SECRETARY CARLISLE presented a statement to the United States Senate, last Thursday, showing that owing to the falling off in business and declines in the importation of dutiable goods and raw material, the government will be in danger of facing a deficit of from fifty to seventy-five million dollars the coming year. In connection with this probability we hear of a rise in whisky trust stock caused by the rumor that the tax on whisky will be advanced to $1.40 per gallon. We would suggest, nay, are continually suggesting, that the vast sums expended annually in the consumption of narcotics and spirits be turned into the channel of legitimate home and government uses. With our expenses for almshouses, penal institutions and such governmental paraphernalia reduced to naught, what threatened form of bankruptcy could shake our financial stability as a nation? Whisky taxation may help to fill the coffers but it can never remove the need.

THE largest audience of the entire Convention week assembled in Columbus Hall Sunday afternoon to hear the "annual sermon" by Lady Henry Somerset. As early as twelve o'clock hundreds of people were standing on the outside steps, awaiting an entrance. If the estimate of three thousand be the seating capacity of the hall, there must have been at least five thousand people in the congregation. The preliminary exercises were simple and appropriate to the day. Mrs. Buell presided as gracefully as she had all the week, and Mrs. Frances Graham, of New York, led the singing. Bishop Newman led in prayer and pronounced the benediction. Lady Henry Somerset took for her text, "And the disciples were called Christians first at Antioch" (Acts 11:26) and preached upon the vital question, "What is it to be a Christian?" giving it a most practical turn, as befitted the occasion. It was a beautiful discourse, one which made a profound impression, and will be published in full in the Convention number.

As we go to press (two days late this week) the daily papers contain an account of an ambushed attack said to have been made by a party of respected and Christian women of Osceola, Neb., on six disreputable young women whose actions have been openly, immorally flagrant and exasperating. Whether the event is correctly reported by the press, the trial of the case will doubtless prove, for all the assailants have been arrested and have given bonds for their appearance in court. The promoters of the attack are said to belong to the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of the state. In regard to this, we feel safe in saying that no loyal, worthy member of our organization ever permitted herself to be drawn into such a revolting act as this reported white-cap tar and feather method for removing any evil. Such an underhanded, dastardly attack as this is reported to be is entirely foreign to the policy and principles of our union, and one to be denounced by Christian workers everywhere. We will give our readers a full explanation next week, and in the meantime advise them not to be hasty in believing this report, because they "read it in the papers."

LADY HENRY SOMERSET'S statement concerning Miss Willard is of deep interest to all white-ribboners: "I wish to tell you that there is hope for all who love her in the absolute certainty that if she will follow the prescription that has been laid down for her, a prescription by no means easy to such a brain and such a heart, and if you will help her to carry out that prescription, I believe we can speak with a certainty, as far as any human events are concerned, that she will be given back to you with completely restored health and strength. It is a great difficulty to her to rest. Many women, since I landed on this shore, have come to me with the natural question, 'Why cannot Miss Willard rest upon our shores where we would have her within hail and see her face and reach out to her once in a while?' Just for that reason. So many would reach out to her: so many, just one want, would be brought to her, just one question that she must settle, that rest would be impossible for her, and only the faithful friend of all these, the trusted Anna Gordon, knows how hard a task we have in a place in which she is severed by the great ocean from interests which are as dear to her as life, how great a task we have to make her rest, and how impossible would be the task if she were within hail and reach."

A SIGNAL triumph for W. C. T. U. principles was reported in the Convention by Miss Lucia Kimball, Sup't of Sunday-school work. After many years of seeking the coöperation of Sunday-school authorities and the consequent securing of temperance quarterly lessons in the international series, we rejoice to learn that the tables are turned and these authorities are now seeking us. Mr. Chas. Waters, Sec. of the London Sunday-school union, asks our coöperation in securing a temperance Sunday not only for the school but for the church also; and Mr. W. H. Dietz has formulated a plan for a Temperance Day for the children of America (such as "Children's day" is now in the churches) in the interest of which he seeks the support of our organization. His plan was presented to the General Assembly of the Presbyterian church, which resolved that "a day be observed as a day of prayer for the success of the cause of temperance, and that our churches, ministers and Sabbath schools be requested to observe this day by such services as shall be best fitted to rouse and interest in the subject and secure sound biblical instruction thereon." We rejoice that the church is thus preparing for a vigorous attack upon its most powerful enemy. It is "coming right along" and ere long will see eye to eye with its most powerful ally, the W. C. T. U., upon the great question of the liquor traffic at the baliot box as well as in the Sunday-school room.

HE SUFFICETH.

BY JOSEPH COOK.

Soul whom dazzled ages scan,
Man in God and God in man.
Who sees Him the Father sees,
Who loves Him with God agrees.

Bliss were it to see afar
What Time's coming wonders are;
But One Highest hath been here;
Higher never shall appear.

Sinless soul with God made one,
Seen but once beneath the sun.
With that vision we content,
Futures veiled do not lament.

Every star about Him wheels;
Every penitent He heals;
Higher than the highest, He,
Son and soul of Deity.

We are sinful and undone;
God and man the Christ makes one;
Rebels, perjured, lawless, we;
Ransom, Ruler, Healer, He.

Father, Son and Holy Ghost.
With Thy ransomed, heavenly host,
Give us grace for evermore.
Thee to know, obey, adore.

MARK KEITH'S ESCAPE.

II.

BY HELEN CAMPBELL.

(Concluded.)

Why had Lyman not asked Mark where he was going and settled some way of communication? How was he to go on alone? Lyman asked himself. Mark had gone out alone into the night.

"If you keep on sulking like this, I'll have a warrant for you as accessory before the fact," roared Elder Simmons suddenly, as the morning had nearly gone. "It's more'n likely you know where he is, anyhow."

"I wish I did," said Lyman with a groan. "I'd see that he stayed there out of your clutches, anyhow. See here, Uncle Simmons," he went on, regardless of the snarl that came from the furious Elder. "Would you drop the warrant and settle if I'd pay the money to you?"

"You! Where are you to get the money?"

"I've got part already and I'll earn the rest."

"How much?"

Lyman hesitated. It was useless to tell unless a bargain could be made.

"Will you drop it?" he repeated.

"No," said the Elder after a pause, "I won't. If you put the whole into my hand I'll drop it, but till you do I'll hunt him if it takes six times the money. He'd ought to swing and he would a-swung once for less than that. Not that I have feelings unbecoming my profession," he added after a moment as Lyman's steady eyes, full of deep contempt, rested on him. "It's righteous anger and I'm ready enough to renounce it when I see reason."

Lyman was silent. He could not argue with him, and indeed he was too miserable, nor did the pain lessen as days went on, bringing no word of Mark, each more lonely than the last.

"He's guilty, of course," people said, as they still discussed the theft. "He wouldn't have run if he hadn't been," and fight as he might, Lyman could make no headway against this conviction. The Elder had paid the money, snarling as he counted out the dollars, and vowing fresh vengeance.

"Barlow's good on tracking," he said one day. "He'd ought to get on the trail somehow. Where is Barlow, anyhow? This ain't the time o' year for a hunt."

"Ezra Bean said Joel was smitten with a gal up in the North Woods—Fowler's gal—and he'd been hangin' round there considerable," said one of the men who formed part of the knot whose evenings were spent in the village store. "Joel's a good lookin' fellow as you'll see, but powerful shiftless, and Fowler wouldn't look at him. What Fowler said was, that if Joel could prove he'd ever had ten dollars to onct, he'd know he could ag'in, and wouldn't stand out ag'in Nancy, but Joel's jest as likely to bring out ten elephants as ten dollars, and that's what I said to Fowler."

Lyman had heard all this but thought no more of it till the next afternoon, when Joel passed him on the street with a look so unlike his usual easy swagger, that Lyman puzzled over it for hours; a look that held shamefaced humility, and a sort of fear never before seen on the good-natured, happy-go-lucky face.

"What does he mean?" thought Lyman, as Joel slunk by without a word, and "What does he mean?" he repeated at intervals, till, far in the night, he rose with a bound that sent the old cat flying from the foot of the mattress and cried, "Great Scott! That's it! Thank goodness it's Sunday!"

By daylight Lyman was off. Joel might not be in his hut at the edge of the North Woods, but he was somewhere, and to be found if it took all day. Crackers and cheese were in his pockets. He whistled as he went. Evidently something was coming and he ran and jumped, to the consternation of a pair of squirrels who had run down to the end of a bough, and chattered fiercely at the intruder. Something was there a little farther on; a dark figure sitting doubled over on a log, and looking up with the same strange expression of abject humility that had roused Lyman's curiosity the day before—Joel himself.

Lyman sat down and eyed him for a moment. Joel grew red, then pale, hung his head, and then gave himself a great shake like a wet dog emerging from a pond, a look of sudden resolution on his face.

"I know all about it," Lyman began.

"You don't know as much as you will when I'm done," said Joel with a gulp. "You stop right there. I'm going on. I declare to gracious, Lyman, I ain't such a cur as you think. It's only I couldn't see no way to get out of it and the devil himself put it into my head. 'Twas Nancy I wanted. I swore off from drink and everything to git her, and old man Fowler said he wouldn't let me have her onless I could prove I'd had ten dollars to onct. I was in the store when the Elder was counting out that money. I seen that roll, and I said, I'll borrow that roll and put it back somehow, this very night, but I'll take out ten dollars of it and cut over to old man Fowler, and tell him there's his ten dollars and more to come, and I sneaked it out when your back was turned and Mark not noticin'. And then Bill Bean said old man Fowler wan't to home, and I hid it in the woodshed and watched a chance to git it back for I was scared enough to die after all, and before I'd done a thing, up starts the Elder and says it's gone and it's Mark, and Lord help us, I didn't know what to do! I hain't been near Nancy sence, jest by way o' punishment. Can't you put it back, Lyman? I ain't a thief. I'd do anything for you or Mark. I set a sight o' store by you."

"Great store when you'd let three weeks go on, and not a word, you sneak!" said Lyman.

Joel bowed his head.

"Cut in," he said, "I am a sneak, but I vow I was here tryin' to get courage to go and tell. I'll go to the minister. He's a good man and maybe he'll help us out."

"'Twon't bring Mark back," said Lyman whose spirits fell again at the thought. "You've done for him."

"No I hain't," said Joel. "I know where he is but I ain't to tell how nor where. He's fifty miles off, an' another name, an' helpin' hay on a big farm. I'll go after him if I ain't tied up in jail, but the Elder ain't no bowels o' compassion, and I'm sure to be."

"The minister will tackle him," said Lyman, whose face had cleared and who rose with a bound. "Come on, Joel! I ain't going to lay up anything, if you did do a mean thing."

"Wait till your own turn comes," said Joel, who had straightened up once more, but whose face bore a look of eager penitence. "A man makes a fool of himself for a girl, but I vow I'm done with any nonsense forever,—if Nancy'll have me after this," he added dejectedly.

An hour later to the scandal of the congregation as it came out of the church, Joel Barlow and Lyman Kinnicutt came down the street and went boldly up to the minister himself, who turned shocked and startled eyes upon them.

"It's a work of mercy, sir," said Lyman, "and you'll say so when you've heard. Mayn't we go home with you? Joel's something to tell you, sir."

The old minister asked no questions. A stern faith had not killed the human side in him, and though he shook his head as he listened, his own eyes moistened as he saw a tear roll slowly over Joel's cheek, and fall on his rough hands, twisted together in his earnestness.

"There's the darned roll," the hunter ended, pulling it from some secret hiding-place, "an' may I never see another onless I've earned it. I vow I'm goin' to try. I ain't as bad as you think I be, Parson Whittlesey, an' I'll go to jail if I must."

"I think we can hinder that," said the old minister. "I will deliver this to-morrow but not on the Lord's day, and you are to promise not to go in hiding, friend Joel, but wait like a man for what is to come."

"I'd ruther set out for Mark," said Joel. "I swear I never put that dollar in his chest. It must a fallen under the counter somehow, and got rolled up in the bed-clothes. I'd ruther start for him an' it's a work o' mercy, too, as Lyman said about your listenin.'"

"I am not quite clear in my mind," Parson Whittlesey began, but Joel had already disappeared, swinging with great strides, like a man from whom a mighty burden had been removed, out toward the North Woods.

How did it end? Popular opinion was too strong for the fierce old Elder who faced his minister down, that Joel should go to prison, but renounced the plan at last, as, three days later, Mark and the abject, yet triumphant Joel entered the village and walked boldly down the street. Lyman took his friend's hand silently, a lump in his throat hindering other greeting, and the elder gave a reluctant nod as every small boy in town and some of the older ones, hurrahed themselves hoarse. It did not stop here. The sheriff himself, and old Judge Dunscomb, said that the boys should have a chance for Dartmouth, and Lyman and Mark, in September, said good-by to the village and turned their faces toward the new life, earning in all ways that every New England boy knows as possible, most of the money for the four years that followed. To-day the years are behind them. The North Woods were levelled long ago. Nancy and Joel Barlow, church members of twenty years standing, lie in the old churchyard where the grim Elder and the gentle old minister have also their place, and Lyman Kinnicutt, chief justice of a famous state, and Mark Keith, minister of a great church in a great city, go there now and then and spell out the old names and look up to the pines, under which it will, by and by, be their turn to lie, friends to the end and their children friends after them.

THE ARMY CO-OPERATIVE BEER SALOON.

A Little History Concerning one of Them.

BY FRANK ROBERTS.

During the month of July, 1892, there was opened at Fort Apache, Arizona, an institution known in official reports as the Post Exchange. Prior to this opening the sale of "beer and light wine" was in the hands of the post trader, and no member of the garrison could obtain anything unless on an order signed by an officer. This system had been in force for a considerable time, and, under it, the supply of drink to the men could be really controlled.

Shortly before the actual opening an attempt had been made to establish a canteen, but it had failed. Such a matter had to be submitted to the body of officers known as the Post Council of Administration, and according to army regulations the chaplain was a member of this body. He is a Methodist, and a pronounced opponent to the sale or use of intoxicating liquors. To get rid of him, the Post Commander wrote a letter to the authorities which resulted in a reply from the Adjutant General stating, with reference to the sitting of post chaplains on the council when it was about to deal with matters in connection with Post Exchanges, "that it is advisable that they be not thus detailed." This in open defiance of the regulations, and as a result, the starting of the institution was authorized, and the opening took place as above stated.

The paymaster visits this post every second month for the purpose of paying the troops, and it was arranged that his arrival should be the signal for the grand opening. The garrison at this time consisted of almost one hundred and sixty persons. The beer was supplied in bottles in barrels, the post being ninety miles from the railroad depot, and this being the only way it could well be sent. Each barrel contained seventy-two bottles, and on the first night ten barrels, or 720 bottles were sold. In the first thirty-six hours, up to Sunday morning, over one thousand four hundred bottles had gone, and terrible were the cravings of the beer-soaked and drunken soldiers as they had to face a dry Sunday.

Now, in dealing with this matter, I would like the people to know that one of the worst features in connection with all this drinking is the conduct of the men, when under its influence, in their quarters. There the nuisances committed, profane and filthy language indulged in, and general conduct of these men is past all description, and must be seen to be believed. The officers are supposed to visit the quarters, and this is generally done about nine o'clock a. m. After this it is seldom one is seen about the quarters, most of the non-commissioned officers are either drinking or drunk themselves—nay, often go the length of stating on parade that they want no complaints brought to them.

The post trader, commenting on the enormous sale of beer on this opening night and following day, and the consequent disgraceful scenes, remarked that his eyes had been opened, and there was evidence from his manner that it was truly so. From comparisons it was ascertained that the sales at the government institution were, now the men had free license, considerably more than double those ever made any previous pay-day.

This consumption of beer may appear startling, considering that about thirty-five or forty members of the garrison did not enter the canteen, and it may be thought that it was exceptional, the men giving way to their overflow of spirits now that they were no longer restricted in the matter of getting their drinks; but at the November pay-day there were sold eight hundred bottles in one day, at twenty-five cents a bottle. And as a sequence to the "beneficial results" obtained by stopping the sale at the post trader's and establishing the post exchange, where the authorities can have the men "under better control," one man, in a drunken row, had his wrist cut open to the bone, several fights took place, an attempt was made to murder a man by stabbing with a knife, one man was knocked down with a stick of cordwood, and an Indian woman was assaulted by two soldiers belonging to Company F, 11th Infantry.

At first it was not thought advisable to allow the soldiers belonging to the Indian company to have access to the beer saloon, but this was soon altered; the Indian was no longer an Indian, as such, but an enlisted soldier, and why should he be deprived of the privilege of getting drunk? So another element and a dangerous one was added to the fighting propensities of the men when crazed with beer. The vicinity of the canteen became a veritable bedlam, and was the subject of remark by many residents in the post, citizens as well as soldiers. No decent person dared venture near it, and it became necessary to place non-commissioned officers on special duty inside or around the canteen to be on the watch for trouble.

It is needless to go over each succeeding pay-day and its results. Things have gone on from bad to worse. Men get drunk, but very little notice is taken of it. A sergeant, in charge of the guard, got helplessly drunk and was so found by the officer of the day. He was placed under arrest, but shortly afterwards released; and it may be remarked that the officer of the day on this occasion was also his company commander, and the officer in charge of the canteen. Men get drunk and are taken to the guard house, but not for trial. Occasionally one may so far commit himself that it becomes necessary to bring him before a court; but in most of the cases the men are confined till sober, or nearly so—kept in just long enough to intensify their craving for another drink, as they are getting over the effects—and then released, only to fly to the beer counter and get drunk again.

There has happened the tragedy depicted in my last article—a man rendered unaccountable for his actions by the "control" exercised over him which allowed of his keeping on a prolonged drunk, spending over three dollars a day for several days preceding the crisis, and then blowing his brains out, after nearly murdering two companions who were with him;—this last July pay-day an Indian has been bodily thrown out of the canteen, and, as a result, the whole Indian company lined the road at the back of the quarters, armed with bottles and stones, and so threatening was their attitude that no white soldier dared attempt a passage that way. Citizens are looking for an outbreak between these rival races at any time, and each pay-day, with its attendant drunken orgies, seems to bring such a catastrophe within the bounds of possibility —almost of certainty. And yet the large majority of army officers, and even some of the chaplains, are defenders of this system. Why?

ENGLISH PATENTS TO WOMEN.

BY HELEN BLACKBURN.

It was said and repeated and believed that women never invented. The rapid increase in women's patents is clear evidence that it was opportunity rather than faculty that lacked. Modern facilities for knowledge and communication have brought to the front a quite remarkable number of inventions by women.

The earliest English patent known was granted by King Edward III., after a commission of inquiry, to two aldermen in order that they and their assigns should have the sole right of making the Philosopher's Stone.

The existing record of patents begins in 1617 with one granted to Aaron Rathborne for engraving and printing maps, etc.

The first in the list granted to a woman is number 104, year 1637, to Amye Everard, widow, for preparing tincture of saffron, roses, etc.,—"her own and sole invention." The next woman mentioned is in 1638, Sara Jerome, who patented an "engine" for cutting wood into thin pieces for making bandboxes and sword-sheaths. In the latter half of the 17th century the names of five women are recorded; in the 18th century are found ten; in the first half of the 19th century (up to 1852) there are 42.

The number of patents taken out increases steadily each year, marking the steps of education, civilization, wealth and luxury, and the proportion of these granted to women remained, until lately, much the same; within the last five years the proportion has increased.

During the ten years preceding 1883 the average number of patents annually was 3,506, in the first three months after the Act was in force the number issued was 5,748, and last year (1892) it was over 24,000.

Of these, the number granted to women during the last eight years are as follows: 1884, 36; 1885, 85; 1886, 99; 1887, 110; 1888, 247; 1889, 262; 1890, 276; 1891, 302; 1892, 364.

The variety of these patents is not less remarkable than their number. As might be expected by far the largest proportion are connected with dress and toilet arrangements for women and children, household matters, education, games, nursing, needlework and decorations. But they are not confined to such domestic subjects. Thus, in 1838, Anne Bird Byerley took out a patent for obtaining motive power. Patents have been granted to women for improvements in looms, in machines for cutting corks, in tools for making blocks and pins for rigging, also in locks, bolts and screws. Improvements in sewing machines, type-writers, bicycles, etc. The list of women's patents also contains such unexpected subjects as steam boilers, apparatus for distilling, guns, horse-shoes, stirrups, railway sleepers, lights and other appliances, agricultural implements, electric and hydraulic machines, etc. One hundred and sixty years ago, Elizabeth Coppin had a patent for "extracting silver from mundic and fluxing it into a metal"; to-day, Miss Elizabeth Parnell has one for "an amalgamator for extracting gold from refractory ores." The plans and drawings for this are amongst the Chicago exhibits.

The smaller, but not less useful, and often more profitable inventions for everyday use, such as pencil holders, traveling bags, note books, door handles, parcel covers, etc., are innumerable.

A group of models of recent English women's patents will be found in the Handicraft Section of the English women's department at the "White City." These models collected by Messrs. Eli and Hughes for the Handicraft's sub-committee are necessarily a fraction merely of the patents taken out in the last twelve months; nevertheless, they exemplify a diversity of effort and an ingenuity of application which indicate a fund of inventive power in women. Among them Miss Barron's combination dress-stand and fire escape is especially worthy of notice for its ingenuity and practicality. The same may be said of Mrs. Kesteven's carving fork, a noiseless coal-box for an invalid's room, a bed rest with arms and pillows, a traveling box which can be expanded into a hanging wardrobe, are all inventions born of practical needs. Particularly inviting to lazy or busy people is Miss Hungerford's instantaneous method of lacing boots and gaiters; also to any one in the habit of losing their umbrella, Mrs. Malcolmson's umbrella holder will be a useful adaptation of the principle of the sword sheath to the peaceful umbrella.

In the Educational Section several women's patents are displayed, all tending to lessen the labor of the teacher and increase the interest of the pupil. Among these may be noted a skeleton celestial globe showing the apparent movement of the heavenly bodies, as a help to the study of elementary astronomy. Others which will repay examination are Miss Osborne Moore's "Philographs" —simple, mechanical instruments containing neither lens nor prism, calculated to very greatly facilitate exactness in drawing of all kinds—portraits, architecture, landscapes, etc., etc. These instruments will not admit of description by a few brief words, but will be readily understood by examination of the models. The "Line Divider," invented by Miss Marks, is of interest not only for the simplicity of the arrangement by which any given line may be divided into any required number of aliquot parts, but also as being one of the first inventions emanating from the brain of a Girton graduate.

These examples may seem but few, but it must be borne in mind that they have been chosen not so much with a view to quantity as to showing that women's inventions abound in originality, although women cannot—any more than men—produce original work until they are brought to a level with the knowledge of their days.

[Mrs. Mary S. Lockwood also sent a paper to the Patents Congress, read by Miss Octavia W. Bates, in which the following statement is made.—Ed.]

"There is not a piece of ancient pottery in the National American Museum from the pre-historic tombs, from the ancient Pueblos, from the pre-historic cliff dwellers, from the burial pottery of Nicaragua, but carries the graceful touch of woman's hand. Every step in this experience flashed a light along the corridors of time that gave the key which unlocked the thought of late centuries to a Palissy, a Wedgewood, a McLaughlin.

"Palissy wrought and struggled with poverty and want to catch the inspiration of his enamel, which took sixteen years of experiments to crown with victory. Miss McLaughlin held on to the old thought of the fore-world, nurtured it, fostered it, caressed it, until suggestions came in rhythmic rhyme, and wrought the grand success of the McLaughlin enamel. The Rockwood potteries of Cincinnati are the object lessons of woman's perseverance and victory.

"Since the Patent Office was established in 1790, a little more than one hundred years ago, there have been between three and four thousand patents issued by women, covering all degrees of complexity and ingenuity. They have gone from cradles to baby-jumpers, from a pencil sharpener to a type-writer, for those who can see and those who are blind, from knitting-needles to circular knitting-machines, from the hour-glass to stem-winding watches, from the sewing bird to sewing-machines. She has patented hand carriages, stock cars, car coupling and sound deadening attachments for elevated railways. She has gone from siphon propelling pumps to ozone machines, from electro-therapeutic appliances to machinery for welding, hardening and tempering steel.

"The deft fingers and active brain of woman went to work upon the old idea Queen Lydia used when she taught Hercules to spin, and improved upon it in this nineteenth century forty times, and set forty spindles humming in place of one.

"From needles of bone and wood used by these savage fore-women, with which they stitched the long day through making hats, mats and garments of straw, comes Mrs. C. with her sewing machine and curved needle. She has caught the nineteenth century inspiration and makes a hundred stitches where one was made before. 'Tis the old idea improved upon a hundred-fold.

"This is followed by Mrs. Harriet Ruth Tracey with a notable invention of a rotary shuttle, lock and chain stitch sewing machine, whose lower bobbin carries over one thousand yards of thread, an achievement that has baffled a generation of masculine inventors."

[It is important to note that the world has held four Congresses or Conventions for Patents and Inventions. The first was in Madrid, the second in Vienna, the third in Paris, and the fourth during the first week of October, in Chicago, in the great World's Congress Auxiliary, where for the first time woman was admitted and held equal place of honor with man.—Eds.]

COLUMBIAN CRUMBS.

BY B. V. CUSHMAN, M. D.

ELECTRICITY IN THE HOME.

"The American Myth," represented in the Art Building by a nude figure holding a telephone receiver to her ear, exquisitely moulded in flesh colored marble, has figured a good deal in domestic life for ten years. She has "answered the bell," and "ordered the marketing" by means of electric "button" and "diaphragm," and performed her service so faithfully and accurately, that she is about to be installed as cook and furnace boy.

The exhibit of cooking and heating apparatus on the southwest gallery of Electricity Building is simply witchcraft. The wizard in charge turned a thumbscrew, settled back upon one foot a minute, and then daintily poured a spoonful of batter upon the polished slab that a moment before I had leaned upon. Lo, the characteristic hiss! A deft turn of her knife and the golden surface came in sight, and then, while I was still open-eyed, open-mouthed and shivering with wonder, she transferred that millennial pancake to a china plate, buttered and sugared it and bade me eat. It was no hypnotic phantom, but a feathery flap-jack, good to fill the stomach and cheer the heart in cold mornings soon to come. There was no fire in the building, no hint of where the heat came from, no connection of the griddle with anything tangible save a cold cord that you might have mistaken for a strand of druggists' wrapping twine. One thing in passing I want to tell you that you may try it. The priestess of that electric griddle assured me that it is quite unnecessary to use grease in baking cakes if you never begin to grease a griddle. If smooth at the start and properly heated the dough will not stick. The one she used is polished like a flat-iron, and she keeps it clean by rubbing with a dry cloth. She could not say whether an old griddle could be cleaned until sufficiently smooth, but think of all the blue smoke avoided if "hot buckwheats" can be baked without grease, and try it.

I learned all the practical points I could, for I am much in accord with a bride I know who says: "I shall not go to housekeeping until I can have electricity for cooking." Cost of course comes first. An outfit capable of doing the cooking for a family of six costs $60. If water-heater, boiler and flat-irons are added the expense will be about one hundred dollars. An extra long kitchen table will hold the whole outfit. Connection must be made with the plant furnishing the town with electricity, as storage battery will not run this apparatus. Where the current is made by water power it is as cheap as coal, but more expensive where produced by means of steam or chemicals. The difficulty in price will not long stand in the way of American invention. Let it be known that a thing is desirable, that the people want it, and the inventive genius of the times soon puts it within their reach.

The advantages of cooking by electricity are beyond doubt. The oven made of Russia iron, lined with wood and asbestos, allows no radiation of heat into the room. It can be heated to three hundred degrees in ten minutes, or reduced to two hundred degrees in five minutes. Most of its baking is done by retained heat, that is, the oven is heated to three hundred, or for a thirty pound roast of beef, to four hundred degrees. Ten minutes after putting in the meat the current should be turned off, and in two and one half hours it will be done perfectly, in full flavor with all juices preserved. The oven has glass doors and a light jet inside, so the contents can be seen without opening. The heat is alike at top and bottom, and basting unnecessary.

The wires are coiled on the bottom of each vessel, and incandescent heat is produced by the current passing through. Steak may be broiled in four minutes by perfectly even heat. All the squibs about which of the young pair shall start the fire will be "chestnuts" when the movement of a screw "turns on" the teakettle. Even the flat-iron has its private wire, and will smooth miles of muslin, maintaining uniform heat as long as the current is on. Think of it, no more smoky irons, no more raking fires and scrubbing hands afterward, no more yellowing of garments because the iron was too hot.

Another thing too often forgotten is that every gas jet consumes as much oxygen as half a dozen people, and coal is equally avaricious of the life property of the air, besides poisoning it to some extent with its own noxious gases, while electricity makes no demands upon the atmosphere.

Then my lady closed one switch and opened another by means of the mystic button, and heat began to flow from a table, I had turned toward not a biting furnace blast but the soft even zephyr that one expects from hot-water pipes. That was the parlor heater, prototype of the twentieth century fireside, around which the young husband of to-day will gather his grandchildren and tell them: "When I was a boy, my job before school in the winter was to rake down and carry out the ashes from three base burners—base they were!—and fill them up with coal for the day. When I went to housekeeping we had a furnace which got all the stoves into one and I spilled ashes on the basement floor instead of the parlor carpet. That was an improvement, but it was nothing like getting your fuel through a wire, and lighting it by pressing a button. 'Pears to me everything now-a-days is calculated to make boys lazy!"

The funniest sight I saw in all that wizard's den was the CHICKENS HATCHING BY ELECTRICITY.

Yes, actually hatching! One pecked the end off his shell while I stood there; another was staggering toward the bulb that furnished dim light and modulated heat; a third had snuggled his wet back up against the warm glass and gone to sleep, while a dozen of a few hours' age were scampering about. The good-natured exhibitor brought one of the latter out to me, and I had the luxury of cuddling under my chin a real live downy chick. Be sure I made the most of him. Down on the floor was the brooder, a wire frame covered by the American flag fringed around the edge to feel like feathers when chicky crawls in. Another electric arrangement supplies the warmth, and the motherless brood nestles together and goes to sleep.

Electric incubator may hatch a larger percentage of eggs and raise a larger percentage of chickens, but at its best it is an orphan asylum. "Old Glory" doesn't call the bed-time like a motherly old hen. It doesn't cluck and give them the little scoldings and tender peckings that all chicks need. Electricity-bred chickens keep late hours, and are sure to be "tough."

"Christopher Columbus," a dignified Muscovy, waddling about the floor, has the honor to be the first duck hatched and raised by the new method. He landed his caravel August nineteenth, and, at this writing, six weeks old, is apparently well and happy. A card on his coop reads, "Who cares for mother now?"

exhibited by charts, photographs of buildings, and printed statements are full of practical suggestion. The Self Help Association, founded by Queen Louisa of Sweden in 1869, offers inducement to working people to save a part of their earnings. As soon as one's deposits amount to twenty-five dollars the association adds twenty per cent. It is supported by gifts from the king and queen, and is a good example to our untitled kings and queens. Sofia, the present royal lady of Sweden, is the patron of a home for women prisoners just released, in which they are admitted for religious moral and industrial training. When ready, the Home assists them to find employment. In this way about three hundred and fifty women have been reclaimed from criminality.

In Sweden much practical temperance work is done through the Parish Temperance Unions. A Scandinavian Sailors' Home in London has the joint support of Princesses of Sweden, Norway, Denmark and Wales, and is superintended by Mrs. Welin. It is a true shelter for seamen. All sorts of business is done in its office. The Board of Trade gives authority to fit out ships and to pay seamen their wages on presentation of a stamped record of their time of service from the muster office. Afterward the Home and the muster office square their accounts. Generally Mrs. Welin takes care of "the boys'" money while they are in port, and so thousands of pounds have been saved from the public houses and sent home to families.

France displays an unexpected number of Protestant charities, as the Maternity Supply, which helps poor mothers, furnishing baby clothing and, if necessary, food and shelter during confinement. Poor children are taught in some of these institutions, preparing them for skilled service. The fresh air mission, which is new with us, is a dozen or more years old in the great cities of France.

Of the many inventions and exhibits of women I have no space to speak, save only of the work of the women of Winnebago county, Illinois, represented by five hundred dollars raised to secure lodgings near the grounds for one hundred and fifty-six working women during eight days, thus giving them an opportunity to see the great Fair.

LUCY STONE.

BY H. B. K.

There is something singularly suggestive in the going away of Lucy Stone, at the close of the most wonderful six months' exposition of the evolution of the woman's cause the world has ever known. Many who read these lines saw her for the last time in the great Woman's Congress in May, where hundreds took her hand and rejoiced that she had lived to witness the crowning hour for which she had worked and suffered so many weary years. No face was so restful in its content, so peaceful in its calm joy as hers. It seemed to say, "It is finished; I have lived to see it, I am satisfied."

It is suggestive, too, this day when the social questions all hinge more or less upon the farmer's interests, that the brave, strong life of a farmer's daughter should be filling the world's heart with admiration and the world's eye with tears. She is a remarkable demonstration that the hardy qualities which have always been this nation's "standing army" find rankest development in the simple, natural life of the American farm. If her going emphasizes anew the jealous nurture due from this government, to its agricultural interests that protection of its rural classes and improvement of their condition is but buckling of armor over the nation's heart, Lucy Stone will say, as so often before, "I count it not loss if larger life comes thereby to the multitude."

Yours sincerely Lucy Stone

When she was born near West Brookfield, Mass., in the high-noon of the summer of 1818, the eighth of nine children, the new baby was even a regret to the overworn mother, who said: "Oh, dear! I am sorry it is a girl, a woman's life is so hard."

Her keen child-vision soon took note of the inequalities of the man and woman side of family life, and she made up her mind if this was by law the law must be changed. She wanted to die when her child eyes first read in the Bible the words, "Thy desire shall be to thy husband and he shall rule over thee." Then she determined to go to college and probe the correctness of this text by learning the Scriptures in the original. Alice Stone Blackwell, her daughter, tells that she picked berries and chestnuts to pay for her tuition, studied and taught alternately, and in Oberlin College did housework in the ladies' boarding hall at three cents an hour to pay her expenses, cooking her food in her own room, boarding herself at a cost of fifty cents a week. She was twenty-five years old before she had earned enough to enter this starvation sort of a life at the only college which then admitted women.

Lucy Stone gave her first lecture on equality of women at Gardner, Mass., in her brother's church, in 1847. After this her connection with the anti-slavery society brought her prominently before the public, in which work her efforts did not relax, notwithstanding assaults of mobs, being played upon with a hose while speaking, and frequent hootings and wild scoffing. It is related that while speaking with Stephen Foster, a big man with a club rushed upon the platform. She quietly said: "You had better go, Stephen; they are coming;" and turning to the man with the club sweetly said: "This gentleman will take care of me." And "the gentleman" tucked her under one arm, mounted her on a stump and stood by her with his club while she addressed the mob.

She had always intended not to marry, but Henry Blackwell, a hardware merchant of Cincinnati, pursued his suit so pertinaciously for three years, insisting that he could render her life work more effective, that in 1855 she married him, on condition that she should not sink her individuality by taking Mr. Blackwell's name. So, through all the years of an ideal married life, to her family and the world she has been just "Lucy Stone." Their daughter bears the name of both parents, Alice Stone Blackwell.

The earliest and most constant protest of Lucy Stone was against the common law of Massachusetts, and many other states, which handed over a woman on her marriage day to her husband—person, property, liberty to buy or sell, to make contracts, or hold her own earnings, even the child she had begotten at the pledge of her own life. Against tradition, wealth and custom for more than forty years she fought in the legislature and courts before the women of Massachusetts had a right to their own wages and to more of their husband's property than would barely support life—at the reckoning made for county paupers; (a decision of court).

As editor jointly with Henry Blackwell, assisted by their gifted daughter, of the Woman's Journal, Lucy Stone displayed rare ability, discrimination, and profound knowledge of all the spots—legal, political or human—upon the condition of woman, and an equally keen sense of her possibilities. Her mind was preëminently logical, and with it was combined a rare sweetness of spirit that won her cause where justice failed.

During the National W. C. T. U. Convention at Boston some of the delegates held a memorable reunion at Lucy Stone's invitation in the parlors of the Woman's Journal. Many of them have since said: "That reception was the best part of the whole Convention." The gentle serenity, the leisure from herself which allowed Lucy Stone to listen to others, won the hearts of women everywhere. No more attractive pattern of a life, in this respect, can be given to women who enter reform work. To be as ready to hear as to speak, to be as courteous to the yet unknown follower as to the distinguished leader, to be easily approachable is the sine qua non for that one who would win great causes.

Lucy Stone's was a majestic life. It had all the power of a great object, of a purpose as strong and unswerving as gravitation. It had all the calmness of the certainty of truth and its final triumph, and it kept the unruffled sweetness of one having unwavering faith in others, and who believed of herself:

"Greater than any fact,
My wish that failed of act."

All the world is better, will ever be better, for that strong, true life that so gently loosed its fetters the other day at Dorchester, Mass. The men whom she taught to be more just, the women whom she taught to be more true to themselves, those "gone before" and those left here send on a cheer with Lucy Stone, entering into her well-earned rest in the kingdom of certainties and rewards.

THE DUTCH W. C. T. U., AND FOURTH TOTAL ABSTINENCE CONGRESS.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—Among the zealous total abstainers a good many had but a poor expectation of the results of this Congress, as it was well known that so many of the chief leaders were rather averse to the principles and aims of total abstainers. Such prognostications of the pessimist order are too often reversed by the facts. The truth has a power of its own, and everywhere that people are looking out for promoting some good for others rather than for themselves, the interchange of thoughts and views will seldom lose or fail to secure benevolence and sympathy.

So it proved at The Hague. On each side of the question the speakers were in great earnestness and spoke powerfully, but no words were heard of an offensive character, and such as were far from being propitious to total abstinence repeatedly said: "What is uniting our endeavors is more than what makes a division." Moreover, I have been peculiarly pleased with the kind reception given from all sides to Mrs. Selmer. Repeatedly she spoke in French and English, and in both languages as fluently and correctly as if they had been her mother tongue. Much as her friends admire her, scarcely less was the tribute of praise paid her from the other side, though on each occasion she gave her mind fully, and this not only as a total abstainer but even as a faithful believer in the Gospel of Christ.

It was the book and the blessed work of a Christian lady, Mrs. Julia B. Wightman, of Shrewsbury, that in 1861 induced me, after having been from 1844 an abstainer from spirits to become a total abstainer. Every year had showed me more evidently that the first principle was quite powerless to win the working classes to a sober and religious life. An inner struggle, whether total abstinence was not against the spirit of the gospel, was brought to an end by the sudden conviction created in my conscience by the light gained through the precious book, "Haste to the Rescue." The same day convinced and gave me the full assurance that teetotalism, and that only, was the powerful way to lead to a radical change in the home and religious life of our working and even well-to-do classes.

Since that day I never have neglected to fix the attention of the women of our country on the great things it has pleased God to accomplish in England and America, and more and more over the whole extent of the globe by women united in the gospel work of total abstinence. I have written quite a series of life sketches of the heroines of our war for a clear brain and a happy home. After having been gladdened by the event that a Miss De Ranitz, of Groningen, was immediately persuaded by my translation of "Haste to the Rescue," to follow Mrs. Wightman's example, I felt sure that by relating labors and triumphs of Miss Marsh, Mrs. Daniel, Mother Stewart, Miss Weston, Miss Robinson, Miss Willard, Lady Henry Somerset and many others, a day of a general awakening was to follow among Christian women, glorious evidences that God's grace is working most powerfully through His weakest co-laborers. A success in this way has been gained by winning my friend, Miss H. M. Scholten, to public speaking on behalf of our cause, an endeavor quite new and not approved in this country, and to win as co-worker Miss M. Vander Goes, a little and rather weak lady, but having a quite miraculous power in influencing the roughest men and older boys. When not long ago she was ill by overwork it was almost a time of rejoicing in the one hundred drinking places she regularly visits each week, the innkeepers hoping never again to see her most unwelcome face.

These small but happy results during thirty years of incessant work made me fully sure that in God's own time a W. C. T. U. would follow. Had not this been my firm persuasion, at my age I would not have the courage to start a weekly paper as the Wereldstryd; but fully sure that the seed was not thrown away, but would bear its fruit, I set to work, wishing that in due time women might find a paper existing of which they might take possession and make it their UNION SIGNAL.

I do not in any way wish to detract from what is accomplished by men. Yet I know of none able to accomplish what has been done by Miss Marsh, Miss Weston and so many others. All these gave themselves wholly, forever and without any other desire than to glorify God and to spread religion and happiness as far as their influence can reach. All that has been done by men is done, and done in a more perfect way, by women; but even if this were otherwise, there is part of the field where only women can have real and permanent success—with girls, the young women and their sisters, fallen by the manifold traps set for them in our corrupted social life.

Feeling for this numerous class, hitherto almost neglected, even by the selfishness of the churches, I rejoice as in a most happy event that the congress as a result has brought about the starting of a Dutch W. C. T. U. And if anything, above all, was filling my soul with thankfulness and joy, it was the fact that without my influence it was again Miss De Ranitz, who has been leading the way. As "Haste to the Rescue" set her to the blessed work she does in Groningen, so it was the "Wereldstryd," of August 5, that proved for her as a call of the Lord Himself to go to the congress (of which she had no intention) and there to try to start a similar work to the one prospering in America and in Great Britain.

In this she has been successful. The foundations have been laid. Even at the first meeting, at which I had the honor to preside, it became evident in how many hearts a longing had existed that a leader might be found whom all might be willing to follow. Who could better have been elected than Miss De Ranitz, who just thirty years ago gave herself wholly to the glorious task that makes her quite a mother in Israel. Not only the union has been started, but at the same time an executive committee is chosen, that promises the best for the new endeavor. This pleasing end of the congress was reached in the room, where as Christian total abstainers we had met every morning.

May the blessing of the Lord rest on the dear laborers and their work, and it soon be visible through the whole land, that the right workers have found the right field for accomplishing the so much needed work to promote the secular and spiritual welfare of the nation.

THE EDUCATION BY CONVENTION.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—The following extract is from a personal letter written to us by a white-ribboner not long ago en route from her first W. C. T. U. convention. It is of interest as showing the wonderfully educative and stimulating powers of our annual gatherings. This is what she says:

"I think my first feeling after I slid quietly into a seat —for train accommodations (?) had made me late in starting—was one of intense satisfaction and pride, satisfaction at being in the good time, and pride for the organization that could call together so many women of such an evident business pattern and withal so womanly as those I saw about me. I studied my program over and over as the train sped to our destination, but ten minutes of study after I got within the convention were worth sixty outside, and before long I had the delightful sensation of being in swing with the movements of the hour. Then I began to take mental notes and continued them throughout the sessions. Do you want to hear a part of the 'conclusion of the whole matter'?

"1. A resolve to urge every fellow-worker in the ranks to attend every convention possible whether it be a great or lesser one. I have been more or less conversant with W. C. T. U. work for over two years, but I tell you frankly, as I would like to tell every one else, I learned more in three days there than in a weary number of days in local work. The latter was, of course, a preparation. I had been mixing and kneading my bread-dough. The Convention was the oven where the process was completed, and I assure you it was 'done brown' and in good shape to carry home.

"2. I had occasion more than once to regret neglected opportunities to read and study concerning our various branches of work. For instance, I never had a natural taste for law and the enactments thereof, but it seemed a very desirable acquisition when one and another of my comrades in the ranks talked intelligently about the enforcement of certain laws and the passage of certain other bills touching the general weal of man and woman. And there I sat unable to 'move' in any direction—handicapped by lamentable ignorance, a lame wheel in the machinery. 'Twon't happen again.

"3. I have read and heard a great deal about the value of a ballot, and I was at once proud and amused and dismayed to see how 'our women' voted. The majority used mature judgment and laid petty personalities aside. But a few voted because they 'liked' or 'could not bear' the candidate in question, some because some one else 'said so,' some followed blindly the popular voice, and yet others idly did not vote. Of all these, I learned my lesson in negatives. One must vote as justice balances her scales with eyes closed that small personal feelings may not interfere with truth.

"4. I was impressed by the educative power of the W. C. T. U. The local union gathers together her material, sifts and sifts until she gets her best talent to work. The county takes this, the best of the grain, and administers it to the district, that to the state, and the state in turn to the National up to the World's where we have a Frances Willard! And all along the line discussion, testing, trying, proving goes on and the standard of woman is creeping higher and higher. God help us to keep step, and between conventions study, study, study—books, papers, men, women and events, and each convention shall bake brown the precious loaves that we may feed the dear stay-at-homes while we prepare a new batch of sweeter bread than ever for the new baking. And may God bless the feasts."

How little what is called success amounts to! It is not peace; it is nothing to the smile of a loving Father. How surely we find that all that is satisfying is in the relation of a child to a Father above.—Gen. Armstrong.

A TRUE Christian faith starts with the truth of a present redemption and leads the man up to personal duties. It takes this poor, indistinguishable atom and says to him: God knows you. To Him you are not only one of the race; He knows you separately; He made you separately. Have you never heard of such a thing as responsibility? Get up; repent. Get the pattern of your life from God, and then go about your work and be yourself.—Phillips Brooks.

All things, whatsoever ye shall ask in prayer believing, ye shall receive.—Matt. 21:22.

Joseph Cook has an epigrammatic style, both in speech and writing, that is rarely surpassed. What could be happier or more forceful than the following, written after his late visit to Chicago, in regard to the Temple, which he and Mrs. Cook visited. He says: "We saw the grand structure of the Temple, and both think it the Hub of the Universe of woman's work for women."

The following beautiful description of the noon prayer-meeting at Willard Hall is from the pen of Mrs. A. M. Wickes, which appeared in New York in the Attica News as follows: "It seemed to the writer as if a Bethesda pool had opened in the midst of the great city, in which an angel constantly stirs the waters and into which every day the impotent and wretched victims of the soul-destroying liquor traffic are lifted by the faith of those praying women and healed." The Fulton Street noon prayer-meeting, so noted in the past for marvelous answers to prayer, used to be besieged with written requests from all parts of the country for prayer for dear ones out of Christ. Should not our Willard Hall noon meetings be besieged in the same manner for the intemperate? Any requests for prayer sent me I will have presented at these meetings.

The following letter received from the hand of Mrs. Mary Grant Cramer, when in Chicago two or three weeks ago, will, we are sure, prove of deep interest to our readers. She says: "It was the custom for devout persons in olden times to take an offering when they went up to the Temple; so I will take an offering to our great Temple in Chicago. Like Mary of old, my offering is small. It consists of the following articles: A letter from General Grant to his sister, a button from a coat worn by him when a cadet at West Point, a piece of the watch chain worn by the general's mother, that was presented to her by his father, a piece of lace she knit and wore, some leaves from Mount McGregor, a paper cutting made by Hans Christian Andersen, the popular Danish poet and story-teller." We cannot agree with Mrs. Cramer that her gifts are small. We feel that in a sense they are priceless and have been so cherished by her. But her love for our cause and her desire to aid the Temple constrained her to part with them. We are at liberty to sell them and if not sold they are to be placed in the archives of the Temple. The letter from General Grant is written to his sister from Cairo, Ill., September 25, 1861, at the beginning of the civil war, and is full of interest. We would like to receive a bid of a thousand dollars for this original letter in the handwriting of the great general. We are "open" for bids." We want to say to our rich friends, however, that nothing under a hundred dollars for the letter will be considered. We will not stipulate the price of the other articles, but will receive all bids sent and if commensurate with the value of such precious relics will sell to the highest bidder.

J. C. Anderson, Thawville, Ill., sends $2 for the Whittier clock; C. Allen, Middleport, N. Y., sends $1 for the same object; Batesville, Ark., W. C. T. U. forwards $15, which completes $100 sent for memorial in Willard Hall, in memory of Mrs. Esther A. Byers, who was for many years before her translation the able and beloved president of the Batesville union; a large part of the above amount was the gift of Mrs. Neill (Mrs. Byers' daughter) who said she did not care to attend the World's Fair unless she could see the name of her loved and honored mother on a tablet in Willard Hall. She can have that privilege now. Mrs. Elizabeth T. Belknap, treasurer for Tioga county, N. Y., W. C. T. U. sends $1 to place the name of her father, Edward H. Terry, in our memorial record book; Mrs. Decker Whitmore, Hill, N. Y., sends $3 in memoriam for her mother, Mrs. Electa Foster; Mrs. Daniel Case sends $1 in memory of her son, Henry Case, who at his post of duty met death and quickly passed from labor to reward.

Tioga Co., N. Y., W. C. T.U., sends a small balance which completes their hundred dollar pledge. Mrs. C. H. Gould, president of the Danvers, Mass., W. C. T. U., has been in Chicago lately visiting the Fair and was the bearer of $50 from her union—a first installment on a hundred dollar pledge. The Newport News, Virginia, union sends $25, their first payment on a hundred dollar pledge. The Lincoln, Va., W. C. T. U. sends $5.50 towards state tablet. Dear old Virginia is evidently waking up and does not mean that the state is to be longer disgraced by having no representation in the "House Beautiful." Wisconsin State W. C. T. U. is going to have its name on a tablet; $22 comes for this purpose from the Mansfield Wisconsin, Union. The Kirkland, Ill., W. C. T. U. sends $20, which it hopes to increase to a hundred. The Normal, Ill., union sends $5.54 on pledge; $12.70 comes from Boulder, Col., union to be applied on its pledge. The Minnesota tablet in the Willard corridor contains the names of the following unions which have paid a hundred dollars to the erection of the Temple: Central Union, Minneapolis; Lucy Hayes' Union, Minneapolis; Northfield Union, Northfield; State Union; Lady Henry Somerset Union, St. Paul; West Duluth Union, West Duluth; Central Union, St. Paul; Brainerd Union, Brainerd; Hamline Union, Hamline.

All money orders should be made out in the name of the treasurer, William D. Preston, and sent to our financial secretary, Miss Sara G. Johnson, The Temple, Chicago, Ill.

ENTHRONED.

BY SAMUEL HOYT.

He sits enthroned who sits supreme
Nor fears remorse, nor feels the scourge
  Of conscience with the ended day.
He has no greed for wealth that's won
  By bargain in the marts of sin,
Nor lust for fame whose peans mock
  The hollow heart that wails within.
His lips attuned to nature's lyre,
  He sings as sang the early stars;
His clean hands suited to God's plan,
  His handiwork no blemish mars.
He gives to all unselfish due,
  Nor claims what others may not share;
And every cry of woe bespeaks
  His ready bounty with his prayer.
So, doing God's will on the earth
  With love illimitably zoned,
Though waiting yet his higher birth,
  He sits enthroned.

HOW WORKERS ARE SOMETIMES MADE.

BY CARRIE L. GROUT.

"No, I don't think I care to join. I never could discover that the union was doing any good."

So Mrs. Mansfield replied to her caller, Mrs. Lewis, who had ventured to suggest that she join the Fairfax W. C. T. U.

Mrs. Lewis hesitated a moment, and then said earnestly: "I am sure the union is doing good. It has done much to make me a better wife and mother. I'm afraid I was not very well fitted for those responsibilities when I took them upon myself, but our mothers' meetings have been very helpful, and the Loyal Temperance Legion has done a great deal for the children."

Mrs. Mansfield did not appear to be interested in the turn the conversation had taken, and replied lightly: "My James is pretty well grown, and I hardly think I can spare the time."

Mrs. Mansfield was a social leader, and enjoyed it. Her entertainments were always popular, and her influence was unbounded, but like many others of her sort, no thought of responsibility for the moral atmosphere of the community ever troubled her, though she accounted herself a Christian, attended church regularly and gave liberally to all benevolent collections.

Fairfax was a flourishing town, with a population of about seven thousand, a railroad center, with a distinctly "tough" element abounding. Forty saloons spread their vile allurements, and only four churches attempted to stem this tide of evil.

A few of the good women had become alarmed and organized a W. C. T. U. in the hope of doing more to save their homes and boys. It now numbered about fifty members some of whom lived in the country, but had felt the demoralizing influences of the town, and were anxious to do something to bring about a better state of affairs. At first there had been a determined effort to get rid of the saloons, the result of which had convinced more than one woman that home protection in its true sense cannot be expected until women secure the ballot. Later there had been quiet but persistent work to create sentiment against the saloons, to teach the children the evil effects of alcohol, and to give the mothers an idea of the most effective means of guarding their boys and girls from the temptations which beset them.

Of course this was slow work and they often felt the need of more helpers. At the last meeting of the union, after a season of earnest prayer, each member present agreed to ask at least one woman of her acquaintance to join and it was this which led to the call of Mrs. Lewis and the conversation related, which, to say the least, was not encouraging.

Not many months afterward a sad thing happened at the Mansfield home. Late one evening a violent ring at the bell took both Mr. and Mrs. Mansfield to the door, where they found their handsome boy, their only son, unmistakably drunk, supported by a cab driver who politely expressed his regret that the young master was so sick.

His parents were not at all deceived as to his condition. They realized instantly that he had disgraced himself and the family and that by morning it would be town talk. They saw him safely in bed and then retired to spend the night in agonized questionings to which they could find no answers.

How could it have happened? They were sensible enough to know that there was something back of this night's debauch, a history of temptation and yielding, of habit contracted in secret till it had grown too strong to be controlled. Oh, it was horrible! Mrs. Mansfield knew that she would be blamed by society, mothers always are, but she could not see how she had been remiss. James had been carefully trained to regard moral obligations as well as social proprieties; she certainly could not reproach herself with having served liquors at her entertainments, while her husband as well as herself were abstainers. She had always regarded the saloon as a blot upon the morality of the town, but considered it as something too low and coarse to possess attractions for the son of a gentleman. Suddenly her conversation with Mrs. Lewis recurred to her mind. She felt more kindly toward the W. C. T. U. to-night, she had half a mind to go to their next meeting and ask their advice.

In the morning there were inquiries and explanations. It was plain that the boy had been drinking in the saloons with other boys of equally respectable families, but just where they were unable to learn. Mrs. Mansfield knew it was illegal for the saloons to sell liquor to minors, and James was only eighteen. She would get the W. C. T. U. to help prosecute the saloon-keepers; probably all of them were equally guilty. She wondered they hadn't done it before. It wouldn't do to wait till the next meeting. She would go that very day to the president and lay the case before her.

She found the president very sympathetic and kind. They talked long and earnestly over the matter. Mrs. Mansfield was surprised to learn that the W. C. T. U. advocated doing without alcohol even for medicine; she remembered that it had always been used very freely in their home for such purposes. She inquired into the work of the mothers' meetings and the Loyal Temperance Legion and she was soon convinced that she was woefully ignorant of the evil which had overtaken her boy.

"Well," she said, "I think we ought to get rid of the saloons, anyway."

"Certainly we ought and we want to very much if we only knew how."

"They have no right to sell to minors, have they?"

"No, it is against the law."

"Then I should think we could make way with them in short order."

The president gently reminded her that they had tried again and again to convict the saloon-keepers of selling illegally, but could secure no witnesses. Now it might be if James and his companions would testify where they obtained their liquor that something could be done. It was really harder to convict a man of selling liquor illegally, than to convict him of murder.

"I see," said Mrs. Mansfield, thoughtfully, "that I have been very ignorant and criminally negligent, but you may count me with you hereafter in all your efforts," and she went home a sadder and a wiser woman.

FROM A WHITE RIBBON CANVASSER'S NOTE-BOOK.

BY ESTELLE MENDELL.

It was in one of the "river cities," "beautiful for situation," but honeycombed with the vice-producing saloon. With its sacred symbol ever upon my breast I found my way into homes on its every street, alley and avenue. I chatted with the wife of the humblest wage-earner, the mechanic and the millionaire.

"Our blessed work" seemed uppermost in my thoughts, and asking each morning that God would give me some opportunity to scatter a little seed, I found many openings. And as I tramped through those insufferably hot July and August days, meeting every strata of society, I found myself studying its needs from a W. C. T. U. standpoint. Not a day that was not filled to overflowing with incidents that set my white-ribbon heart to throbbing. I could write volumes of sad, personal histories, breathed in brief in my sympathizing ear, each one dark and terrible enough to forever curse the liquor traffic that caused them.

Each incident and story set me to thinking, hating and praying as never before; and I always thought I was a dyed-in-the-wool white-ribboner before. I said "hating"; of course this refers to the "abominable traffic," not to the individuals connected with it; for these mistaken men I have only pity.

The dear little Midget, edited by our loved Ethel Stout, of Melbourne, Florida, was the key that unlocked many interesting and valuable facts to me. I told Mrs. Stout of my proposed canvass and that I would gladly speak a word for the paper. She kindly armed me with the child-editor's pictures "at the case," and with plenty of extra sample copies of the Midget.

It took but a moment to present the matter and this led so very naturally to our work that no one could take offence or feel that the subject was forced.

Could I tell the readers of THE UNION SIGNAL how very few in all that city of twenty thousand souls seemed to have heard of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, their hearts would ache as mine did. One lady's ignorance seemed unaccountable. She had a beautiful home, case after case of choice books, and only one idolized boy to occupy her time, but she told me she had never even heard of our organization! She seemed very much concerned about her son, lest he should fall under the blight of the drink habit, which, strange to say of a "society lady," she seemed to fully understand and abhor. I learned through others that the iron was entering her own soul—her husband having brought on some terrible disease by his fashionable drinking.

I left her reading about the W. C. T. U. and she promised to study it. When I called again she told me she was so glad to know there were so many women banded together to put down this curse and that if there were a union near she should join it. She asked me to give the leaflet to some other woman that it might enlighten her. I kept her in UNION SIGNALS and leaflets during my stay, and feel sure she is ready for still further light.

Does this story seem possible? Should you see the elegant fancy work she had done, the yards and yards of perfectly lovely embroidery and know the demands of fashionable life upon her time, you would not be surprised that she had not even heard or read of our work. She is but a sample of the many women I found who had wealth, leisure, costly libraries, but no knowledge of one of the greatest and most beneficent movements of the century.

In striking contrast was one poor washwoman who could neither read nor write, who was yet well versed in our work and who proudly told me she "had one o' them on her best dress," pointing to my white ribbon.

This brave woman regretted her inability to read and write, as there being no union near she was shut off from all knowledge of recent movements. But I comforted her in that which she did know was a "pearl of great price," which many of her sisters in the fashionable world did not possess.

This woman was American born, one of a large family living upon a large farm. And she told me with just indignation towards her parents, that all the children were kept at home "to help" instead of being sent to school. Think of the great and lasting wrong done those children. May not education be made compulsory in every state, that this crime not be perpetrated?

The ignorance that I found regarding our beautiful Temple would almost have given brave Sister Carse "the blues." The story of what the Midget had done for this enterprise usually produced an utter blankness in their faces. They had never heard of it. And had I not felt well intrenched in my own belief of its existence, I might have concluded that the weight of testimony was against there being any such structure; and consequently that it was a myth.

It is sorrowful that my good women allow themselves to live in such ignorance of the events and movements of the day; that they will work themselves blind on doylies and rugs and waste all their strength upon "society" while minds and souls are starving for proper food.

This house-to-house canvass impressed me that very many women are still ignorant and untaught concerning this great question of intemperance, and naturally enough, but worse still they are indifferent! Let every white-ribboner go to work with new zeal.

Belmond. Ia.

THESE are the days when the reputation of women for strength and of men for gentleness is being gradually built up. Remembering this, we cast a stone upon the rising cairn: A leading American literary man was in an apartment house recently when a policeman gave warning that it was on fire. The literary gentleman says of the women who inhabited this apartment house, which, by the way, was in New York City, "and speaking of the ladies, I was impressed anew on that occasion with the fact that in times of danger they are really stronger than men, and fit for all manner of heroism and self-sacrifice. During this fire, or rather this alarm, the men were flustered and excited, but the women were universally calm and self-possessed." He then goes on to say, "A number of years ago I was on a steamboat on Long Island Sound, when there was a collision and a fire. The water was filled with wreckage, and men and women, supported by life-preservers, and a few boats much overcrowded. I saw a woman who had a life-preserver under her arms and who held aloft a baby. Two of us offered her our places on a boat that was just launched. 'Get back,' she cried, 'I am an old body, and not worth saving. Save the baby, that's all I ask.' She said this as coolly as one would decline to sit down, and meant it, too, for she had to be actually forced into the boat, and the baby was as dry as a chip, though its grandmother had been floating around in the water well nigh an hour."

DON'T YOU SEE?

The boy who on the corner stands,
With open mouth and listless air,
Who in his pockets thrusts his hands,
And shows no signs of thought or care;
Who idly dreams—who rarely works—
Who needful tasks or duty shirks;
Though kind in manner he may be,
There's much that's lacking—don't you see?

The boy who will neglect his book
For game of chance, or bat and ball,
For gun and dog, or rod and hook,
Or for a dance—for one or all—
Will find he's made a grand mistake.
Can games the place of knowledge take?
When on the top round he would be He'll find he's lacking—don't you see?

The boy who smokes a cigarette,
Or drinks with friends a social glass,
Is forming habits to regret,
Whose ills all other ills surpass.
Though solid rock is near at hand,
That boy is building on the sand;
With scoffing mates and boisterous glee
His course is downward—don't you see?

The girl who at the window waits
With idle hands and dreamy look;
Who, by her actions, says she hates
The household work of maid or cook;
Who lets her mother work away
While she indulges in a play;
Howe'er refined that girl may be,
There's much that's lacking—don't you see?

The girl whose recitations show
No earnest work, no careful thought;
Who fails in what she ought to know
When skillful test of work is brought;
That girl will fail to win the prize—
Will fail while earnest workers rise—
A grand success she'll never be,
There's too much lacking—don't you see?

When one would build a house to stand,
He builds upon the solid rock.
He takes the best at his command;
He piles the granite, block on block.
No soft, shale rock shall have a place
In inner or in outer face.
Well-tested rock shall polished be,
For lasting structure—don't you see?

Build thou for time—on solid rock.
Give thought and care; build broad and deep.
Then, tempest wild, with rudest shock,
Shall harmlessly around thee sweep.
With knowledge gained, and purpose grand,
The ills of life thou canst command.
From all their power thou shalt be free;
Thy pow'r the greater—don't you see?

WORKING FOR HOME PROTECTION.

"What is the matter with you, Charley?" asked Mrs. Smith in surprise as her nine year old boy entered the back parlor at dinner time.

He usually came bounding home at that hour of the day hungry, of course, but light-hearted and gay. Now, however, he was the most doleful looking object imaginable. Every curve of his wrathful face was turned downward, every muscle in his body seemed relaxed. His shoulders drooped; his arms swung loosely around and his feet scraped on the floor. In answer to his mother's question he replied angrily: "That Bob Brazier is the meanest boy I ever saw."

"What makes you think that?" asked his mother.

"Because he is. He sits just back of me at school and this morning when the teacher's back was turned he gave me a hard whack on the back with his rule, and it hurt, too. Coming home he followed along back of me and kept thumping me with a stick."

"Why didn't you get out of his way?" questioned Mrs. Smith.

"I did try to but he can run faster than I can. He needs a good thrashing and if you'd let me I'd give it to him, too!" Charley's fists were clinched now and his blue eyes flashed indignantly through the tears.

"What did you do to make Bob act so badly?" asked his mother.

"Not anything. I haven't hurt him at all."

"He would not be likely to act so unkindly for nothing," remarked his mother.

"Well, mamma, I haven't hit him at all nor hurt him, either."

"Now, Charley," Mrs. Smith spoke in very kind but firm tones and the little boy knew at once that there was to be no more trifling, "no little boy will treat you that way because he loves you. You did something to displease Bob. What was it?"

"Well, mamma, I really did not hurt him the least bit. This morning before school we boys got up a new play. The little boys were divided into two armies with the big boys for captains. One army was for prohibition and the other was for whisky. It was hard to get boys enough for the whisky and they wanted me on that side but I said I wouldn't even play help the whisky cause, so I was in the prohibition army. The boys were in two lines facing each other and the two boys who stood face to face were not to fight, but to see which could throw the other down and hold him. Bob Brazier was facing me and he's bigger than I am, but I was working for home protection, so I flew in with all my might and threw Bob down and held him there and all the boys on our side laughed and hurrahed,—but Bob got mad."

Mrs. Smith saw that Charley was in a happier mood and the dinner bell was ringing, so she said: "Let us have something to eat before we talk any more on this subject." A half hour later she drew her boy gently into the parlor again and said:

"Now, Charley, just a few more words about your trouble. You were right, my boy, not to fight and it would have been a victory if you had controlled your temper. You did right to choose the side of temperance even in play. But that play is not a good one for it leads to quarreling among you boys. If Bob had thrown you down and held you, while the boys hurrahed for him and laughed at you, would you have felt so happy?"

"N-no'm, I guess not. I never thought of that. But I wouldn't have acted like he did."

"I sincerely hope not," said his mother. "But remember he has not a Christian father and mother to pray for him and teach him to do right. Do not keep thinking of Bob's unkindness, but remember you were not altogether blameless. How does Jesus Christ teach us to treat our enemies?"

"He says we are to love our enemies and do them good," was the reply.

Charlie was naturally a quick-tempered boy, but the fire of anger never burned very long in his heart. The good dinner, the pleasant chatter of his two little sisters, Susie and Jennie, and mamma's little talk had soothed his ruffled spirit and restored the smiles to his face.

"Can't you think of some way in which you can show Bob a kindness?" asked Mrs. Smith.

"I might give him an apple," said Charley. "They don't have apples at his house."

"Very well, go to the cellar and get a nice red apple for him and one for yourself also."

"Thank you, mamma."

The little boy was soon back with the two apples.

"Be sure you give it to him pleasantly," cautioned his mother smiling.

"All right, I will. Good-by, mamma."

A little later he entered the school grounds flushed and breathless from running. A large number of boys had already assembled and he looked among them for Bob. That youngster was a little bit ashamed of himself and was purposely avoiding Charley. The latter found him, however, and called out merrily:

"Yes," was the equally cheerful reply. "Toss it to me and I'll throw it back."

"Well, here goes!" with these words he tossed the apple and only waited long enough to see the glossy red ball fall plump into Bob's brown hands, then turned and darted off among the other boys.

"That beats me," said Bob to himself in astonishment. "What did he do that for? Wonder if he gave me this apple to eat." A few moments after, "Say, Charley, did you give me this apple?"

"Yes, of course. Didn't you see me? I've got one, too. Let's eat them before the bell rings." They fell at once to munching away on the apples and talking sociably in boyish fashion.

"I'll tell you what, Bob," said Charley at the conclusion, "when I'm a man I'm going to vote against making or selling anything that makes folks drunk."

"So will I," said Bob decidedly. "I'm for temperance."

SAID a little girl of three the other day, "Mother, do you know what sunlight is? It is the light of the angels' heads when they come together. They are bright with looking at God!"

DEAR BOYS AND GIRLS:—A Baltimore girl comes knocking at our door this week who writes that she is "an out-and-out temperance girl" and always wears the white ribbon to show which side she is on. And here is the rest of her letter:

At our W. C. T. U. headquarters here, a gospel meeting is held every day at noon. My uncle goes every day, and sometimes I go with him. Then, each Saturday and Monday night there is another meeting held. I go to the Saturday night ones and find them so interesting that I would like to tell you of them. At quarter of eight the organ is rolled out into the hall in front of the door, and we all sing bright, stirring hymns which, together with the bright light streaming from the door, attract wanderers in to the meeting. Punctually at eight the singing stops, the organ is pushed back into the large room, we all go in and take seats and the service commences. After the leader has made a short talk the meeting is open for any one that chooses to take part. Hymns are sung, prayers made and interesting testimonies given. Sometimes men come in so drunk they can hardly stand and go out saved. It is a wonderful work, and I am sure it will be greatly blessed in the future as it has been heretofore.

THE GREAT CONVENTIONS.

The Second Biennial Convention of the World's W. C. T. U. opened Monday morning, October 16. The absence of our "best-beloved leader," as Mrs. Woodbridge so aptly called her, tinged with sadness the joy of the occasion. Yet, to quote still Mrs. Woodbridge's forceful words, "second only to the welcome we would give to her," was the welcome of white-ribboners to the " W. C. T. U. Queen of Great Britain."

The W. C. T. U. is organized in forty-eight countries, thirteen of which sent delegates to this Convention. At one time women from twenty-five foreign lands sat upon the platform.

The personnel of the Convention would easily fill many columns and be of intense interest. Nor would it be inappropriate since one of the greatest results of the W. C. T. U. as an organization is its development of women. More than any other agency, the white ribbon movement has led women out into new and untried fields of labor, proved their abilities and developed their powers. But so many are the women who have shown exceptional ability and won the lasting gratitude of the world by their service to humanity that it is impossible in a brief article to even mention their names.

The Convention was admirably presided over by Lady Henry Somerset, who crossed the sea that she might preside in Miss Willard's enforced absence. She has thus added another to the many proofs already given of her love for our leader, and for the white ribbon movement and its workers.

The addresses of welcome were many and appropriate. Hon. C. C. Bonney, president of the World's Congress Auxiliary, said that the W. C. T. U. stood as the foremost representative of the woman movement, but, notwithstanding the misconceptions on the part of some, it sought only to give women their rightful place in the state.

Mrs. Potter Palmer, Mrs. Charles Henrotin, Dr. Josiah Strong, Archbishop Ireland, Anthony Comstock, and many others gave a few words of cheer.

Lady Henry spoke briefly in her own charming way. She craved the indulgence of the Convention for being obliged to take the part of an "understudy," saying that while it was difficult to take any one's part, it was an absolute impossibility for any one to take Frances Willard's part.

Monday afternoon brief, interesting speeches were made by foreign delegates. Mrs. Ella Williams, president Dominion W. C. T. U., brought greetings from eight thousand Canadian sisters of the white ribbon. Also Mrs. Cunningham and Miss Lillian Phelps spoke for the work on the other side of "that imaginary line," on one side of which Mrs. Williams told us tradition would have us believe the British lion roars while on the other side the American eagle screams defiance, but neither of which in any way interferes with the passage of the white-ribboner. Miss de Broen, of France, told us of the beginnings of the work in her native land, and of that unique window in Paris bearing the letters, W. W. C. T. U., the Mecca of white-ribboners and of women who need a friend, the educator of the many who pause to inquire the meaning of those mystic letters. Miss Conybeare, Mrs. Stanley Mathews, Miss Emily Pierce, Mrs. Muff, Miss Alys Pearsall Smith and Mrs. James Emmette gave reports of different phases of the work in England. Mrs. Magnusson, of Iceland, let us know that temperance was known in her far-away island. Miss Anna Smith represented the union of Natal, South Africa, Mrs. Chika Sakurai brought good cheer from Japan, and Mrs. Smith was presented that we might know that New Zealand furnishes one wing of the white ribbon army.

Tuesday was occupied quite largely with reports. Miss Kimball, Supt. of Sunday-school work, reported the final success of the effort of this department to secure quarterly temperance lessons in the regular course of the International Sunday school series. This means the reaching of 17,000,000 children and, Miss Kimball said, "the Sunday-school of to-day is the church of to-morrow, and when we have the church for temperance, we have the world."

Mrs. Mary H. Hunt, Supt. of Scientific Temperance Instruction, reported that not only did the United States have compulsory scientific temperance instruction in all of its public schools, with the exception of six states, but that the cause is spreading rapidly through foreign lands. Sweden, Norway, Finland in Russia, Natal in South Africa and most of the provinces of Canada have temperance educational laws. Several of these countries use as text-books translations of the books issued by the W. C. T. U. department of scientific temperance instruction which are so generally used in our own land. There is good reason to hope, too, that the work will still go on. The Russian Minister of Education and the "Czar of all the Russias" have our laws and text-books under consideration. Our books have been translated into Chinese and Japanese and every effort will be made to have them introduced as text-books into the schools of those countries.

Mrs. Nichols, superintendent of fairs and expositions, pointed out that the way in which these countries found out that there was a Mrs. Hunt and scientific temperance instruction was by men of influence from these nations seeing at the Paris Exposition the W. C. T. U. pavilion where text-books were given them. She also called attention to the temperance educational work now being done at the World's Fair.

Miss Gordon's report showed that the children of the world are being rapidly enlisted in the temperance army. From eight foreign countries children have sent contributions to the Willard fountain, and from twelve foreign lands have come their pledge cards to be seen at the Fair.

A tender memorial service for Mary Allen West was held, Mrs. Chika Sakurai, our little Japanese sister, giving the address. Her words were few, but full of sympathy. She closed with an appeal for help in the temperance restaurant building which the women of Japan are trying to rear as a memorial to Miss West.

There was no more interesting feature of the meeting than the reports of the round-the-world missionaries. Miss Jessie Ackermann, second in the list of these intrepid women, has tied the white ribbon on to seven thousand women. She spoke with great feeling of the way in which the crimes of so-called Christian nations handicapped her in her work. An intelligent Chinamen sent her to the fearful opium dens, where his countrymen and women were ruined, saying these were the work of a Christian nation; she need never press her Christianity upon an intelligent Chinaman. One high caste Hindu asked her why in England opium was sold only with a physician's prescription and marked poison, while in India the same government dealt it out as food for the people. Another said: "You call us heathens, but heathens as we are, we have never legalized vice as a Christian nation has. Our women may be immoral, but they were never so by the sanction of law."

Mrs. Elizabeth Wheeler Andrew and Dr. Kate Bushnell told of their faith journey, when they went out without purse or scrip and yet lacked nothing. Most thrilling of all was their account of the delicate and difficult mission committed to them by the British government to learn if, as was suspected, the military authorities in India utterly disregarded the command of Parliament that the atrocious Contagious Diseases Act should be abrogated in India as it had been in England. Several commissions had been sent out before but had utterly failed to secure the necessary evidence, though there were many reasons to believe that the system was in active operation. These two women, without resorting to the usual detective methods of falsehood and crime, secured the evidence wanted, evidence so overwhelming that when it was presented, Lord Roberts, Commander-in-chief of the British Army in India, publicly acknowledged the truth of their statements and apologized for having at first denied them.

As Lady Henry Somerset said: "No women have ever done a nobler work for women than these two consecrated round-the-world missionaries."

The World's Convention closed Tuesday evening, and the National opened Wednesday morning. For the first time since her election fourteen years ago, our Chieftain was absent. Mrs. Caroline B. Buell, by virtue of her office as corresponding secretary, presided. It would be difficult to find a presiding officer superior to Mrs. Buell. The Convention did an act of simple justice when Friday afternoon it carried enthusiastically a vote of thanks for the admirable way in which she had presided. The vote was put by Lady Henry Somerset, who said that she could appreciate the difficulties of presiding over such a body and she wanted to say that she never saw the task better done than it had been by Mrs. Buell.

The chief business of the morning session was the reading of Miss Willard's Annual Address. It was read in a most effective way by Lady Henry. The address was listened to with the closest attention and interrupted occasionally with enthusiastic applause. On motion of Mrs. Hoffman, a cablegram was sent to Miss Willard saying that the address had been heard and received with love illimitable.

Wednesday afternoon was devoted chiefly to reports of superintendents. Mrs. Catherine McClees, Superintendent of Legislation and Petitions gave some excellent practical advice as to ways of preparing bills and getting them before legislatures. Interesting reports were made from other departments which it is not possible to summarize.

Wednesday evening was occupied with addresses of welcome. Mrs. Rounds, President of Illinois W. C. T. U., welcomed the Convention in the name of the sixteen thousand white-ribboners of Illinois. She said the object at which we aimed was expressed in the one word with which Carlyle summed up the world's needs—justice. "Ay, it is justice that the world needs to-day. Justice! Justice! It would close every dramshop in this beloved land of ours. Justice! it would eliminate from the ballot box every illiterate vote. Justice! it would give every woman her place and position that God meant that she should have by the side of her brother at the ballot box. Aye, well may Carlyle say it is justice that the world needs to day. And, beloved friends, it is justice that we propose to have. The women of this country are not begging for mercy." She related the anecdote of the woman who tried to present her petition to Philip of Macedon and when rejected said, "I appeal from Philip drunk to Philip sober." "I congratulate you," said Mrs. Rounds, "that you are here in this great city where the throbbing, beating brains of the world seemingly have concentrated in their representatives and where some day we hope to greet you when we shall have appealed from Chicago drunk to Chicago sober."

Mrs. Carse expressed her sorrow that it was not possible for the women of Chicago to welcome the Convention to their homes as they had done twice before. But the housewives of Chicago were in about the position of the ancient dame who lived in her shoe. Since Chicago had become the World's Fair city and the railroads had put down the fare to a cent a mile, it was impossible for any one to imagine how many relations the women of Chicago had found. There was nothing ever like it since the locusts swarmed down upon the unfortunate Egyptians.

Miss Lillian Phelps, organizer of the Dominion W. C. T. U., made a response full of bright points. In reply to the question, "What are the prospects for the overthrow of King Alcohol?" she would quote the words of Judson, the great missionary to India, "The prospects are as bright as the promises of God are sure, and not one of these promises has ever failed aching, throbbing humanity."

Mrs. Emily Huntington Miller gave an admirable sketch of the origin of the W. C. T. U., which we will give to our readers later.

Thursday morning's session and a considerable part of the afternoon session were given to the discussion of the Temperance Temple. The Board of Temple Trustees and Mrs. Carse's lawyer, Mr. Moses, of the firm of Moses, Pam & Kennedy, answered all of the questions put to them by members of the Convention. If any one who was present does not now fully understand the status of the Temple, it would be difficult to make her understand it, after this discussion, which was carried on in a most admirable manner. We strongly recommend that some of our brother conventions take pattern. We have never happened to know of any body of men discussing a subject concerning which there was radical difference of opinion and so much feeling, with such equanimity and good humor. Mrs. Buell's merits as presiding officer never appeared to better advantage. Her rulings were so strictly impartial and marked by such an evident desire to be just to both sides as made them beyond criticism.

The report of the committee on credentials made the splendid showing of four hundred and fifty voting delegates present. Of these, forty were state presidents.

Appropriate memorial services for the seven comrades who went from us during the year consumed the remainder of the afternoon. Bright, entertaining two-minute speeches from state presidents filled the evening session.

Election of officers was the great event of Friday. As usual, Miss Willard's majority on the informal ballot was so large that the ballot was made formal. The vote stood 358 out of 371 for Miss Willard. The other officers elected were: Corresponding secretary, Mrs. Mary A. Woodbridge; recording secretary, Mrs. L. M. N. Stevens; treasurer, Mrs. Helen M. Barker. Miss Esther Pugh was elected treasurer in the morning session, but because of a technical informality in declaring the ballot, another ballot for treasurer was taken during the afternoon. Miss Pugh announced, much to the regret of a large number of delegates, that after careful consideration, she had decided to withdraw her name, and upon the second ballot, Mrs. Barker, who had received the second highest vote on the first ballot, was declared elected. Mrs. Clara C. Hoffman was selected by Mrs. Stevens as her assistant.

The work of amending the constitution was the main business of Saturday. The Convention closed with the Y meeting in the evening.

On account of the prolonged discussions of the constitution and the Temple, and also because there was one day less than usual devoted to the National Convention, it was impossible to complete the program, fifty-two reports and addresses being omitted. To atone in a measure for this unavoidable omission, THE UNION SIGNAL will publish these papers from time to time, if the writers will kindly forward them to us at once. All that we have now on hand will appear in the Convention number, and the others as soon as possible after they are received.

We are aware that this is but a meager account of the great Conventions, but the best we can furnish during the preoccupation of the Conventions. Our double Convention number next week will contain a full account of both meetings, and for the complete stenographic reports, we refer our readers to THE DAILY UNION SIGNAL, copies of which may still be obtained.

THE ARMENIAN QUESTION.

A touching appeal has been issued, "To the Christians of America, by the Christians of Armenia." The Armenians are a singularly interesting people, exceptional among Orientals for their pure family life and the high position they accord their women. They have occupied their present territory, around Mt. Ararat and in the valleys of the Tigris and Euphrates, ever since Old Testament days. They have never had either slavery or polygamy, though surrounded by nations guilty of both. The Armenians are, as an English writer says, "a Christian people, whose lot has been cast beyond the frontiers of Christendom." Hence for fifteen hundred years they have been persecuted for their Christian faith by the Asiatic nations around them. As early as A. D. 451, the King of Persia invaded their country to force them to become fire-worshipers; but, though he conquered them, he found it impossible to make them give up Christianity. Tradition says that even the high priest of fire perceived this, and said to the King of Persia: "These people cannot change their skins. They wear their Christianity, not like a garment, but like their flesh and blood."

Armenia was finally divided up like Poland, among several other nations, and Turkey got the largest slice. The Turks hate all Christians, and the atrocities they perpetrate on their Armenian subjects have aroused the indignation of Europe. Churches and schools are arbitrarily closed; innocent men are imprisoned, tortured and massacred; Christian women are carried off for Mohammedan harems; and the wandering tribes of marauding Kurds are encouraged to come down from the mountains and quarter themselves on the Christian villages, plundering and committing all sorts of outrages. The Turkish government forbids the Armenians, under heavy penalties, to possess arms, and it supplies the most improved firearms to the Kurds, who are fanatical Mohammedans. The state of things has become intolerable. As Professor Bryce says, who traveled through that country, "There is absolutely no security for life, honor or property."

The Armenians in their appeal say:

The powers of Europe have promised us protection, but they are too busy arming against each other. We are thus driven to appeal to the conscience of Christendom. . . . Our demands are mainly three: (1) That we may organize our own police and our own courts of justice, where Christians shall be on an equal footing with Mohammedans; (2) that we may control a part of the revenue of our country, to be spent in internal improvements, so that the taxes wrung from our poverty may not all be spent in building palaces for pashas and in buying cannon and erecting fortifications wherewith to keep us in subjection; (3) that our governor shall not be a Turk, but, if not an Armenian, a European or an American.

The Armenians ask Americans to help them, (1) by studying the Armenian question, and helping to spread their appeal through the press; (2) by signing a petition to the president of the United States which will soon be circulated, asking him to use his influence with the Sultan in favor of granting their reasonable demands. The petition should be largely signed.

PLEDGE.—"I hereby solemnly promise, God helping me, to abstain from all distilled, fermented and malt liquor, including Wine and Cider, and to employ all proper means to discourage the use of and traffic in the same."

QUESTIONS.—1. Is the president of the union, or of any society, a member of all committees? 2. May she be present at all of its meetings, and does she influence its proceedings the same as any other member? 3. Is the chairman of a committee a member of all subcommittees? 4. Bills are to be paid by order of the executive committee. How is the thing done? What is written on the bills, and where? 5. If a union has ceased to meet for several years, no form of disbanding having been gone through with, and a union is formed of new members excepting two who belonged to the former union, but who can seldom, if ever attend the meetings, must that union be classed as reorganized?

ANSWERS.—1. Not unless made so by vote of the union. 2. No. 3. No. 4. The usual way is to pay bills on the order (See Order Book on sale by W. T. P. A.) of the president and secretary, in which case an order is written and they sign. If by order of executive committee the committee votes to pay, and the secretary notifies the treasurer of the action. 5. The old union is dead and the other is a new union. CAROLINE B. BUELL.

Q.—What is the best and most complete work on Bible wines, showing from the best scholarship and best arguments, that there are two kinds of wine mentioned in the Bible, one approved and the other condemned?

A.—I would recommend the little book called "Wines, Scriptural and Ecclesiastical," by Norman Kerr, M. D., F. L. S., as giving the most satisfactory statement of facts and arguments upon this important question, of any that has yet been given, to be obtained at 58 Reade street, New York. Price twenty-five cents. For a brief and pointed presentation of the subject, National Leaflet No. 22, entitled "Bible Wines," by Mary Allen West, to be obtained at the W. T. P. A., The Temple, Chicago, is very clear and convincing. ELIZABETH G. HIBBEN,
Nat. Supt. Dept. of Unfermented Wine.

Q.—I noticed in the Philadelphia Ledger that the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Chester county, Pennsylvania, had prepared a memorial to the next legislature asking that the grade of a certain crime be advanced to a capital one. Is the position consistent with a woman's organization claiming peace as one of its departments?
LIZZIE SHUMATE.

A.—No! Our department aims to exert an influence against international and civil war, capital punishment, prize fighting, slugging matches, and against all cruelty and every form of man's inhumanity to man. Our department is in reality the department of love. "Love worketh no ill to its neighbor." The department claims that to take human life under any circumstances is overstepping the bounds of human rights, and that to do so cannot be morally legalized. We recommend that for all high crimes the criminal be imprisoned during life with no possible hope of pardon except on account of subsequent undeniable proof of innocency. "Thou shalt not kill." HANNAH J. BAILEY,
Nat. Supt. Peace Dept.

NINETEEN years ago two graduates of Mt. Holyoke seminary (now college) founded the Huguenot Seminary in Wellington, Cape Colony, after receiving most urgent appeals to establish such an institution which would give the daughters of South Africa some of the educational and religious advantages of their more favored American sisters. The faculty now numbers twenty, and more than a thousand young women, descendants of the Dutch, French, and English settlers have gone out from the school. The standard of education has been gradually raised until the pupils compete successfully at the government and university examinations at Cape Town. The school is self-supporting and supports some missionaries at the front whom it has trained. The school is the headquarters for the W. C. T. U., and has done more than any other one thing to create temperance sentiment.

It costs twenty-five hundred dollars to keep a man in prison for five years, and three thousand to keep a patient in the infirmary, while it takes twenty-five hundred to keep five children in a workhouse in England. The sale of strong drink is rather a costly thing, for it is the principal agent in filling the prisons, workhouses, etc.

Sir Wilfrid Lawson has been showing how statistics can be made to prove anything by relating the story of an attempt to prove teetotalism destructive to life and health. An inquiry into the state of health of total abstainers in the Indian army brought the report that fifty per cent were dead and fifty per cent invalided; but on further investigation it was found there were but two abstainers, one of whom had been eaten by a tiger and the other had broken his leg.

The secretary of the Chinese Sabbath-school association of this country has made an effort to secure some accurate statistics of the schools. There are one hundred and twenty thousand Chinese in the United States. Sunday-schools have been established in thirty-six states, the largest number being in California, fifty-nine. It is stated that the number of Chinese converted is larger in proportion than among any other class of immigrants, the percentage of Christians being thirty-two of those in attendance on the schools. They are extremely liberal in giving to all benevolent purposes. There is a crying need of consecrated men and women teachers and preachers for them.

Mr. Froude, the great historian, has shown a churlish spirit in refusing to admit any ladies to his lectures at Oxford University. He recently said in the inaugural address: "To myself the object of history is to discover and make visible illustrious characters, and to pay them ungrudging honor. 'The history of mankind,' says Carlyle, 'is the history of its great men.' To find out these, to clear the dirt from them, and to place them upon their proper pedestals, is the function of the historian, he cannot have a nobler one." He says that history to him "teaches that right and wrong are real distinctions," and then he proceeds to deny altogether that liberty raises the character either of individuals or of nations. It is a pity that he thinks so, and perhaps it has something to do with his shutting the women out from the sound of his voice.

ON DUTY.

ILLINOIS.

W. C. T. U. STATE CONVENTION.

Monday, October 2, found more than 200 of the busy women of Illinois preparing to visit its capital city. It was not because a sudden impulse to visit the home of our martyred President, Lincoln, had seized them but because living martyrs had made pathetic appeals to their hearts.

And so, when the long roll-call of members of the Illinois W. C. T. U. executive committee was made, Tuesday a. m., October 8, in the beautiful and commodious First M. E. church, of Springfield, there was a very general response. In another part of the church was an all-day devotional meeting. The restored health and old-time vigor of our state president called forth abundant thanksgiving.

Tuesday evening was

YOUNG WOMAN'S EVENING.

Miss Mary Mahon, state superintendent, presided. The address of the evening was given by Miss Anna Downey, now state evangelist. It was full of forceful thought. Miss M. Lena Morrow presented the Y banner to the Clinton Y for largest per cent increase in Y membership.

At 9 a. m., October 4, the convention was called to order by the president, Mrs. Louise S. Rounds. Devotional exercises were led by Miss Downey. The burden of prayer was for the descent of the Holy Spirit.

Abundant

followed, until all felt very much at home, while Mrs. Gould and Mrs. Carlock voiced their responses. Three radical Prohibitionists have pleasant memories of the kindly hospitality enjoyed in the Governor's executive mansion.

It will be impossible to give any adequate report of that three days' convention. The program itself was "a thing of beauty." From the opening to the closing hour there was one continual contest to see how much could be crowded into the passing moments. The was excellent from beginning to close. The twenty district presidents were allowed ten minutes each for their annual reports, and superintendents of departments five minutes. Several gave their time to extend the period for discussion of other important topics.

The recommendation of the executive committee to remove the state headquarters from Chicago to Bloomington called forth considerable good-natured discussion, and resulted in adopting the recommendation. For several years there has been an increasing desire among the women of the southern part of the state for a more central location of headquarters. The home of the state treasurer is in Bloomington, where also, The Watch Tower is edited and printed.

THE RE-DISTRICTING THE STATE,

so that W. C. T. U. districts will conform to the new Congressional districts, was agreed upon. This will not be done until the close of this year.

The report of the growth of our state paper awakened much interest. Subscriptions, gifts and pledges came pouring in and gladdened the heart of the editor. When state superintendents of departments send out their message this year, they will feel that their "marching orders" are heard all along the districts and counties.

THE PRESIDENT'S ANNUAL ADDRESS

was given before a large audience Wednesday evening, Mrs. Carlock, vice-president, presiding. The appreciation of those who heard it could be measured by their attention, broken only by the frequent applause. Mrs. Rounds received quite an ovation of congratulations at its conclusion.

One of the special features of the next morning's exercises was

THE "MARY ALLEN WEST BIRTHDAY FUND" SERVICE.

It had been decided that this fund should be applied to the scientific temperance instruction department, to which Miss West had given so much thought and work. It was explained that a penny should represent each year of one's life, and a text or sentiment was asked for to be placed in the envelope with the gift.

Along with the tender sentiments or words of wisdom expressed was the occasional smile at thought of the great age of some of the sisters—the pennies testifying that some had already reached the age of some of the old patriarchs; for instance, no one looking at the fine physique of Mrs. Hunt, of Boston, national superintendent, would for a moment give a "Yankee guess" that she was five hundred years old, but so the record stood according to the number of pennies in her gift.

MRS. HUNT'S ADDRESS

in the evening, on her favorite theme, called forth many words of commendation. Probably some went away saying, "I did not know that the Woman's Christian Temperance Union was doing so much work to save the children. I thought it had gone into politics." Well, there was considerable "going into politics" before all the laws were obtained that now make scientific temperance instruction in the public schools obligatory in nearly all the states and territories of this country. At for the coming year, the informal ballot for nomination of president, showed almost a unanimous choice for the reelection of Mrs. Rounds. The informal ballot was made the formal, and she was escorted back to her place as leader of the Illinois W. C. T. U. The Chautauqua salute that greeted her must have been gratifying. Mrs. Carlock was reëlected vice-president; Mrs. Grout, recording secretary; Mrs. A. E. Sanford, treasurer, and Miss Helen L. Walker, corresponding secretary.

THE DEVOTIONAL EXERCISES

under the leadership of Miss Downey were of marked power, and in the necessity for supplying a superintendent of the evangelistic department because of Mrs. Hathaway's resignation, Miss Downey was chosen as her successor. Miss Mahon has been doing good work among the Y's. Miss Wintringer's zeal in the L. T. L. work knows no bounds, and so on, through the departments, generally; good work has been done, as the reports showed.

And to all the paraphernalia of this Illinois W. C. T. U. workshop, our state president recommends an additional one—a bureau—a bureau with several drawers in it, which should be used to hold Illinois statutes, city ordinances, lawyers' briefs and many other useful tools. This new bureau has been christened

BUREAU OF ENFORCEMENT OF LAW.

It was expected that this World's Fair year, so full of distractions, would result in neglect to gather in and count all the memberships, which proved to be true by the treasurer's books. The closing the treasurer's books, September 28, caused an apparent loss of members; but it was voted that this positive law should be enforced, although it might reduce the membership this year.

But the hour when hearts grew tender, voices trembled, and eyes filled with tears, was when Mrs. Rounds conducted

THE MEMORIAL SERVICES

Friday morning, holding in her hands the little annual "In Memoriam" souvenir for Illinois, "Promoted Soldiers" of 1893, which contained one hundred and fifty-seven names.

A bond of sympathy and sense of bereavement united all hearts as name after name was read, although many had an unfamiliar sound. But some have been household words. That of Mary Allen West, who "fell asleep" in a foreign land in the early part of the year, will not soon be forgotten.

The name of

who "received promotion" and "went home" only a few days ago, September 28, is one about which blessed memories cluster. Her name was not in the memorial souvenir, but it is engraved on the hearts of many, for she has served the Illinois W. C. T. U. all along the lines, from "high private" up to district president and vice-president of the state. At the time that failing health laid her aside from active service, she had been for a long time superintendent of the railroad department of work, to which her heart ever turned with great earnestness. I remember with what joy she told me of a soul redeemed, that had just passed over to the better land, and of the message he sent her, when he knew his feet were on the very border of the other world. She first met him in the after-meeting of the gospel service to which he had dropped in, just off his engine, with its grime and smoke still upon him and there was the taint of liquor on his breath. "I went down into the audience," she said, "with the prayer in my heart that God would lead me to one to whom I might take a gospel message. God led me to him, and this will always be a glad memory to me—this soul saved." Years of great suffering and weakness, hopes and fears alternating, must have been a strong test of faith to her, who watched the battle between right and wrong, and longed to step into the W. C. T. U. ranks again. It was a great grief to our state president, that she could not be present when the tired body of this "promoted soldier" was laid to rest, but Mrs. Metzgar, of Moline, and Miss Mahon had a part in the funeral services after Dr. Dean, her pastor, had spoken from the words, "To die is gain." There was a request that there should be no flowers, but it is hard to keep loving hearts from bringing their floral tributes in memory of such a life, and this was no exception. Though very feeble, Mrs. Kirkpatrick's presence will be remembered in the Monmouth convention two years ago, at which time her house was filled with guests. "Counted faithful" shall be her epitaph, with many others whose record is on high.

The closing meeting of this Illinois W. C. T. U. convention was on Friday evening, when Anthony Comstock, the friend of humanity, spoke of

"THE FOES OF SOCIETY, CHURCH AND STATE."

This was a fitting close to the convention. The work of the licensed dramshop, the gambling den, pool-room and brothel, and the distribution of obscene literature, he deals with. Sixty-seven tons of poisonous printed matter have been destroyed by him and the society he represents. The long scar upon his cheek bore witness that he had felt the assassin's knife. The personal incidents narrated added interest to the address. Many hearts were stirred to put forth more earnest efforts in behalf of home and native land.

Excellent music was provided for all these meetings, and everything necessary for a grand convention was at hand, including some faithful reporters, who always have the good will of the W. C. T. U. press department of Illinois.

CONVENTION ECHOES.

Having received an invitation from Owensboro W. C. T. U., our thirteenth annual state convention convened there Sept. 23–27. We were met by Mrs. Robert McJohnston, president of the union, with other ladies of the reception committee who soon assigned us to our respective homes.

Owensboro is a little city, fair to look upon. Its homes, whose doors were so hospitably opened to us, are beautiful; its people refined and cultured; its schools are excellent, and we want to add that Prof. McGinnis, superintendent of public schools, is a faithful friend to woman's work, and the temperance cause. He has kindly offered the W. C. T. U. a prominent place on the program, at the teachers' association, which convenes in Louisville, during the holidays.

Never have we been more cordially welcomed than by the pastors of this city, who assured us of their sympathy, recognized us as co-laborers and bade us press forward.

Our sessions during the day were held in the handsome new lecture room of the Methodist church. Dr. Kelley, pastor of this church, in his words of welcome at our opening session said it delighted his heart to see this new building first occupied by the W. C. T. U. convention.

The convention opened Friday morning with Mrs. Munnell in the chair. She held in her hand a gavel, which had been made by a prisoner in Frankfort penitentiary and sent to her, requesting her to use it upon this occasion. The roll-call, by the recording secretary, showed that the other state officers were present and many superintendents of departments. The appointing of committees and usual order of business followed. There were about forty-five delegates and many visitors present. As we sat there, looking over this assemblage of intellectual Christian women, listening to reports of such faithful, efficient work done in various departments, this thought came to us:

"They talk about a woman's sphere,
As though it had a limit;
There's not a place in earth or heaven,
There's not a task to mankind given,
There's not a blessing or a woe,
There's not a whisper yes or no,
There's not a life or death or birth
That has a feather's weight of worth,
Without a woman in it."

We had with us as speakers, Miss Frances Griffin, Mrs. Mary Woodbridge and Miss Belle Kearney.

On Friday evening we were welcomed by Rev. F. D. Hale, of the Baptist church, in behalf of the pastors of the city; by Mrs. Eugene Owsley, representing the W. C. T. U.; and by Master Bailey McAdams, in the name of the Loyal Temperance Legion. God bless the children, for in them is centered our hope for the future! These welcomes were responded to in a happy manner, and after an entertaining program, rendered by the L. T. L., Miss Griffin delivered an eloquent address.

On Saturday evening Mrs. Woodbridge addressed a large audience, after which we were given a reception by the musicians of the city.

Sunday afternoon Mrs. Woodbridge preached in the Methodist church. Monday morning the usual order of business was resumed after our day of rest. Just before noon, Monday, the election of officers was called, which resulted as follows: Mrs. W. H. Munnell, Louisville, president; Mrs. Stella Hubble, Lancaster, vice-president; Mrs. G. H. Givins, Cynthiana, corresponding secretary; Mrs. Lizzie K. Myall, Paris, recording secretary; Mrs. M. E. Millersburg, treasurer. The following delegates to the National Convention were elected: Mrs. Frances Beauchamp, Mrs. Robert McJohnston and Mrs. Sue Davis. Mrs. Beauchamp was also elected state organizer.

Mrs. Hennen, editing The White Cross, and Mrs. Grinstead, editing The Reformer, have consolidated, and we are to have a paper called The Kentucky White-Ribbon. We predict success.

The convention adjourned Monday afternoon after singing, with prayerful hearts, "God Be With You Till We Meet Again." All through the convention special prayer was made for our beloved Chieftain across the waters. God speed the day when she will return to us, with her health fully restored! On Monday evening Miss Belle Kearney gave an address upon young woman's work and thus closed the best convention we have ever held.

NEW YORK.

TWENTIETH ANNUAL MEETING.

New York state W. C. T. U. held its twentieth annual convention at Syracuse, Oct. 3, 4 and 5. The state union was organized in Syracuse, and it was but fitting that we should "go home" to celebrate our "twentieth anniversary." The church was well filled at the opening of the convention, and delegates continued to arrive during the day and evening, until when the credential committee made its final report it was found that four hundred and forty-four voting delegates were present. A great many visitors were there as well, but no record was kept of them, so we could not learn the number. The church was most beautifully decorated by the Day Brothers of Syracuse, while our platform was kept supplied with cut flowers—a profusion of roses and carnations, fresh each day—from the greenhouses of Mr. Louis Marguisee, all of which were donated by him. Meals were served in Freeman Hall, a block or so from the church, and homes were provided for the entertainment of all. The Syracuse ladies worked very hard for the success of the convention. Mrs. Mary D. Ferguson, the county president, was chairman of the entertainment committee, and was instant in season and out of season.

It was voted that reporters be appointed to report our convention to the different religious newspapers of the state.

The President's annual address was the feature of the first day and was reported in full in the Syracuse papers. It contained not only a history of our past work, but valuable suggestions for the present and future. She reviewed our legislative work of last year, referred to the prospect of the full enfranchisement of woman, the coming Constitutional Convention, the Conditions of our State, The Fair and Sunday, Rescue Homes for Girls, Woman's Triumphs, and "Our Great Leader," Frances E. Willard, recommending that a cable message be sent her, conveying to her our love and sympathy, with fervent hope of her speedy restoration to health. This was done by the unanimous vote of the convention.

In giving the present standing of our state, Mrs. Burt said: "Twenty years ago when stirred into life by the divine breath of the Crusade, we numbered about 1,200 women. To-day should the muster roll of our membership be called 22,000 voices from the cities, towns and villages of the state would respond, together with 4,049 honorary members. From a very few juvenile unions we have grown to 348 Loyal Temperance Legions, with 20,544 members. County after county has fallen into line until a complete network of county and local organizations covers the state."

Nearly all of the recommendations contained in the president's address were adopted. The report of the treasurer and corresponding secretary followed next, and were well received. The superintendents of departments gave most excellent reports of work along the different lines, and each one seems to be peculiarly fitted for her own particular work.

A pleasant feature of the convention was the presence of a number of women who were at Syracuse at the organization of the state and as they were presented to the convention they were received with the Chautauqua salute.

Dr. Anna H. Shaw was the speaker of the first evening and Col. George W. Bain of the second. Every inch of available space was occupied and many were obliged to stand during the entire evening. Both speakers were at their best, and it is safe to predict that should either one of them go to Syracuse to speak again the largest building there would not more than accommodate the audience which would gather to hear them.

The third evening was given to the Y's and they furnished the program. Mrs. C. J. A. Jump, secretary of the Young Woman's Branch presided. Music, recitations and brief addresses filled the evening. Mrs. Frances J. Barnes, general secretary of the Young Woman's Branch, was present and spoke a few words. A portion of the church was reserved for the young people's societies of the city, invitations having been sent them to be present, and these seats were well filled with bright young women and young men.

We were cordially welcomed to the city by Mrs. Mary D. Ferguson, and to the church by Rev. A. E. Packard, the pastor of Plymouth Congregational Church, where our meeting was held. Dr. Packard was most happy in his manner, and his little speech was one of the brightest we have ever had in the way of a welcome. As an illustration of the advance which women have made he said. "Once, Ruth gleaned after Boaz; now, Ruth rides the patent reaper around the field, and Boaz sits on the fence watching her." This caused much merriment. Mrs. Mattie S. Mead, of Chautauqua county, responded for the convention.

The banner presented to New York by Mrs. Hunt at the Denver convention for the greatest gain in local superintendents of scientific temperance was presented to the convention by Mrs. Davies, state superintendent, and was received for the state by Mrs. Burt. We also received the banner presented by Miss Kimball for the largest number of signatures to the autograph pledge cards, nearly 30,000 having been secured, Mrs. Julia A. Bidwell, state superintendent of Sunday-school work making the presentation.

Mrs. Burt gave an interesting report of work done on the State Fair Grounds at Syracuse during the State Fair held in September. For a week previous to the opening of the fair, she was in Syracuse preparing for it, and every day during the fair she was there giving her personal attention to the work. The building fund is growing through her efforts and we hope to have a building erected before another year rolls around. Mrs. Burt does this work at a sacrifice of health, strength and means, and coming each year just previous to our state meeting it is doubly hard for her. We feel glad to know that the banner of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union is upheld on our state fair ground. Who can measure its influence? Mrs. Viele, as treasurer of this work, gave her report, and both reports were accepted with a rising vote of thanks.

An amendment to the constitution was adopted, increasing our state dues five cents per member, and this will give us a better financial basis. Five cents is a small sum, but multiplied by twenty-two thousand it verifies the saying, "Many littles make the mickle."

A great deal of important business was transacted which space will not permit me to report. The convention was most harmonious throughout, and we trust may leave an abiding influence for good. The officers were all reëlected almost unanimously. The Monday preceding convention and the Friday following were given to executive meetings.

The convention adopted the recommendation of the president, that we appoint a committee to present a memorial to the Democratic convention then in session at Saratoga Springs, and one to the Republican convention which should convene in Syracuse, October 6. Mrs. Lucy H. Washington was chosen to appear before the Democratic convention, and Mrs. Burt before the Republican. A telegram was received from Mrs. Washington on Friday saying she had been allowed two minutes in which to present the memorial, which asked them to declare in their platform for the prohibition of the liquor traffic, for the full enfranchisement of woman, and to appoint representative women as delegates to the coming constitutional convention. Mrs. Burt was also granted two minutes on Friday, before the Republican convention, and the same requests were made of them. What effect these memorials may have remains to be seen.

CONVENTION NOTES.

A very nice card containing hymns and responsive service from Anna Gordon's White Ribbon Hymnal was presented to each delegate, for use during the convention.

Music was furnished during the convention by a choral society, of Syracuse, the first evening; and a mixed quartette and male sextette the second and third evenings; also by the corresponding secretary.

In addition to the cable message sent Miss Willard, telegrams were sent to every state convention in session at the same time as ours, also to two county presidents who were kept at home by illness.

A message from Miss Willard was a most pleasing feature of the convention. The message said, "Read Titus 3: 15."

Messages were received from Mrs. Homer A. Nelson, of Poughkeepsie, who for the first time in years was absent from convention—from Mrs. Frances H. Bentley, president of Fulton county, and from several sister states.

A number of prominent temperance workers were introduced to the convention. Also a white-ribbon baby two years old, the grandson of Mrs. Mary D. Ferguson.

A literature table, in charge of Miss Wylie of Poughkeepsie, containing W. T. P. A. publications, occupied a prominent place. Miss Colman also had a literature table.

A son of our late brother P. A. Burdick was present with about 200 copies of a memorial volume, and many of the delegates purchased one or more.

Mrs. Allen Butler, the first president of the state union, was present and spoke cheering words to us.

A letter of regret was read from Mrs. Dr. F. G. Hibbard of Clifton Springs, the second president of the state union.

Nearly two million pages of literature have been distributed during the year.

Miss Dailey, the editor and publisher of our state organ, Woman's Temperance Work, was on hand and did good work for the paper in securing subscriptions.

Mrs. Nellie Hutchinson secured a large number of names for copies of state minutes.

The death angel has been busy in our state during the year, and three hundred and twenty-two have been taken from our ranks.

We had expected to have with us Mrs. Mary McGee Snell, of Mississippi, and Miss Lucia E. F. Kimball, of Chicago, but were disappointed. Miss Margaret E. Winslow, of Brooklyn, was also expected, but failed to be present.

Mrs. Ella A. Boole, first vice-president, presided the second evening. Mrs. Gardenier, the faithful recording secretary, and Mrs. Ellen L. Tenney, our treasurer, are towers of strength in our conventions.

A cornetist, whose name I did not learn, aided greatly in the congregational singing.

The different banners displayed in the decorations were very beautiful and belong to the different counties.

Twenty-two delegates to the World's Convention were elected, and forty to the National.

A devotional meeting, conducted by Mrs. Mary J. Weaver, superintendent, of the evangelistic department, was held in the chapel of the church each morning from 8 to 9 o'clock.

Mrs. Ella C. Viele, superintendent of railroad rates, had no small amount of work to do, but it was well and faithfully done, and certificates were ready for delegates when needed.

The responsive service was read, and "God be with you till we meet again," was sung, and the twentieth annual convention of New York State W. C. T. U. was closed, all feeling that it had been good for us to be there.

MRS. FRANCES GRAHAM,
State Reporter, Lockport.

MISSOURI NOTES.

In the clear, crisp air of Colorado mountains the active and faithful woman who has for two years chronicled Missouri's work, in these columns, is seeking the lost blessing of health.

In these hours of trial she has our earnest prayers and loving sympathy and as I take up the pen she has for a while laid down, it is with the hope that the white-ribboners of this state will continue to me the same kindly coöperation which was so large a factor in the success of their former reporter. Many were held in September and as Mrs. Hoffman, state president, was present at several the work has received a new impetus from her strong and helpful words, and at the twelfth district convention held at Lee's Summit, Sept. 7, 8, her witty and convincing address was received with an enthusiasm that was "significant of much" for the temperance work of that vicinity.

Early in September a stirring appeal from headquarters roused the women to united effort for new members on and the plan devised by Mrs. E. B. Ingalls, of St. Louis, deserves especial mention. At the bottom of the little circular she sent to each of her fourteen unions was appended the names and residences of ten or more ladies in different parts of the city at whose homes all the white-ribboners of each neighborhood were requested to gather in the morning for a brief, devotional service. At its close they were desired to go, singly or in couples, to call on their acquaintances and friends and ask them to unite with some union, for the protection of home and children from the power of the rum traffic. All members and all new members secured by the day's effort, were then invited to have a grand rally at four o'clock at the home of the president, Mrs. Ingalls, and after appropriate exercises, exchange experiences. This program was most successfully carried out—fifty members and probably more being secured. Great gains were also undoubtedly made in other parts of the state that have not been reported.

In spite of the "Veiled Prophet" in St. Louis and the "Priests of Pallas" in Kansas City, a larger host than usual of earnest women came up from every part of the State to attend the at Sedalia. The skies were kindly, the winds were tempered, and the hospitality extended to us most gracious. October 4 we gathered in the Christian church, a beautiful and unusually commodious edifice, whose pastor later gave us a royal welcome on behalf of the ministers of the city, many of whom attended our sessions and participated in our exercises.

The meeting was called to order by the president, Mrs. Clara C. Hoffman, and opened with a brief service of praise and prayer led by Mrs. Rebecca B. Hall, of Carthage, state superintendent of evangelistic work.

Miss Lydia J. Newcomb, National lecturer for department of physical culture, was expected to instruct us "How to Breathe," but not having arrived, her place was most successfully filled by Miss Mattie Bender of Trenton College.

Twenty of our number have joined the church triumphant during the past year, and in a touching memorial service conducted by Mrs. Lucy M. Wisker, they were tenderly remembered.

Mrs. Mary T. Lathrap, president of Michigan, was announced to speak Thursday evening, but it was our singular good fortune to have two whole convention days spiced with her wit and wisdom, as well as a forceful talk, just for us.

Clear-cut and strong as are Mrs. Hoffman's convictions, sometimes too, almost at right angles with those of her most earnest women, it is nevertheless true that she holds her constituency to her with unswerving loyalty because they honor her courage, admire her great ability, believe in her honesty and love her for her appreciation of what is best in them.

The corresponding secretary, Miss Ellen D. Morris, in her review of the year's work gave these interesting facts: In 68 counties there were 3,904 saloons, 39 distilleries and 18 breweries, 46 counties not having replied to her inquiries. Mrs. Glazier, state treasurer, gave an encouraging report, which was followed by a pleasant thank-offering service conducted by Mrs. E. B. Ingalls of St. Louis. Mrs. Alice Brown, of Sedalia, presented fraternal greetings from the Catholic Women's Temperance Union and the session closed.

Wednesday evening was devoted to addresses of welcome from Rev. J. S. Myers, on behalf of the clergy of Sedalia, Mrs. E. E. Clark for the W. C. T. U. and Rev. E. P. Ryland, for the Y. P. S. C. E., to which Mrs. A. A. Hawley, of Kansas City, gave a rhymed response which was pleasantly received. Miss Lydia J. Newcomb gave an able address on the "Relation of Physical Culture to the Temperance Cause," in which she said, "We dress our bodies so we are not able to do anything, and then deplore our inability to do the Lord's work." She concluded with illustrations of the exercises of the Delsarte system.

Thursday morning the vice-presidents gave two-minute talks on "How to secure new members," which were packed with helpful suggestions, and in the afternoon the superintendents followed with five-minute speeches full of practical help for workers, and later Miss Newcomb showed us "How to Relax," which by this time proved a most welcome lesson.

The event of the convention was the magnificent address of Mrs. Mary T. Lathrap, in the evening, on "The Divine Side of Government."

Friday morning the general officers of the state were all reëlected unanimously, as well as the vice-presidents, and nearly all of the superintendents, and some new departments were taken up and officered. A few changes were made in the state and district constitutions, and delegates to the World's and National Conventions were elected.

The report of the resolutions committee was then read, and with some slight changes, approved. It reaffirmed the attitude of the W. C. T. U. of Missouri in regard to intoxicants and opiates, and made earnest protest against the complicity of church and state with the liquor traffic. It declared for a full ballot for women, and registered its opposition to legislation for the few as against the many, censuring the United States Senate for obstructing the will of the people.

The work of the Loyal Temperance Legion was specially urged as a sure way of filling our ranks and educating temperance sentiment, and the report closed with the customary resolutions of courtesy.

The last hour of the convention was given to an interesting program by the Y's under the leadership of their talented state secretary, Miss Carrie Lee Carter, and our hearts were stirred with gratitude by the presence of so many bright and thoughtful young women, knowing it was full of promise for the work in Missouri.

After singing, "Blest be the tie that binds," Mrs. Hoffman declared the Eleventh Annual Convention of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Missouri adjourned.

Friday evening was given to a medal contest by children (?) between thirty-five and eighty, and proved highly entertaining. The medal was won by Mrs. Millie M. Lewis, of Winfield.

We were especially favored in the music furnished during the convention by Miss Gullie, Miss Merz, Mr. Clark and others; it was of a high order of excellence.

PRESERVED IN THE RECORD.

Proceedings of the "World's Parliament of Religions" Now Easily Obtainable.

Half the value of the "World's Parliament of Religions" would be lost if no permanent record of its proceedings had been kept. It is estimated that the total of words contained in the various speeches reaches the enormous figure of 2,000,000 words or more than the Bible contains. Some of these words may be of dubious value, but all of them were uttered in good faith and in the heat of profound convictions. The speakers were representatives of all the historic faiths, Christian and Jewish, Mohammedan, Hindu, Confucian, Buddhist, Shintu, Jain, Brahmin, etc., all were gathered on one platform in response to an invitation to come and present, in terms of frankness and courtesy, the claims of their faith upon the respect and confidence of mankind. The most learned and pious came from the four corners of the globe. There was absolute freedom of speech but no jarring or contention. They who heard the addresses heard the religions of the world in all their manifold forms presented by their ablest exponents. This impression would now be lost had not the addresses, papers and speeches been reduced to print and so preserved for all time. The result is a compendium of information, whose value it would not be easy to overestimate.

The question has often been asked of late, since the adjournment of the World's Parliament of Religions, whether any steps had been taken to preserve the record of that unique and wonderful gathering. We are able to answer that question authoritatively. A complete record, containing all the speeches, papers and addresses delivered in each of the seventeen sessions has been made. The reports of the papers have been duly revised and corrected, so that their accuracy is without a flaw. These have been collected in neat and tasteful form and illustrated with portraits of the principal delegates.

It is needless to dilate on the value of such a work. It is in brief a photographic reproduction of that which has been well described as the "crowning event of the nineteeth century." It is a succinct account of all the religions of the world, from the lips and pens of their respective leaders. As the parliament itself was unique, so is this publication—unique and of incalculable value.

We have made arrangements by which our readers are able to procure this great work at a merely nominal price. In another column will be found the formal announcement.

PATENTS

FOR INVENTIONS.

Equal with the interest of those having claims against the government is that of INVENTORS, who often lose the benefit of valuable inventions because of the incompetency or inattention of the attorneys employed to obtain their patents. Too much care cannot be exercised in employing competent and reliable solicitors to procure patents, for the value of a patent depends greatly, if not entirely, upon the care and skill of the attorney.

With the view of protecting inventors from worthless or careless attorneys, and of seeing that inventions are well protected by valid patents, we have retained counsel expert in patent practice, and therefore are prepared to Obtain Patents in the United States and all Foreign Countries, Conduct Interferences, Make Special Examinations, Prosecute Rejected Cases, Register Trade-Marks and Copyrights, Render Opinions as to Scope and Validity of Patents, Prosecute and Defend Infringement Suits, Etc., Etc.

If you have an invention on hand send a sketch or photograph thereof, together with a brief description of the important features, and you will be at once advised as to the best course to pursue. Models are seldom necessary. If others are infringing on your rights, or if you are charged with infringement by others, submit the matter to us for a reliable OPINION before acting on the matter.

St. Nicholas for Young Folks

CONDUCTED BY MARY MAPES DODGE.

It Absorbs "Wide Awake" and is Enlarged.

OF all the publications for boys and girls that the world has ever seen, ST. NICHOLAS is unquestionably the best. It has been praised by the press and the people of two continents,—its circulation is unprecedented among magazines for young folk. Beginning with the number for November, 1893, now for sale everywhere, it is enlarged by the addition of about 200 pages in the volume, and for 1893–94 it will have the greatest program in its history. New subscribers should begin with November, and get the first of Rudyard Kipling's stories of India and the jungle, and first chapters of

SINCE it began publication, in 1873, ST. NICHOLAS has absorbed in itself about all the leading children's magazines, including "Our Young Folks," "The Schoolday Magazine," "The Little Corporal," "The Children's Hour," and last of all the favorite New England periodical, "Wide Awake." "The more the merrier," says the editor of ST. NICHOLAS. Each new crowd of young people is made welcome, "and all unite heartily in the same quests, the same songs and jollity." ST. A resolution to present the model battleship, "Illinois," on exhibit at the World's Fair, to the state of Illinois for use as a naval armory, was passed in the United States Senate, Saturday.

The World's Fair Congresses were fitly closed by a session on Saturday, October 28, in which the representatives of the World's Congress Auxiliary and many foreign visitors participated.

The National Woman's Foreign Missionary Society of the M. E. church held its annual meeting at St. Paul, Minn., last week, and the Woman's Home Missionary Society of the same church held a convention of one hundred delegates in Toledo, O., at the same time.

ONLY the warmest commendation has resulted from the beautiful DAILY UNION SIGNAL issued from our presses during Convention week. Orders are pouring in upon us, and in most cases, extra sets are purchased for friends, as it is believed that this handsome paper with its faithful account of the great Conventions will win many converts to our ranks.

NOTHING so clearly demonstrates the onward march of woman's—of humanity's—cause as the love and veneration exhibited by our young women toward the one whose very name is a synonym for sex equality, Susan B. Anthony. The Y's, as well as the W's, delight to honor that name side by side with the name of their own beloved chief, Frances E. Willard.

MR. GEORGE E. MARSHALL, stationer, 144-146 Monroe street, Chicago, will have the grateful thanks of the thousands of boys and girls who have contributed their dimes to the Willard Fountain. This generous-hearted business man has presented to the department of juvenile work of the World's W. C. T. U., an elegant record book, leather bound, with a beautiful embossed cut of the fountain therein, in which are to be inscribed the names of each and every donor to this gift of the children to the electric city which has entertained the World's Fair. As the dedication of the Temple has been postponed until spring, when it is hoped Miss Willard can be here to assist in the ceremonies, it has been thought best to defer the presentation of the fountain until that time in order that she may also participate in the services connected with the unveiling of this significant statue.

IT is a curious coincidence that in 1868 Miss Willard first crossed the Atlantic in the "fastest ship afloat," viz., the steamship "City of Paris" of the Inman Line, and that this is the same ship in which Lady Henry Somerset crossed in October, 1893, to preside over the World's W. C. T. U. Convention in her friend's place. In that quarter of a century what mighty changes have occurred in the point of view of these two leaders of women and temperance!

IT seems a happy concurrence that children's week at the Fair should occur at the same time as the visit of our World's and National Conventions to the city. As was suggested by an Ohio delegate the spectacle of the throngs of embryo citizens on the streets, on the cars and on the grounds furnished an impressive object lesson to our women. It inspired the earnest mother-hearts of the white-ribboners with new zeal and with greater determination to "do everything" that will tend to make it as easy as possible for the coming man and woman to do right and as difficult as possible for them to do wrong.

"WE believe in home rule for women." These words of a man (a young man, of course) riveted our attention as we moved with the throng from the Hall of Washington, during a noon recess. "So do we," was the quick retort of his companion, a silver-haired white-ribboner, "and we want the ballot because we have found out that 'home rule' is a farce without it, we home-rulers must have the power to decide what influences shall or shall not enter our domain." We went on our way rejoicing that one young man at least was in a fair way to receive the arrest of thought which should make of him a full fledged woman suffragist.

"THE Y's constitute the reserve force of the white-ribbon army which, with Mrs. Barnes as its Blucher, is coming up to the help of our Wellington (Miss Willard) and is destined to become the chief factor in the overthrow of the enemy." So said Miss Clara Parrish, one of our bright and energetic young organizers from the platform on Y evening. "The W. C. T. U.," she remarked, "was one of the first organizations to recognize the importance of having a reserve force in training, and from being as at its inception a mere social factor, the Y union has become a working force in nearly all departments of W. C. T. U. work, and one upon which the parent organization looks with increasing hope and pride."

A SYMPATHETIC audience filled the seats within earshot of the speakers' platform in Washington Hall on the Sabbath evening following the Conventions, October 22, to listen to two of our W. C. T. U. state presidents and well-known lecturers, Mrs. Clara Hoffman, of Missouri, and Mrs. Susan Fessenden, of Massachusetts. New York's president, Mrs. Mary T. Burt, was in the chair, and Mrs. Hammer, president of Pennsylvania W. C. T. U., conducted the devotional exercises of responsive Scripture reading and prayer. The singing was led by Mrs. Frances Graham, of New York, assisted by Miss Louise Linebarger, of Georgia, cornetist. Mrs. Hoffman made a stirring and characteristic appeal for woman's enfranchisement, saying, "No victory will come until the ballot is given to women. Woman's 'influence' will begin to tell when she can crystallize it at the ballot box." Mrs. Fessenden graphically pictured the effects of the "rum monopoly," which has attached to its train all classes and conditions bound by the iron bands of habit and the chains of appetite, showing the misery entailed and the consequent necessity for penal and reformatory institutions. She urged Prohibitionists to continue their efforts until this great Juggernaut is overturned and demolished. The W. C. T. U. Closing Service, led by Mrs. Burt, was a fitting finish to the meeting.

CONTRARY to our plan and desire, it became impossible at the last moment to insert the unread reports of superintendents and organizers in the Convention number. We extended our pages as much as practicable and cut down the Convention report as closely as possible, but even then there was no space left. We are determined, however, that these excellent reports shall be published, and hereby extend our third invitation to those who have not already sent in a copy for publication to do so at once, and we will give as prompt publication as possible in the regular numbers.

AS WE anticipated, an official denial has been sent out by the Osceola, Neb., W. C. T. U. regarding the reported connection of that union with the alleged white-cap outrage upon suspected immoral girls. The president and secretary of the union have made affidavit that the society did not instigate the lawless proceeding and as a body denounces the offense. Strange, isn't it, that these charges against our organization were given the publicity of more than two columns in prominent positions in the dailies and its contradiction is relegated to a twenty line item in a rear corner? This is but a sample of the unfair criticism and readiness to think ill of others, which is latent on every hand.

MR. SEN TSUDA, of Japan, expressed himself before the Convention as surprised that in the city of National W. C. T. U. headquarters the sign of the saloon was so much more frequently met with than the badge of our organization. "I do not count ten up to this time," he said, "as the number of ladies I have seen wearing the white ribbon, but on the contrary, wherever I turn I see a signboard of whisky and beer. Take the one block of Lake avenue at 55th street and there I see sixteen bars on one side of the street. Is it not amazing!" Indeed it is; we ought to be able to show our brother at least one white-ribboner for every licensed saloon. When our government shall become in truth as in name a government of and for and by the people, then, if our Oriental brothers, who have so justly if so severely criticised us this summer in the congresses, will visit us again they will find the saloon, the gambling den and the brothel conspicuous by their absence.

HISTORY has repeated the horrible tragedy of Garfield and Guiteau. All Chicago was stirred on Saturday night by the startling news of the assassination of Mayor Harrison, which flew like wildfire from tongue to tongue and over the electric wire and ocean cable, to distant cities and countries. Mayor Harrison had spent the day at the World's Fair, the host of the mayoralty guests from many cities. Resting quietly at his home in the early evening, he was called to the door and shot by a newsboy named Prendergast. The awful calamity has shocked every one. The flags on the city and government buildings are flying at half-mast as we write, and the closing day of the great World's Fair is shrouded in gloom instead of the gayety that has been so long planned. It seems a dreadful thing that a public official, placed in his high office by the suffrages of the community, should be made the target for the assassin's pistol and his life endangered by any ill-conditioned claimant for political spoils. Carter Harrison became a martyr to the system of political award which he had so generously encouraged. While doubtless his assassin is an imbecile, the sole reason he assigns for his atrocious deed is that the mayor had not fulfilled his election promise to provide him a good position in return for his vote. The mayor's body is to lie in state in the city hall twenty-four hours before burial, which will take place on Wednesday of this week. A special election for a new mayor has been called, in the meantime the city council has elected a temporary chairman.

WORLD'S WOMAN'S CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE UNION CONVENTION.

SECOND BIENNIAL MEETING.

CHICAGO, MONDAY MORNING, October 16, 1893.

Bright and frosty the morning dawned. Hundreds of women had reached the city during the week previous in order to be on hand for the early nine o'clock opening on Monday. The first announcement of Mrs. Mary A. Woodbridge, the secretary, indicated the character of the meeting. She said: "Some are asking where the state delegates will sit. They will sit behind the banner marked 'United States.' In this World's Convention only nations are represented."

The decorations of Washington Hall, the place of meeting, were simple and significant. Vases of flowers were placed on desks and tables. The beautiful banner of the World's W. C. T. U., which was made especially for the first World's Convention in Boston two years ago, occupied the place of honor in the rear of the platform. It represents the globe encircled by the white ribbon floating among clouds in the deep blue of space. Beneath is the motto, "Christ for the world," within a ring of evergreen and holly. Above this significant banner is the motto of our World's and National leader, Frances E. Willard, "We wage our peaceful war for God and Home and Every Land."

The picture of Miss Willard, our beloved, absent leader, hung in a prominent position, and a silken globe with the token of our organization tied about it was an addition to the platform ornaments. Flags of all nations were suspended from ceiling and post as they have been during all the Congresses. Each country's delegation was indicated by a white-ribboned card suspended above it. Thirteen different countries, with twice as many delegates, were thus placed.

On the platform was an assembly of women not only distinguished in office, but brilliant in deeds and the noble ideas wrought out in their self-sacrificing lives. Beside Lady Henry Somerset sat the treasurer, Mrs. Ella F. M. Williams, of Canada, and Miss Anna Gordon. On the other side were the secretary, Mrs. Mary A. Woodbridge, and Mrs. L. M. N. Stevens. Behind them were seen the faces of the president of the W. C. T. U. of France, Miss de Broen, Mrs. Chika Sakurai, of Japan; Mrs. Elizabeth Wheeler Andrew, Dr. Kate Bushnell and Miss Jessie Ackermann, who have girdled the earth with the white ribbon in their work as round-the-world missionaries of the World's W. C. T. U.; Mrs. M. M. Love, recent president of Victoria; Mrs. Potter Palmer and Mrs. Chas. Henrotin, in representation of the Woman's Branch of the World's Congress Auxiliary; Miss Elizabeth Greenwood, World's and National W. C. T. U. evangelist; Mrs. Lide Meriwether, president of Tennessee W. C. T. U., and Mrs. Alice Harris, of Boston; Miss Alys Smith, of London, daughter of Hannah Whitall Smith, the Quaker Evangelist of the W. C. T. U.; Mrs. Hannah J. Bailey, superintendent peace and arbitration for World and National; Mrs. Matilda B. Carse, builder of the Temple, and Mrs. Josephine Nichols, ex-president of Indiana W. C. T. U.; Mrs. Frances J. Barnes, general secretary Young Woman's Branch; Mr. and Mrs. John G. Woolley; Miss Susan B. Anthony; Mrs. Zerelda Wallace; Mrs. Caroline B. Buell; Miss Esther Pugh; Mother Stewart.

Owing to necessary preparation which could not be made before, the Convention was not called to order until 9:45. At that time Lady Henry Somerset walked upon the platform amid hearty cheers, and, without delay, stepped to the president's stand and gently, but firmly, applied the gavel.

After the singing of Coronation, led by Mrs. Harris, devotional exercises were conducted by Miss Greenwood, and the audience listened attentively to four distinguished addresses of welcome, delivered by Hon. C. C. Bonney, Mrs. Potter Palmer, Mrs. Charles Henrotin and Dr. Josiah Strong. These were all given in full in THE DAILY UNION SIGNAL, so that we can give only a sentence or two here. [This will be the case, necessarily, with all the addresses and reports which received full mention in THE DAILY, as otherwise we could never compass the two great Conventions in one number.]

To white-ribboners, Mr. Bonney's golden sentence doubtless was:

"The Woman's Christian Temperance Union stands in the world the foremost representative of the new movement which is known as the woman's movement of the nineteenth century, and I think it only just to say that that organization which has sought to bind the whole world with a white ribbon of social purity, to banish from the world all the great evils of intemperance and insanity and pauperism and crime which follow in its train, is entitled to the palm of victory."

And that of Dr. Strong's: "I pray God's richest blessing upon your organization, until this white ribbon, woven by the warp and woof of prayer and work (believing prayer and intelligent work,) shall grow long and yet longer until it wraps within itself not only the noblest women of America and Europe but the womanhood of all the world."

When Lady Henry Somerset arose to respond to these admirable addresses, she said, first, "It is an impossibility to take any one's part well, but it is an absolute impossibility for any one to take Frances Willard's part, and, therefore, at the outset I feel that I am placed at a most decided disadvantage. I come to you to-day in the character of what we, in England, call the Queen's messengers. They are simply chosen as men who can with the greatest fleetness carry the dispatches of our Queen in England to all parts of the globe, and I think that I may claim that I have the right to be considered one of them, for I think no one could have come more fleetly, considering that I have not stopped night nor day since I started from London, and it is to-day in the character of the Queen's messenger that I come, for I bear the message with me that I will give you presently of the Queen of this white-ribbon movement—Frances Willard (applause), and I ask you to take the deed rather than the ability, and to take the good-will that I show rather than the power that I shall manifest in presiding here to-day."

In closing her inspiring address, Lady Somerset said:

"The World's Christian Temperance Union claims, I think, to have been the first body of women who have made it their prayer, their delight, their joy to concentrate no more only the good and blessing upon one nation, but to stretch out upon all the nations of the earth, knowing no difference in creed or class or nationality, and therefore, it is fitting that the last notes struck in this great woman's harmony should be the note of praise, the note of joy, the note of uplift, of the white-ribboned women here in this magnificent World's Fair city."

Mrs. Ella F. M. Williams, President of the Dominion Union, as well as World's Treasurer, happily responded to the welcomes, among many bright sentences being this one: "Along that imaginary line that is said to separate our two countries, there are mile-posts, according to an old legend, on one side of which an American eagle screams defiance to the British and on the other side the British lion roars defiance to the Americans. But let me tell you that neither bird nor beast interferes with the passage of the white-ribboner."

Miss Ackermann's response was apropos, closing with a touching incident about a tiny American flag that fell from her home letter received last Christmas morning in far-off Australia.

The last speaker to respond to the cordial welcomes was Mrs. Lide Meriwether, President of the Tenn. W. C. T. U., who voiced her sentiments in one of her own inimitable poems, entitled "Trust in God and Keep the Plows A-goin'," which we trust to present to our readers later.

After roll-call and appointment of committees, Lady Henry proceeded to read a portion of Miss Willard's address to the World's Convention.

[We give below as much of it as our limited space will permit, and refer our readers to the pamphlet containing both this and the National address, which may be obtained from the W. T. P. A. for ten cents.]

THE WORLD'S W. C. T. U.

The World's W. C. T. U. is but an outline map as yet. The shading is to come; the tones are to be wrought into its texture with the perspective that shall make a picture glorious and complete. How soon this vision shall begin to dawn on human eyes depends upon each one of us,—in the last analysis perhaps as much on one as on another.

No testimony is more uniform or more cheering than that which comes from our round-the-world missionaries, showing the solidarity of sentiment among women everywhere, no matter what their complexion, language or condition of servitude; they all believe in the white ribbon movement when it is explained to them, and none more heartily than the dusky-faced women of Africa, to whom our ambassadors spoke through interpreters, and who listened so long and with such acute interest that the pale-faced women from the West could not find it in their hearts to break up the meeting until an unusually late hour. The universal kindness and good-will manifested toward our representatives, brings to our minds with pathetic significance, those sacred words, "He fashioneth their hearts alike."

It should be remembered thankfully by us that Mother Stewart, whose name has gone the world over as "the great Crusader," had the honor of giving the first impulse that led to the foundation of the British Women's Temperance Association in 1876; and that this is universally conceded as a part of authentic history. Mrs. Margaret Parker, a philanthropic Scotch woman, was the prime mover in England, but Mother Stewart had come to her all the way from Ohio with the Crusade torch in her hand.

The B. W. T. A. affiliated with the World's W. C. T. U. in 1885, through the influence of Mrs. Margaret Bright Lucas; but the prevailing sentiment in the executive of that society has always been hostile to Americans and American ideas until the revolution, which took place at the 17th annual meeting in May of 1893, when Lady Henry Somerset and a minority of her executive committee led the movement which resulted in the endorsement of the "Do-everything policy" by a good majority, and the re-election of Lady Henry Somerset and officers who were in agreement with her progressive plans. As a result of this action the W. C. T. U. throughout the world is now harmonious and homogeneous; "all before us lies the way," and we have but to enter in and possess the land as the reward of consecrated common sense efforts to make good people know what are our principles, and by what method we seek their incarnation in habit, custom and law.

There were in the B. W. T. A., by the Secretary's report, 610 local societies last May. Since then 25 have seceded with the members of the old executive committee, who resigned after the annual meeting, but more than 60 new branches have been formed. Lady Henry Somerset is a peerless leader, she is full of faith that works by love; she is tactful and ingenious, brimming over with wit and good cheer; equally ready with influence, pen, voice, and purse, she has a statesman's head, a courtier's manners, and a child's heart; she is a leader of leaders, and her comrades cherish for her such love as none but unselfish and heroic natures ever win.

In Canada three provinces, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward's Island, have gained the scientific education law, Mrs. Mary H. Hunt leading the forces. Mrs. Ella F. M. Williams of Montreal, is now president of Dominion W. C. T. U., and a successful convention was held last spring at Winnipeg, Manitoba. Results of the commission to investigate the workings of the liquor traffic have not yet been announced, but a plebiscite of the people on prohibition promises to forestall the report of this half-hearted group.

In July last Miss Anna Gordon visited her sister, Mrs. Alice Gordon Gulick, who is vice-president in Spain for the W. C. T. U., and has, with her husband and family, a position of large and beneficent influence in that kingdom where they have wrought for thirty years. Mrs. Gulick has been quietly sowing good seed in the hearts of her bright Spanish girls for many years, and Miss Anna Gordon on her birthday, July 21, established the first Young Woman's Christian Temperance Union and Loyal Temperance Legion ever known within their borders. These are only starting points, it is true, but we do not forget how very small have been the beginnings of our white ribbon work in almost every locality, state and nation, where it is now taking on a permanent type, known and read of all men for its intelligence and zeal.

Two new points of light stand out for us on the map of Europe in places where we have never seen them before, as a result of the international temperance convention in The Hague, Holland, in August last. A meeting of Dutch women was held, addressed by Mrs. Selmer, our vice-president for Denmark, and an international W. C. T. U. for Holland was projected and affiliated with the World's W. C. T. U. We know that the women of Holland do not readily relinquish the grasp that they take on any subject of thought or action, and we feel assured that from this nucleus will spread the light and leading of our movement throughout the little kingdom over which the little Wilhelmina will ere many years preside.

A lady from Finland reported that out of two hundred thousand inhabitants fifty thousand are total abstainers, of whom the large majority are women. We expect that from the efforts of our Danish vice-president coöperating with this earnest Finland lady, we shall secure within a few months the beginning of an organization in Finland.

In Norway the first National W. C. T. U. convention has just been held (September 22–24) at Trondhjem, in "the land of the midnight sun," and strangely blessed was it to receive a telegram of "sisterly greeting" from Countess Wedel-Jarlsberg, the earnest-hearted president.

The largest temperance society on the continent is that of the Croix Bleue, of which the membership is ten thousand. What a commentary is this on the present situation!

We have vainly tried thus far to gain a foothold in Italy, but a providential opening is now before us. Mrs. Josephine Butler, superintendent of the World's W. C. T. U. work for social purity, Miriam and Deborah in one, of the host that has rallied to the watchword of "A White Life for Two," has been earnestly urged to make a pilgrimage to the land of song and poesy, and she will do so under our auspices in a few months.

Our honorary president, Mrs. Leavitt, sailed to the Hawaiian Islands early in 1884, and her name will always stand at the head of our growing galaxy of "round-the-world missionaries." Since our first Convention (Faneuil Hall, Boston, 1891) she has pioneered in South America and Mexico, investing much of the last year in the Hawaiian Islands, where she has lent a hand to help the work she founded there nearly ten years ago; she has also lectured along the Pacific coast, and is now in Southern California. I renew my previous recommendations in respect to a fund for this heroic woman, only urging that it be for her personally and permanently rather than that the interest during her life time only shall be hers.

Miss Jessie Ackermann, president of the W. C. T. U. of Australia, which she has done so much to create, has a story to tell full of adventure and the romance of honest hard work. Miss Ackermann went out on her world trip from the Convention held in New York City, 1888, and returned in the spring of '93, having been absent something less than five years. She is the first woman who ever traversed Australia; she has organized it in every direction, and consolidated it in a National W. C. T. U., and as president of the organization she has also visited and worked in India and China.

When the World's W. C. T. U. first convened in 1891, we had just commissioned Mrs. Andrew and Dr. Kate Bushnell to visit the outposts of our society, and they will report the result of their remarkable investigations. Two more intrepid or better-furnished representatives could not have been chosen. No word has come to us concerning them save in their favor. Inspired as they are by the Crusade spirit, and thoroughly grounded in the method of its organized form, they have lighted living tapers throughout the East, and re-illumined many that were well-nigh extinguished, while their study of the condition of degraded women in the military cantonments of the British army in India was conducted with so much devotion, skill, and heroic self-sacrifice, that leaders in the British Parliament, who were on the Departmental Committee appointed by the present British government to take evidence on this very difficult and trying subject, have declared that in their long experience they had never known witnesses who excelled, and very few who approached, in ability and trustworthiness, our white ribbon representatives. Their united voices have been heard in nearly all the leading cities of Great Britain, their winged words have aroused the British public from its apathy, and there is every reason to believe that the abominable system of legalized vice will be crushed out henceforth from the English-speaking army in the East.

In all this tempestuous campaigning they have never received a penny from the World's W. C. T. U., nor from any source except as a free-will offering of those for whom they labored, until their return to England, when the British committee of the Society for the Suppression of Legalized Vice handsomely testified to them in a practical way its appreciation of the magnificent service they had rendered. More than this, their testimony forms the basis of one of the famous Parliamentary "Blue Books." Lord Roberts, General-in-Chief of the British army in India (at the time of their visit), has publicly apologized to them for expressing a doubt as to the credibility of their statements, and the London papers declare that the outcome of their work will be destruction to the dark methods of woman-slavery in British camps.

Our sisters returned to America to attend the Conventions at the earnest request of Lady Henry Somerset and myself. It would have been more consonant with their plans to have gone back to India, and visited China and Japan before taking home their report; but we felt that their presence and consecrated zeal were of too much value to be missed from our great meetings this autumn. I cannot adequately express the sense I feel of what these honored and great-hearted women have done to advance the cause of purity and temperance in their voyages of well-nigh one hundred thousand miles.

Nothing has moved me more than the accounts brought home by them of the way in which they were welcomed on their visits to Australia, South Africa, and India, by groups of women wearing the white ribbon, observing the noontide hour of prayer, writing their letters on paper headed "For God and Home and Every Land," quoting THE UNION SIGNAL and the utterances of leaders in different countries, and imbued heart and soul with the Crusade spirit, whose key-note is that by the coming of our Lord in habit, custom and law, this planet shall become a larger home for all who dwell here. At the Huguenot Seminary, South Africa, presided over by that gifted young woman, Miss Virginia C. Pride, our round-the-world missionaries were welcomed with the rallying cry given to the Y's by Mary T. Lathrap, "We are coming to the rescue, we are coming in our youth."

Miss Alice Palmer wends her way without rest, but I fear not always without haste, over the wide realm of South Africa, to which we appointed her in 1892 as our minister-at-large. She has caused things to come to pass that are true and lovely, and of good report. The white ribbon is acclimated in that new climate, and to the young and earnest-hearted Indiana girl, our motherly affections should, and I doubt not do, go out—that brave young spirit who went so far to carry in her gospel trumpet the clear Crusade echoes that shall attune the new life yonder to a nobler harmony.

Mrs. Ganguli, the educated Hindu lady, who was recently in England, said to some of us, "Every woman's name in India onds in 'bai,' which means sister, and they think we are all sisters, and that you English and Americans will as a matter of course do everything you can for them."

There are 33,712 women and girls in India under Christian instruction, and outside this favored circle stands the appalling number of 111,332,927 not under instruction, and unable to read or write.

I earnestly hope that vigorous measures will be taken at the present World's Convention to advance our work in India and Japan. We have secured the services of Mrs. Jeannette Hauser, of Lucknow, for thirty years a missionary in India, and one who has the entire confidence of reputable people there. Mrs. Hauser relinquishes a business that is important to her in the way of self-support, and comes to us for $600 a year, a sum that does not at all represent what she loses by making the change; but she hopes to eke it out by the help of people in India. Already several of our friends have agreed to give from ten to twenty-five dollars a year for five years, the total amount subscribed being, I think, about one fifth of the $600 that we must raise. If the fees are duly paid in, and the W. W. C. T. U. thank-offering day observed (that is, Mrs. Leavitt's birthday, September 22d,) we can secure the amount; and we have a good veteran soldier, Mrs. Reese, ready to go to Japan if we will pay her passage. I feel sure that in memory of our loved and lamented leader, Miss West, we shall be able to take a collection during this Convention that will go far toward meeting this expense.

The high caste Hindoos have received the impression that Christianity means intemperance, but they have learned that the Salvation Army is teetotal, and for this reason they think more highly of its members than of any other religious sect that comes to them from the West. Many a servant (for it is wholly from the lower class that Christian recruits are gained in the East), changes his religion, if a Hindoo or Mohammedan, in order that he may be permitted to drink. High caste women are total abstainers, and they oppose Christianity on no other ground so strongly as because it permits the use of alcoholics. Although women are in subjection, they still have much power in the home, and Hindoo men do not like to return to their wives with the smell of strong drink on their breath. When these women learn that total abstinence is the basis of the white-ribboners' society, they will gladly admit the W. C. T. U. women to their homes. One of our round-the-world missionaries was permitted to go to the family of a rajah, who had been for forty years a member of the government, spoke English like an Oxford don, and was in fact a cosmopolitan. He sent a carriage with four outriders to convey her to his princely home to talk with his "curtain women," for that is what married women of the "higher class" are called.

Tidings have come to us of a remarkable work in Aintab, Turkey in Asia, of which a gifted young woman, Miss Krikorion, is the leader. She says, "I shall regard it as a great favor and help to me to feel that my work is a branch of your great W. W. C. T. U.; it will encourage me to think that my small work is brought before the mercy seat along with the great work of God's people in the temperance reform." I give her address so that any of our friends who may have temperance literature, or may be willing to help this intrepid young woman as a Christian temperance worker, may forward her any token of their interest that they have the heart to send.

Among the signs of promise in Japan is the preparation of a pamphlet entitled "Alcohol and Man," by Mr. Taro Ando. Our faithful friend, Mr. Sho Nemoto, of Tokyo, Japan, has issued a speech on citizenship delivered by Miss West before 2,000 people in a church in Tokyo, on the 27th of October, 1892. The pamphlet also contains a touching account of the death and funeral services of Miss West and letters from leading men and women in Japan; it is written both in English and Japanese.

A convention has been held in Japan this year and the work reorganized. Mrs. Joseph Cook and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts are going there this winter, and I know they will gladly lend a hand to help our faithful white-ribbon men and women there.

The action of 700 missionaries in Bombay who declined to pass a resolution for the suppression of the drink trade in India, the opium traffic and the state regulation of vice, has caused great searchings of heart throughout the English speaking world. Much has been said by excellent men in defence of this action, and much more by men equally excellent has been said against it. On no account would I misjudge those who are the pioneers of civilization fighting on the frontier of progress, but upon one conclusion we may congratulate the missionaries and the cause, namely, that when they assemble in another decennial conference it is morally certain that their utterances on these and other questions of applied Christianity will give forth no uncertain sound.

The British Parliament has appointed a commission on the opium trade, which is to visit India during the coming winter, and we may expect a thorough ventilation of the subject. Strange to say, in the debate in Parliament that preceded the appointment of this commission, leading members were not ashamed to come forward and take a position in favor of the use of opium, saying, that "in a tropical climate it seemed necessary to the people," and setting forth the threadbare collection of fallacies with which, as temperance workers, we are familiar. The points attempted to be made were practically so identical with the defense set forth by advocates of the alcohol trade, that the simple substitution of the word alcohol would have made them subjects of admirable use in the Wine and Spirit Gazette.

Let me mention once more that the intention of the great Polyglot Petition seems to have been generally misunderstood. It is not supposed that it will produce any strong impression upon any government or ruler, although of course even this is possible. Neither is it proposed to leave the Petition in the hands of any government to be referred in the usual parliamentary way to a committee, and there remain entombed. The object is rather to focus public sentiment, and we all know that whatever does that is invaluable, and speeds the temperance cause. People are taught by great public object lessons as well as by the slow and quiet process of home training; popular opinion is exceedingly sensitive to the impress of a demonstration, and the spectacle of a commission of honorable and distinguished Christian women, who have given their lives to the cause of temperance and social purity, carrying a petition with millions of names gathered up from all quarters of the globe, both Christian and pagan, and presenting that Petition in the largest public hall of a great capital will be reported by the press of a whole nation and will set a myriad brains at work to solve the problem, "Why did these women do this thing? What does it mean? How much in earnest they must be! What infinite pains they have bestowed, what hardships they have encountered, what public opinion they have braved! Ought not we men, who have so much more power, to take up a question like that? Is it not unmanly to leave this great reform to women?" What we want is an arrest of thought in the manly brain; and such an embassy and such a petition will greatly help to bring about this consummation.

At the close of the reading of the address, a cablegram was ordered sent Miss Willard with the Scripture greeting found in Col. 2: 15.

After Archbishop Ireland had addressed the Convention, Mrs. Elizabeth Wheeler Andrew led in the noontide prayer followed by an exceedingly helpful Bible reading.

Mr. Anthony Comstock, Mr. H. L. Hastings and Mrs. Zerelda Wallace were then introduced and addressed the Convention most acceptably, Mrs. Wallace's closing words being: "I speak hope and courage to my friends, notwithstanding sometimes the outlook for the future is discouraging, because 'hope deferred maketh the heart sick,' yet I do feel that the manifestations that have been brought before my mind this year, particularly the last six months in this city, strengthen my faith that God's purpose for humanity is dominion and progress, and though the day may be delayed because of our own lukewarmness and indifference, it will come in His own good time. So I work with all the strength that is still remaining in me, and I pray that the men of this nation, the men of all the world, may have their eyes opened to realize that that part of the race in whose hands the conservative and the moral forces dwell numerically must be brought to bear against these licensed evils which are sanctioned by law, which corrupt our state, which destroy our homes and waste our wealth."

This session closed with the Doxology.

MONDAY AFTERNOON.

This session was more in the nature of a temperance mass-meeting, the World's officers being obliged to hold an executive session. Dr. Anna Shaw presided, and introduced in turn the distinguished representatives of the various nations organized under the white-ribbon.

Miss de Broen, president of the W. C. T. U. of France, was the first speaker. She told of the work in which she is so vitally interested, the Medical Mission for the poor of Paris, and how she managed to unite the work of the W. C. T. U. with that. She said: "It has been my privilege to work amongst the French for twenty-two years, and from the very establishment of my medical mission I introduced temperance work, without ever knowing that there was such a noble army of women here in the United States, so you may imagine how great my cheer was when I heard of you. The only window in Paris which bears the initials, World's W. C. T. U., is in my mission. We want to give a welcome to all strangers, and we have there a text in French and English, Italian, Russian and Spanish, and we hope soon to have one in Chinese. There are thousands of passers-by, and many of them have inquired: 'What does it mean, that W. W. C. T. U.'?"

Miss Conybeare, Mrs. Stanley Mathews, Miss Alys Pearsall Smith, Miss Emily Pierce, Mrs. James Emmette and Mrs. Muff brought warm greetings from the British Women's Temperance Association. Miss Conybeare paid a high tribute to the work of Dr. Bushnell and Mrs. Andrew in India. Mrs. Mathews spoke eloquently of her admiration for the Temperance Temple and what it stood for. Miss Smith was warmly received for her mother's (Hannah Whitall Smith) as well as for her own sake, and spoke cheeringly of the work of the younger women in England. Miss Pierce told of the way in which she became interested in the work—through the assistance she gave Mrs. Nichols in the W. C. T. U. booth at the Paris Exposition in 1890. Mrs. Emmette greeted the Convention not "only with English love, but with true Christian love." Mrs. Muff spoke particularly to mothers.

Mrs. Cunningham, president of the British Columbia Union, delivered strong words for equal franchise, having herself enjoyed the privilege of municipal franchise for several years without any mental, moral or physical deterioration.

Mrs. Chika Sakurai from Japan responded gracefully though timidly to her introduction.

Miss Anna E. Smith represented the work in Cape Colony with an appropriate greeting, giving the good news that the work there was well started.

Miss Lillian Phelps spoke for Canada effectively, her closing words being: "This Convention is assembled for the protection of the international womanhood of the world, and so we greet ourselves, thank God and take courage for what has been accomplished in the past and for the prophecies for the future."

Mr. Sen Tsuda, the Japanese worker, who was such a friend to our promoted Miss West as well as the projector of the bronze tobacco bell which has been at the World's Fair all summer, was introduced and responded most quaintly as follows: "Ladies and Gentlemen: Excuse me, not a speaker in English. My address is written in English. Some lady read it for you. My pronunciation so bad that I will speak in Japanese better." He then gave a greeting in Japanese, which we are confident was most appropriate, after which Dr. Shaw read a part of his truly eloquent address as follows:

There are over a hundred temperance societies in Japan. Members of some societies number a hundred and some a thousand. Here are young men's societies and there are the Women's Temperance Unions. Most of them consist of Christians, and again there is another organized by the believers in Buddhism under the name of "Hansee Kwai" (a self-examination society). It has many hundred thousand members. But bear it in your mind, it is not a temperance society in the strictest sense of the word. Some say drinking should not be indulged in when a dinner is given on account of family worship. Some promise not to drink for three years. Well, the influence of this society is very weak. There are other societies organized by non-Christians. They were strong for a time, but they became weak very suddenly. Again there is a society bearing the name "Sesshiu Kwai" (Moderate Drinking Association). The meetings are, all and each of them, very ludicrous, and their influence is very weak. I had a few friends, members of this association, who died by drinking sake rice liquor. Only the Christian temperance efforts become influential and strong. There is no doubt that this fact is owing to the power of prayer and especially to the guidance and help of our Father in Heaven. Because the omniscient and omnipresent God is with you, dear beloved sisters, I firmly believe and doubt not that your undertaking will surely succeed.

Judging from the present conditions of Japan, temperance, like John the Baptist, makes men repent of their sins. Christianity and temperance are united and, like the two wheels of a carriage, propel men in the way of happiness. Wanting either one, they cannot enter the Kingdom of Heaven. As the Apostle Paul wrote in one of his epistles, "Temperance is one of the fruits of the Spirit." Gal. 5:19-25.

There are a few instances in Japan in which a dealer or a brewer of sake, after hearing the way of life, was convinced of the sinfulness of his business, repents and becomes a teetotal man. Allow me to refer to some of them. At the foot of our glorious and peerless Mount Fuji, or well known in America as "Fujijama," is a town called Misima. There was a large brewery owned by Mr.

Hanajima. A few years ago he heard the glad tidings of God preached and soon he was converted and baptized. He joined the church and gave his entire sake brewery to the church, and the brewery was turned into a girls' day and boarding school and place of worship, and made the tables and seats for the use of the school and church of some very large casks. When Miss Jessie A. Ackermann came to Japan to lecture on temperance a few years since, she addressed her audience in this very ex-brewery.

At Okayama, a large and populous city on the picturesque inland sea of our country, a sake brewer repented of his sins and becoming a Christian, turned all of his sake, which was being brewed, into vinegar and manure for rice fields and gave up his business once for all.

Mr. Shigeru Hayashu, of Yokohama, an elder of the church of Japan and the president of the temperance society, came to that city with the idea of engaging in retail and wholesale business of sake. While he was engaged in that business he joined the church, but thought his business was not wrong, although he was told to the contrary. Since Mrs. Mary Clement Leavitt visited Japan, he repented very much and gave up the business and is now devoting his body and mind, nay, offering himself wholly as a sacrifice to the cause of temperance. With the exception of teaching drawing to the pupils of Ferris Seminary two hours a day, he does nothing whatever but attend to the business of the temperance society, and to paint oil paintings to raise funds for the society. He toils incessantly day and night, summer and winter, and hopes to contribute ten thousand oil paintings to the society in his life-time. Noble and faithful man!

On the 11th of February, 1882, His Majesty, the Emperor of Japan, promulgated the constitution of our country changing the government into a constitutional monarchy. The day was a great day in our history. The people all over the Empire were very glad, and all made preparations to celebrate the great day. Mr. Iwasaki, of the Mitsubishi Company, who is the richest man of Japan, made his plan to pile up five hundred casks of sake, and as soon as the ceremony of the promulgation of the constitution was over in the Imperial Court, to put them on both sides of the street and to make sake free to the citizens on that day. Hearing of this, I went to his residence at once and, seeing Mr. Iwasaki, was just on the point of speaking to him to ask him to change his plan; he said, "I thought until this morning that I would celebrate the day by giving sake to the citizens; but I thought very suddenly that it will harm the people; I intend to change my plan." Being quite taken by surprise I asked him, "What do you intend to do instead?" He said, "It costs five thousand dollars to buy five hundred casks of sake. Well, I will multiply the sum by ten and ask the governor of Tokyo to distribute the cash to the poor and needy of the capital." In talking with him I found that the very time the thought occurred to him to make the change I was praying to God to have his plan changed. Did not God answer my prayer? Truly, we feel the necessity of the temperance cause in Japan.

Tokyo, where I live, has a population and the size of the city is about the same as Chicago. The rate of mortality per year is from 37,000 to 40,000. In 1890 it was 40,022. Of that number, those who died of the disease arising indirectly from the bad effect of sake is 10,447, and those who died of disease arising directly from sake is 10,016. In 1891, it was 37,044; indirect, 16,615, and direct, 9,149. In 1892, it was 37,053; indirect, 18,558; direct, 8,467. If I count this in percentage those who had indirect harm from sake is 44.3, and direct is 24.2, and therefore it comes to this that those who suffered the effect is in total 68.5, and those who are free from the effect is 31.5. These statistics are those which were presented to the governor of Tokyo from the physicians of the board of health. I have here in my hand the list of the diseases which are the direct and indirect result of alcohol, prepared by Dr. Nanba, the vice-president of the Red Cross Society of Japan.

Many of you, I am sure, have seen the bell made out of pipes which the W. C. T. U. exhibits in the World's Columbian Fair. Very many asked me: "Were those pipes opium pipes?" No, they were all tobacco pipes. In Japan there is no one who suffers from the effect of opium. In regard to this, Japan must pay the debt of gratitude to the United States of America. When our country signed the treaty with your country, your representative, Consul-general, Hon. Townsend Harris, paid great attention to this matter, and wrote in the treaty that if foreign vessels coming to Japan were found to have more than fifteen pounds of opium on board the opium should be confiscated and the vessel fined.

At that time the Japanese commissioners said that fifteen pounds per vessel would be too little. But Mr. Harris was aware of the evils of opium and stood firm as a rock in this matter. England did not agree to this exclusion of opium, but Japan, in accordance with Harris' persuasion and advice, insisted that she could not sign the treaty with England unless it was made like that with the United States. Japan had her desire complied with and we, up to this time, I am happy to say, are free from the evils of opium. According to the Harris treaty, a tariff of thirty per cent. value was put on liquors, but the Tokugawa government being just at the moment declining and decaying, granted the request of the French minister and reduced it to five per cent. Even to-day, a large amount of liquors are imported and the officials in charge of these matters want to change it but on account of the avarice of the foreigners they are not able to change it, but are suffering from the consequences.

About 40 years ago when your Commodore Perry, with your fleet of men-of-war, entered the Yeddo Bay for the first time and anchored at Uraga, it was Sunday. So he gave orders not to go ashore. On the deck of his vessel he had the 100th psalm read and prayer offered and with these he entered our country and without shedding a drop of blood consummated the treaty of amity in peace. I heard it said that as soon as this was done, he set apart $1,000 of his salary as a donation for the church building fund of Japan and put it into a bank in San Francisco. With this as a basis the church which was built on the very spot where he landed first and had conference with the Japanese commissioners, is the Union Church of Yokohama, and a native pastor now has charge over the native congregation. In this church it was that the funeral services for Miss Mary Allen West were held in Yokohama.

Indeed, Miss West was not much advanced in age, and we all with you regret her death very much. Her work in Japan was wonderful. It may not be too much to say that her work of three months in Japan moved the people more than thirty years' labor of the missionaries. She addressed her audience twice or thrice every day when there were opportunities. The cause of her disease, I was told, was to be traced back to years before, but I think she shortened her life, too, by overworking. Yes, she has offered herself as a sacrifice in the name of God and Home and Every Land to rescue men from the curse of intemperance. Inspired by her noble example, shall we not try to do our utmost? God grant it!

Before closing my address I have to say one word more. Chicago is the headquarters of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. Before I arrived here I have imagined to myself that I would see many, many white-ribbon ladies. But I do not count ten yet up to this time as the number of ladies whom I have seen wearing the badge. On the contrary wherever I turn I see a sign-board of beer, whisky and liquor. For instance, take the one block of Lake avenue at 55th street, and there I see sixteen bars on one side of the street. Is it not amazing?

Two months ago we went to North Dakota. On our way to Chicago we broke our journey at Milwaukee, Wis., and saw all the buildings of the Pabst Brewing Co. on invitation. I was overwhelmed with the large scale on which the business is carried on. I pray that through the earnest prayers of our beloved sisters that this company, like the Japanese brewer, who got happiness as before stated, may be made to change their business for one more useful to the people, and that within a decade or so the Pabst Brewing Company brewery may be turned into a church or a Young Men's Christian Association, or a theological Seminary. I sincerely and firmly believe that time will surely come when we shall hear the triumphant song of the W. C. T. U. ring throughout the world to the glory and honor of our Father in Heaven.

After singing, "God be with you till we meet again," Mother Wallace delivered the benediction and the meeting was adjourned.

MONDAY EVENING.

This session was greeted by a most eager and interested audience, as the speakers were our third and fourth round-the-world missionaries who have been so highly honored as well as so signally blessed of God in their heroic and delicate task of loosing the degrading social shackles from the sisters of India. Lady Henry Somerset presided, Mrs. Fessenden conducted the devotional exercises, and Mrs. Harris led the singing.

The following forceful letter from Mrs. Josephine Butler was then read by the chairman:

Honored and Dear Friends:

I regret that I am not able to be present at the Convention of the World's Woman's Christian Temperance Union. Lady Henry Somerset will convey to you the expression of my deep sympathy with you in the great work in which you are engaged.

I feel honored and strengthened by my connection with you, as superintendent of the Purity Department of the W. W. C. T. U. That connection is a great strength to me in the special line of work to which I was called many years ago, and to which your union has given a prominent place in its great and far-reaching program.

It is a source of joy and thankfulness to all who have that cause at heart that the women of your country and mine have been recently so closely drawn together in the cause of temperance and purity, and of all those forward movements which tend to increase the power and influence of women for good.

As you all know, we have lately had a marvelous proof of the advantage of that union. Two of your noble countrywomen have accomplished in India, in our and your behalf, a work which has resulted in the exposure and overthrow of a great deception and evil in our Indian Empire, which has given a shock to the patrons and regulators of impurity all over the world, and has been and will be an encouragement to moral reformers in every country in which this vital question has taken root. These ladies have also succeeded in re-arousing our own country, England, once more to a sense of the horror and wickedness of the legal enslavement of women in the service of vice. One of our noblest statesmen, the Right Hon. James Stansfeld, said that he had never, in the course of his long public career, seen a piece of work so well done, so carefully, skillfully and courageously carried through to the end, to be crowned with the success it deserved. No man or set of men, he declared, could possibly have done it so well.

The gratitude which I share with so many of my countrymen and women toward Dr. Bushnell and Mrs. Andrew has deepened my desire to be able a little longer to continue to take part in this work of justice and moral purifying; and I hope that, by God's grace, and strengthened by this very precious bond of union with your great organization, to be able to do something this winter in the purity work in some parts of the continent of Europe.

Your revered leader, Miss Frances Willard, is in this country while I write, and the thought comes to me of all that she has done, and the marvels which God has enabled her to accomplish, not in the great temperance cause alone, but on behalf of purity. She was the first woman who, grasping the vital importance of this latter question, and perceiving its intimate connection with that of temperance, volunteered to come forward and definitely take up that work as a portion of the great spiritual forward movement of women for the purification of the hearts and lives of men and women.

She met at the first with the cynical opposition and the special difficulties which the pioneers of the purity cause always encounter in all lands. It was a thorny path which she trod, alone at the first. But she had all the noble instincts, the holy anger and the tender pitifulness of a true woman; no sneers or coldness or difficulties daunted her, and she now has the reward of seeing thousands of her countrywomen, of whom Dr. Kate Bushnell and Mrs. Andrew are worthy types, taking to heart this great question, and more and more entering practically into the war against impurity. I have had the joy of meeting and conferring with your dear leader, whose voice and countenance expressive alike of power and sweetness I can never forget; and I wish here to record my love and veneration for her and my appreciation of her noble life-work.

Yours in the bonds of true fellowship,

JOSEPHINE E. BUTLER.

In introducing the honored speakers, our third and fourth round-the-world missionaries, Lady Henry Somerset paid a tribute of appreciation to their work and worth.

Mrs. Andrew's address was in part as follows:

I think to-night that there are special things which come to me and press their utterance immediately, but first I think of the ideal which was set before us by our president, Miss Willard, in her first thought of the World's Woman's Christian Temperance Union. She said that she felt that the whole force of the World's Union ought to be turned upon international questions, upon questions of legislation, purer laws, purer customs, the protection of helpless people, in all nations to which the Anglo-Saxon has gone often bearing the tempter in form of the drink, of opium and other evils. Then she said also that this World's Union should become a great world's protective agency, for the youths of the Anglo-Saxon nations that go everywhere, either in search of pleasure or work. She spoke of throwing the arms of mother-love around those boys and girls whom we find in every land.

So it came to Miss Willard's thought, not only that we should affect the great international questions, but that we should be a protective agency, and that we should establish bureaus of literature in different foreign lands in connection with other helps toward the education of these youths. We rejoice to find that this has been done already in many lands. We have found a wonderful bond of union between the women of all lands, the one pledge, the one badge and the one noontide hour of prayer, which we find observed in all these lands to which we have gone. As some one has said that it is always noontide somewhere, in the moving of the earth around the sun, so prayers are always ascending from our white ribbon women in the progress of the world and we know that God has that incense always going up to Him from the hearts of our workers.

Now, I want to impress upon you how real a thing prayer seems to me, how mighty a force. I think many people regard prayer simply as a matter of communion between their individual souls and God. They regard it almost in many cases as a formal thing, as something to be uttered to show their reverence for God or something simply to pour out their requests. They do not get to the outermost, the innermost, the very depths of what the divine energy of prayer should be to those who have the interests of Christ's kingdom upon their hearts. They do not know that it can be such an entering into and talking with God and hearing His answer, such a holding on and a wrestling for the world's salvation that it shall actually be a miracle working power. To those who know the power of such prayer and enter into it with this divine force in their souls, God communicating with them, telling them His secrets through His Holy Spirit, this is what prayer should be to the children of God. We have proved it, those of us who have been driven into close places where we knew that no human agencies could possibly lead us out of trouble. Some of us have been brought to this place so that we have known that God speaks and has spoken to us and we have ventured out where we stood upon the solid rock and walked safely on to the consummation of that which we so devoutly desire.

I would plead, therefore, with my dear sisters here to-night to remember the noontide prayer. Do not let anything prevent your having that high privilege, and bring that mighty energy to bear upon this world, because it is not only having power with God, but it is having power with men, prevailing in this mighty council. God has put this great weapon into our hands, and remember that as we have impressed it upon our sisters the world around, we have held you, our American sisters, up as an example, and that you first set this example, and that we expected, positively believed that we were being upheld day by day by the prayer of our sisters at home, for they had promised to pray for their round-the-world missionaries, and therefore we begged that they should enter into this sisterhood of prayer and observe it. If you cannot retire to your room, even if you are in the midst of crowd, or with people engaged in business, that prevents your getting away to yourselves, yet you can retire into that quiet place in the soul where God looks down and knows that you lift your heart to Him and hears every breath of your heart, and you let it go out to Him in the desire that He may bless the progress of the work the world around.

Whenever I think of the world's work, I think of the wonderful language in the first chapter of Acts, of what the Holy Spirit would do when He should come upon the earth, "Ye shall be witnesses unto me in Jerusalem, and unto all parts of Judea and Samaria and unto the very ends of the earth," and so under God's great commission these World's Woman's Christian Temperance Union missionaries have been sent out literally to the very ends of the earth, carrying the gospel of total abstinence and social purity wherever they have gone.

We first worked in England three years ago. I went on ahead and Dr. Bushnell very soon joined me, then we sailed in July, 1891, for South Africa, stopping at Madeira on the way; then landed at Cape Town, that wonderful old town. After that we went up to the seat of the Huguenot seminary where is the Rev. Andrew Murray, that holy man of God, who is doing a splendid work. There we found a large corps of American teachers, as well as teachers from other lands gathered to welcome us. We were taken, on the evening of our arrival, into an adjoining room to meet a band of Y. W. C. T. U. girls and on our entrance into the room I shall never forget those bright faces and those lovely girls, sixty of them, with white ribbons on their breasts and their handkerchiefs waving to us the Chautauqua salute. Here good seed is being sown, and these girls will go out to form other Y's in South Africa. We afterward met these Y's in Natal and different places of South Africa.

After this we went to Kimberly, the seat of the diamond mines, and sailed around to Natal. Everywhere the people greeted us in the kindest manner even in the wine-growing districts where we least expected such cordiality.

Three days' coaching took us up in the Transvaal to Johannesberg, the city of the gold mines, and there we had crowded audiences. People of all classes came. I remember when we paid the money out for this coaching it was so expensive, I said to Dr. Bushnell: "It is truly bread cast upon the waters; we shall probably not see it again for many days," but instead of that these rough miners had such a feeling of kindness toward us that we should come so far to bring them our message of temperance and purity that they put even gold pieces into the collection and our way was more than paid.

I have not yet told you that this was a faith journey from the beginning, that we had laid the matter all before God before we started, and that He made it perfectly clear to us that we were to go out and trust in Him; therefore, we have had no financial basis whatever, except to believe that God would take care of us if we did His work, and He has taken care of us all around the world.

Our journeys have been long; we have crossed the equator four times, we have journeyed nearly one hundred thousand miles during these three years; we have gone wherever duty led and all the time and all the way through we have had the blessing of God upon us, spiritually and mentally and in material things, so I will say this in the fullness of my heart, "Praise to Him to-night, that He has so wonderfully blest and guided us."

We sailed for India by the way of Ceylon, stopping at Ceylon four days. All the way through South Africa we met warm-hearted white-ribboners engaged in all departments of our work, but when we sailed for India knowing that this was to be a secret mission, an investigation that must shut us out from talking with our missionaries, or our other workers until the completion of the task that lay before us, you may easily imagine that our hearts were at times very heavy and we knew that only God could possibly carry us through. We realized all our weakness and helplessness, our utter lack of wisdom, yet we had prayed in England until we were clear that God would have us undertake this work, and so we started with the promise to our friends in England, dear Mrs. Butler and the chairman of the committee for the repeal of the C. D. acts.

We had made several attempts to find out the true condition of women in India in regard to their enslavement in the cantonments, which are large districts set apart for the residence of the British soldiers, for their camps; and besides the British soldiers and officers, there are also others and often a large native and white population engaged in different trades and businesses. Now our business was to know whether the command of the House of Parliament had been obeyed by the military officials of India. The order of Parliament had gone forth five years ago last June that all this official purvey of women and confinement of women in quarters and subjecting them to examination and confinement in the Locke hospitals should be stopped. That the slave trade should not be carried on, that the whole thing should be abrogated. It was entirely abolished in England, and England commanded that India should cease this system, but the friends of purity strongly suspected that the system was being carried on and, therefore they felt that they must know whether the orders of the House of Commons had been obeyed or not.

They had made several efforts to discover the true condition of things, but these had failed from one reason and another. Therefore, we were obliged to conduct our investigations in the most discreet manner. We went on to Calcutta, took our letters of introduction to a noble friend, a Scotchman, and began our consultations with him. Soon after making our arrangements in Calcutta we started forward into the heart of the forest country.

We had a month of utter failure to begin with. We were assured over and over again that no such system existed, that it had all been abrogated years before; that there were no Locke hospitals in which women were confined by order of the officials; that there was no slave trade in women; that there was no registration of the women, and that they were not segregated for the use of the British soldiers. We were assured of all these things by men high in authority, yet we felt that we must get at the truth.

We went to Ogra, and I shall never forget as we drove into that great city past the fort, where the walls were very high, how as we looked up at them, we felt an almost overwhelming realization of the impenetrability of this secret system that we were seeking to get behind, and we felt that it was impossible for us to do anything unless God Himself went before us and opened the door which no man could shut. So we set apart a day of fasting and prayer. We went into our room at the Government Rest House and closed our doors and there we waited all day reading our Bibles, talking a little one with another, but talking most with Him. It does not matter how dark it is, God can make light to arise in the darkness. Before the day was over, our plan was all clear to us, what we should do, and we followed that plan just as God revealed it to both our hearts at the hour.

Then we went to our second confidant in India. We had but three confidential friends through all these months of weary work and great responsibility. She was an American woman, a strong W. C. T. U. woman, fully in sympathy with us but she said, "I fear you have a greater undertaking than you think you have. This system is entrenched behind military authority. I think it will be impossible for you to get at the truth." However we pressed on, we got at the truth, and by and by God guided us so that we could gather as much evidence in one day as we had in a week before. It was written on very thin sheets of paper and carried in the hem of a dress, sewed in, and at intervals it was sent by registered letter to our friend.

We were always in danger of being arrested and sent to a new cantonment, because they have a law that the commanding officer has the authority to expel any person whatever. This law we had read and we had the dread of it before our eyes, but God led us on, and we gathered the evidence. I wish I could give you an idea of the welcome we received from those poor outcasts. We found women from Arabia, from Egypt, from Afghanistan, from Cashmere, from all parts of India, and we could not doubt that there was a slave trade established by which women of all climes, castes, classes and nations that could possibly be thought of within range of Oriental countries, were brought into this slavery.

Here were these poor, little creatures, many of them children, ten, twelve, fourteen and sixteen years of age in these quarters. Often they were weeping before our interpreter had finished the simple introduction, and then they would pour out their sad histories to us. When I remember through what fraud, through what promises broken, through what treachery, through what perjury, and through what terrible ignorance many of them had been brought there, these poor little creatures, I can scarcely speak of them.

How quickly they welcomed us and our story of the blessed Redeemer, because they felt that none but a true God would ever have caused us good women, as they called us, to come to them when they were so degraded and so low that when we would say to them 'We are your sisters,' they would say, 'We are your slaves.' In their Oriental fashion they would say these loving things to us and pour out their hearts.

Often when we were talking to them some voice would cry out in the group as they sat on the ground around us, "Take me with you, I will go anywhere with you to the ends of the earth, let me serve you." But we couldn't take them. We knew that if we attempted to take them, that they were bound hand and foot by this pitiless system which is a system of absolute slavery for woman wherever it has existed, which does not consider them as women, but only as degraded creatures, and they are never regarded as women, but only as things, as creatures to be tossed about, and when fit no longer to be retained in these quarters, as the women told us who were in charge of these poor creatures, they are simply turned outside of the cantonments to beg or starve.

There are few industrial openings for women in India at all, and of course, these only openings are closed to degraded women (you know how closed they are to degraded women even in Christian lands). These women who have been crushed down in the government houses of shame are branded pariahs among the people, are not permitted to return to their homes, and there is nothing left for them but to starve, and they do starve by the thousands.

There is a spot of light in India that I love to think of. I speak particularly of the hope that is held out to the little widows, the industrial opening that is made for women in India through the work of one good woman.

She is our own white-ribbon lecturer for India, and a true white-ribboner she is. We visited her school, and saw her thirty-nine little widows who had been gathered into that school.

Now, in these quarters for degraded women, we found that the large proportion is made up of these little widows. In every Christian land the very name of widow surrounds a woman in the eyes of a true man with sacredness, and he will do anything in his power to give her that protection which she has lost in removing her earthly protector; every true man has that feeling, but in India one of our missionaries said to us, "Widow is only a synonym for prostitute." Even though these widows fleeing from persecution and starvation and beating in their husband's families, wander out in the desert, they are instantly taken up by the police, registered and put in the government house of shame. We passed on from one cantonment to another until we had visited ten of them, visiting the women in their quarters, visiting the hospitals, examining the records and getting our evidence as fast as we could. Then we returned to Calcutta, and there we spent three weeks, making out our report to send to England. Our work was finished as we thought when we sent the report on, but as it turned out we were sent for to go to England to give evidence before the Departmental Committee, and there we had still another contest, and God enabled us to pass through it triumphantly, as we believe.

After we had finished our work in India we went to Australasia and spent seven months in that last country visiting six of its colonies. We had, therefore, during this time since we left America visited England, Wales, Scotland, Cape Colony, the Orange Free State, the Transvaal, Natal, Ceylon, India twice, South Australia, Victoria, Queensland, New South Wales, New Zealand, Tasmania, Egypt, Beloochistan, England again and then have returned to you. We should have gone at this time and have finished our round-the-world journey, going back from Australia to Burmah, the Straits settlement, then on to China, Japan and the Sandwich Islands and have returned by the Western gateway into our country, having completely circumnavigated the globe, had it not been that we were recalled to England to give the report of the India work to which I have referred.

It is exceedingly difficult to put before you any idea of the travel, the work accomplished, of what we have seen and witnessed and heard, but our hearts are full of praise to God for what He has enabled us to endure and to accomplish during this time and we realize that the very work which our president outlined at the beginning and which the officers of the World's W. C. T. U. have endeavored to go on and formulate with the help of the rank and file,—these methods and these ideals—are being realized, and that the banner of the white-ribboners is set up in these more than forty countries and the women are taking up the departmental work and are accomplishing it. The World's W. C. T. U. is no longer simply a name, but a great world-wide sisterhood of women, that it is teaching us better things than in the old days of narrowness and prejudice. A few years ago a young Oxford gentleman sat next to me at our hotel in Switzerland and said when speaking of the vast gulf that existed between the different races, "It seems to me that there is absolutely an impassable gulf and must ever be between the Anglo-Saxon race and any colored race whether yellow, or brown, or black, that can never be passed." I said to him, "The white ribbon woman does not recognize that gulf, she has passed it long ago." Then I told him of India, I told him of our grand love toward little slaves, I told him of the Kaffir women, I told him of the women in the different countries that we had met and how we felt that as they came into this bond with us, that we were one with Christ Jesus and that we did not recognize any bond or free, male or female, Jew or Greek, but one in whom they are all free in the blessed liberty of the gospel.

Dr. Bushnell spoke as follows:

We are accustomed to speak of the wonderful work that the Lord did, or that the Lord laid the foundations of when He came here to earth to work, as a scheme of salvation which takes in the whole world. Now, there are two thoughts in that sentence of worth to us. First, it is a scheme, a definitely arranged plan; and secondly, this plan takes in the whole world, and we are co-workers with God in the building of the temple, a building that must be fitly framed together until it grows up for a habitation of the Lord in the Spirit. Now, that builder or that carpenter or mason who would ignore the architect's plan of the whole building and would say, "I will build my own little corner without regard to the universal plan of the whole building, and if I am faithful in the little bit that I I do, I have met my responsibility in this matter," will find in the end that there are great cracks and that the whole building will fall to pieces.

Now let us remember from the very first that if we work along God's plan we will work along a plan that takes in every nation and every language. No matter how small our work is, it seems to me that the ignoring of this fact has had a great deal to do with the work of the Christian world that has been accomplished in times past. What there is of impotency in connection with Christianity—not that Christianity is impotent, but that weakness that surrounds Christianity—seems to be greatly due to the fact that we have ignored the architect's great plan for the whole universe. We have not been universal in our sympathies; we have not said not only "What can I do right here?" but "What are our sisters doing across the sea?" that we may have planned that in the end their building and our building be fitly framed together.

Why do I say this? Because the stronghold of Satan at the present day and hour is in the international hatred,—race prejudice. Mrs. Andrew referred to our work in India, it has been referred to repeatedly this evening. A few men representing the military power of that empire, representing a Christian government and calling themselves before the natives Christian men, sat down in Burmah and planned a scheme. That scheme comprehended the thought and anticipated the fact that the Christian government of India should found the houses of shame in India and erect them at the government expense. Every detail of vice they considered as absolutely necessary for the health of the British soldier was arranged for, building the haunt of shame, hiring the brothel keeper, hiring the procuresses as government servants, sending out government letters by the hand of the Quartermaster General, that a large number of sufficiently attractive women and young women should be procured for the British soldier and paid the pitiful price (about five cents is what it amounts to) for their souls, that these soldiers might be stalwart men, and their health protected by making slaves of children, sometimes not more than twelve years of age. I speak of this matter in this way with as absolute confidence as is possible, for the commander-in-chief of the Indian army himself has said that our statements are in the main correct and that acknowledgment on his part is before the House of Parliament in England for consideration, so I am not afraid of making extravagant and exaggerated statements that will be disproved, for we have proved them to the very hilt already.

How could this be? How is it possible that men could do such a work as this? That men calling themselves Christians; that men representing what they call a Christian and benign government could have done such a thing as this in a heathen country seems incomprehensible excepting for one fact and I want to lay that before you. It was well expressed by the Westminster Gazette in London not very long ago when they said, "Why are people making such a commotion and such a discussion about the great injury done these women out in India? Don't they realize that no high-born woman will ever come into this system of slavery?"

It was simply because the Anglo-Saxon in India had the hatred for the native race that we see exhibited everywhere where one race comes in close contact with another race. Go to our western states, you will find men there who declare unblushingly that the one human creature who has no soul to save is the Chinaman. Go to some of our frontier states and the people who call themselves Christians will tell you that the only good Indian is the dead Indian. Go to Australia and they will tell you there without hesitation that the native of Australia is the most degraded creature that God ever brought into existence, and that he is absolutely incapable of any moral reformation or any moral improvement whatever. Go to India and they will tell you that if they were dealing with Chinese, if they were dealing with American Indians, or if they were dealing with negroes or any other class they might do something, but never with the natives of India. Go to our southern states and they will tell you that the colored man cannot be improved, that he only lives to occupy his place as inferior to the white man, and I say to you to-night that race hatred is the stronghold of Satan, and the crime of the age to be rebuked in every place and in every land under every circumstance. These men could never have sat down and plotted such a scheme as that, a scheme that would have brought immediately in this distinct and in this awful way the women of England under their heel, yet they did plan in this way that the native women should be ground under their heel, and that system of things prevails in India at the present time.

But will these crimes that we send abroad, stay abroad? Did they stay abroad? A few years ago they concluded in India that opium was good for the Chinese. To be sure they labeled it poison in England, but in India it is something good to eat for the natives, and in China it is something good for the natives, so have these enlightened Christian people decided, and there is the monstrous opium traffic. Have they been able to keep that traffic abroad? Have they been able to confine that traffic to regions where it hurt only those that it was intended to hurt? Not by any means. Whatsoever ye sow, no matter in how distant a field, that shall ye also reap, and the opium trade has crossed the United States, and the opium trade is penetrating to the very heart of England at the present time.

Go to South Africa and it is quite a common thing to hear a man say, "Here is a lot more of this Cape brandy, and we are going to send it up into the interior to poison off a lot more of these natives." Can they poison off only the native in South Africa with their deadly brandy? Not by any means. It goes home and their own children become drunkards in their own homes. We cannot send these crimes abroad without meeting them at home again. The work of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, it seems to me, is preëminently the work of teaching the sisterhood of woman the world around. The sisterhood of woman—how we need to learn it.

I was looking at a book to-day marked "A Woman of the Century." If we describe a woman of the 19th century, would it be as a person who is enlightened, a person who has had an education, opportunites, respected in her home, protected by her husband, well-to-do, intelligent? I tell you that is the woman of England and of the United States, and we are in danger of forgetting that England and the United States do not yet people the whole world. If the human family be placed in a row, every seventh person would be a Chinese person. Had you thought of that? Is the typical woman the American woman—is it the English woman? I will place before you in all its awful truth the typical woman. She is the Chinese woman, who is taught the axiom that her one duty is first to obey her father, second, to obey her husband, and third, if left a widow, to obey her son—that the one lesson for her to learn throughout her lifetime is obedience to some male who owns her as he owns his cattle. If in her heart she has a purpose and a desire to serve God, she is thwarted at every point in carrying out that desire and has no right but to be degraded, in case the one who rules her rules that she shall be degraded.

The typical woman of this world has not yet had given her the right to keep God's Ten Commandments; and yet, strange, while this condition of things prevails, we talk about women as though they were going to elevate the world, and that if woman would only be good, then man must be good. Why, yes, if the little worm that has penetrated the foot of the mountain would only lift the mountain up, then the mountain will be raised up, there is no doubt about that, and it is doubtless true that if woman will be virtuous and upright she will elevate the whole world, because she is under the whole world, and there is always a woman at the bottom of every degradation and every misery and crime, and that is the typical woman of the world at the present hour. Why do I speak of this? Because I want to stir your heart as mine has been stirred with the conflict with the powers of darkness; because I want to set you to questioning and crying to God, why are these things so? Why do these awful things exist? I would stir every woman's heart to its very center with this tremendous problem of why it is that the large majority of women who exist to-day are trodden under foot, and have as yet no right even when they hear the Word of Life to obey it.

I wish to put this before every woman to whom the lesson could come that I might set her to questioning God on her knees, "Why is it that nineteen hundred years after Jesus Christ has preached salvation to the world, nineteen hundred years after the Bread of Life is brought within the grasp of the human mind, that women are not allowed to take and eat? Why is it, oh, why is it?" Why? Because we do not do work God gave us to do. It is not for God on His throne to do the work that He has constituted for us to do, but we have the power and we have the gift, and let us work out that which God intends we shall work out, for it is God who has given us both to will and to do at His own good pleasure, and, therefore, we have it within the grasp of our hands to banish oppression from the face of this earth.

It has been said several times that the work that we did in India was accompanied with marvelous success, unusual success, so that the purity workers in England have felt that it marked an epoch in the history of the purity movement. Shall I tell you how it was accomplished? We had tens of thousands and hundreds of thousands of white ribbon women who every day at noon bowed their knees and asked God to strengthen the hands of the round-the-world missionaries, and your prayers have been answered. You have done the work by laying hold of the right hand of power on high, and we are all one in Christ Jesus and we can work out many things. "He that believeth on me (and it was prefaced by the 'verily,') verily, I say unto thee, he that believeth on me, the works that I do also, and greater works than these shall he do, because I go unto my father." He can help us every one to realize our calling in Christ Jesus and the work that we have to do here on earth in the power of His spirit, is to seek judgment, relieve the oppressed, judge the fatherless and plead for the widow.

This memorable session was closed by the singing of the doxology.

TUESDAY MORNING.

Lady Henry Somerset was again in the chair at this session. Mrs. M. M. Love, formerly president of Victoria W. C. T. U., led the devotions, reading the 144th Psalm. "Nearer, my God, to Thee," was sung.

Miss Anna Gordon proposed this important amendment to the World's constitution, which was adopted:

"That all women who hold our commission as round-the-world missionaries shall, so long as they retain their commissions, be ex-officio vice-presidents of the W. W. C. T. U."

Several reports from World's superintendents followed. In that of press work, presented by Mrs. Charlton Edholm, we learned that twenty-one countries are represented in this department; five hundred temperance papers are published, forty being owned or controlled by the W. C. T U., and three thousand columns are conducted in the interests of our work in the daily and weekly press. Mrs. Edholm has written five hundred columns of original matter published in one thousand two hundred papers.

Miss Lucia Kimball's report of temperance in the Sunday-schools of the world was most encouraging. She said:

"This crowning of effort in this department in the United States to secure quarterly temperance lessons in the regular course of the International Sunday-school series, has given accelerated momentum to this work, and brought it not only into American Sunday-schools, but into those of all countries where the International lessons are used. It is estimated that 17,000,000 throughout the world are reached by these lessons. Thus we may have a world-wide rejoicing over the recent decision of the International Sunday-school convention at St. Louis, whereby these lessons were made a permanent institution.

"Two hundred and one thousand, nine hundred and seventy-one of the Columbian autograph pledge cards have been ordered, and three million pages of temperance literature were reported. The Dominion of Canada stands most nearly side by side with the United States in this work."

After mentioning in detail this work in a score of countries in which the World's Union is found, Miss Kimball fittingly said:

"'The entrance of Thy words giveth light.' It is the aim of this department to help make these words most blessedly true in the world's Sunday-school army, which numbers 22,508,661, and thus hasten the dawning of the perfect day."

The memorial exercises for Miss Mary Allen West, who died in Japan last December, were appropriately introduced by Mrs. Chika Sakurai, of Tokyo, who was one of Miss West's intelligent interpreters in the Sunrise Kingdom. By reason of the intense interest felt in this paper, we reproduce here a large part of it.

My Dear Sisters: You cannot tell with what joy I meet you this morning, and as I look upon you I feel that we are friends and not foreigners. This is my first journey from my native land, and it is no easy matter for one to leave the scene of her childhood days, and the many friends and loved ones. But one always feels that leaving home, friends and beloved ones to work for God is no loss. I feel thankful to God for His goodness and mercy to me. He has blessed me with traveling mercies and allowed me to come here to try and do something for Him. I trust my efforts will be blessed by God.

I am going to speak to you for a short time about Miss West. My English is not good, but I know and feel you will listen and at the same time sympathize with me, so I will do my very best and try and interest you.

When Miss West came to Japan she first visited Hakodate and Sattusporo, which are in the northern part of Japan. It was about the middle of September of last year when Miss West arrived at Hakodate. At that time I was in Hakodate in connection with the Bible work. I went with other members of the temperance society to meet her on the steamer. It was a bright morning, the sun shining warm and beautiful, and nature around was dressed with beauty. When she saw us in the distance she smiled, as if she were very glad to see us, and we knew at once that she was so, not only glad to see us, but we also felt as if she was our mother. O dear friends, I shall never forget her face that morning. It was as bright as an angel. While I am speaking to you now, I can see with my mind's eye Hakodate harbor with its numerous ships riding at anchor on its quiet, peaceful waters, and the sun causing the water to sparkle, but the face of dear Miss West attracted us more than anything else.

Soon after she landed she made a speech in the girls' school at Hakodate, and on the same day started for Sattusporo, which is further north. Here, as at Hakodato, she had a good welcome. She stayed there some days, and made many useful speeches, then returned to Hakodate, and stayed for some time.

While there I had the pleasure to meet her often, and during our conversations she told me many things about Chicago. So you see I cannot think I am in a foreign land, because it is "mother's home." She left Hakodate while I was there. Some weeks afterwards I met her in Tokyo, and we were very glad to see each other. When she saw me she put her arms around my neck, and said, "Oh, Mrs. Sakurai, why haven't you come to see me sooner? I was looking for you." Then tears stood in her eyes. Her voice was full of love. I could not express any words at the moment, because I was too glad to see her, and her love affected my heart very deeply. She wished me to interpret her speech on the same day. She was going to speak about the World's Fair, and petition for ladies of high rank; but I did not that day, because another lady was expecting to interpret for her. I interpreted for her on other occasions.

She stayed in Japan for seventy-one days, and traveled 3,580 miles and made ninety-seven speeches. Whenever we thought she was too tired to see visitors, she was always glad to see them and talk with them.

How I sympathize with you, dear friends, in the great loss of our dear sister. My Japanese sisters sympathize with me, feel the great loss we have all undergone. But we must not forget that we shall see her again.

Although she has been taken away from us so suddenly, her death has made a lasting impression, and almost all our people who can read know Miss West. Her visit to my native country has not been in vain, and the seed she has sown, perhaps in tears, will one day bring forth fruit to the honor and glory of God and the salvation of many precious souls; her influence was felt wherever she went, and she was much beloved by all our people. We thank God that ever Miss West came to Japan and we trust and pray that many more like her may be called by God to follow in her footsteps, for there are a great many who have become interested in her work.

We have many opportunities of speaking to our people about temperance, and are using all the opportunities we possibly can. All active members of our society are working according to Miss West's suggestions. We wish to have a large building in commemoration of our dear sister, and intend naming it "West's Memorial." We have already raised about eight hundred yen, which is equal to about forty-eight dollars. This is not a large sum, but as we have few Christians it is very hard to raise even that sum. There are 117,519 Buddhist temples in Japan, and in some places there are many large temples filled with wood, brass and stone gods, which our people worship daily, and they give very large sums of money to these temples and gods, but, of course, do not give any money for Christian work.

Our sisters are working very hard to raise more money for this purpose of giving to the memory of Miss West this building, and so I appeal to you here to help us; you are our sisters, we are your sisters. We worship the same God, our blessings come from the same loving heavenly Father, the same loving watchful Eye is over us, and, thank God, we are laboring for the same Master.

Now with your kind, practical help we can have a fine large building in the center of Tokyo, and from which power and influence will be felt all over this large city. The temperance cause will be sure to do good and doubtless be the means of turning many from idols to worship the true and living God.

At the close of this beautiful paper, Lady Henry said:

"I think that makes us feel how true are the words spoken by Hannah Whitall Smith years ago, that the W. C. T. U. is organized mother-love and it is just that message that Miss West carried way to that distant country and brought cheer to those loving, tender hearts in that land."

After the singing of "Blest be the tie that binds," the Traveler's Psalm (121) was read, and Mrs. Harris concluded the memorial services by singing, "The Home of the Soul."

The chairman then introduced Miss Susan B. Anthony in these words: "It is one of the greatest privileges that I have ever enjoyed to be allowed to present the woman whom I honor as the great pioneer of the work that is nearest to my heart, the one who went out to sow the seed alone, and who now is reaping the great reward of her labors, and Miss Willard and I, as we read of these great World's congresses, rejoiced with a great joy when we heard that the cheers were louder and the greetings more warm for Susan B. Anthony than for any other of the noble band of women who were present."

Miss Anthony then delivered the following address:

Madam President and Friends, Lady Henry Somerset herself cannot be more proud this morning than Susan B. Anthony herself is, for this is the first time in the history of this great movement that one so obnoxious, one having carried the gospel of perfect equality of rights for woman forward in our country almost single-handed and alone (the numbers of us could be counted on the fingers of the two hands it is a glorious moment for me personally, and for the cause that I represent, and for every one of the leaders of the cause that I stand here to represent), that this largest association of women on the face of the globe has invited a representative of that idea to stand upon this platform.

I do not come into this audience, I am not escorted to this platform, without remembering eleven years ago when the noble president of this association introduced me to an audience of the W. C. T. U. at Washington. I remember it well, and I remember that Miss Willard came very near losing her official head because she did it. But Miss Willard has fought a noble, grand battle, and we all of us honor her, and not one of you who sits here to-day, in the audience or on the platform, more regrets her absence than do I. I miss her every moment, but thank God, she has sent a noble representative in her place, one who can set us an example, and one whose example certainly I hope every one of us will try to follow.

Now, friends, words are inadequate in all those directions, but Ralph Waldo Emerson said fifty years ago, "A wholesome discontent is the first step towards progress." Now, my friends, you will all agree with me that there has been plenty of discontent among the women of the United States and of the world. The only question with that discontent or about it is, has it been a wholesome discontent? Is there to day a wholesome discontent? Now, I insist upon it that no discontent is wholesome unless it seeks to remove the cause that produces the discontent, and I remember a score of years ago and more when I wrote to one of our best woman's suffrage representatives in the state of Iowa, asking her if she could make way for a woman's suffrage speech, she wrote me it was impossible, that the women of the city were full of work; they had their mite societies, their fairs, their dinners, their hops to raise money for the missionaries, to raise money for the poor, and just now they were raising money to establish a home for friendless women. All busy, but no time.

Now what does that mean? It means that the women of this nation through all these years have been educated to feel that the work of repairing the damages of society was their part of the work and the result of that education is that all the great philanthropic, I was going to say all the religious, work of this nation is to-day being done by the women of the world. They have not been taught to look to the causes that produce the damages for which they complain and which they seek to repair.

I remember forty years ago, and I can carry my memory back a good ways in this matter, when old Dr. Van Meeker, of New York City, established the Howard Home to which the poor children were carried and where they were fed a little soup, washed and had clean aprons put upon them. I remember meeting Dr. Van Meeker one day in the street car and he said, "Miss Anthony, it is a marvel to me that women with such brains as Mrs. Stanton and yourself have, should forever busy yourselves about mere abstractions. Why don't you do something practical?"

I said, "Doctor, let us look a moment; how many less children will you have to feed and clothe when the next generation comes around, how many more capable?"

And then he answered, "Of course, we shall have a great many more, for as I told you we are already raising money to build a house twice as large as we already have."

"How much better will the poor women be whose children you feed and try to educate to-day, how much better will those daughters be when they are grown up to support and care for their children than their mothers are to-day?"

"Oh, not a particle, the poor ye always have with you."

"Now, I said, 'Doctor Van Meeker, the work Elizabeth Cady Stanton and I are doing seeks to remove the causes that produce the poverty and degradation of women. I claim then that every woman, whether she become a mother in or out of marriage, will be able equally with man to earn her bread, to support herself and her children, and I insist, Doctor, upon it that our work is practical and yours is not.'"

Later on I asked a very wealthy woman for a contribution to aid our suffrage cause and she said, "Miss Anthony, there are so many practical applications for money that I cannot give to mere abstractions." She handed me her check book and the stubs on it showed ten dollars to a poor woman to help her in one direction, and it was fifty dollars to buy a sewing machine for a poor woman, it was one hundred dollars to a poor man to help publish his poetry, and it was—oh, dear me, I don't know what—it was a book that thick, and her income was $30,000 a month, and it was all frittered away in helping these individuals to a little money at the time being, and I said to her, "My dear friend, do you not know that the daughters of every one of these women when they come to the years of self-support will be just as incapable with the conditions of society left as they are, they will be just as incapable to earn the money to buy the machinery with which they will need to work at that time as the mothers are to-day."

And now, my friends, just so in this whole movement of reform amongst women. The very first thing necessary is to change the absolute condition of womanhood, is to make woman a free and equal human being in the government in which she lives (applause). And I want to say that I listened yesterday with great pleasure to Bishop Ireland and I know that Bishop Ireland sees that woman's mere influence, mere sentiment, cannot do the work. Sentiment is good when it is backed with a power to carry out that sentiment into law and into execution of law. But nevertheless he repeated as do all our good men that old story of the immensity of the power of woman's influence. Granted. But at the ballot box the "influence" is not there. Any man whose opinion is exactly opposite to the opinion of these myriads of excellent women can have his opinion counted and his opinion weighed in the establishing of the legal conditions of the community.

I remember in Kansas a few years ago at the time of the great break in the Republican party, the great swarm, as I call it, of the third party Prohibitionists, I remember that St. John was speaking in the city of Leavenworth, the metropolitan city of that state. He spoke in the largest auditorium in the city; it was packed, and hundreds went away, not being able to find admission. The morning's newspaper said: "To be sure St. John had an immense audience, but if he had taken notice, he would have observed that about nine out of ten of them wore bonnets." What did that mean? What did it mean when a political newspaper taunted that man who sought the highest office in the state that his audience wore bonnets? It meant that his audience could not vote, could not help to make him governor of the state. So it is everywhere. The good men of the country who come to us are not the men who want votes; they are the men who try to make public sentiment for the better. Bishop Ireland may come, and the Reverend this, that and the other may come, and the good reformers may come, but where is the mayor of the city of Chicago, where is the governor of the state of Illinois, where is the president of the United States? Not one of them is here, not one of them. Tell me why. Not because they feel that these women have no right to opinion, not because they feel that the women have no right or that the cause that they represent is not right (interrupted by the secretary)—the secretary whispers in my ear that she sent every one of them a special invitation to come here and welcome us. The only reason they are not here is because the people who are here wear bonnets, and wearing a bonnet means that you cannot vote.

Now, friends, every human being has to go through about the same experience that the children of Israel went through and that is, through a wilderness about forty years. This W. C. T. U. National organization and the World's organization in general, but the temperance women of this country have traveled through the wilderness over forty years, for I started in temperance just as you have started, just as almost every woman everywhere starts out to feel that she can do something to change the condition of society, something to save the fallen woman, something to save the drunkard and in trying to do this she learns that her hands are tied, her feet are tied, that she has only the power to weep and to pray and to talk, and none of those weapons avail with the government, and therefore, we all learn,—you have learned what I learned by experience, that what we need is that woman's sentiment may be coined into law and that can never be done until the constitutions of the states and of the nation are amended so as to strike out that little adjective "male" which says every male citizen shall be entitled to vote.

Speaking of women,—in 1877 the Illinois State Temperance Society circulated a petition and carried it up to the legislature. It was signed by over 70,000; some good member presented the petition and it was carried through the usual processes and by and by a good member made a motion that the president of the Illinois State W. C. T. U. should be invited to address the legislature upon the prayer of that petition, and the prayer was this, that women might be permitted to sign or withhold their signatures from petitions of the rumsellers. That little, mild power was all that was asked. When it became known that this president should be permitted to address the legislature, a good Democratic member arose in his seat and said, "It is all very well for the women to be allowed to petition, it is all very well for the gentlemen to present the petition, etc., but when you come to propose that the valuable time of the Illinois State legislature shall be consumed with the gabble of women, it is going a little too far." And then he moved that the floor of the house and the galleries should be cleared from the mob.

Now, these Christian women of Illinois who went up to the legislature were called, whatever they might say, "the gabble of women," and they were called a mob. Now, not only that year but every year before or since the legislature of Illinois has had scores and scores of men hanging around, lobbying in the interests of the liquor traffic, and they have been invited to seats on the floor, and to address the legislature and the committees of the legislature and no religious bigot on the floor of that body ever dreamed of such a thing as calling those men a mob, or did they ever dream that for those men to consume the valuable time of the Illinois legislature was lost time.

Oh, no, why is it? Simply, not because the women have not as much right to ask for laws against whisky as men have to ask for laws for whisky, but it is because the men hold this power of the ballot in their hands with which they can make and can unmake the Illinois legislature, while those women, though they might exceed in numbers a thousand times the representatives of the other side, they must be ignored and they are ignored, simply because they have no power to make or to unmake the members of the legislature.

At the close of Miss Anthony's address, this telegram was read from Miss Willard and received applause:

SOMERSET HOUSE, LONDON.

Prov. 25: 25. Love never faileth. WILLARD.

Rev. Dr. John Hall and Rev. Wilbur F. Crafts were then introduced to the Convention and responded eloquently, their addresses being given in full in THE DAILY UNION SIGNAL.

The noontide prayer service was led by Miss Elizabeth Greenwood, taking for her text the words from Acts, "So mightily grew the word of God and prevailed." Mrs. Rounds and Amanda Smith led in the prayer and the latter sang her well-known "Whosoever," and the Convention adjourned.

TUESDAY AFTERNOON.

Lady Henry Somerset was in the chair and called the meeting to order promptly at two. Mrs. Cunningham, of British Columbia, conducted the devotional exercises, after which Mrs. Woodbridge offered the following memorial concerning arbitration, which was adopted:

To the Governments of the World:

The undersigned, citizens of many countries, gathered at the Columbian Exposition in Chicago, in the United States of America, recognizing the advantages accruing to those nations which have pursued the policy of arbitrating international disputes, and desiring that the like benefits may in the future be enjoyed by all nations, and deeming this a fitting opportunity, do hereby join in this memorial to all our various governments, praying that they will unitedly agree, by mutual treaties, to submit for settlement by arbitration all such international questions and differences as shall fail of satisfactory solution by peaceful negotiations. And for this the petitioners will ever pray.

It was requested that a copy of this memorial shall be presented to each of the governments of the world.

Miss Conybeare, of England, spoke effectively for the memorial.

Six important departments of the World's W. C. T. U. were presented during this session, namely, Scientific Temperance Instruction, by Mrs. Mary H. Hunt; Evangelistic Work, by Miss Elizabeth W. Greenwood; Juvenile Work, by Miss Anna A. Gordon; Peace and Arbitration, by Mrs. Hannah J. Bailey; The Young Women's Branch, by Mrs. Frances J. Barnes; and Fairs and Exposition, by Mrs. Josephine R. Nichols.

Mrs. Hunt brought the good news that "we have only six more states to win before the whole United States and territories will be under compulsory temperance education laws, with their 65,000,000 inhabitants and 18,000,000 school children. Already in forty-four states and territories the law says that their 13,000,000 school children shall be taught, as a part of their regular school education, God's law of total abstinence from alcohol and all narcotics, with other laws of health."

She briefly reviewed the work in Canada, Mexico, Guatemala, England, Sweden, Norway, Finland, Russia, South Africa, India, China, Turkey, Japan, Australia, New Zealand and Honolulu, and closed with this bright prophecy:

"If you ask, 'Watchman, what of the night?' I reply, the darkness which bondage to alcohol and other narcotics has passed over the earth is breaking, for the people are asking for the light. When these soul-destroying agencies, alcohol and other narcotics, are dethroned, then shall be crowned the King of Kings and the Lord of Lords."

Miss Greenwood's report showed that the field of her department was truly the whole world, for few civilized countries are there which have not well organized evangelistic work under W. C. T. U. superintendents. In many countries the work is just being started, but in all it is encouraging. Miss Greenwood's "personal appeal" is a very strong one and is as follows:

Dear superintendents of evangelistic work, will you, in every local, county, state and National W. C. T. U., join in a grand rally this year for a World and National revival of evangelistic work and spiritual impulse? Let us each commence in our own locality. Let the local superintendent revive the series of gospel temperance meetings, by which in Crusade days, as now, hundreds were reformed and redeemed. Plan special series of such meetings in churches, halls, depots, camp grounds and out-door services, through all of which the local unions must reach the masses. Mothers' meetings and cottage meetings are also most helpful. Pastors should be invited to preach upon temperance, and union temperance meetings be secured in the different churches.

Penetrate into jails, penitentiaries, forts, ships, factories and homes—wherever a soul needs you. She who would win souls needs the winning grace which only God can give. This is the chrism of power, the baptism of fire, the divine unction. They who most honor the Spirit are those whom the Spirit most honors. Therefore, "Tarry ye until ye are endued with power from on high."

Miss Gordon made a verbal report for her department—juvenile—which was full of interest. She contrasted the famous but horrible fountain in Berne, Switzerland, (which represents a huge monster devouring a little child, with scores of innocent ones about to share the same fate) with the beautiful Willard fountain bearing the bronze figure of a little girl offering a cup of cold water to all, which has been on exhibition at the World's Fair all summer and will be presented to the city of Chicago next spring. The first fountain Miss Gordon likened to the iniquitous liquor traffic, and the second to the children's part in destroying the traffic. She reported $2,681 received for the Willard fountain and three hundred thousand pledge cards signed by the children for the World's Fair exhibit.

Mrs. Bailey depicted a hopeful outlook for her department—peace and arbitration. Besides the monthly publication, the Pacific Banner, 500,000 pages of peace literature have been published and distributed by her department in the United States alone, 40,000 pages of which have been given away at the World's Fair. Agitation along this important line has proceeded in Australia, Ireland, Scotland, France, Germany, Denmark, Sweden, India, Italy, Jamaica, England, Canada and far-off Palestine. Mrs. Bailey closed by presenting this strong petition to the governments of the world:

PEACE PETITION.

In the name of the growing and now world-wide unity of nations; in the name of the successes of arbitration during the last half century; in the name of the rights of neutrals and of a peaceful commerce; in the name of all free parliaments in which the people who suffer most from war, now hold its purse strings; in the name of education, philanthropy and social progress; in the name of all the homes and firesides in the world; in the name of Christianity, with all its holy precepts and sanctions, the World's W. C. T. Union, an organization representing many thousands in many nations, hereby most urgently and respectfully petition the world's rulers to substitute for war the methods of arbitration.

Mrs. Barnes brought good cheer of the growth of Young Women's Branches in many countries, prominent among these being the United States, England, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, India, China, Turkey, France and Spain, the last being the most newly organized.

Mrs. Nichols made an informal but highly interesting address on the subject of her department, emphasizing particularly the educational opportunities of local fairs and international expositions, for giving away temperance literature and presenting the W. C. T. U. as an object lesson. She also spoke strongly for the regeneration of the average agricultural fair, which often serves as a pitfall to the rural youth who come to learn how to advance their honest interests. "I hope," she said, "that the men of this nation will rise and see that our laws in respect to fairs are better enforced, and I am glad to testify to the loyalty of one superintendent of our public schools who refused to allow the children to go to the fair upon the day set apart for them because of the gambling devices and the illegal sale of liquor there. Here is a place to create a sentiment for prohibition, for here is the place where you meet the farmers."

The report of committee on resolutions was then read by Miss Ruth Schaffner, of China, as follows:

PREAMBLE.

The second World's Woman's Christian Temperance Union Convention now assembled would offer to our Heavenly Father most grateful thanks for the progress made during the past two years. Realizing that the success that has crowned our efforts is due to the "good hand of our God" upon us, to Him, therefore, we would give all praise.

Resolved, That before the nations here represented we once more raise our uncompromising banner of total abstinence for the individual from alcoholic and narcotic poisons and total prohibition as the only ultimate law of righteousness in government for the traffic in these twin curses of Eastern and Western civilizations, and to these principles we invite the brotherhood of men and the sisterhood of women around the world.

Resolved, That special efforts should be made in every country where the W. C. T. U. is to be found to extend its membership, and that all the members be urged to wear the white ribbon constantly both at home and when traveling, not only as a badge of loyalty, but as a means of influence; that white-ribboners when abroad should seek out the white ribbon sisterhood and efforts should be made to induce every church member everywhere to sign the pledge that the whole influence of the church should be thrown on the side of total abstinence.

Recognizing that progress is the law of humanity, and that liberty is essential to development, therefore,

Resolved, That next to the influence of God's spirit, we believe that the recognition of woman's equal right and the according to her of equal power in government, is the most effectual means to promote the growth and success of all moral reforms.

That we do most earnestly appeal to the Christian women of all nations that whenever wars shall threaten, they will request prayers to be offered in their churches, prayer meetings and homes that the Almighty may be pleased to save the nations from the great curse of war; that they will also by petitions to their respective governments endeavor to promote peace and procure the settlement of all international difficulties by arbitration.

Resolved, That this World's Woman's Christian Temperance Union approves the proposal that in 1900 A. D. the 1900th birthday of Christ, the beginning of the twentieth century shall have a preëminently Christian rather than chiefly commercial celebration in a series of world-round Christian conventions, including a great world convention of Christian reforms, these conventions to be so arranged that a host of round-the-world tourists and missionaries may participate in them in succession, and that our president shall name to-day a committee of three, who, in behalf of this organization, shall invite officers or committees of the World's Sunday-school Association and of other national and international Christian organizations to join in arranging for such a celebration.

Resolved, That we rejoice exceedingly in the recent decisions of the International Sunday-school convention held in St. Louis whereby the quarterly temperance lessons with the regular course of international series were made a permanency and that we do our utmost the world over to enter this door of opportunity.

Resolved, That we regret that the decennial missionary conference of India withdrew the public morals resolution, including resolutions against the opium trade, the liquor traffic and legalized vice.

Resolved, That we recognize the efficiency of THE UNION SIGNAL as a means of communication between white-ribboners in all countries and urge that every means be taken to extend its circulation and promote its usefulness.

Resolved, That this Convention has heard with the deepest and most sympathetic interest the report of the work done by the self-sacrificing efforts of the round-the-world missionaries, Miss Ackermann, Mrs. Elizabeth Wheeler Andrew and Dr. Kate Bushnell, and especially would we recognize the world-wide significance of the success of the important and delicate work undertaken in India by Mrs. Andrew and Dr. Bushnell.

Resolved, That beyond all words is our sense of loss in the absence of our President, Miss Frances E. Willard, and our sympathy for her in the impaired strength which keeps her from her place in this great meeting, with faith in God for the future. We fully expect her recovery that she may carry out the purpose so long cherished of carrying the Polyglot Petition round the world, following the faithful and capable missionaries who have pioneered the way and who greatly desire that this visit to the governments of the world shall be soon consummated.

Resolved, That we record most loving memory of our noble comrade, Mary Allen West, and our sorrow at the ending, in a far-off land, of her pure and useful life. We express our thanks especially to Mr. Sho Nemoto and the Japanese and American friends who showed the love of kindred in those sad days, and with tender hands sent back the sacred dust to its final rest among her own people.

Resolved, That in hope of the resurrection we also write the name of Jennie Casseday, knowing that these have entered into the reward of the faithful.

Resolved, That the thanks of the World's W. C. T. U. are extended to the World's Congress Committee for their welcome to the representatives of other great moral organizations, to Lady Henry Somerset for her self-sacrificing interest manifested by her coming to the United States at this time and serving us so nobly and faithfully as president of this Convention, and also for the great interest which she manifested in our President all this year, and in her secretary, Miss Anna Gordon, to the clergy for encouraging words, to Mrs. Alice J. Harris and those who have helped with the music, to the W. T. P. A. for hymn books, to the reporters of daily papers and to all who have helped to make this Convention a success.

After a number of introductions, including Mrs. General Bidwell, Mr. John G. Woolley, Colonel Parker, Miss Alice Briggs, Mrs. Caroline F. Grow, a cablegram of loyal greetings was read from the National executive of Great Britain, the song, "Some Glad Day," was sung, Lady Henry Somerset led in prayer, and the Convention adjourned until evening.

TUESDAY EVENING.

Interest did not flag in the least at this, the sixth session of the World's Convention. After the usual devotional exercises, conducted this time by Mrs. Emmette, of England, Mrs. Mary A. Woodbridge, secretary of the World's W. C. T. U., read a very comprehensive report of the general outlook and the ten years' growth, which will be found in full in the World's Minutes, soon to be issued. The introductory paragraphs were as follows:

Twenty years ago wondering eyes were fixed upon a band of women as they filed out from a temple of the Lord. Who are they? Where are they going? What to do? were questions from sightseers on every side. They were humble, faithful followers of the "Captain of our Salvation," about to visit "the hyena of our civilization in his own horrid lair," there to proclaim "the gospel of love and redemption." What an army for such a mission! Less than fourscore women who for years had sat at Jesus' feet shrinking from the sight of men, but pleading with boldness at the throne of grace for the deliverance of the home from its fiendish enemy—now forgetful of the carping world, moving on with the courage of the Lord, no longer putting "their trust in princes, nor in the son of man, in whom there is no help," but "in the Lord Jehovah, in whom there is everlasting strength;" their cry "Home protection," to the glory of God. Who can estimate the result? The past we have seen, the present we somewhat know, the future is with God, and its revelation will be to us a joy in eternity.

"That band has grown to an army," and as it has reached out from nation to nation, each has caught the keynote then sounded and has waved in the face of the foe the banner of an aggressive Christianity.

Are you not glad, my sisters, that this reform which God has so clearly placed in the hands of women is not confined to Ohio, from whence went forth that sacred company of seventy disciples? Not limited to the United States, but reaches to the uttermost parts of the earth? May we not with reason believe it to be an assurance that God has been our Leader, and He thus gives His approbation of the effort to extend to the whole world the blessing first bestowed upon the United States? To our peerless president, Frances E. Willard, as she stood upon the shore of the Pacific, looking out over the vast ocean, which, like her sympathy for humanity, reaches all continents, was given the thought, Why not make the world our field and take it all for Christ? The Spirit answered, "The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, and the power of the highest shall overshadow thee." It was enough, and from that hour plans were laid to go from our own "Jerusalem to Judea and to Samaria and to the uttermost parts of the earth."

After the conclusion of Mrs. Woodbridge's report, Mrs. Smith, of New Zealand, was introduced, and not being able to speak because of a recent long illness, Mrs. Elizabeth W. Andrew, who had met her in Auckland, spoke a few words for her whom she styled "our brave young sister from that brave young colony across the sea."

The secretary then read the following letter just received from our first round-the-world missionary, dated at San Jose, Cal:

Dear sisters of the World's W. C. T. U. in Convention assembled: It is a source of great grief to me that I cannot be present at the second Convention of the W. W. C. T. U. But the climate of Chicago at this season utterly forbids me to go. Even the much milder, brighter and more equable air of this place is almost more than I can bear.

I give you one and all loving greeting, and pray that the blessing of God may rest upon the work and workers, and divine guidance be given in all your deliberations and conclusions. If it be true that affection for loved ones is measured by what they have cost us, what we have expended upon them of personal effort, toil, pain, if this be true, none can love the W. W. C. T. U. as I do. May the Lord prosper, guard and preserve the unions in every country.

I look forward with joyful anticipations to the time when we shall all meet in the great convention where cold nor pain nor sickness will interfere, and where we shall see the full sweep of influence of its results, and where we shall have the privilege of laying all our sheaves and all our laurels at the feet of our blessed Lord.

Sincerely and lovingly yours,

MARY CLEMENT LEAVITT.

Miss Jessie A. Ackermann, the second round-the-world missionary, who has been absent from her native country nearly five years, then addressed the audience as follows:

Sometime ago Miss Willard wrote me, "We want you to come home and attend the World's Convention, and we want you to begin all over again." It did not seem possible at that time that I could come home, but the way opened. After I reached home I looked over page after page of that notebook of mine, and I tried to make out a five years' report. I summed up the miles that had been traveled, and I found the miles reached the large number of one hundred thousand. I tried to find how many members had been added to the organization, and I found under the blessing of God that it had been my privilege to tie our white ribbon on nine thousand women in different parts of the world. And then I looked at some of the other sides, and I found that I had had to write six thousand letters to try to open my way around the world; that I had been a guest in many, many hundreds of homes.

I hardly know where to begin to tell you of what interested me most in these long years. Before I started away I had gone the length and breadth of this great land of ours, I had gone into some of our most magnificent cities, I had traveled over the beautiful plains, and wherever I had gone I had seen the trail of the serpent; I have met lives that have been blighted and blasted and withered by the curse of strong drink. Standing on the deck of the steamer I had in my possession fifty letters that mothers had given me from this land to their boys in different parts of the world and they had said, "Look for my boy, and look for my boy," and I heard the cry: "Look for my boy," until my heart ached and I felt the worst, the most dreadful, the most awful thing in all this world was the evil that arises from strong drink. Friends, I have come to tell you something different to-night. I have come to tell you that there is an evil in this world that it seems to me is even worse than strong drink; I have come to tell you that there is an evil in this world that is blighting and cursing and destroying almost half the women of this world, and if they are not directly they are indirectly affected by the dreadful opium traffic that exists throughout the world. So much is said of strong drink and its evils that I want to-night to speak especially of what I have seen concerning opium smoking.

The line of travel took me to China. If I had been trying to picture all the people in the world I never could have dreamed or thought of as many people as I saw in China, and I went into some of the small villages and I gathered the people round about me, and I went into the larger villages and talked to the great statesmen of China, and I told them what Christianity had done for the women of the world; I told them what Christianity had done for me. I tried to press upon them the claims of Christianity. I never shall forget what one statesman said to me, and I believe he was one of the greatest men with whom I have ever spoken. This great Chinese statesman said to me, "Do not talk to an intelligent Chinaman about Christianity. You have sent your Christianity to our country and what has it done? Why," he said, "it has turned this great empire into a living, seething hell of opium smoke until one million of the people of China are dying every month of the year because of opium smoke." I talked on with this statesman but he said: "Go to one of our great opium dens." So I went into this place, one story high, two stories high, and three stories high—an opium palace, and I saw men in hundreds and I saw that under that one roof there were two thousand smoking at a time. I saw them in every state of intoxication. He said that these object lessons around us were unknown until they saw the white face and he said: "Do you expect that we can have any faith in Christianity?"

Do you know, friends, how opium was introduced into China? I never knew so much about it until I went to those countries. This good statesman gave me a history of the opium traffic in China and I read with amazement that that vice was thrust upon a heathen land by a Christian country at the point of the bayonet. I read with surprise and I read with horror for I shuddered as I read it, how, long ago, a Christian nation sent as merchandise opium to China. The Chinese after a while began to feel that this would blight and destroy the lives of the people and so in a mild way they protested, but no attention was paid to their protest and finally they arose and seized the opium vessel and twenty-eight thousand chests of opium were seized and a large portion of this opium was burned and the ashes scattered on the Canton river. That plunged that heathen country in war with one of the greatest Christian nations in the world. You know what the result was; everybody knows that China was disorganized, a great Christian enemy came over there with their gunboats and soldiers, and shot and shell was poured heavy and fast upon the cities of this empire until it resulted in the victory for the English, and China had to take the opium. They had no choice, China had to take the opium and when some of the wise men went to the Emperor and said, "Well, after all it perhaps will be a good thing, we will put a heavy tax upon it and we will have a great revenue," and do you know what the old heathen Emperor—we all call him an old heathen Emperor—do you know what he said,—"I would rather see this empire perish than to know that it was supported by a revenue derived from the vices of our kingdom." I wish some of the sentiment of that heathen Emperor could be imported to our legislative halls to-day.

So China had to receive the opium. People went on smoking and they found what wrong was being wrought, and so the people protested again and for the second time China was plunged in war and the Christian nation was victorious, and the second time the Christian nation said, "China, you shall take the opium." And China receives the opium to-day for the simple reason that they are obliged to, they can't help themselves. Friends, I present to you to-night a plea from China; the millions of women in China are reaching out their arms to us and they are crying to us, "Oh, come over and help."

I went to India and I thought I would see what the opium traffic was like. I traveled through Hindoostanee, went along the banks of the Ganges river, and I was told on the best authority that twelve thousand acres of the most fertile land in India was set aside to the cultivation of the poppy. I thought it was necessary then to talk to the Indian people about not using opium, so when we had an opportunity of speaking to two or three or four, or even five thousand, of those educated, high-class people of India, I spoke to them in the English language without an interpreter, and I want to tell you that such questions were asked me from the floor of that great hall as absolutely rendered me speechless.

When I was speaking on this opium question a high-class Brahmin rose in the audience and said, "I was educated in England; I am a barrister at law; I am practicing here in India. I should like to have you answer me one question." He said: "Here in India the poppy is cultivated; opium is manufactured in the government factories, every ball of opium that goes out from the factories bears the stamp and seal of the British crown. There are government opium shops in this land; there are government opium pills for the children; opium in this country is sold as freely to us as any kind of food. When I was in England I went to a chemist's shop and I said to him, 'I want some opium.' He said, 'Where is your prescription?' 'I have no prescription.' 'You must get it; you must go to a physician and get a prescription before we can sell you any opium.' I went to a physician and the prescription was written out and the opium was placed in my hands and it was marked poison. Now,' he said, 'can you tell why it is that to England's white-skinned subjects this opium is poison and to its dark-skinned subjects it is sold as food?' I could go out to the nearest opium den and buy opium enough to poison a hundred men. Can you explain this to me?" Of course I could not explain it and I confess to you that I was speechless before this high-class, educated Brahmin.

I went to another place, and I was speaking especially of what Christianity has done to elevate the womanhood of America and England. I tried to hold up before those people the examples of magnificent womanhood that we have in our country. One Brahmin arose and said—of course, wherever I went I tried to tell the people what I so firmly believed, that it is the religion of Jesus Christ that has been the emancipator of woman, and so I tried to tell how Christianity had elevated the standard of womanhood in our country, what it had done for us, and do you know what the Brahmin said to me? He said: "You will have to raise Christianity to a higher standard than we have ever heard of before you can expect an intelligent Indian to speak or even to think about it. You call us heathen people in this part of the world. I should like to remind you that there has never been a heathenism in all India so black that it has legalized vice and degraded the womanhood of the country. Our women," said this Hindu, "may be impure, but they have never been impure through the sanction of the law."

I can go on to tell you, friends, that it is not only the Orient that is so cursed by this traffic, I come to Christian countries. I go to Christian Australia and what do I find? A lady said to me one night: "I wish you would go to the opium dens of this city and try to rescue a young woman;" and in one night in that great metropolis, Melbourne, I talked to forty-seven white girls and more than one hundred white men.

The day that I sailed one of the principal and most influential Chinaman of all Australasia tendered me a farewell. He was a wealthy merchant of the city and we had gathered there many men of wealth and influence and as we were talking this Chinaman rose and he said, "I want to say something before this woman sails to her home. I want to say something in behalf of the white people of Australia. The Chinamen are being degraded, hundreds of them, through the opium fiend; I do not say anything about the Chinese, because some of the Christian people don't seem to think that they have any souls, and so I will not plead for them, but I do want to ask that something shall be done for the white people of Australia, for opium smoking is spreading among these people until I know at least 150 women who smoke opium in this one city alone." And so this Chinaman drew up a petition, he doesn't belong to any church, he does not call himself a Christian, but he drew up a petition and the petition was addressed to the W. W. C. T. U. about to be assembled in Chicago and he passed it around and asked every influential man and woman in that gallery to sign it. And what do you suppose that petition was. It said, "We entreat the women of this great moral force of the nineteenth century to add to their many departments of World's work, a department that shall be known as the Suppression of Opium Smoking throughout the world," and that is how we came to add this department.

It seems to me, friends, that when the voices of those whom we call heathen, are heard making a plea for our own people, for the white people, it seems to me that it is time the church of Christ was more active concerning the great reforms to-day than they ever have been before.

Now, you will ask us how is this question going to be settled? Why, people ask how is the liquor question going to be settled? I say to you that the world can never be won for Christ, Christianity can never ride on its power to heathen lands until the men of Christian countries settle the opium question and the liquor question, and so a heathen world is looking to us, not to send the gospel to them half so much as it is looking to us to settle for time and forever the opium traffic in India and China and the liquor traffic throughout the world. And so that is the question that confronts the people of America and England to-day.

The Rev. C. P. Hard was introduced and spoke a few eloquent words for the christianizing of India.

After singing the "Parting Hymn" from the White Ribbon Hymnal, the World's W. C. T. U. convention was adjourned sine die on motion of Mrs. Woodbridge.

NATIONAL WOMAN'S CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE UNION CONVENTION.

WEDNESDAY MORNING.

So easily did the World's meeting glide into that of the National that the transition would scarcely have been perceptible, had not a comical and somewhat trying mistake been made by the janitor of the hall. The evening previous, the state presidents and ushers had remained dutifully after the exercises and, as is their custom, had drawn lots for the seats of their delegations. The seats had then been carefully designated on cards tied to the lower rung of the chairs, and at a late hour, the provident presidents and faithful ushers retired with the happy consciousness of work well done. Imagine, then, their dismay the next morning, upon entering the hall, to find the chairs all piled in a promiscuous heap in the middle of the floor, and many of them minus the mystic label. Of course order was restored as soon as possible, but the reassignment necessarily occupied some time, and it was ten o'clock before the Convention opened. For once, at least, the careful housewives did not fail to count the cost of a freshly swept floor.

The devotional exercises were conducted by Mrs. Lide Meriwether, of Tennessee, which included the reading of the Crusade Psalm. The beautiful old hymn, "How Firm a Foundation," which white-ribboners love so well, was heartily sung by the audience, and the twentieth annual convention of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union was fairly inaugurated.

Doubtless the leading thought in every one's mind was the absence of the beloved President, Miss Willard, but it was also evident that every delegate had come prepared to do her individual part even better than usual, to help make up for the great loss of our inspiring leader's presence, and at the same time to extend to Mrs. Buell, whose lot it was, as corresponding secretary, to preside, the right hand of fellowship and loyal support in her difficult position, which she well proved the ability to fill long before the Convention had closed.

Mrs. Buell's first words were these:

"I am very sure that there is not a delegate in this room whose thought does not turn to the East and to another country than ours, whose thought is not far away across the ocean with her whose duty it would have been, had she been present, to stand in this place and preside over this Convention.

"There is not a delegate nor an officer in this Convention this morning that does not regret that our President is not with us. I regret it, we all regret it. We are sorry that we cannot look into her face this morning; we are sorry that we cannot hear her pleasant voice and feel the clasp of her cordial hand, but she is not with us, and under the constitution it devolves upon me to stand in her place, not to try to fill her place, but simply to stand here and do the best I can in presiding over this Convention. And I ask this morning that the delegates and the officers upon the floor will help me to the best of their ability in preserving order.

"Will you pray for me as you would for your President were she here this morning, and may we all work together during these four days, to make this a good Convention, and one that she shall delight to think about, although she is not with us this morning."

After the roll-call by the recording secretary, the adoption of the program was moved by Mrs. Fessenden, of Massachusetts, with the amendment that the report of the Temperance Temple be made a special order for 9:20 Thursday morning instead of 9:30 Saturday morning, as it stood on the program. Mrs. Fessenden stated her reasons for proposing the amendment to be that only ten minutes were given for the Temple report on the program, and she was confident that many delegates would wish to ask questions and a great deal of information be desired that it would be utterly impossible to give in ten minutes and therefore if it came earlier in the Convention there would be a better opportunity to discuss and make themselves intelligent with regard to the affairs of the Temple.

The amendment was carried by a vote of 196 against 33, and the program as amended was adopted.

Lady Henry Somerset, Mother Thompson, Mrs. Andrew, Dr. Bushnell, Miss Ackermann, Mrs. Harris and Miss Jennie Smith were made members of the Convention, and Mrs. S. M. I. Henry, Mrs. Zerelda Wallace, Miss Susan B. Anthony and Mrs. Cunningham, from British Columbia, were granted the liberty of the Convention without a vote.

The committee on credentials as reported were: Miss Lodie Reed, Indiana, Mrs. Emily Underwood Burgess, New York, and Miss Helen Walker, Illinois.

Miss Pugh was made chairman of the committee on finance, with power to select her own assistants, and Mrs. Woodbridge was given the same power, as chairman of committee on publications.

The introduction and response of Mother Thompson were so interesting that we reproduce them entire.

THE CHAIRMAN: We have very frequently had with us some one in particular whom we have specially delighted to honor. We have one such with us this morning, and I am going to ask you when she is brought to the platform and introduced to give her the Chautauqua salute, and we will not exclude our friends in the galleries. I have the great pleasure of introducing to this audience this morning, and to the Convention, Mother Thompson, Mrs. E. J. Thompson, the first leader of the first Crusade Band in Hillsboro, Ohio.

MOTHER THOMPSON: I don't feel strong enough to say what I want to say, but I will try. I am here by a special Providence.

THE CHAIRMAN: Let us be perfectly quiet all over the house and we shall be able to hear Mother Thompson.

MOTHER STEWART: The saloon-keepers heard her years ago.

MOTHER THOMPSON: "That was when I was young and strong. I want to say that the white ribbon movement is a special providence and the same power is ruling over the women to-day and especially over the old Crusaders.

"I wrote to my Ohio president and secretary that I must decline the honor they had conferred upon me of being a delegate from Ohio to the National Convention, because it looked like an impossibility for me to be here owing to affliction in my family. But our God knows no impossibilities and therefore let us cheer up to-day when we look at this horrid liquor traffic. It looks like an impossibility that the women of the land could make any invasion upon it, but the same God that sent me a message day before yesterday, that my dear one was improving and I would not be needed for three weeks, brought a message from dear Mrs. Carse, saying, 'You must come, I will take care of you.' My family said, 'Now, ma, now wife, there is the opening. You are not needed here for the dear son-in-law and the daughter, and the temperance women want you and now go.'

"I just want to tell you I have had the grandest time. Why, men from West Virginia, and I was going to say Nova Scotia, have absolutely tipped their hats to me and waited upon me so that I would know none of the difficulties of traveling, and when I got to the depot in Chicago it seemed to me that I was just entering into a young Babel, and what was a poor little woman to do, and I was met at the depot by a son of our Crusade minister, Bro. McSurely, who resides here, and he took me in a carriage to the Temple and saw that I was in the care of the one who had promised to care for me, and here I am with the biggest heart that any old lady ever had, just full of love for the white ribbon women."

The Chair then announced that the time had come for hearing Miss Willard's annual address, and that by special request, "Rock of Ages" would be sung, preparatory to the reading.

After the singing of the beautiful song, Lady Henry Somerset stepped forward and for well nigh two hours held the audience absolutely quiet, except for the occasional tremendous applause, as she read the address which is always considered the richest feast of the program, and which for the first time was voiced by other lips than those of the eloquent writer:

[Want of space forbids our giving Miss Willard's annual address in full. It is published in a neat pamphlet form by the Woman's Temperance Publishing Association, and every W. C. T. U. member and leader will find it a complete reference text-book of our work. The selections from it which follow are those which were read by Lady Henry Somerset at Wednesday morning's meeting.[

PRESIDENT'S ANNUAL ADDRESS.

BELOVED COMRADES OF THE WHITE RIBBON ARMY: When we began the delicate, difficult and dangerous operation of dissecting out the alcohol nerve from the body politic, we did not realize the intricacy of the undertaking nor the distances that must be traversed by the scalpel of investigation and research. In about seventy days from now, twenty years will have elapsed since the call of battle sounded its bugle note among the homes and hearts of Hillsboro, Ohio. We have all been refreshing our knowledge of those days by reading the "Crusade Sketches" of its heroic leader, Mrs. Eliza J. Thompson, "the mother of us all," and we know that but one thought, sentiment and purpose animated those saintly "Praying Bands" whose name will never die out from human history. "Brothers, we beg you not to drink and not to sell!" This was the one wailing note of these moral Paganinis, playing on one string. It caught the universal ear and set the key of that mighty orchestra, organized with so much toil and hardship, in which the tender and exalted strain of the Crusade violin still soars aloft, but upborne now by the clanging cornets of science, the deep trombones of legislation, and the thunderous drums of politics and parties.

The "Do-Everything Policy" was not of our choosing, but is an evolution as inevitable as any traced by the naturalist or described by the historian. Woman's genius for details, and her patient steadfastness in following the enemies of those she loves "through every lane of life," have led her to antagonize the alcohol habit and the liquor traffic just where they are, wherever that may be. If she does this, since they are everywhere, her policy will be "Do Everything."

A one-sided movement makes one-sided advocates. Virtues, like hounds, hunt in packs. Total abstinence is not the crucial virtue in life that excuses financial crookedness, defamation of character, or habits of impurity. The fact that one's father was, and one's self is, a bright and shining light in the total abstinence galaxy, does not give one a vantage ground for high-handed behavior toward those who have not been trained to the special virtue that forms the central idea of the temperance movement. We have known persons who, because they had "never touched a drop of liquor," set themselves up as if they belonged to a royal line, but whose tongues were as biting as alcohol itself, and whose narrowness had no competitor save a straight line. An all-round movement can only be carried forward by all-round advocates; a scientific age requires the study of every subject in its correlations. It was once supposed that light, heat and electricity were wholly separate entities; it is now believed and practically proved that they are but different modes of motion. Standing in the valley we look up and think we see an isolated mountain; climbing to its top we see that it is but one member of a range of mountains many of them of well-nigh equal altitude.

Some bright women who have opposed the "Do-Everything Policy" used as their favorite illustration a flowing river, and expatiated on the ruin that would follow if that river (which represents their do-one-thing policy), were diverted into many channels, but it should be remembered that the most useful of all rivers is the Nile, and that the agricultural economy of Egypt consists in the effort to spread its waters upon as many fields as possible. It is not for the river's sake that it flows through the country but for the sake of the fertility it can bring upon adjoining fields, and this is preëminently true of the temperance reform.

Let us not be disconcerted, but stand bravely by that blessed trinity of movements, Prohibition, Woman's Liberation and Labor's uplift. Everything is not in the temperance reform, but the temperance reform should be in everything.

There is no better motto for the "Do-Everything-Policy," than this which we are saying by our deeds: "Make a chain, for the land is full of bloody crimes and the city of violence."

If we can remember this simple rule, it will do much to unravel the mystery of the much controverted "Do-Everything Policy," viz: that every question of practical philanthropy or reform has its temperance aspect, and with that we are to deal.

We are too apt to think that what makes for us makes for the truth, and what makes for the truth must be true. Such a circle of reasoning leaves us, so far as logic goes, in the attitude said to have been assumed by the coffin of Mohammed—suspended between earth and heaven. A reformer is very apt to fall into this line of argumentation, a tendency which is perhaps most likely to be corrected by studying the correlated movements of other groups of men and women equally excellent, and by allying to the reform of which he is an advocate as many others germane to it as may be practicable, always asking this question as the touchstone of the "natural selection" he would make "What is the Temperance aspect of this cognate reform, and what its aspect toward the liquor traffic?"

The Temperance cause started out well-nigh alone, but mighty forces have joined us in the long march. We are now in the midst of the Waterloo battle, and in the providence of God the Temperance army will not have to fight that out all by itself. For science has come up with its glittering contingent, political economy deploys its legions, the woman question brings an Amazonian army upon the field, and the stout ranks of labor stretch away far as the eye can reach. As in the old Waterloo against Napoleon, so now against the Napoleon of the liquor traffic, no force is adequate except the "allied forces."

A GENERAL SURVEY.

There are two changeless sources of solid happiness; first, the belief in God, and second, the habit of hard work toward useful ends. The first affords a sunshiny mental atmosphere, the second keeps that ever active engine, the brain, from working on itself. For it cannot be idle, and if its energies are not directed toward objective occupation, it will find employment in such dissection of its own powers as will weaken them, and tend toward morbid views and general bewilderment. The recoil of an engine upon itself, when that engine is the brain, means, in the last analysis, insanity. Looking out upon the world we perceive that it is continually improving as to the comforts of life, the tools of mind and hand, the inventions that help on the annihilation of time and space, and the incentives to noble character. We know that this great improvement has not happened but has been caused to come to pass; and we know that human beings are the necromancers who have wrought these wonders. If we are not wandering savages, it is because of some systematic power put forth to produce that totality of improvement which we call civilization. This was done, man by man, woman by woman, step by step, thought by thought, hand by hand. Into the vast and fruitful harvest of their sowing who have passed across the stage and out of sight, we have been welcomed for a while, and the least that we can do is to add our increment of power to the totality of achievement,—to leave the world, materially, mentally, sympathetically, conscientiously, spiritually, as much better than we found it, as the addition of our personality and rational effort during the years allotted to us, can cause it to become. This is a very practical view of life, I am aware; but it is one that commends itself to this practical age, and, as I understand it, the women of the white ribbon, banded together in the name of "God and Home and Every Land," propose to do just what I have described in a systematized and consecutive fashion, so long as life and health remain to them. In view of such a purpose, our association can but command the respect and good-will of all rational minds, and we do not care what the irrational may say, because their blame is praise.

The great philosopher, Emanuel Kant, says that "every action carries with it its own punishment and its own reward," and the putting in of our powers to help our race is its own exceeding great reward.

There are higher considerations expressed in more technical language to which I have often asked your attention; but it seemed to me that to put the whole movement on this matter-of-fact and common-sense basis might be a helpful and healthful thing in this year of the great Exposition, when the long result of time has been concentrated into a magnificent object lesson which "he who runs may read," and when the public mind is asking with quickened interest of nations, societies, and individuals, "What have you wrought, and why?"

The three requisites for success are ability, availability and responsibility. The first is native, the second acquired, the last conferred. In every white-ribboner, whose work is worth the name, these three must meet and the greatest outcome of the Crusade in its original and organic form was that it gave to women of ability the schooling in which they acquired availability, and helped them to the positions in which, through responsibility, they grew from what they were to what they had the power to be.

General Booth says that the qualities of generalship are latent and only awaiting development in one out of every thirty-five men and in one of every thirty women.

The church that within the next generation opens widest doors of ecclesiastical freedom to women will be the church of gospel triumph and heavenly benediction. And the reforms that women lead shall win men's will and work, as certainly as a true mother can count upon her son. For tact is talent working by love and winning by worthiness.

The history of the reformer, whether man or woman, on any line of action is but this: When he sees it all alone he is a fanatic; when a good many see it with him they are enthusiasts; when all see it he is a hero. The gradations are as clearly marked by which he ascends from zero to hero, as the lines of latitude from the North Pole to the Equator.

A wooden bowl is soon turned on the lathe, but the making of a golden bowl, which must be beaten and burnished, is quite another thing.

It is quite likely that in the long, slow, and often weary march of these twenty years since the Crusade impulse came to us from heaven, we have not seen as much accomplished on the specific lines where we have wrought as we had hoped; but we must all remember how little it is possible for us to realize the outcome of our work. I do not know how it may be with other speakers and writers in the cause of temperance, woman and labor, but for myself I seldom hear that anything has come of what I have tried to do. Yet now and then in ways most unexpected I have learnt of changes in the lives of individuals and even of communities, that have astounded me as results of my poor labors, and I concluded from this that if we were but to know all the good that is developed or conserved by our united and systematic efforts, we should indeed take heart of hope. At first the Crusade light was like that in Rembrandt's pictures, a pure, limpid, vivid ray across the gloom, but as the years went on it has widened into the Raphaelesque light that approaches noontide, but whose beams are so diffused that the intenseness of the early and concentrated ray is gone.

Concerning the temperance movement in our land and throughout the world to-day, the pessimist says—and says truly—"There was never so much liquor manufactured in any one year since time began as in the year 1893,* and as a consequence never did so much liquor flow down the people's throats as in this same year of grace." "But," says the optimist, "there is each year a larger acreage from which the brewer and distiller may gather the golden grain and luscious fruits, there are more people to imbibe the exhilarating poison; but, per contra, there was never so much intelligent thinking in any one year as to the drink delusion, there were never so many children studying in the schools the laws written in their members, there were never such gatherings together of temperance people to consult on the two great questions, what to do and what not to do, as in this year; there was never such a volume of experience and expert testimony and knowledge so varied, so complete, as we have had this year at the International Congress; there were never so many total abstainers in proportion to the population, never so many intelligent people who could render a reason scientific, ethical, æsthetic, for their total abstinence faith as now; there were never so many pulpits from which to bombard the liquor traffic and the drink habit; there were never so many journalists who had a friendly word to say for the temperance reform; there was never such a stirring up of temperance politics; for the foremost historic nation of the world, Great Britain, has this year, for the first time, adopted as a plank in the platform of the dominant party the principle that the people shall themselves decide whether or not they want the public house; and as a natural consequence of this political action there was never a public sentiment so respectful toward the temperance reform. The great world-brain is becoming saturated with the idea that it is reasonable and kind to let strong drink alone. The vastness of these changes can only be measured by the remembrance that a few generations ago these same drinks were the accredited emblems, in cot and palace alike, of hospitality, kindness and good-will."

So far as the white ribbon movement is concerned, this has been its best and brightest year from the outlook of the World's W. C. T. U. and that is the only point of view that is adequate. How little did they dream, those devoted women of the praying bands, who with their patient footsteps bridged the distance between home and saloon, and in their little despised groups poured out their souls to God, and their pitiful plea into the ears of men, that the "Movement" would be systematized twenty years later into an organization known and loved by the best men and women in every civilized nation on the earth; and that its heroic missionaries would be obliged to circumnavigate the globe in order to visit the outposts of the Society. How little did they dream that in the year of the World's Columbian Exposition well-nigh half a million of children would send their autographs on the triple pledge cards of our Loyal Temperance Legions, and Sunday-school department; that we should have a publishing house, owned and conducted by the Society itself, from which more than a hundred million pages of the literature of light and leading should go forth this year; how little could they have conceived of the significance that is wrapped up in the lengthening folds of the Polyglot Petition, signed and circulated in fifty languages, and containing the signatures and attestations of between three and four million of the best people that live praying for the abolition of the alcohol traffic, the opium traffic and the licensed traffic in degraded women. How little they dreamed of that great movement by which the study of physiology and hygiene were to bring the arrest of thought to millions of young minds concerning the true inwardness of all narcotic poisons in their effects on the body and the brain. How "far beyond their thought" the enfranchisement of women in New Zealand and Wyoming, Kansas and "Michigan, my Michigan!" How inconceivable to them the vision of our House Beautiful reared in the heart of the world's most electric city, and sending forth its influence to the furthest corner of the globe. How little did they dream that the echo of their hymns should yet be heard and heeded by a woman whose lineage, and the prowess of whose historic name may be traced through centuries,—and that not alone from the cottage and homestead, but from the emblazoned walls of splendid castles, should be driven the cup that seems to cheer, but at the last inebriates.

The momentum of the centuries is in the widening, deepening current of nineteenth century reform; the twentieth century's dawn shall witness our compensations and reprisals, and as these increase humanity shall pay back into the mother-heart of woman its unmeasured penitence and unfathomed regret for all that she has missed (and through her, every son and daughter that she has brought into the world), by reason of the awful mistake by which, in the age of force, man substituted his "thus far and no farther," in place of the "thus far and no farther" of God; one founded in a selfish and ignorant view of woman's powers, the other giving her what every sentient being ought to have—a fair field and a free course to run and be glorified.

The Prohibition agitation in America has not been as great in the past year as formerly, and the reasons are not far to seek. A presidential campaign always lowers the moral atmosphere for a year before it begins and a year after it is over. Legislators become timid, politicians proceed to "hedge," journalists, with an eye to the loaves and fishes, furl their sails concerning issues that have at best only a fighting chance; the world, the flesh, and the devil get their innings, and the time is not yet. In the past year the attention of the nation has been focused on the World's Fair and the endless difficulties to which that has given birth. There has been an incalculable amount of ill-will set in motion as the result of personal financial interest and ignoble ambition. All this savors not the things of God or of humanity. The readjustment of political parties is still inchoate; men's hearts are failing them for fear; leaders in the traditional party of moral ideas have thrown off all disguises and grounded any weapons of rebellion they may once have lifted against the liquor traffic. The financial panic has riveted the attention of the public on their own dangers and disasters, and the spirit of money-making has lamentably invaded the ranks of the temperance army itself; but prohibition is as lively an issue to-day as emancipation was in 1856; an issue that stirs such deadly hatred is by no means dead. It is still quick with fighting blood, and its enemies know this even better than its friends.

Strange to tell, Iowa is once more the battle field; that brave young state so grievously wounded in the house of its friends by politicians who are not statesmen, but so gallantly defended by its Methodist Conferences, its Congregational rank and file, its Baptist contingent, its Quaker "remnant," and its New England farmers. Iowa, the hawk-eye state, hallowed by Haddock's blood and disgraced by the would-be murderers of Muscatine, birthplace of Republican "non-partisanship," battle-ground of prohibition, and Moloch of persecution for principle's sake, through which white-ribboners walked with the smell of fire on their garments and the Crusade fire burning in their hearts;—it would be the top of life to take the torch of truth once more and wave it on those prairies! But 1882, when I worked "for the amendment" seems long ago, and campaigning is beyond me; among so many voices mine will not be missed. God grant that victory may turn on Zion's side in Iowa's partisan battle at the ballot box in October, 1893!

Kansas, true to its traditions, is still the torch-bearer of progress. Prohibition and the people's money, woman's ballot and the banishment of bond-holders are all issues tingling with life on yonder plains. We may yet live to see all this commotion condense into the war cry: "Down with John J. Ingalls, up with John P. St. John!"

The situation in South Carolina is difficult to judge. At this distance I do not know the exact status of the law at present, but have heard that it was controverted in the Supreme Court. Whatever attitude is taken toward the movement in South Carolina by our temperance leaders there, trusty and devoted as they have been, seems to me worthy to be accredited by those of us who have not the means of judging intelligently nor watching the changing phases of the struggle as they have who "Hold the Fort."

The economic view of prohibition is one that appeals to the largest number of our people, and none will deny that more and more they are separating into two camps, the industrious and thrifty favoring prohibition, the idle and spendthrift class opposing it. This is no doubt the most helpful report that can be made upon the present situation. The general drift, or, as a great statesman in England has said, "The flowing tide's with us." Those who let strong drink alone must always be the most forceful and in the long run successful and potential portion of the country. Our fathers were as good as we, but they took no stand against the drink habit or the liquor traffic. There is hardly a woman here upon the side-board of whose grandfather's home would not have been found a decanter if not a demijohn. The same influences that have brought us out of the passive into the active voice may be trusted steadily to swell the number of recruits who shall join their intelligence, energy, talents, and sobriety with ours. The temperance cause has everything to gain and nothing to lose from free discussion, from experimental study of its results, whether physical or financial, moral or mercantile, ethical or æsthetic. These are the hidings of our power, the strong foundations on which, as on a rock, we have begun to rear the edifice of a clear brain, an edifice that shall extend and rise until it becomes the Pharos of humanity.

THE YOUNG WOMEN'S WORK.

This department holds its own among many contestants by reason of the genial spirit of its leader, Mrs. Frances J. Barnes, of New York, and the loyalty of her lieutenants. No department is conducted with more ingenuity or faithfulness.

JUVENILE WORK.

Our Loyal Temperance Legion represents the most progressive method of Juvenile Work with which I am conversant; we recognize no distinction as between "masses" and "classes," and we put the organization into the hands of the children themselves, so far as presiding and all the local arrangements go, but retain its guidance in the hands of a grown-up superintendent, and we have a graded course of study. In several states we have held either county or state conventions of the children, with results more inspiring than have been attained in any other department of our work within the last five years. With a system so "up to date," it is to be deeply regretted that our numbers do not more rapidly increase. I suppose we have in round numbers half a million children under our care, taking the world over, but the Bands of Hope in Great Britain alone number 2,500,000 boys and girls. These are eloquent figures, and ought to stir in us emulation as well as zeal.

THE CHILDREN'S FOUNTAIN.

The success of the efforts made by our L. T. L. Department, under the leadership of Miss Anna Gordon and Mrs. Helen Rice, to enlist the children in contributing $2,000 or more to the erection of a cold water fountain symbolic of their work, and to be presented by the children of the World's W. C. T. U. to the city of Chicago, shows remarkable esprit de corps in our on-coming temperance host. Between four and five hundred thousand total abstainers' pledges have either accompanied their gifts to the fountain or have been forwarded separately; and the collection of these in our exhibits at the Exposition has been of unique interest to the temperance people who have thronged that corner of the Woman's Building. The entire number of these pledge cards, all of which to our great regret could not be included in the exhibition, will be preserved among the archives of the World's W. C. T. U. in the Woman's Temple.

I do not longer dwell on our departments, because we can now say of each what Daniel Webster said of Massachusetts: "There she stands; look at her."

THE WORLD'S COLUMBIAN EXPOSITION.

The World's Fair in Chicago has been, indeed, the eighth wonder of the world, and no one has appreciated its splendor more than women have done, nor has any class probably reaped more of help and hope from the great show than we. Never before has such provision been made for women. First of all, the Congress of the United States voted to have a board of women directors, who were duly appointed; next, a woman's building was decreed; then women were placed on all committees of award that had women's work to examine; then a Congress of women such as the world has never seen was held, calling together crowds of from twenty to thirty thousand auditors, eager to learn what had been wrought, and to know what could be undertaken by the suppressed half of the human race. Then women were admitted to the deliberations of all the Congresses, chiefly by the wish of the men who were at the head of the different committees, most of which had also a coördinate committee composed of women. There has been no enthusiasm over all the great men who have come and gone to exceed that which has been manifested in the case of equally great women. Perhaps to us as reformers no single illustration of this has been more welcome than the public recognition given, after more than forty years of service, to our elder sister in the woman's work and world, Miss Susan B. Anthony.

The Sunday closing question at the great Fair has been so theorized and acted upon as to make the effect beneficently educational to all people. The value of the Seventh Day rest was never understood so well as now, and the day was never so safe and sacred in the reverence and love of the most reasonable and thoughtful people in the world. We did not look for just this outcome; we had no conception of the magnitude to which the controversy would attain; our imaginations were not equal to such a revelation of true inwardness as the management finally gave to the world. The reaction upon working men and their families of the practical admission that it was for the purpose of gain, and this alone, that it had been determined to open the gates on Sunday, caused an arrest of thought in the midst of that hearty and independent class of people that will for a generation make them suspicious of those who "in the interest of the working man" declare their purpose to open expositions, fairs, and other places on Sunday, when the facts are that by doing this they simply saddle him with an extra sweating process and undermine his hold upon the single day in which he has a right to be a man among men and to join the "leisure class."

The Congress called by the National Temperance Society and Publication House in New York City in connection with the two sections of the Committee on a Temperance Congress appointed by the World's Temperance Congress Auxiliary, was successful in presenting to the public a series of essays and speeches of great value, which have been brought out by Mr. J. N. Stearns in two large volumes entitled "Temperance in all Nations." The World's and National W. C. T. U. were nobly represented by our most eloquent speakers. It was the greatest deprivation of my life as a reformer to be absent from such a grand reunion, but perhaps it is good discipline to one who for nearly 20 years had missed no important meeting of the Temperance forces in America, to find how little any individual is needed anywhere. As Col. Bain has keenly said, "If one wishes to know how large a place he will leave vacant in the world when he departs, let him paddle his canoe into the midst of some large stream, rest for a momont from his oars, put his finger into the tranquil water, take it out again carefully and see how large a hole is left." But the best of it is that the human spirit knows no boundaries of time or space, and leaps at once into the midst of all circles of power and influence to which it is related by a common perception, purpose and pulsation of sympathy; so that we really meet with our comrades wherever they or we may be, and this will be all the truer, let us hope, when we have cast aside the hindering garment of mortality.

It is the universal testimony that no single meeting ever held by women was so representative in the character of its attendance, so progressive in the tone of its utterances, or so phenomenal in the size of its audiences as the International Congress of Women held in May, 1893, in connection with the World's Columbian Exposition.

TOTAL ABSTINENCE.

It may be that in some better day the world will see a human being gifted with the best powers of what we are wont to call the "lower orders of creation"; keen-sighted and swift of motion as a bird, sharp-scented as a greyhound, faithful as a dog and full of wisdom as an elephant. It may be, too, that we shall see a human being who has not only these powers, but is made up of the best physical graces, mental gifts and graciousness of all generations; one who shall gain knowledge, not by the present slow process of acquisition, but instantaneously, through magnetic currents, from the books and brains about him. One who will be such a thinker as Kepler or Kant; such a poet as Shakespeare or Tennyson; such an artist as Da Vinci; such a sculptor as Phidias; such a musician as Beethoven; such a statesman as Gladstone; such a philanthropist as Shaftesbury; such a saint as Guyon. Naturally the unintelligent and the unimaginative will declare this impossible, but everything helps forward the advent of just such a being as that. All arts, inventions, philanthropies, religions, are but tentaculæ put forth, searching for the means to make the man of the future, who shall be what all who have the vision and faculty divine have always prophesied he would yet be—a microcosm, the mirror of the universe. We in our little corner, doing our work well-nigh unnoted by the world at large, are helping by our small increments of power to create this complete human being—the goal of all desire and hope. The coral zoophyte builds not more surely on the unseen reef that yet shall rise in gleaming beauty above the deep sea's level blue than we are building for universal and perfected human nature. Nothing less is in our thought, and nothing else; for by ideals we live, and this ideal has been upon our consciousness from the beginning. The brain is but a stained glass window now, we wish to change it to a crystal pure and brilliant. The total abstinence pledge is but one strand in the cable of our organized endeavor, for we have seen that to make man as God would have him be, the student of perfection must study his heredity, must hover like an unseen guardian about his cradle, his desk at school, his happy playground, his thoughtless and endangered youth, his tempted manhood, and must guard, not only against beginnings of ill in his own separate career, but their organized form in the habits, customs and laws of his nation and his world. For "it is easier to prevent than to undo." Lord Shaftesbury said that the iniquities of the fathers are visited upon the children to the third and fourth generations of all who worship idols, and there is no greater idol and no falser god than the god Bacchus.

I once asked the greatest of inventors, Thomas A. Edison, if he were a total abstainer, and when he told me he was, I said: "May I inquire whether it was home influence that made you so?" and he replied: "No, I think it was because I always felt I had a better use for my head." Who can measure the loss to the world if that wonderful instrument of thought that has given us so much of light and leading in the practical mechanism of life had become sodden with drink instead of electric with original ideas? But there is another argument on which we can perhaps insist with a larger constituency.

It will always be true that a certain number of the people must, for their own sake, let intoxicants entirely alone, and that there is a certain amount of danger to any one who uses them. If then, any one elects to be an abstainer, in order that those who must follow that practice shall not be a class by themselves marked as weaklings and of singular ways in life, and also for the reason that it is more absolutely safe to let liquors alone than to use them, he is in a position wholly scientific, ethical, and in accordance with the Golden Rule. Whoever then laughs at a total abstainer shows himself lacking in a clear mind as well as a good heart, for to take such a precaution on one's own account as a matter of prudence is surely conformable to reason, and to take it in order to make it easier for others to do the same is conformable to the Golden Rule and the highest dictates of brotherhood.

"What luck to be born good!" is one of Thackeray's exclamations. A vicar in Shoreditch, London, offsets these words after this fashion, "Unhappily there are many who are not born but damned into the world," and he goes on to say, "It may not be the best theology but it is the soundest sense, to admit that some by inherited 'defects and taints of blood,' by mental, physical, and moral peculiarities, by surroundings, training, and circumstances, have no fair chance of being anything but bad." He tells the story of a poor fellow who said to him one day, "I should like to turn honest," whereupon the clergyman lifted the man's hat off and said, "Let me look at your head?" "He burst out laughing, thinking it was a joke, but to me it was no joke at all. I am not a phrenologist, but any one could tell what that sad, sloping forehead, those shifty eyes, those heavy jaws mean, and I admitted to the man that I did not think he could."

Was ever a minister of Christ in poorer business than the one who tells this story? His action was diametrically opposed to the whole spirit and method of the Gospel. "A bruised reed shall he not break, and smoking flax shall he not quench." "Whosoever will may take the water of life freely." Why did not this vicar feel in his deepest heart the glad prophecy in the poor man's words, "I should like to turn honest," and why did he not say, "that which we like or love we may become." Our love of it, our liking for it, is the bright prophecy, the sure word of hope. He who never made a mistake never made anything. He who never sinned or sorrowed never really lived at all. As an antidote to the pessimistic view of this no doubt well-meaning but misguided minister of God, I recall my mother's words, "We always may be what we might have been."

THE APATHY OF WRITERS AND INSTRUCTORS.

"Art for art's sake" is now the shibboleth of novelists, even as science for its own sake was, in a less enlightened period, the shibboleth of those who devoted themselves to the study of nature's laws; but scientific men have outgrown this selfish rallying cry, and are to-day the leaders of mankind out of the wilderness of savagery, and into those peaceful conquests by which mankind shall come to be the rulers of the world. If any inventor or student of the theory of nature should now declare that he was only trying to improve himself he would be hissed out of the circle of civilized men, and the day is not distant when the story-writer who avowedly makes of his work simply a pot boiler, a pastime or a perquisite of art for art's sake, will be as much detested and as little tolerated, for no form of writing at all compares in the wide reach of its influence as novel writing; it is a principle that we are responsible to humanity in exact proportion to the power of which we are the custodians, and men and women of the pen who in this day of humanity's unequal struggle for its own betterment do not turn the pictorial and dramatic art of the novelist to the higher uses of socialism, temperance, the woman question, the advocacy of peace and other living issues that most intimately touch the life of the race, have by no means measured up to the ideal standard.

Of all the fallacies ever concocted, none is more idiotic than the one indicated in the saying, "A woman's strength consists in her weakness." One might as well say that a man's purity consisted in his vileness, or that his sobriety consisted in his drunkenness! When was ever strength discounted, except by those who would have women kept in a condition of perpetual tutelage, or ignorance glorified except by those who desire her as a parasite? Nothing proves more conclusively the wretched nonsense of the conservative position on the "Woman Question" than that so noble an expression as "strong-minded" should have become a synonym of reproach. It is the off-set of "weak-minded," and to be weak-minded is the greatest calamity that can fall upon a human being. Let us have done with this nomenclature, and the shallow wit that gives it currency, and let us insist first, last and always that gentleness is never so attractive as when joined with strength, purity never so invincible as when leagued with intelligence, beauty never so charming as when it is seen to be the embellishment of reason and the concomitant of character. What we need to sound in the ears of girlhood is to be brave, and in the ears of boyhood to be gentle. There are not two sets of virtues; and there is but one greatness of character; it is that of him (or her) who combines the noblest traits of man and woman in nature, words, and deeds.

SOCIAL PURITY.

When a man would rob a woman of her virtue or a woman is about to sell herself in the most degraded bargain that the mind can contemplate, what does he give her, and what does she take? Strong drink!

Mrs. Josephine Butler says that in the early days of Queen Victoria the British government wished to introduce a Contagious Diseases Act, but could not make up its mind to ask the virgin queen to sign such a bill. England has carried the Bible, alcoholic drink and legalized harlotry to every country she has conquered. This has been the work of man; if woman were added to the government she surely could do no worse, and in simple self-defence would be likely to do a great deal better.

WOMAN'S BALLOT.

He who knows what ought to be knows what will be, and we know that the home vote ought to be let loose on the saloon; as our English leader has said, "She who is life-giver ought to be law-giver." The Michigan Liquor Dealers' Association have decided to do their utmost to destroy the law that arms women in that state with the municipal ballot and declares that "when the legislature granted this power to women (with an educational restriction) it struck a blow directly at the liquor dealers' interests and rights."

"The eye of the law" is a correct phrase, for up to date the law has but one eye, it needs two, and women must furnish the other.

Local control of the liquor traffic by all the people (as Abraham Lincoln said, "by no means excluding women") is believed in England to be the best practicable measure that can be sought, and our forces there, much as they are divided on other lines, have united upon this. There is a tendency among temperance workers everywhere to the opinion that as a wise general first recruits and drills his troops, then marches them on to the enemy, it would be wiser in the temperance forces to unite their efforts to secure the ballot for women before they further expend their energies in seeking the submission of constitutional amendments to be voted down by men. I have never made any secret of the opinion that if our forces could but have seen this as the wiser way, it would have been to our advantage, and I have heard Professor Dickie—that trusted leader of the Prohibition party—make the same declaration; but it has been our view that the loyal thing to do was to march with the army and abide the decision of the majority as to methods of work, trusting that time, with its logic of events and its argument of defeat, would lead us all, sooner or later, to the right path, the true method of attack, and unite us in its application to the pulverization of the rum power.

HOSPITAL.

The Woman's Temperance Hospital at 1619 Diversey Avenue, Chicago, is doing well; no other report comes to me. It is now in an advantageous location, is well equipped, and conducted on progressive principles by a devoted and capable Board of Trustees. For many years our beloved Mrs. Hobbs has been the moving spirit, and its development must be a source of unalloyed satisfaction to one who, in all this heavy score of years which we have well-nigh completed, has preserved among the thickening complications a gentle and womanly demeanor, and has won the confidence and affection of all her comrades. It is a proverb that "the happy have no history" and everything has gone so smoothly with the hospital in the last years that we who remember the stormy vicissitudes through which it passed in 1889 have reason to hope that, as it has now entered upon a period of tranquil administration, so it may be with the Temple, after this crucial year of financial demoralization closes up, and Chicago settles back to the sober realities of its everyday business career.

THE WOMAN'S TEMPLE.

So far as I can learn by examining our minutes, the first resolution adopted relative to this great enterprise is the following, offered by Mrs. Hoffman, at Nashville, in 1887:

Resolved, That we regard with admiration and amazement the colossal plans of our earnest and devoted sister, Mrs. Matilda B. Carse, of Chicago, for the building of a Temperance Temple in that city, as a home and source of financial revenue to the National W. C. T. U., and that while we assume no legal responsibility whatever, we do give Mrs. Carse our sympathy, our prayers, and pledge ourselves not to hinder or embarrass her in the prosecution of her plans, providing that she shall legally obligate herself not to begin the work until five hundred thousand dollars shall be secured.

In my annual address that year I made the following reference to the Temple:

"That the temperance reform is to have in Chicago its Westminster Abbey, its West Point and its gold mine all in one, you are by this time aware. I will not have the temerity to speak of this huge enterprise at length in presence of the woman who with twenty-five hundred dollars founded our great temperance publishing house.

"May all our hearts join in the children's hymn,

"'Brick and stone and mortar fair,
Rise, Temple, rise!
Upward through the sunny air,
Rise, Temple, rise!'

and 'may we be there to see'—when its topmost stone is set in place—with shouts of 'grace, grace' unto it."

Five years later the Denver Convention passed the following (1892):

"Whereas the financial standing of the Temple has never before been so secure nor the outlook so hopeful as now, the report given and accepted here showing that by united effort we can within one year hold a controlling amount of Temple stock, therefore resolved: (1) That we will not cast doubt upon this enterprise; that we will not create distrust; that if any cannot help they shall at least allow those who will do so peace of mind in the doing. (2) Further resolved, That it is the sense of this Convention that for the sake of the W. C. T. U. and the great work to which it is pledged, and for the sake of the cause of woman's advancement in the world, there is but one just and reasonable course to pursue, viz., that we stand with solid front and united effort until we reach a successful and triumphant completion of this great enterprise. And to this end we urge special and persistent efforts for the building during this our Columbian year."

The corner-stone of the Woman's Temple was laid with impressive ceremonies on November 1st, 1890, and the temperance reform has never witnessed a gala day of more marked significance. The reflex influence of the enterprise has been even more emphatic than the direct. I have seldom visited a village so small that it had not headquarters of some kind, and often these were the local union's property, the improved method being to incorporate and build for renting purposes so as to have an income as well as a home. If all the women's societies of a locality would combine to do this, each one receiving in proportion to the amounts severally invested by them, a vast impetus would, I think, be given to the totality of women's work, and an unmatched stability acquired.

Mrs. Matilda B. Carse is a woman of remarkable financial ability, who, if she had chosen to use her powers in her own interest, might in the last twenty years have amassed a splendid fortune, but she did what no business man has ever done, so far as I have learned, in the annals of the temperance reform, put her business ability wholly at the service of the cause. Most persons who have a certain amount of financial skill, use it to forward their own fortunes, but having a competency, she chose to devote herself to the interests of the movement of which from the beginning she has been one of the foremost leaders. Many of us remember that when Mrs. Carse projected the Woman's Temperance Publication House and founded THE SIGNAL (now THE UNION SIGNAL), she was for years suspected of having some ulterior design. It was said many a time in my hearing, "The next you know she will carry off that paper and make it her own private property;" so little were we able to conceive that a woman in the prime of life, a favorite in society, and one who might have made her way to a commanding position along any path she would have chosen, was willing to walk the dusty road of the temperance reform in its very dustiest part—and that is where the whirlwinds of financial interest blind men and women to the fact that "what we keep we lose and what we give we have."

From the day when the Chicago W. C. T. U. was turned out of the Young Men's Christian Association, because at our gospel temperance meeting we had too many of the "submerged class," at which time Mrs. Carse said with the earnestness grown familiar to us all, "God will give us headquarters of our own where we can receive anybody who will come"—from that day on until this hour it has always been stated with absolute distinctness that the National W. C. T. U. was not even asked by the founder of the Temple to assume the slightest legal responsibility; but that she was at liberty to do on her own responsibility what she felt would best forward the great enterprise. And women with a full knowledge of this fact were not only at liberty, but they were encouraged to collect and contribute money to such an extent as they felt inclined to do in the expectation that some time—we did not venture to say when, but twelve years from November 1, 1890, has been mentioned as the date—there would be such a return in money as to justify the efforts that had been put forth; for no reasonable person ever expected that dividends would be made to state and local unions until the building itself was paid for It has also always been stated that after the Temple became our own no rent would be charged for the accommodations furnished the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and that from the time that it was opened the hall would be at the service of the National W. C. T. U. without charge for holding meetings.

It is consoling to me whenever I recall the fact, and that is more often than the sunrise, that we have once more a centre of Christian prayer, song and testimony in the heart of the world's most progressive city, and that the earnest white-ribboners who conduct that meeting are women whom we can trust to "keep a light in the window for thee," and to "throw out the lifeline" for the tempted and distressed.

Let me repeat, the Woman's Temperance Temple has never proposed to make a farthing for any individual, hence it cannot as a business enterprise be placed in the common category of selfish financial interests. It has always been stated that after th building was paid for, the proceeds were to go for the work of the temperance reform through the local, state and National unions in proportion to the amount contributed by them. This is in a nutshell the understanding that I have had concerning the great enterprise in the midst of which we are, and I have always understood that even if we never owned the Temple entire we should realize an income to be used in our work on the basis just named from the amounts we had contributed, all of which have been officially acknowledged in THE UNION SIGNAL, week by week, from the beginning. It is known to most of us that there has been a difference of opinion among our leaders as to the practicability of the plan I have here outlined; but the great majority of the white-ribbon women have always heartily supported Mrs. Carse, and have coöperated in every practical way by resolutions passed in local, state and National conventions; by innumerable encouraging letters and articles; by the contribution of large sums of money (not involving a sacrifice of the necessities or even the comforts of life, but, as a rule, of its superfluities); and by that common public sentiment, which is the surest indication of the opinion of a great society.

A resolution sent out by the board of directors of the Temple, asking for an expression of opinion concerning the duty of loyalty to the Temple enterprise on the part of the W. C. T. U. leadership, was disapproved by several of our presidents of states, not, so far as I can learn, because they did not think we ought to be loyal to the enterprise, but because they thought the executive committee of the National W. C. T. U., and not the board of directors of the Temple, was the rightful source from which such a suggestion should proceed. This view of the subject commended itself to the sober second thought of the directors, and they did not press the resolution.

Concerning the controversy that grew out of this action I prefer not to express an opinion, for the reason that at the distance from which I send this address I have been unable adequately to hear both sides, and it is far from my intention to impute bad motives to good people. This much, however, may be said, and I think ought to be said by the President of the National W. C. T. U., namely, that while it is true that in so great an undertaking as the building of a temple like ours, there is room for two opinions, nay, for many—and the widest latitude should be allowed to personal conviction—the fact remains that if any of the officers elected by the National society (who, in the intervals of the annual meetings stand as our representatives,) are, or have been unfriendly to the Temple enterprise or any other of our affiliated interests, they have owed it to themselves, and owe it now, as well, to the Convention frankly to say so before allowing their names to be used as candidates for reëlection. A house divided against itself cannot stand in philanthropy, any more than in politics. The leaders of a movement must agree about the interests concerning which the Convention has pronounced its judgment, and if they cannot accept that judgment, it is not for the interest of the Association to place them in positions where their very inertia—to say nothing of their momentum—will block the wheels and dissipate the power.

In the stress and strain that has this year resulted from pulling different ways, the waves ran high, but the good old ship White Ribbon righted itself with remarkable skill and weathered the wintry storm. So far as I can learn from varied testimony, the attacks upon the Temple strengthened its standing with the public, because these attacks gave Mrs. Carse the opportunity to publish such a rejoinder and vindication as was convincing to reasonable men and women everywhere; so that what seemed to be a driving wind from an ill quarter has but sped us onward toward the port we have in view.

PERSONAL.

Next to the old home hearth are to me the white ribbon women, their children and their homes. As the last of a household that held together for more than sixty years, I traveled twelve thousand miles last autumn to meet the good and true, who came to meet me in the shadow of "the Rockies."

Victor Hugo says that forty is the old age of youth and fifty the youth of old age. Tens of thousands of our white ribbon women are nearing the significant middle milestone, and it is a happy thing to feel that old age has indeed a youth, and if we believe in and show it forth, there is no reason why it should not blossom out into the eternal youth of a better world, for no one is ever older than he feels himself to be, and a sense of other planets brightens our stay on this first one of the series.

In the last year I have met a great variety of our white ribbon comrades, and am more impressed than ever by the cosmopolitan character of their inspiration and achievement. The organization of the World's Woman's Christian Temperance Union has had not a little to do with this development. Our women feel that they are working, not for a community, a state, a nation, but for humanity. Their optimistic outlook is unmistakable.

It was my custom to write letters, personal and descriptive, to THE UNION SIGNAL, until I was told of the criticisms made by some of our comrades who did not believe that "one person should have so much space," and who objected to the off-hand way of putting things, and the individual character given to these contributions. From that time I have tried to conform in some degree to the standard thus set up. It is natural that where there are so many equally-deserving workers there should be unpleasant feeling when a few names are frequently brought forward. I do not think this sentiment exists among the rank and file, but it is almost impossible but that it should among the leaders. I have never read or heard of a group of associated workers where it was not found to some extent; it is a part of the humanness alike of saint and sinner, and seems to be as manifest in Christian as in worldly circles. Doubtless we all have a great deal more of it than we wish we had, but we can at least all pray and speak and strive against it in ourselves and others, and we can humbly admit that exceedingly commonsense statement of a great novelist through one of his most famous characters that "there is a great deal of human nature in folks"; the trouble is we are apt to think it is in other folks rather than in that particular member of the Folks Family to whom we are most partial.

Ruskin has said that the wise man will prepare himself for the best society, and then keep out of it, by which he means, I suppose, that whoever reads the best books has really kept company with the best minds. It is true that more and more what is technically called society is conspicuous for the absence of those whose presence it well might desire and covet. As woman herself becomes great, she will be less given to society, and more to the congenial company of a few minds of like purpose and pursuit, taking her good company not as a business but incidentally, as perhaps the choicest perquisite of the work in which she is engaged; so that good comradeship will perhaps come ere long to take the place of good society, often falsely so called.

I take this all to myself and pass it along to my friends: It has been well said that just as the liar's punishment is not so much that he is not believed as that he cannot believe any one else, so a guilty society can more easily be persuaded that any apparently innocent act is guilty than that any apparently guilty act is innocent.

In like manner, the penalty of putting an uncharitable construction on the words and acts of other people is that this becomes a habit, and one loses the charm of life because he cannot trust his fellow mortals, and without the power to do this life becomes a burden.

The worst vice of conversation is that we proceed upon the hypothesis that if you differ from me! me!! me!!! you are always wrong. If anybody doubts this let him watch his own utterances for a single day, and see how often he uses the expression—"I should not have done that."

For well nigh twenty years we have worked on together in this holy war, my first speech having been given in the February following the Crusade that began just before the holidays of 1873. It seemed to me then that vigor and enthusiasm would never fail me; I used to smile when the suggestion was made that perhaps it would be wiser not to write all day in the cars before speaking in the evening, for somehow I felt adequate to everything I had to do. This, with the steady support of my mother's great character, the belief that my resources were fed from heavenly springs, and the love and trust of my comrades, made life rich and inspired. For a year or two before coming to England, our family physician, Dr. M. C. Bragdon, of Evanston, had been warning me that I showed signs of overwork. Of this I was not in the least aware, and was inclined to set it down to the brotherly solicitude of this gifted physician whom I have known since he was a little fellow, and whose mother was my mother's most intimate friend for thirty years. Repeatedly your kindness voted me a year for recuperation and rest, but I never realized that it must be; nor do I think that if my mother had remained with me I should to this day have relaxed the efforts that had become second nature. Perhaps we cannot know what really occurs when destiny separates a mother and child who have been so closely united that neither ever had a thought she would not wish to tell the other, even though that separation is effected by those gentlest of all means that involve the failing vitality of one who has lived long and well, and her painless transition to a better world. Be this as it may, "when that loved voice which was both sound and sweetness failed so suddenly, and silence ached around me like a strong disease," I felt as Helen Hood said she did when our Yolande Ames passed from the earth, that "something in me also died." I had not the slightest symptom of rebellion; what an ingrate I should have been to rebel against her happy embarkation after a companionship of 53 years, and with a heritage of memories unalloyed, concerning one whose whole life had the brightness of health, sweet reasonableness, and no tragic vicissitudes. But I sometimes think the severing of such a nexus may have consequences of which we are aware only by results rarely traced to their true source. It was a sense of lessened power, and has been with me from that day to this. I seem to have lost much of my grip since I had "grip" in 1892. On coming to Lady Henry, she and all my friends in England were struck by a change in my appearance of which I had no cognizance, and she consulted at different times Dr. Batten, of Gloucester, Sir Andrew Clarke, Sir W. H. Broadbent, Sir Benjamin Ward Richardson, and Dr. Holman, also an eminent London practitioner. The statement of Dr. Broadbent that I had "pernicious anæmia" was alarming to us; I mean technically so, for really there is nothing to alarm a Christian philosopher who is told that his prospects of a better world are nearer than he thought, and I greatly wish our forms of utterance might be so changed as not to make such infidel expressions as "I am anxious, alarmed, horrified, agonized"—among the most frequent phrases of our current speech. But as there is no name in medicine so trusted in the temperance world as that of Sir Benjamin Ward Richardson, I shall subjoin for your reading his diagnosis, followed by letters written by him to Lady Henry and me in response to one in which she brought before him the importance of my return this autumn to attend the World's and National W. C. T. U. Conventions.

LONDON, June 29, 1893.

We hereby certify that we have this day, in consultation, seen Miss Willard, and have paid the most careful attention to her case.

We consider that she is free of any actual organic disease, at this moment, and that she bids fair to make a complete recovery; but from excessive overwork she has brought her nervous powers to a condition of exhaustion that is critical, and we are of opinion that she must have one entire year of absolute rest from all public labors.

(Signed)

BENJAMIN WARD RICHARDSON, M. D., F. R. S.
25 Manchester Square.
C. HOLMAN, M. D.
26 Gloucester Place, Portman Square, W.

BOURNEMOUTH, Aug. 20, 1893.

DEAR LADY ISABEL:—Your note came whilst I was away and it has reached me here. I have studied the matter as you wished from both sides, (my patient's and the cause) and I have, in order to be quite faithful, no choice as to the reply, which I enclose for Miss Willard. I would I could do differently but it is impossible.

Most truly yours,
(Signed) B. W. RICHARDSON.

25 MANCHESTER SQUARE, LONDON, Aug. 19, 1893.

DEAR MISS WILLARD:—I regret much to say that I cannot change my decision in regard to your case.

You must remain at rest. That is imperative on the grounds stated in the report which Dr. Holman and I have already given.

No one is more attached to the cause of temperance than I am, and no one more thoroughly comprehends the importance of your labors. But the faithful physician must put life and health first as I do, peremptorily, in regard to yourself. Your always faithful,
(Signed) B. W. RICHARDSON.

Sir Benjamin said of his own free will, "I do not think it wise to interdict one whose whole life has been devoted to such work as yours from all participation in your usual lines of thought and effort. I am willing that, when you feel equal to it, you should dictate two hours a day or more to a good stenographer, if you will take plenty of time for out-door exercise." Think of me, then, my comrades, as living quietly, twenty miles from London, in Lady Henry Somerset's cottage home, which she prefers to any of her residences, where with Anna Gordon and my loyal helpers I am able to do a large amount of correspondence and some composition; so that I need be by no means counted out from among the active forces of our movement. It is evident that one who may not be able to stand the noise of drum and trombones in a great convention, nor yet the shrill fifes of public platform work, may still twang his small horn or scrape his single violin even if it be but as an outlet to the pent-up desires and purposes of his own spirit.

I have every reason to believe from what Sir Benjamin Ward Richardson and those in council with him told me, that by next spring I shall be able to go back to my beloved native country ready to work. However, I desire to leave both the World's and the National W. C. T. U. and the board of directors of the UNION SIGNAL as free in all their councils and decisions concerning the work of the oncoming year as if I had never been. Let them consider in everything what they believe to be the best for the good of the white ribbon movement, for that cannot fail to be the best good of each one of us who hold it dear and sacred. I am confident that you will know better than I can what should be done in view of all the varying and complicated interests of a movement which by God's grace and man's good will has grown so great.

For all the resolutions passed by state, district, county and local W. C. T. U.'s and by our young soldiers of the Loyal Temperance Legion, and for the numberless affectionate tokens of interest wafted to me across the wide sea by those with whom I have been so long and tenderly associated in every part of the United States and Canada, not forgetting the tender words of my sisters in all the nations where the white ribbon has gone as a strong cord binding our hearts together, I wish to express the earnest appreciation that I cherish towards each and every one who has thus stretched out to me the right hand of fellowship in an emergency of grief and weariness.

For our comfort in all the loss and loneliness of these years that have ploughed the furrows of bereavement deeper and yet more deep, we must comfort one another with words like these:

"Forever near us though unseen
The dear immortal spirits tread;
For all the boundless universe
Is life; there are no dead."

"And they feared as they entered into the cloud," but nevertheless it was the cloud of the transfiguration, even as death shall be to all of those who live "as seeing him who is invisible."

Every Gethsemane has beside it the serene, sweet heights of the Mount of Olives, and from its summit, the resurrection into the heaven of heavens.

We are told that off the coast of Wales a large bell has been placed in the sea, to warn vessels of too near an approach to the shores near which it swings. This bell is so arranged that at every motion of the waves, however slight, it sends forth its warning sound. Amid the din of business, the people on the shore may not hear, or, if they do, may not heed its tuneful stroke.

Even so, above the changing sea of life, touched ever by its mystic waves, the bell of conscience rings; the Spirit of God speaks to us through His word. It rings in eternity, but we hear its tones in time sounding soft but clear through "our life's deep dream." May it prove to us when we do wrong, an alarm bell that will not let us rest; may it ring out in the ears of those devoted to the pleasures of sense, with the words, "Look not thou upon the wine when it is red, for at the last it biteth like a serpent and stingeth like an adder." May its clear notes call to the thoughtless, "Remember now thy Creator in the days of thy youth," and to us all, "He who sinneth against Me wrongeth his own soul."

Immediately after the conclusion of the reading Mrs. Hoffman moved that a telegram be sent to Miss Willard stating that the address had been heard and received with love illimitable, and on motion of Mrs. Cranmer a rising vote of thanks was tendered to Lady Somerset for her pleasing, earnest and inspired reading of the president's address.

In response Lady Henry Somerset said:

"Madam President and Friends: I thank you for the courtesy that allows me a moment, at the close of this address, that I would rather not have disturbed by a single word of mine, but I feel that there is a remark that is laid upon my heart to make to you and one that I feel sure will find an echo in yours.

"Miss Willard has stated in her address that it was that bereavement which we have all shared with her that has for a time, at any rate, impaired her health. I would like emphatically from my own knowledge to correct that statement. Miss Willard had been suffering for months and months, before she knew it, from the effects of the long strain of years of work and anxiety which would have borne down a far stronger physique than hers.

"She has been living upon her vital energies far too long. What she needs now is the recuperation of those energies that will return to her, we believe, God willing, absolutely unimpaired and I know that in appealing to this constituency I am speaking as to one heart, one feeling, one great mother love that has been extended for so many years to the leader of this great movement.

"The world appreciates Miss Willard, the women of the world owe her a debt of gratitude and they know and glory in the love that has upheld her hand so long, and they feel that that love is not wanting to her at this hour.

"I speak to you because I know you share with me a deep anxiety, but I wish to tell you that there is hope for all who love her in the absolute certainty that if she will follow the prescription that has been laid down for her, a prescription by no means easy to such a brain and such a heart, and if you will help her to carry out that prescription, I believe that we can speak with a certainty, as far as any human events are concerned, that she will be given back to you with completely restored health and strength.

"It is a great difficulty to her to rest. Many women since I landed on this shore have come to me with the natural question, 'Why cannot Miss Willard rest upon our shores where we would have her within hail and see her face and reach out to her now and then?' Just for that reason. So many would reach out; just one want would be brought to her, just one question that she must settle, that rest would be impossible for her and only the faithful friend of all these, the trusted Anna Gordon, knows as I know how hard a task we have in a place in which she is severed by the great ocean from interests which are as dear to her as life, how great a task we have to make her rest, and how impossible would be the task if she were within hail and reach.

"I thank you for the courtesy that has allowed me to make this explanation, because it may be thought, and with a great deal of truth, that it is perhaps the selfishness of the English women who have learned to love and prize her as you love and prize her, that keeps her a captive over there."

Mother Wallace offered a fervent prayer, after which three foreign friends were introduced. Among these was the Archbishop of Zante, Greece, who paid an eloquent tribute to the work of women in the United States. He prefaced and closed his brief address by these words, first pronounced in his native tongue and then in English: "It is not Jew or Greek, it is not free or slave, it is not a male or female, for all are equal before the Almighty God, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ." He was followed by Swami Vivekananda, the Hindoo monk, and Mr. Gandtie from Bombay, India, who were representatives to the World's Parliament of Religions. Each spoke briefly of the drink evil, paining the hearts of their listeners for the shame that at the doors of Christian civilization lies the forging of those chains which the Christian women of the world are striving to break asunder.

The Convention then adjourned.

WEDNESDAY AFTERNOON.

Devotional exercises were conducted by Mrs. Henry. This session was devoted chiefly to the hearing of superintendents' reports, nine in number. As these were given at some length in THE DAILY, they cannot be entirely repeated here.

The first was by Mrs. Catherine W. McCulloch, superintendent of legislation and petition. Mrs. McCulloch outlined in a most intelligent and direct way the methods of procedure in securing desired legislation, which, abbreviated, are:

First, understand the differences between constitution and statutes, and do not imagine that the legislature can grant everything, even full suffrage. Second, be sure the bill is technically correct; drawn not by some volunteer stripling of a lawyer, however good-hearted, but by the ablest lawyer in the state. Then you will not be bankrupted by test cases nor worried later by adverse judicial decisions. Third, put your bill in along the first days of the session so that the lawmakers cannot excuse non-action by complaining of lack of time. Fourth, try to have it referred to a committee which will not smother it, and if possible, to one which will give a favorable report. Ask the committees to allow your advocates to appear before them early and urge immediate action. Fifth, in the meantime, every member of both houses should be interviewed, lists kept whether each is favorable, hopeful, doubtful or hopeless. Sixth, just as quick as you know who are hopeful and doubtful, start the letters and petitions rolling in, arranging so that each legislator shall receive some, and that some petitions are presented every day. Seventh, have the constituents come to the capitol to urge on their representatives the justice of the measure. Eighth, watch the daily calendar to see that your bill is not slipped off by mistake (?) of the clerk, and when it slips, write or talk to the speaker, the governor, the leaders of the parties and have things well stirred up around the state house until the bill is found. Ninth, after it is through one house, just as careful watching is necessary for the next.

In printing the report of the department of Franchise, we regret that the well-known name of its superintendent was incorrectly given. It is Dr. Louise C. Purington, instead of Lucy C. Purrington as stated in THE DAILY. Dr. Purington's report was a comprehensive glance over the entire field, divided into states. "The pen must be swift, indeed," she said, "that would chronicle the growth and the gains towards governmental equality in this year of our Lord, 1893. The subject commands public attention, and the advocates have a hearing as never before. . . . . From the Atlantic to the Pacific and back again, the tide rises, until just now it reaches the highest point midway in the continent; first, in Colorado, second, in Kansas."

Mrs. Hannah J. Bailey uttered strong words for her department—peace and arbitration. She said:

People have been so long accustomed to consider the life of a soldier as one of glory that they are quite unmindful of the fact that nowhere does a man encounter so many temptations as when entering upon military service; indeed, we doubt if one in a hundred of our American citizens ever considered the subjects of war and intemperance as being in any way kindred. But that these two are twin evils, facts point out only too plainly. During our last war, the United States government dealt out rations of liquor to the soldiers on long or forced marches, and alcohols were used in the army hospitals. Thus many men who went to the war sober returned with appetites that have led thousands to drunkards' graves. The soldiers are likewise tempted when not in active service. The United States government permits the sale of intoxicating drinks upon its own territory where its soldiers are stationed, even in our prohibition states.

We have many encouragements. The very successful Peace Congress, at which our department was represented by your superintendent and three delegates; the settlement by arbitration of the Behring sea controversy; the manifest increased desire of people to become acquainted with methods of settling difficulties in this way, are all encouraging features.

The World's Fair is, we believe, a promulgator of Peace. When representatives of all nations meet together in harmony and become acquainted and interested in each other they surely cannot fail to have a desire to avoid controversy.

Mrs. Anna M. Hammer presented the report of her important department—parlor meetings—by states, and concluded with the following recommendations:

1. Each state, district, county and local should appoint a superintendent of each department; each superintendent should keep herself in communication with the officer next to herself.

2. Study new features and methods; become acquainted with your department.

3. Report! Report! Report! Keep an account of meetings held and members, honorary members and well-wishers (on a paying basis) gained.

4. Make it a point this year to hold some parlor meetings, inviting the women whom you wish to interest. Let us try as never before, to get the cultured, intelligent women of our churches to join us.

5. Send to the W. T. P. A., the Temple, in Chicago, Ill., for literature of the various departments. As our aim is to advance all lines, their literature supplies our needs.

Mrs. Esther Tuthill Pritchard said concerning her department—proportionate and systematic giving:

Our department is organized solely with reference to white-ribboners, but it places us alongside an increasing number of kindred agencies that are seeking to promote God's plan of finance. The front line of the general movement for a pure and adequate treasury is rapidly extending, and the indications are that uniform action will soon be secured on the part of women's missionary boards in favor of Scriptural giving, as opposed to irregular, inadequate and unspiritual methods. If such action is germane to their cause it is equally germane to ours, and as closely related to the interests of the work as the treasury itself. Three influential women's foreign missionary boards have taken steps in this direction within the past six months. The membership of two of these is mainly in the South, and we hope their agitation of the subject will facilitate the introduction of our department into more of the Southern states. But the most important event of the year in connection with this movement is the action of the late World's Woman's Missionary Conference held in this city. It appointed a committee of three of which your superintendent is chairman, to formulate a plan of work suited to the adoption of all the boards for the promotion of systematic beneficence.

By permission Mrs. Pritchard asked that all the delegates who are in the habit of proportionate giving would stand, upon which about one-fourth of the delegates arose.

Mrs. Margaret Watts presented an excellent report of police station work, of which the following is part:

In giving the report of my department, my difficulty lies in too much material, rather than too little, from which to gather facts. The Constitution of the American Institute of Christian Sociology gives the correct aim of this undertaking. Until the races of men are far in advance of the present condition of human affairs, this momentous work will go on.

The object is: 1. To claim for the Christian law the ultimate authority to rule social practice. 2. To study in common how to apply the truths and principles of Christianity to the social and economic difficulties of the present time. 3. To present Christ in practical life as the living Master and King; the enemy of wrong and selfishness; the power of righteousness and love.

The experiment has proved so beneficial that cities that are trying to perfect a good system of municipal control, urge that matrons be a part of the police staff where women and children are brought under arrest.

The chiefs of police favor the movement, and one writes: "It relieves our officers from the execution of many unpleasant and delicate duties, the necessity of which has not been generally understood, and the performance of which has been criticised." Another writes: "We certainly ought to have women to take charge of women. It is not a pleasant duty to search women; we would be glad to turn such cases over to women."

Mrs. Sarah McClees said, in concluding her interesting verbal report on work among soldiers and sailors:

Our government helps to make drunkards and helps to make possible all kinds of vice, but you will be glad to know that through this department of soldiers and sailors efforts have been made and a legislation has been secured at Washington to prevent what has been called the canteen system, and now when the very best men of our army are prevented from saying what they know to be fact, they look to us as an organization to spread the knowledge of these facts that we may let the world know what is going on, and this we are doing. We have never before done such work for the seamen as we have done for the last year, and it has been done by means of the so-called loan libraries which have been furnished to thirty ships which I have visited myself and made acquaintance with the captains.

The report on securing homes for homeless children was read by Miss Kimball, department lecturer, as the superintendent, Mrs. Margaret Merrill, was absent. The object of this work was stated to be the seeking out of children needing homes, and the homes ready to receive them. Fourteen state unions are now committed to this beneficent and beautiful work.

Most careful investigation is made as to the fitness of the home before entrusting the child to it, and friendly relations to both afterwards by visiting and correspondence are required. The legal adoption of the child is to be secured whenever possible, the younger the better, that no recollections of desertion, neglect or abuse overshadow the future. Special efforts are made to secure the permanent home at a distance from birthplace, or early unhappy surroundings. Coöperation is sought with existing children's relief societies, benefiting by their experience, adopting or improving upon their methods, while aiding to secure the family home for their little ones.

Mrs. Mary C. Upham read her report of work among lumbermen, from which we excerpt one paragraph:

Do these men read the literature sent them? Yes, many letters every winter testify that they do, and they often tell the camp missionaries of their appreciation and gratitude. What do our women send them? Trust a good W. C. T. U. woman how to make up just such a package as were "her own boy" to be the recipient, and to know how many treasures of the sacred sort may be wisely placed in every secular package; many copies of the New Testament and comfort bags, scrap-books and wall pictures and games have been sent in these home packages. Faithful missionaries have carried the gospel message from camp to camp, and in some states the manufacturers and dealers in lumber have helped these women by assisting in his salary. It was the W. C. T. U. women of Michigan who first took up this work for lumber camps, and experience has proved that non-sectarian united efforts alone can make it a success.

After various announcements, among which were the sending of the following telegrams, the Convention adjourned:

To Mrs. Lucy Stone, Dorchester, Mass.;

Be assured of our sympathy, love and loyalty for the cause for which you have given your life. Read 23d Psalm.

To Miss Willard, London, England:

Address received with illimitable love and abiding faithfulness. Read II John, 2d verse; also I Thess., 1, 2, 3.

Adjournment.

WEDNESDAY EVENING.

This proved a highly entertaining session, being devoted to the addresses of welcome and response.

The devotional exercises were conducted by Mrs. Mary T. Lathrap, and a new "Convention Song," written by Katherine Lente Stevenson, was sung by the audience.

As was most fitting, the president of Illinois W. C. T. U., Mrs. Louise S. Rounds, was the first to welcome the Convention. Two fine portions of Mrs. Rounds' address having been reported in last week's UNION SIGNAL, we give here only the introductory paragraphs:

The welcome that I have for you to night, hearty as it is, will be offered with congratulations.

I congratulate this great organization upon the noble fight that it has made during the years of your severe trials; I congratulate you, dear friends and white ribbon comrades, because you are so true to the great purpose that God has implanted in your hearts, to the great principle that is written upon our banners; to the mighty movement that to-day girdles the world in all its majestic work and brings to this city the representatives of so many nations from over the sea.

It is a wonderful work that we are trying to do; it is a marvelous path by which God has led us through these years, and as we round our second decade we can say, "Surely goodness and mercy have followed us all the days of our lives."

I congratulate you, dear friends of this great white ribbon army, that we are clamoring—justly too—for our political rights, that we have given with no uncertain sound our influence, our voice and all the power that we possess towards the culmination of the objective point which we hope to reach, which is the prohibition of the liquor traffic, and when I say that I want to say one thing more, that we would not be true to these principles, true to our demand for justice, true to the desire we have for equal political rights did we not stand in heart and hand with that party which of all the parties alone has promised to give woman the ballot. And so I say to-night that the Prohibition party and the W. C. T. U. are banded together for the consummation of our desires.

The second speaker was chosen with equal propriety, being the president of the Chicago Central W. C. T. U., Mrs. M. B. Carse. Mrs. Carse gave special greeting to the Convention, to Lady Henry Somerset and to the three brave round-the-world missionaries, and welcomed them all, not only to Chicago, but to the World's Fair and the Temperance Temple, concerning the true mission of which she said:

To a true white-ribboner every stone and every brick in it means an answered prayer, and its turrets pointing heavenward are a constant protest against the accursed liquor traffic. We welcome you to it. We would ask you to enter it. It has inscribed upon its front portals W. C. T. U., on its great heavy corner-stone W. C. T. U., and over its Willard Hall are the words chosen by our own leader to be cut in the stone there, "NOT WILLING THAT ANY SHOULD PERISH." We want you to enter that beautiful corridor, we want you to note the names of your unions, we want you to go into the auditorium and see the names of loved ones all about you, we want you to feel at home there, and know that there is a blessed place where God dwells, and where souls are continually being saved.

Her last thought was:

Many of you have seen the statue which represents Chicago, the Chicago which is called "I will";—a sturdy young woman stands forth strong, independent and with astride, says "I will." That is Chicago, for whatever Chicago wills she does. Now, dear sisters, what the W. C. T. U. wants and every woman wants to-night is to say "I will." But let "I will" go beside God's will; and with that spirit of "I will" and God's will, we will conquer, and the time will come I trust when you shall be welcomed to Chicago and this traffic shall have been swept from its fair face, and I trust from the face of the world.

After the inspiring song, "Victory," by Mrs. Harris, Mrs. Emily Huntington Miller, at present dean of the Woman's College in Evanston, Ill., and formerly a prominent leader in our work, delivered the following interesting address:

I have been asked to relate to this representative body of the W. C. T. U. some facts which pertain to its birth and its beginnings—that part of our history which we are all compelled to take on the testimony of others. I deplore the insufficiency of my recollection; if I could but have known nineteen years ago what a royal young existence was beginning, how carefully I should have treasured every smallest circumstance of the hour. But, if poets are born and not made, it must be true in a higher sense of prophets, and seers have never been in a majority in this world. Now and then a woman has the prophetic instinct to see down the ages, and understand that what seems trivial and unimportant to-day, will to-morrow be of thrilling import and she keeps journals and puts events on record and wins the everlasting gratitude of the historian of the future.

It was at Chautauqua in the summer of 1874 that there began to be a W. C. T. U. It was the first season of that magnificent inspiration, when only the eye of faith saw the glory of its future.

My companion was Mrs. Jennie F. Willing, and we sat under the grand old trees, and wrote or read or speculated philosophically on the future of the universe. It was there, under those trees, that the first suggestion of the W. C. T. U. stirred my soul. It was no thought of mine.

Among the great themes of which we discoursed was the work of the Crusade, but while we agreed upon the necessity of in some way gathering up and concentrating the forces that had been set in motion, it was Mrs. Willing who pressed the point of then and there laying the foundation for a National organization. The time seemed to her ripe for action, the opportunity most propitious, since representative women from every section were sure to be present, while the place would give the movement at once a prestige, and a rallying point for the future.

I was faint-hearted and doubtful, having a wholesome awe of the Assembly's great head, and not quite daring to borrow his hammer to drive a nail in another enterprise. But of course I yielded to the determination of one who has been said to be the only woman who invariably saw the end from the beginning, though it seems tolerably certain that she did not foresee the end of this beginning. Meantime, the same thought and purpose had awakened in other hearts. The women of Ohio were there in force, still thrilling from the wonderful experiences of the Crusade, and all alert to seize the next thing that promised advance. Among their leaders I remember, by name only, Mrs. Ingham, of Cleveland, and her sister, Miss James, Mrs. Mattie McClellan Brown, and one or two others, but the temperance prayer-meeting was fervid with earnest petitions for guidance; petitions, it has been said, directly answered by the inspiration sent to the heart of Mrs. Brown to then and there organize a National Society. Who can tell to whom the Lord spoke first, or whether His message came at the same time to many hearts? I only know that it first came to me through Mrs. Willing, and that the thought of organization once broached, the work was pushed vigorously. The women from each state were brought into conference; plans of work and basis of union were prayed over, discussed, sometimes very spicily sparred over, but in the end concord reigned, and all things were ready for the public meeting.

It was called in the big tent, and I am sure it rained—I have an ineffaceable impression of the flapping canvas let down against the torrents; this, however, would argue nothing in the way of disapproval, since nearly everything at Chautauqua has in its turn been rained on. The tent was well filled; Mrs. Jennie F. Willing was made chairman and I secretary, and after a service of prayer one woman was appointed from each state represented to act as a committee of organization, and arouse and interest the workers. To this committee was left the exact date of the National Convention, which it was voted should be held in Cleveland in November. This convention was to be made up of delegates, one from each congressional district, elected by the local temperance leagues, and a circular calling it and setting forth its purposes was ordered to be issued by the chairman and secretary. A collection of $19.75 to pay for printing and postage was taken on the spot, and I had in my possession until very recently the names of the eighteen women whose subscriptions sent out this first call to the hosts—24,000 circulars.

Mrs. Willing and I started homeward, and wrote the circular on the train, she writing one and I another, and then probably compromising our disagreements, if we had any, as the man and his wife did their difference in regard to the cotton sheets, which he preferred, or the linen, which the wife considered the only wear—they compromised on linen. It was decided that I should attend to the printing and sending it out. My boys of ten and twelve folded, enclosed and sent out every one of the circulars. East and west, north and south, the little yellow-cased missions sped their way, finding a place sometimes with words of hearty approval, sometimes, no doubt, with contempt, which thought it could still afford to give so weak an adversary a chance, and so the new forces that were marshalling to take the field announced their muster by this brave bugle call.

In spite of failures and disappointments, this never conquering-army had better right to take up the pæan—"Sing ye to the Lord for he hath triumphed gloriously!" Therefore, in behalf of the homes for whose peace and purity you have waged holy war—in behalf of the homeless for whom you are making possible that blessed shelter—in behalf of a purer manhood, a nobler womanhood, a holier childhood, I bid you hail and God-speed.

Rev. Carlos Martyn, pastor of the Sixth Presbyterian church of Chicago, gave the final address of welcome. Among many good things he said:

Madam and Ladies: Standing upon this platform to-night, I feel a little like a mullen stalk planted in a bed of roses. On a certain occasion Daniel Webster was asked to write his name in an album under that of John Adams, and he responded in the following:

"If by his name I write my own
'Twill take me where I am not known.
The cold salute will meet my ear,
Pray, stranger, how did you come here?"

And now I imagine that some of you are saying, "Pray, Mr. Blackcoat, how did you come on this platform in this gracious presence to-night?"

Well, I wish to say that I am here in the name of the Christian sentiment of our city, I desire to extend to you, representing as you do the reformatory movement of our country, a most hearty greeting, a most cordial welcome, and to give to you the freedom of Chicago.

We who represent the churches of Chicago are especially glad that you have come, because we see in your coming the most efficient reinforcement that could possibly come to our society in the great war which we are waging against the world, the flesh and the devil. Strange that man should have been content, for ages and ages, to go blundering along the path of reform with this gracious and efficient helper, woman, just at hand. Well, thank God, those old, sad nightmare days are gone, and we have reached an age which begins, at any rate, to see that there is profound philosophy, not only in so far as marriage is concerned, but in so far as politics, and in so far as social reform are concerned in those lovely lines of Tennyson's.

"He is the half part of a blessed whole left to be finished by such as she."

And now as the men and women come together in this crusade for God and Home and Every Land we hear sounding above their heads the words of Jesus, "What God hath joined together let not man put asunder."

Miss Lillian Phelps, organizer for the Dominion W. C. T. U. was the first speaker to respond to the welcomes. This she did in an eloquent, graceful speech, of which we give two paragraphs:

We are here to-day to thank God that as in the eleventh century the Crusade awakened the chivalry of that age, so the Crusade of this century awakened and aroused the womanhood of this age. We are here to thank God for the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, for what it has been able to do, that it has awakened the church, that it has alarmed the consolidated liquor interests, that it has startled the politicians until with this gigantic liquor monster on their hands and the agitation of the people uneasy lies the head that seeks for office. We are here to-night to be glad and grateful for our round-the-world missionaries. We are here to be glad for the splendid vindication of truth in India, for the splendid heroism of the two women who have awakened the world to awful truth and righteousness, who have stirred the keystone of a woman's life and who have set in motion that woman's life around the world, for to touch the mainspring of a woman's life in India means to set in motion the sacred interests of woman the world around.

And so, friends, because of the fact that the Woman's Christian Temperance Union has awakened so many opportunities for women, has spread its wondrous influence around the world, the Canadian branch of the W. C. T. U. is here to-night simply to thank you and to have a part in the great concourse that is for the bettering of the interests of the race. We are here to accept this greeting that we have heard to-night as all our own.

The concluding address was spoken by Mrs. Mary H. Hunt, of Boston, who delighted her audience with frequent sallies of wit as well as choice sentences of wisdom, as witness a few extracts:

We are very glad to be here and to be welcomed; and we appreciate what it is to be welcomed in Chicago this 18th day of October, this year of our Lord and of the World's Fair, 1893. Why, it is a rare host, that after having had company, day after day and week after week and month after month, to welcome such a crowd as we are to their city. This is a marvelous city, only Chicago could have done it. We are very glad to have come, we know you have had a good deal of company, as you have already said, and you have invited these guests from everywhere under the sun, to air, here on these platforms, every theology, every philosophy, every reform, theories, hobbies, isms, fads, everything, and you have not only granted them the hall and the pages of your popular press but the accompaniment of your steam engines! Never were we welcomed before. Why, the steam throats of these gines seem to vie with the throats of these orators w holding forth their wisdom. . . . . n are like Mrs. Stowe's Old Town Folks, we are a very termined set, and then we have views like those pl and what are those views? Well, we are pretty well vinced—I will not put it so problematically as that— are entirely convinced that theory, that science, that perience has proven alcohol to be a poison, to be an jury to the body, an injury to character and destruct of life, and we want every one to be converted to views, and that is why we are here, Madam President, a our methods are various. . . . And the fore, we have our department of scientific temperance struction in public schools, we have already to-day t teen million children in these United States under te perance education laws and we know that as those cl dren are trained and taught there will come a day and it not so very far off, those eleven-years-old in the sch to-day who are being trained to abhor alcohol—why imagine I can see the dawning of the morning when th boys shall come to their majority and shall wipe this thi from the face of the earth.

The benediction was pronounced by Rev. Dr. Cra and the Convention adjourned.

THURSDAY MORNING.

After devotional exercises by Mrs. Mollie McGee Snel of Mississippi, and the singing of the sweet hymn, "Abide with me," the announcement of the death of Mrs. Lucy Stone was made, and in commemoration of that sad event, at the suggestion of Mrs. Fessenden, the business of the morning was postponed a few moments and "We shall meet beyond the river," was softly sung.

The special order of the day, the report of the Temperance Temple, was then taken up, and Mrs. Carse read the following paper:

The Woman's Temperance Building Association was incorporated July 15, 1887, six years ago. It took three years to work the plan up so as to secure the best business site possible, to arrange proper plans and specifications, and, above all to get white-ribboners interested so that their interest might culminate around one great center, which they themselves were to be the chief factors in securing. But the greatest work of all was to find men and women sufficiently large-hearted to be willing to subscribe $600,000 worth of stock, giving the W. C. T. U. the privilege of purchasing it back any time within twelve years by paying par value and five per cent per annum for the use of the money. This was accomplished within three years. November 1, 1891, the corner-stone of the building was laid. The Chicago press spoke of it as a wonderful work. One of the great dailies in speaking of the procession, said: "Nothing like it has ever passed through the streets of Chicago."

May, 1892, the building was completed and ready for occupancy. It was entirely paid for, with the exception of $50,000; the building cost $1,250,000. This includes ground rent while building, and taxes and interest on bonds during that time. The estimates of the architects gave assurance that the building would not cost more than $1,100,000, but the building committee changed some of the plans, incurring a much larger expenditure than we first anticipated; besides, the $600,000 worth of bonds issued on the building could not be disposed of at par as we had hoped, on account of a depression in stocks and bonds at the time our bonds were issued. This involved a loss of $30,000; consequently there is a floating debt of $50,000 on the building, which we are gradually liquidating from the income from the rentals. Our rent roll would now foot up over $175,000, had it not been for the financial panic which the country is passing through. This has caused the canceling of $10,000 of our leases through the failure of lessees. If business had continued as good as last year, our annual rental by this time, no doubt, would amount to $200,000. When all the offices are rented, it is expected it will foot up $220,000. The expense of running the building the past year has been very heavy on account of so many moving in at once, and frequent alterations in the amount of space needed being necessary. Once the building is full and rented on long leases (as ours is), the cost, no doubt, will be much lessened.

The expenditure for the first year, including these alterations, has been $143,000. I will now report the status of the gift fund, and hope that no one will confuse it with the one I have given above in regard to the Building Association.

From the report of Miss S. G. Johnson, financial secretary of the Board of Trustees for the Temple Gift Fund, I find the receipts for the eleven months of the present year ending October 1, 1893, to be $21,371.17. Besides this, we have received from Rev. and Mrs. Watson Tranter, of Chicago, a deed for five suburban lots in this city, which they will exchange if we so desire, for $1,000 in cash. This increases our receipts to $22,000. The receipts for this month will approximate $3,000. This in round numbers will amount to $25,000 for the year, making the receipts for the gift fund for 1893 as large as those received during 1892. This, in the face of such an unprecedented financial crisis surely is a most encouraging showing.

The five states that gave the largest amount this year are as follows:

	UNIONS	PERSONAL
Illinois	$1,364.51	$2,341.07	$3.705,58
New York	2,274.38	504.88	2,879.26
Pennsylvania	1,416.70	466.32	1,883.02
Ohio	893.26	343.70	1,236.96
Massachusetts	630.93	581.84	1,212.77

This seems like a brave showing, but, when you consider the vast number of local unions in these states, the percentage that has given $100 is very small. For instance, New York has only twenty-one unions on her tablet that have paid $100, out of 920 local societies; Ohio but 20 unions out of her 900; Pennsylvania but 15 out of 828; Illinois does better, of the 772 unions in the state, 36 have paid $100; Massachusetts does still better, out of her 350 unions, 19 have paid their quota of $100. I call attention to this matter because it is claimed by some that the unions are despoiling themselves for the Temple. I believe the very opposite is true; that it imparts new life and strength to every union that has undertaken the work. Only 202 unions have paid $100, which demonstrates the fact that, of the $102,000 received from the gift fund, about $75,000 was the gift of individuals and $27,000 the gift of unions. If our entire 10,000 auxiliaries could be persuaded to raise $100 beside the $1,000,000 it would bring into the Temple, it would prove of untold good in unifying our workers. It is of great value to any organization to have a great central object around which the interest of all centres.

The entire amount received in gifts since the starting of the enterprise to October 1st is $102,618. We want our friends to realize that this money has come voluntarily. All we have done so far to secure funds for the project has been to make a general appeal through our National organ, THE UNION SIGNAL, and at the National Conventions through our annual report. The time to make a general and aggressive movement to secure money did not seem propitious until the beginning of the present year. It was necessary before going to the general public and asking for stated sums from individuals of large means to be able to say: The Temperance Temple is not a dream, but a splendid reality. It is built and occupied, and already demonstrates the fact that it will pay a handsome income on the investment. The W. C. T. U. already hold the controlling interest of the stock, $306,000, with the privilege of purchasing the balance. It was also necessary, before approaching business men to ask for their assistance, to give them the most unqualified assurance of the stability of the enterprise; hence, a meeting of a few of the leading business men and clergymen of Chicago was called for November 12, 1892, to investigate the whole enterprise, and, if found to be on a sound financial basis, to give their indorsement of it. These gentlemen gave the whole plan a thorough sifting. In cases where they could not be present, they were represented by their lawyers. Their verdict, which appeared in THE UNION SIGNAL of February 2, 1893, was a hearty indorsement of the project. The names of men of world-wide celebrity, such as Mr. George M. Pullman, Mr. P. D. Armour and Hon. Thomas B. Bryan, vice-president of the World's Columbian Exposition, were attached to the document.

All things now seemed ready for an onward movement to speedily secure a large fund to buy up the entire interest owned by all outside parties in the Temple.

At a Temple trustees' meeting held last November, just before Miss Willard and Lady Henry Somerset left for England, it was decided to engage Rev. Watson Tranter as financial agent for the Temple. He was to begin work as soon after the first of January as possible. This he did with great enthusiasm. We sent out thousands of letters to the clergy of the country, and received most friendly replies. Mr. Tranter had no doubt but what he could raise $300,000 by June, the time we were then planning to have the Temple dedicated. In the midst of his work, and just after I had left for California to recruit a worn out body, the attack upon myself and the Temple management, which you all know so well about, was sent broadcast over the land. By this means Mr. Tranter was defeated in his efforts to secure funds, and had to stop work to allow the storm to pass by. Owing to illness and distance from home, it was several weeks before I could return and get ready my reply to the charges made. Again we were about to commence the campaign; in fact, I had myself secured several pledges of $5,000 each, when the terrible financial cyclone, from which we are still suffering, swept over the country. It seemed madness to continue the work under the circumstances. And so we stand biding God's time with a faith and courage undaunted. As soon as the tide of prosperity again is in the ascendant, we will commence the work where we left off with renewed vigor.

Our plan, which may be modified more or less, is as follows:

4	persons	to	subscribe	each	$50,000	$200,000
20	"	"	"	"	5,000	100,000
50	"	"	"	"	3,000	150,000
100	"	"	"	"	2,000	200,000
100	"	"	"	"	1,000	100,000
100	"	"	"	"	500	50,000
2,000	"	"	"	"	100	200,000
	This gives a grand total of—					$1,000,000

These different classes of subscribers will not be asked to pay until all the names of the class in which they subscribe have been secured, unless they elect so to do themselves. I cannot in this brief report explain the different plans we intend to follow to secure the million of money desired, but that we shall get it within the next two years, I am as certain as though I had it in my hand this moment. The world is our field; the people of all lands will be allowed the privilege of giving, for it is to be a World's as well as a National building. Only a few months ago, our beloved leader, Miss Willard, wrote me that as soon as it was possible, she and Lady Somerset would help us by holding mass-meetings to raise money for the Temple; and, besides these two great leaders of England and America, numerous other noble and talented women are ready when the time is again propitious to enter the campaign.

To you, dear white-ribboners, who by your sympathy, material aid, and prayers, so nobly sustained me during the past winter when my honesty and integrity were so cruelly assailed, I have not words sufficient to express to you my love and gratitude. I ask you, my sisters, to trust me still a little longer, for sooner than you dream, our "House Beautiful" will be paid for; until then, it will not be dedicated. Believe me, One mighty to deliver stands at the helm of this great enterprise, no weapon framed by man can overthrow it; they who desire to do it, count without their host. As good Hezekiah of old said of the Mighty King of Assyria, "With him is an arm of flesh," but with us is the Lord, our God, to help us, and to fight our battles.

For several hours after the reading of this report, an earnest, spirited discussion was engaged in by both sides of "the Temple question," as it is frequently styled. [This discussion was given verbatim in THE DAILY UNION SIGNAL of October 19 and 20, copies of which may still be obtained at this office for five cents each.] Lack of space prevents the full report in these columns, but we will furnish sufficient remarks on each side to indicate the character of the discussion, which was well sustained and courteous beyond all criticism. The preparations for the discussion were of themselves interesting. The motion that all questions be sent to the desk in writing was lost, that there be no applause was carried, as was also the one that the Temple trustees take their seats upon the platform, so that no time be lost in making their way thither after they were called. The preliminaries being arranged the discussion was opened as follows. [The form of the stenographic report will be observed.]

MRS. FORBES: What relation does the board of women, known as the Temple trustees, hold to the W. C. T. U. and what power have they in Temple affairs?

MRS. CARSE: I would be very glad to reply but I should prefer that some of the trustees themselves would answer that. I would ask Mrs. Lathrap to answer it.

MRS. LATHRAP: The National W. C. T. U. has declined, from the first, organically to take responsibility for the erection of the building known as the Temple. From the first, individual members and individual unions and state organizations have trusted Mrs. Carse as their trustee, and upon her individual call have paid into her hands for the purpose of erecting this Temple, $102,000.

Mrs. Carse, up to the time that the Temple trustees were organized, stood as the sole trustee chosen by the women that gave the money and not by the National W. C. T. U. The people that paid the money had the right to choose Mrs. Carse as their trustee; they had the right to put confidence in her; they had the right to give her the money to build that Temple if they wanted to and as long as the National W. C. T. U. would not or felt that it could not even make Mrs. Carse their trustee, there was no way only to make her the trustee of the donors. That is where she is to-day.

When some doubt was thrown on the enterprise, in the city of Boston, and some questions arose that at that time were troublesome and needed to be answered, Mrs. Carse, at her own request, associated with herself, which was perfectly legal under the laws of the state of Illinois, a company of women that it was supposed the women of the W. C. T. U. had confidence in, as well as herself.

It was done under the advice of a lawyer in this city and it was said that she could do that kind of thing and thereby not stand single-handed and responsible alone for the funds that came into her hands.

They were constituted a board of Temple trustees. They had not up to this time been incorporated and therefore, it has been an association rather than a legal trusteeship, but the incorporation papers are in the hands of the lawyer and by the time of the noontide hour of prayer we shall be legally incorporated.

The relation that we hold to the W. C. T. U. as a body and an organization is the relation of doing the thing that you would not do.

We are trustees for every woman that has ever given five cents; we are trustees for every union that has ever given one hundred dollars; we are trustees for the gift fund of $102,000, and we are responsible to nobody except the women and the men and the boys and the girls who have given the money.

I want to correct an impression that has been in the minds of some of the women of this country, namely, that we control the Temple; that we had to do with its rentals and with the finishing up of the building and the taking care of the Temple itself. I want to say that we have nothing to do with that.

You have found that Mrs. Carse this morning clearly divided her report, giving to you in the first place the status of the Temple under the control of the Woman's Temperance Building Association. Then she gave to you the status of the Trust Fund, which is in the hands of the Woman's Board of Trustees.

We have nothing to do with the conduct of the Temple. That is done in that body that was organized to build it, and they will control it until such time as we buy the stock in and become possessors of it ourselves.

What we do is to stand associated with Mrs. Carse to relieve her of entire responsibility, help her as we may by our influence, and control the gift fund which is entrusted to us by the women and the men who give it.

MRS. FORBES: May I ask the question, when was this Board of Trustees appointed and by whom?

MRS. CARSE: They serve until the building is paid for and handed over to the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

MRS. FORBES: By whom are they appointed?

MRS. CARSE: By themselves; they appoint themselves; if any one falls out they will themselves vote who shall fill the vacancy.

MRS. FORBES: Who appointed them at first? I may be very obtuse this morning; but I do not quite understand.

MRS. CARSE: Matilda B. Carse appointed them at first.

MRS. FORBES: I am merely asking because I want to know, because trustees are usually appointed by somebody and they usually have a term of office, and they are usually responsible, or els the word "trustee" is not the right word to use, and I really want to know, that is all.

MRS. CARSE: I am sure Mrs. Forbes wishes to know and I am very glad to explain, but I think that Mrs. Lathrap has explained it very fully this morning, and just this morning I have requested the pages to hand to each one of you my defense to the attack made on me last winter, in which that is all clearly told.

MRS. FORBES: I ask if this board of trustees, as they were appointed by Mrs. Carse, if they have any financial responsibility whatever?

MRS. CARSE: I call on Mr. Moses, who is our lawyer, and who is present, to answer Mrs. Forbes' question.

Consent was given Mr. Moses that he answer the question.

MR. MOSES: I will briefly explain as far as I understand the situation. I, as a lawyer, have nothing to do with the original organization of the Temple trustees, but it is a very simple thing. Mrs. Carse appointed herself the custodian of money—it might be a misnomer to call it a trustee but it does no harm to call her a trustee, because every person who sends her money appoints her a trustee for that gift, so it is by the approval and approbation of every donor that her trusteeship became approved.

In view, then, as I understand it, of adverse criticism, she thought it prudent and I thought it was a very wise act on her part to gather around her the advisory board of other women to stand by her and to watch her, if you please. So they constituted themselves a board of trustees, call them custodians of money voluntarily given by men and women all over the United States and foreign countries, if you please. And again, every donor that sent money to these eleven ladies approved of their trusteeship, or custodianship, as appointed. When the matter came to my attention at the request of the ladies, I advised that in order to hush and silence adverse criticism that they should simply organize under the laws of the state of Illinois. That had been commenced some four months ago, and the papers were drawn and signed, but not entirely; it was owing to the absence of Miss Willard, I believe, or Lady Somerset, that the matter was delayed and it is now being completed. They will then assume a legal organization under the laws of the state of Illinois, and they will have the money in their own possession. When the entire sum is collected, they will pay for the Temple and then it is intended to present the Temple to the National organization. Now, that is a very plain, brief story and most anybody, I think, could understand it.

MRS. ROUNDS: I would like to ask why this board of Temple trustees was not called an advisory board from the beginning? We have heard from the lawyer that it was a misnomer. Now, lawyers ought not to make such mistakes as that. If it was an advisory board, only, why was it not so stated? That is one question. Another, Madam President, while I am on my feet, is, When were the corporation papers ordered? It is not more than four days since we heard that this board of trustees held no legal status whatever. Now we hear that they are going to be incorporated before the noontide hour of prayer.

MR. MOSES: I think I could answer this lady, that she is laboring under a misapprehension. There is a distinction between a legal organization and a person legally responsible for the custody of the money. Each lady here is legally responsible for the custodianship of this money whether they are organized under the laws of the state of Illinois or not. Their action can be approved by the donor. It is only a better organization to be legally organized, and that was my advice. The original organization was not my child, it was the child of some other lawyer in the city of Chicago. It was by reason of that action that certain adverse criticism arose, and for the purpose of silencing that adverse criticism it was supposed to be best to give it a legal organization under the laws of the state of Illinois, but they are legally bound to take charge, and keep it holy, your fund gathered, so kindly, by you and your constituency.

MRS. SAUNDERS: Madam President, I would like to have this gentleman explain it to us so that we might know whether the trustees have this property all in their hands, to do with as they please, or whether the National union has an interest in it? The states are paying this money in, and as I understand it, it all goes into the hands of these trustees and the National has nothing to do with it.

MR. MOSES: For the present they will not have anything to do with it.

MRS. SAUNDERS: We have not any lease of our lives. If these trustees are taken away, then the funds that have been contributed by these unions as they suppose to the Temple for the National W. C. T. U. will be gone.

MR. MOSES: The present organization that is about to come into life is entitled under the laws of the state of Illinois to hold personal and real estate, and that will not die, that is a legal organization, for that reason it was advised. Nor will any one's money be in danger so long as these ladies live, and if they all should die by one common calamity, the courts will appoint a trustee.

MRS. ROUNDS: May I ask if this board of trustees or advisory board, more properly speaking, are financially responsible for this entire thing to their private fortune?

THE CHAIRMAN: Lady Henry Somerset will reply to the question of Mrs. Rounds.

LADY HENRY SOMERSET: It is a difficult thing for me to reply to questions that concern the law of other countries, and I would ask to be corrected by the gentleman who is making the statements if I am wrong, but I have belonged to a great many incorporated societies and I believe that it is absolutely true that while the members of the incorporated societies are responsible to the donors, for the funds that are placed in their hands, they are not responsible for anything save dishonest dealing with those funds.

MRS. BENJAMIN: Now, please, Madam President and ladies, if I am wrong I would like to be set right. I understand that these trustees, and I see no objection legally or otherwise, not being a lawyer, to call them trustees—that these trustees, if you please, are custodians of the gift fund only. When we make a gift, if we give it with conditions, those conditions must be met. We should all hail that glad morning when freed from all debt that Temple becomes the property of the National W. C. T. U., but the whole of us together haven't enough faith in it to stand back of it financially. Some of us have contributed our money so far as we are able to; that constitutes the gift fund. Mrs. Carse had no other alternative, she must be the trustee, she must be the custodian, she was the one who conceived the idea and brought it before us. Now, we say, "Here, my friend, we have faith in you, because you have faith in yourself; I will give you $100 to help out on the Temple," and enough were so minded to give $102,000 up to date. Then adverse criticism back yonder led Mrs. Carse to associate with her these other trusted women to see that she did not in any way misappropriate this gift, the sole conditions of which were that the gift should be applied to the liquidation on the Temple. Now, I can't see anything that is not just as plain and just as clear as possible. These women, as I understand it, stand back of this $102,000 to see that it is applied for the purposes named by the donors, simply that and nothing more. Is that correct or not?

MRS. MONROE: The question has been asked that if the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union have no control over these trustees, that it is an organized body, that it has all the power within itself, why is it brought before this organization to be inquired into? I answer, Madam President, that every state president who comes to this National Convention is looked to by her constituency to know the condition of the Temple. And, Madam President, these questions are not asked from any unkindness, it is to get satisfactory answers, and Ohio is loyal to the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and Ohio will carry on any work organized by the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, if we can get the answers to the questions which we desire to ask, which we ask sincerely, all that is desired is to have the information and then if these answers are made plain to us, Ohio stands ready to help finish the Temple. Now, is that question answered? This is why we ask these questions. Now, Madam President, will the donors be responsible in case of insolvency? I ask that question. Do the trustees stand in case of insolvency and not the donors?

MR. MOSES: No, of course not. They give a dollar and their responsibility ends there.

MRS. MONROE: Now, was it by the vote of the Temple trustees that $10,000 of the gift fund was used to furnish Willard Hall?

MRS. CARSE: I will say that you can get it from the trustees themselves. I call on one of the trustees to answer that.

MRS. HOFFMAN: It was by vote of Temple trustees.

MRS. MONROE: It is asked if it was by the vote of the Temple trustees that $10,000 of the gift fund was used to furnish Willard Hall?

MRS. CARSE: There was not one cent spent but what was by vote of the trustees.

MRS. MONROE: Did the Temple trustees vote that fund? I think it is not yet answered.

MRS. HOFFMAN: The answer was, yes. I said, that the Temple trustees did vote that expenditure without a dissenting voice.

MRS. MONROE: In behalf of my constituency I ask other questions. Does the W. C. T. U. stock receive the same dividend as the other stockholders?

MRS. CARSE: I ask Mrs. Dunham to answer that.

MRS. DUNHAM, (of Iowa): Most certainly the W. C. T. U. stock will receive exactly the same dividend as all other stock when a dividend is declared. It stands on exactly the same basis as every other share of stock, no matter by whom held. There has as yet been no dividend declared and when it is declared, let me repeat it, the W. C. T. U. stock will every share of it receive exactly the same dividend as stock held by any one else.

MRS. CAMPBELL: I want to ask how those donors elected Mrs. Carse, whether by ballot, or how?

MR. MOSES: They did not elect her at all. She appointed herself and wherever a lady in Canada or in Massachusetts sent her a dollar that was an approval of her self-appointment; that is very plain.

MRS. CAMPBELL: Were those bonds first or second mortgage bonds, the Temple trust bonds?

MRS. CARSE: They are not at all a bond on the building, they are collateral bonds, and they are secured by the stock; there is no question of first or second mortgage. The stock has been given as collateral. We could not have issued and sold $300,000 worth of bonds unless we had taken our stock and placed it in the American Trust and Savings Bank as collateral for the payment of those bonds.

MRS. CAMPBELL: Who gave Mrs. Carse authority to begin building before she had $500,000 in the bank, to build upon these grounds and put up a building not to exceed $800,000?

MRS. CARSE: I was not bound. You wouldn't stand back of me, you did not make me your trustee or anything else. Another thing, I had $1,200,000 before the building was commenced. I would not think of such a thing as not having enough money to build it, and I made myself personally responsible for $300,000.

MRS. HALL: I would like to ask if there is any personal liability clause for the stockholders.

MR. MOSES: No stockholder under the laws of this state is liable when his stock is paid up.

MRS. NICHOLS: I have simply one very vital question to ask. If we go on putting in contributions to the Temple as members of the W. C. T. U. how soon is it likely that any portion of this sum will come back on the investment?

MRS. STEVENS: As I understand the question, it is, if we do our part, as we are asked to do, as a W. C. T. U., how long will it be before we own the Temple. I say, if the plan as outlined and presented to us by Mrs. Carse this morning is followed out, we will own the Temple in two years. I know that it seems a great time and to many of us nearly impossible, but not nearly so impossible as did the plans which she presented to us five, six and seven years ago, and to think that "brick and stone and mortar fair" have risen as they have, and that the Temple is there is more surprising to us than it will be if the plans which she has proposed this morning should be carried out. As to the coming in of the rental, we cannot tell how long that will be, it will take a long time; we cannot tell how soon all of the Temple will be rented nor just how much it will cost to carry it on, but after the Temple is paid for in two years, as we hope, all of the rentals, after the expenses are paid, will come back to be divided according to the gifts which have been made.

MISS GOODWILL: We have heard that we are to be participators in the dividends. How is it possible then that we are not to be participators in the indebtedness that may result from this matter?

MRS. CARSE: Because I assumed the bonds as a personal matter, because the National would not do it, and the gain is all yours, while if there is loss, it is all mine.

MRS. BURT: Is the money contributed by individuals outside of the W. C. T. U. credited to the W. C. T. U.?

MRS. CARSE: Yes, it is.

MRS. BURT: Is there any W. C. T. U. stock?

MRS. CARSE: No, I don't quite understand. Do you mean held by the W. C. T. U.?

MRS. BURT: By what name does the money which is contributed by unions all over this land, in whose name does it stand?

MRS. CARSE: It stands in the name of the Temple trustees.

MRS. BURT: Do those individuals vote the stock?

MRS. CARSE: No, they appoint one of their number to vote.

MRS. BURT: And who is that one?

MRS. CARSE: It is myself.

MRS. BURT: And is the stock held in the name of Mrs. Matilda B. Carse as an individual or as a trustee?

MRS. CARSE: It was as Mrs. M. B. Carse, as trustee, that I signed the stock.

MRS. BURT: Have you legally qualified before the law as the trustee of this stock?

MRS. CARSE: No; it is not necessary.

MRS. BURT: It is necessary.

MR. MOSES: No, madam, it is not.

MRS. BURT: Then the laws of Illinois differ from the laws of other states.

MR. MOSES: Very likely.

MRS. HAMMER: What about our small unions throughout the states that have six or eight or ten members? Are we to go home and ask them to raise the impossible one hundred dollars, or stand under the stigma of being disloyal?

MRS. HOFFMAN: No union has ever been counted disloyal that did not contribute. This is a voluntary matter. If it is proper for a trustee to ask a question, I will ask, "What do you want to do with the Temple? Do you want to burn it up?"

MRS. WILKINS: What relation does the board of trustees bear to the board of trustees of the association?

MR. MOSES: They are a majority stockholder and control the association, by reason of their majority.

MRS. CARSE: The trustees hold $306,000 worth of the stock of the Woman's Temple Building Association. The stock is $600,000. At our next meeting, which will take place next May, the Temple trustees will have control of the stock, and they can vote and have anything done that they please.

The discussion on the Temple was cut short by adjournment at 12:30.

THURSDAY AFTERNOON.

After the introductory exercises of the afternoon, which consisted of prayer by Mrs. Cranmer and the singing of America, Mrs. S. M. Perkins, of Ohio, extended an invitation for next year's Convention on behalf of the sixteen unions of Cleveland, O. The invitation was heartily seconded by Mrs. Monroe, and referred to the executive committee. [It has since been accepted.]

Lady Henry Somerset was invited to speak upon the Temple, Mrs. Carse's report not having been adopted up to that point.

LADY HENRY SOMERSET: Madam President and Ladies, I thank you very much for the courtesy that is allowed to me, because it is proposed that I stand on this board as a representative of the World's W. C. T. U., if you so please that this arrangement should hold good. It is just from and point of view that I want to say a word to you to-day, that I feel sure my excuse for taking up your time will be the many miles that I have traveled in order to attend this Convention. It seems that all of us generally have some text that brings to us particular comfort. The text that I lean a good deal on at this moment is, that "In heaven there will be no more sea." It seems to me that it will be a comfort to some of us, perhaps, to know that they will see no Temple there. But I would like to say a word to you in this brief space as concisely and as seriously as I can.

The World's W. C. T. U. is now an established fact. The eyes of most of the civilized nations are turned upon this Chicago at this moment; not only are they turned on Chicago, but on that great organization of women that has led the way in this magnificent enterprise of woman's temperance work. And it has riveted them on not only the accounts that have reached us, not only the rumors that have come of all you have accomplished, but especially that you have a building for this enterprise such as no other philanthropic enterprise can boast of in the world (applause). Now, this may seem possibly but a small thing; it may seem to you that it is not of very great weight. I do not want to speak here, and I am not in a position to speak as to whether in the beginning those that advocated the building of the Temple, or those that did not advocate it, were right, but the fact exists that the Temple is built, and when those in England adverse to your work wish to cast a slur and doubt upon it, the argument that is made use of now is just this: "The Temple is a failure. If the Temple is a failure, the W. C. T. U's work is not all that it has been represented to us." That may be to you a most unfair argument, but it is an extremely potent one with those nations whose eyes are fixed upon you.

Is it not possible to put aside those facts that must lead you to form one judgment or another with regard to the scheme, and looking to the fact that it does exist, that it is there, that it stands a monument of all you have accomplished, of all you are, and of all you shall be, you will rally around it now. It does not seem to me that it is possible to say that it detracts from your work, for the sum that is named that has come from local unions has been given for a specific purpose, in many instances possibly by people who would not give had it been for any other object. It is the old cry about foreign missions that they take away from home work, but there are bents of mind that will always go in certain directions, and there are people who will always desire to see a tangible expression of their beliefs, and just as in the old days, the magnificent cathedrals were reared with the expression of the people's faith, so to-day the Temple is the expression of the faith of the temperance women. If you never own it, it still stands a monument to what you have done. You have simply done what no other women have ever attempted to do; and even suppose you, in the long run, did not succeed (and I am absolutely confident you will), it stands alone in the history of the philanthropies of women, and that is an example so potent and so powerful that all over the great metropolis of London now there is beginning to be just that cry: "We women must do the same, and we must also have an expression of the faith that is in us."

I heard that when the lady from Japan came to this country a stranger, no one knowing by what train she would arrive, in the early morning she made her way straight to the Temple, because it was the thing she knew of in her country as being the great gathering ground of the clans. And therefore, if it is possible, seeing that all must be assured of the financial basis upon which it stands, if it is possible, do gather around it the strong, practical sympathy of those who, seeing that it is absolutely undeniable that all its affairs are open and above board, do not consider it mere sentiment; there is such a thing as sentiment that is practical, that is true, and right and proper and not sentimentality, and let us uphold that senti-ment in God's name and humanity's.

After further discussion in which satisfactory light seemed to be thrown upon all the Temple interests, an amendment to the report was offered by Mrs. Fessenden, to the effect that it be stated that the trustees hold for the W. C. T. U. the controlling interest of the stock, instead of the W. C. T. U. holds it. As thus amended the report was adopted and the prolonged debate was ended.

Mrs. Stevens moved that Mrs. Harris be now invited to sing "Victory," to which she smilingly complied.

Mr. J. N. Stearns was introduced and spoke a few cordial words.

The committee on credentials presented its final report, which was adopted as follows:

General officers, 4; vice-presidents, 40; superintendents of departments, 25; National organizers, 8; secretary of Young Woman's Branch, 1; President's private secretary, 1; editors UNION SIGNAL, 2; publisher UNION SIGNAL, 1; chairman standing committee, 1; state secretaries and treasurers, 52; delegates by election, 315; total, 450.

The remainder of the afternoon was devoted to an impressive memorial service in charge of Mrs. Rounds, to the memory of Miss Mary Allen West, Miss Annie Northup, Miss Jennie Casseday, Miss Lois Smith, Mrs. O. B. Gause, Mrs. A. C. Thorpe and Mrs. C. M. Shapleigh, which was fully reported in THE DAILY UNION SIGNAL of October 20.

THURSDAY EVENING.

The program for this evening was undoubtedly the most popular one of the entire Convention. Forty state presidents attired in their "best Sunday-go-to-meeting gowns" is not a sight to greet the eye every day, but forty state presidents successfully condensing an hour's address into a two-minute speech, scintillating with wit and ponderous in wisdom is a feat that is feasible only once a year and that at a National W. C. T. U. Convention. Each year since this feature was introduced, have these worthy officials attempted to substitute something else for this "kindergarten exercise," as Mrs. Lathrap called it, and each time they have met with inglorious defeat. The delegates will have it and that is the end of it.

Space forbids the re-publication of the twenty-six addresses already given in THE DAILY. These were by Mrs. Stevens, of Maine, Mrs. Goodale, of Louisiana, Mrs. Baldwin, of Maryland, Mrs. Munnell, of Kentucky, Mrs. Fessenden, of Massachusetts, Mrs. Smith, of Kansas, Mrs. Lathrap, of Michigan, Mrs. Dunham, of Iowa, Mrs. Calkins, for Indiana, Mrs. Mount, of Mississippi, Mrs. Ingalls, for Missouri, Mrs. Rounds, of Illinois, Mrs. Hammond, for Montana, Mrs. Mitchell, for Idaho, Mrs. Meriwether, of Tennessee, Mrs. Hitchcock, of Nebraska, Mrs. Hill, of Florida, Miss Wendell, of New Hampshire, Mrs. Griffith, District of Columbia, Mrs. Bourne, of New Jersey, Mrs. Stoddard, of Texas, Mrs. Phelps for Delaware, Mrs. Cranmer, of South Dakota, Mrs. Burt, of New York, Miss Preston, of North Dakota, and Mrs. Brown, of Wyoming.

Those crowded out of THE DAILY are as follows:

MRS. HENRIETTA L. MONROE, of Ohio: Madam President and dear friends, you have found out that every president is bound to praise her state, and if the forty presidents on the platform all sung the praises of their states yet Ohio would come out ahead. What would the W. C. T. U in convention now assembled do without Ohio? It comes to Ohio for its recording secretary, to Ohio for its treasurer, to Ohio for its sweet singer who has been charming us all these days in Chicago; Ohio, the home of presidents, the home of generals and statesmen and jurists and poets and men of mighty renown; Ohio women honored of all women since the angel appeared unto men; Ohio, the birthplace of the W. C. T. U.; Ohio, with its Mrs. Eliza J. Thompson and Mother Stewart; Ohio, with its 10,000 membership, with its young men and its Loyal Temperance Legions. Ohio sends its message to its National Convention assembled, to all of the states here assembled, to the World's W. C T. U The apathy and indifference that once was like a spell of death upon Ohio is broken forever.

MRS. CORNELIA FORBES, Connecticut: There are a lot of good people in Ohio. Ohio was settled by Connecticut people, so I am very glad that Mrs. Monroe spoke before I did. I want to praise Connecticut a little bit because she has to make up in quality what she lacks in quantity. I couldn't begin in two minutes to mention all the good people who have been born there and gone to other states to help build them up, but I do want to say that this Connecticut is the home of our beloved Caroline B. Buell, and I am prouder of that than I am of anything else. I can't stop to speak of Lyman Beecher, and Harriet B. Stowe and Mark Twain and all the rest.

In our last legislature we got all we wanted; we were backed by our State Union 4,000 strong; we secured a magnificent scientific temperance education law which Mrs. Hunt says is one of the best upon the statute books of the nation. Then we secured a law requiring that in every city of 20,000 or more we should have a police matron and that takes in six cities of our little state. Then we secured our school suffrage law and 7,000 women in Connecticut registered, and 4,000 went to the ballot box and deposited their vote for school officers, and the next legislature, I believe, will give us the privilege of voting on the license question.

MRS. EVA HIGGINS, Colorado: To speak of Colorado in two minutes is just as impossible as to speak for any other state—that state which has figured so largely this year in politics; that state that during the financial panic fed its thousands, though the banks were closed, and not only did that, but sent car loads of flour to Brooklyn. We are very independent out there; if we can't have a free and unlimited coinage of silver, we will just close our silver mines and open the gold mines. Our resources are great; we have gold, and silver and coal, and great acres of untilled soil. On the 7th of November we are going to have a vote which shall say whether women shall cast the ballot in Colorado or not; politicians tell us we are going to have it and they never tell falsehoods.

The coming of the National Convention to Denver last year was a great inspiration to Colorado workers, and I think to the whole West. With all there has been against us this year, we have gone steadily forward, our numbers are increasing and we are taking up new lines of work. With the help of Mr. Crittenton's one thousand dollars as a nucleus, we have established a Florence Crittenton Home, and are doing good work there.

MRS. ANNA HAMMER, Penn.: I will not speak of the physical conditions of our state, for I do not care to see these other presidents hang their diminished heads. We have many things of which to be proud, but more than all I am proud of my women. Do you know that we have a full delegation here to-night, thirty-four blessed women, with their badges pinned across their hearts. We can do anything that anybody else can do, and we expect to go on and do things that have been considered impossible. Ours are women of faith and prayer, but they are also women of work, and we are confident that in the long run the saloon will go, shall go, must go.

MRS. MARY C. WOODY, N. Carolina: I cannot hold up before you to-night a beautiful picture of North Carolina; it is the saddest year we have known. We have beautiful rivers and lakes and mountains, but we have worse rivers that overflow and flood the whole state; we have moonshiners and government distilleries that deluge the state. With all the persistence, with all the grace we could command, we have besieged our legislature to give the home the right of way; that the liquor traffic should not be opened in any town or county without the vote of the people. The bills got lost, got hidden away in pockets; we would bring new bills but something always happened to them; but there was no committee with mystery deep enough, with pockets mysterious enough in which to lose the revenue act and it fastened the liquor traffic upon North Carolina, and took a lease upon the souls of generations to come, unless we are able in the future to uproot it.

MRS. MARY A. BABCOCK, Rhode Island: I am glad to be able to speak a word for little Rhody. In our last presidential election we had a larger number of prohibition votes cast in our state than ever before, we had a larger number of votes cast last spring for a prohibitory government than ever before. Many of our men are coming to realize that prohibition is what they want after all. We have the darkest criminal record in our state since the repeal of the prohibitory amendment to our constitution. Many of the temperance men are leaving the old parties and coming into the party that stands not alone for prohibition of liquor traffic, but for other reforms, and many of them are coming to realize that woman even without the ballot is a recognized power for good. They are coming to see the necessity of giving the ballot to women and we feel that the time is not very far distant when the crowning point for women, her complete emancipation will have been realized.

MRS. LAURA WILLIAMS, California: I think California's exhibit in your great Columbian Fair is very fine; we have taken the first prize on fruits. We have got a world of mountain and all these other things that the women have been boasting of. We women of California used to think California would never come in as a prohibition state until three-quarters of the states had prohibition, but we are coming to think better of California now, because although it may be treason to say license on this platform, we have one small town that has a license of $3,000 and I believe that is next to prohibition. We have lots of towns that have prohibition and local option so I think we are nearing the end. Our delegates have come more than half across the continent to mingle with you and get inspiration, and we are going back to wage this peaceful war for God and Home and Native Land.

MRS. SARAH B. HART, Arkansas: We are a little ashamed of our prohibitory record, in fact, a great deal so, so much that the women have decided that the men alone could never bring about reform. We have commenced and we are talking and working and praying, and we shall keep that up until things are in better shape. It has already brought fruit, and as a result of our talking and working and praying, with these brave men that were at work, we have out of the 71 counties in our state 36 prohibition counties, just the driest kinds of counties they are, and last year our legislature raised the age of consent from twelve to sixteen years, and they came very near giving women school suffrage, so we feel that we have had several very nice loaves conferred upon us. We came very near getting municipal suffrage, and when we get that we shall feel that we have the two fishes as well as the loaves.

We are very poor down there, for two years in succession fire and flood have devastated our country and our poor white-ribboners have suffered with others, but out of the ruins of their homes, these blessed women gathered themselves and thanked God that it was the storm king that had ruined their homes rather than the alcohol king.

MISS HESTER GRIFFITH of Utah: I expect you will wonder what can come out of Utah. I am very glad to represent Utah here to-night and to say that we are coming. We are proud to belong to this organization. We are few friends, but we are mighty in spirit and purpose.

The presidents of these different states have been boasting of their products, but I can tell you we have the very besticrop of children in Utah. I suppose some of you are wondering if I am a Mormon. No, I am not. I have been asked that question a good many times. We have in Utah ten unions, officered by women of great ability, and they are very much in favor of the woman's suffrage question. One of our towns, Logan, last year attempted to carry local prohibition, and we received great encouragement from the people; the Mormons united with us in a mass-meeting in the Temple, and we had a grand meeting. That is a college town, and it was only justice that prohibition should carry in that place.

In Salt Lake a grand work is being done. The groundwork, you know, of our organization is evangelistic work. In Salt Lake City the city council has contributed $100 a month for the support of the Miners' Home, which we established. We have done a good work amongst the soldiers in Ft. Douglas, fifty of them. We are coming along, and we are looking to God and we are going to keep the plow going.

MRS. IDA H. READ, Vermont: I believe in humility. Of course we have a few things in Vermont that we are naturally proud of, but when Connecticut boasts of being so grand on account of just getting into line on the scientific education question, I must tell you that Vermont was the first state in this great Union of ours to have a scientific temperance instruction law.

MRS. COLE, of West Washington: What can you expect of a vice-president who is only six weeks old, and has been but a little more than a year in the state? Long enough to appreciate the magnitude, importance and needs. Of its wonderful resources I will not speak, but simply refer you to the exhibit at your White City. Faithful, aggressive work along the various lines of the W. C. T. U. has been done by my worthy predecessors, Mrs. Lucy A. Switzer and Mrs. Amanda Strong. I came to this Convention with a great desire that some of the strong, experienced workers might soon come that way to lend a hand and give a strong impetus upward. More than all we need your prayers for power Divine from above fresh from God's throne to come into the hearts of all our women, to cause as it were a resurrection of conviction and an energizing of purpose that will enable us to overcome every obstacle until the mountain level of God's requirements is reached—and we thus become a potential force, whose power shall be felt toward the early overthrow of the liquor traffic, and its attendant evils—infidelity, sensuality and drunkenness which are so prevalent in the far West.

MRS. M. J. BORDEN, New Mexico: Since our last annual meeting our work in New Mexico, as in other sections of the country, has struggled with financial storms, often battling with conditions that would try men's souls but in harmony with the divine plan, the souls were found that could bear the trial, and to-day finds us reaching onward, still endeavoring to educate, liberate and elevate. Ten years ago our absent leader came into our borders and located her claim in the organization of the W. C. T. U. As good seed in good soil, it has steadily grown in strength and influence, having twice received a National prize banner for increasing membership.

MRS. HOLT, Virginia: The Old Dominion is coming, coming right along; like Maryland and Connecticut we go to our legislature and ask for what we want, but unlike them we don't always get it. For a few months of the past year we have had for the first time an organizer of our very own in the field. We have just had our first state convention. The reports of real work during the year are far greater than ever before. We are going to keep right on until this accursed liquor traffic is wiped out.

MRS. JENNIE SISSON, West Virginia: The past year has been one of marked progress in our little mountain state. We doubled our vote for prohibition last November; we had a very enthusiastic state convention, where a number of ringing resolutions were passed, among them equal suffrage for men and women, and a resolution that if the World's Fair was kept open on Sunday we would not attend, and we mean to stand by it. I want to say to you to-night that the field is white for the harvest and all we have to do is to thrust in the sickle and gather the sheaves.

MRS. GRAVES, for West Washington: I am proud to represent the grand state of Washington; that state is fanned by the balmy breezes of the old Pacific. I am not proud to represent its vast hop fields, almost entirely used for the benefit of the liquor traffic, but I am proud to represent our white-ribbon women, who are as earnest and faithful as any women could be. I ask an interest in your prayers that God may help us in the onward and upward march for prohibition. The victory is going to be ours. I am just as sure that we will gain prohibition in time as I am that I am standing on this platform.

MRS. VIE H. CAMPBELL, Wisconsin: Time will not permit me to tell you to-night of the wonderful resources of the state that I have the honor to represent, which has been justly called the Switzerland of America, but in the midst of all this beauty and grandeur, man's ruthless and desecrating hand has placed the saloon and the brewery, and so all over the length and breadth of my fair state floats that dark cloud. But God has touched the heart and consciences of our womanhood, and that band of earnest, true hearted, faithful women are welding their weapons by prayer and petition for prohibition of the liquor traffic.

FRIDAY MORNING.

Mrs. Vie H. Campbell, of Wisconsin, led the devotional exercises.

The treasurer's report was made the special order of the morning, and after printed copies had been distributed through the audience, Miss Pugh read the totals therefrom as follows:

Receipts, $20,097.55; expenses, $21,198.42; deficit, $1,100.87. The report was accepted with a rising vote of thanks.

Mrs. Buell asked as a special favor that the Convention release her from reading her report as corresponding secretary, it being very lengthy and the Convention time already so far advanced and other reports not yet heard. Consent was given.

Election of officers was then announced as the next order of business. Delegates were requested to remain in their seats during the election, the pages were relieved from duty and the Chair announced the following tellers: Mrs. Rebecca B. Chambers, corresponding secretary, Pennsylvania; Mrs. Tenney, treasurer, New York; Mrs. Rice, superintendent, Massachusetts; Miss Walker, corresponding secretary, Illinois; Mrs. Zabel, corresponding Secretary, Louisiana; Miss Hay, Indiana; Miss Nichols, Rhode Island; Miss Ensign, Ohio; Mrs. Woodbridge, Minnesota; Miss Clothier, National organizer, Colorado.

Ballots were then distributed for informal ballot for president, after the secretary had announced four hundred and fifty delegates present.

While waiting for the tellers to count the ballots, the secretary read the following telegrams:

"Hebrews 12: 1, 2. With tender love.

"FRANCES E. WILLARD."

"To HON. NEAL DOW, Portland, Me. Thanks for letter. National W. C. T. U. send grateful love and greeting. Hebrews 6: 10. Rev. 1: 19."

Mrs. Chambers, of Pennsylvania, reported for the tellers on the vote for president as follows:

Whole number of votes cast for president, 371; number of votes cast for Miss Willard, 358; number of votes cast for Mrs. Buell, 11; for Mrs. Woodbridge, 1; for Miss Ackermann, 1.

Three scattering votes for other officers were thrown out, also two blanks.

By unanimous vote of the Convention the recording secretary was directed to cast the vote of the Convention for president, which was so ordered.

Mrs. Woodbridge cast the vote with these words:

"It is with pleasure that I cast the vote of this Convention for Miss Frances E. Willard, as President of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union for the coming year."

Miss Frances E. Willard was then declared by the Chair the duly elected President of the National W. C. T. U. for the ensuing year, and it was immediately voted that a telegram be sent to Miss Willard informing her of the result of the election.

On motion of Mrs. Hoffman, Lady Henry Somerset was invited to respond for Miss Willard, and did so in these words:

Madam President and dear sisters: I have been placed in a great many embarrassing situations since I came to this Convention, but none more than to have to speak in the place of one whose voice you so wish to hear at this moment. I am so glad to think that her heart will be rejoiced once more to learn the love and the loyalty that she has so well earned at your hands and which you have always so readily given to her, and I can only congratulate you in having the most peerless leader that the world has ever given to any body of men or women, to carry on the work of your splendid association, and I trust and hope and pray that all those who love her so tenderly and so well, will do their utmost to guard her from all those things that shall retard her perfect recovery during this coming year.

The report of the tellers on the informal ballot for corresponding secretary was announced by Miss Hay as follows:

The total number of votes cast, 373; Mrs. Mary Woodbridge, 231; Mrs. Caroline B. Buell, 122; Mrs. Mary T. Burt, 7; Mrs. Andrew, 5; Mrs. Graham, 2; Mrs. Helen M. Barker, 2; Mrs. L. M. N. Stevens, 2; Mrs. Katherine L. Stevenson, 1; Mrs. Mary T. Lathrap, 1.

A motion for a formal ballot for secretary prevailed, with the understanding that the two candidates on the informal ballot having the highest number of votes be considered the candidates for the formal ballot.

Ballots were distributed, and while the vote was being counted, Mrs. Leonora B. Lake, president of the Catholic Woman's Temperance Union, Colonel Sobieski and Madam Beirut, of India, were introduced and responded with words of strong encouragement.

Mrs. Lovell, of Pennsylvania, read a letter from T. Morris Perot, president of the Pennsylvania Society for the prevention of cruelty to children (which we would gladly give space to were it at hand), and offered the following resolution which was unanimously adopted:

WHEREAS, we have learned that, in violation of the law of Illinois, a little child of about three years is being used by a family of acrobats in their performance at the Auditorium in a way calculated to involve danger to life and limb.

Therefore, Resolved, That we express our utmost disapprobation of said performance, and respectfully request the Illinois Humane Society to take such steps as are necessary to enforce the law.

Mother Stewart led the noon-tide hour of prayer, after which the tellers announced the formal ballot for corresponding secretary as follows:

Total number of votes cast, 389; total number for Mrs. Woodbridge, 259; total number for Mrs. Buell, 130.

The presiding officer, Mrs. Buell, announced: "In accord with the formal vote of the Convention, Mrs. Mary A. Woodbridge is declared the duly elected corresponding secretary for the coming year," and introduced Mrs. Woodbridge, who replied: "I think that at such a moment as this, my sisters, silence is golden. Committing myself unto the Lord, I ask the help of that Jehovah in whom there is everlasting strength to serve you faithfully."

Informal ballots for recording secretary were then distributed. In the interim the Convention guests, general officers, the state presidents, National superintendents, organizers and editors grouped themselves on the platform at the request of a photographer, for a picture of the Convention. The light was so poor that a long exposure was required, and the "audible smiles" of some naughty delegates in the audience were not conducive to a serious expression on the part of the platform officials, which, however, may not detract from the pleasing qualities of the picture.

Mrs. Frances Graham, of New York, was invited to the platform and given the charge of the music in place of Mrs. Harris, who had been called to her Boston home.

The tellers then reported the informal ballot for recording secretary as follows:

Blank votes, 3; for Mrs. L. M. N. Stevens, 277; Mrs. C. Buell, 73; Mrs. Carrie Grout, 12; Mrs. Georgiana Gardinier, 8; Mrs. Helen M. Barker, 5; Mrs. Mary T. Burt, 3; Miss Mary McDowell, 1; Mrs. Mary A. Woodbridge, 1; Miss Emma Goodwill, 1: total, 381.

The secretary was instructed to cast the vote of the Convention for Mrs. Stevens, who was declared the duly elected recording secretary of the N. W. C. T. U.

Mrs. Stevens responded to her election in this way: "I thank you, dear women, for this expression of your confidence. I will try to be faithful to God, faithful to you and faithful to the work."

The result of the informal ballot for treasurer was then reported as follows:

Total number of votes cast, 385; Miss Esther Pugh, 203; Mrs. Helen M. Barker, 148; Mrs. Tenney, 9; Miss Griffin, 7; Mrs. Bigelow, 5; Miss Hay, 4; Mrs. Buell, 3; Mrs. Alice J. Harris, 1; Mrs. L. M. N. Stevens, 1; Mrs. Susan Fessenden, 1; Mrs. Gardinier, 1; Mrs. Stoddard, 1; Mrs. Williams, 1.

On motion of Mrs. Fessenden, the secretary was instructed to cast the vote of the Convention for Miss Pugh for treasurer, which was done, and Miss Pugh was declared the duly elected treasurer of the N. W. C. T. U.

In response, Miss Pugh said: "I thank you for a very unexpected honor."

Mrs. Fessenden then moved that "we express by rising vote our appreciation of the grace and fairness with which Caroline B. Buell has presided over the deliberations of this body."

Lady Henry Somerset added: "If I might be allowed, without taking any part of your time unduly, to say that as a stranger from another land, and knowing something of the difficulties of presiding over a great meeting like this, I have never seen a meeting presided over more fairly and more justly than this, and I am so glad of the opportunity of expressing, as an Englishwoman, my great appreciation of such a presiding officer as we have had during the last few days. May I have the honor of putting the motion that is before you, the vote of thanks proposed by Mrs. Fessenden?"

The motion was put and carried unanimously by rising vote.

Mrs. Buell's reply was:

"Sisters of the Convention, I have only done my duty the best I could. I think I ought to thank you for helping me from the floor and from the platform, and I certainly do thank you from the bottom of my heart. Of course I appreciate this rising vote, but you have done, I think, even more than I."

Mrs. Stevens, the newly elected recording secretary, nominated, according to the constitution, her assistant, Mrs. Clara C. Hoffman, who declared that her only qualification for the office consisted of the fact that she is in possession of a voice, and that she would do "just as Stevie tells me."

Miss Anna Gordon moved that Lady Aberdeen be invited to present her greetings to this Convention.

Mrs. Helen Gougar, of Indiana, was introduced and made an eloquent response.

The Convention adjourned to meet at two o'clock.

FRIDAY AFTERNOON.

The afternoon session was opened with a twenty-minutes devotional exercise, conducted by Mrs. Henry and presided over by Miss Greenwood.

Mr. Henry Varley, of England, was introduced, and accorded a hearty welcome. He spoke as follows:

It is a pleasure to be permitted to be presented to you at your Convention. I cannot tell you how highly I esteem the work of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. I do not know how it is that you manage it, but so many of you ladies seem to rule without letting your ruling appear. My wife is quite an adept in that matter; she never appears to rule, but she always does it. I need not waste time in expressing the frightful forces of evil which we have against us, and I am persuaded that we must have a far wider organization than we have had in the past; not that we must put our trust in organizations, but when we have to meet the consolidated interests of government and of the liquor traffic and kindred interests, which are opposed to the spread of right and good, it certainly is no child's play in which we are engaged.

But if I say a few words, it will be of the importance of having our forces at their best. Have you ever noticed that in the 9th chapter of the Gospel of Mark the Lord Jesus Christ is placed in difficulty by His disciples, and it came about in this wise? There were nine of the disciples who were not able to cast out one evil spirit that possessed a youth who was brought by his father, and why was this? If you will read that chapter carefully you will see that when the disciples went out two and two, they had no trouble in casting out devils and doing great works, but now notice, even while they were filled with the thought of the Lord going away from them, instead of being filled with sorrow, these twelve disciples were actually quarreling among themselves about who should be the big man in the Master's absence, and so they had not the power to cast out one evil spirit. It is a melancholy picture; it is the picture of power lost through sin. I would very much rather that the devil struck me than that he should treat me with contempt, as he will if I am put in that position of having lost power through sin.

I believe that the Christian church to-day has lost its best power mainly because she is putting her trust in buildings and money and organization. I do not believe that Jesus Christ cares a ten-cent piece for the most magnificent ecclesiastical structure that you have in the United States. What our Lord is wanting, my dear sisters, to-day, is men and women who will not be allured from the straight path of devotion to the Lord by their fellows by any self-seeking of any kind. Oh, for the spirit of the Lord that nothing be done through strife or vain glory.

If my few words to you to-day, my dear sisters, should lead you to be so filled with the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ that you have power to cast out the demons of intemperance and lust and the opium traffic and the infernal forces that are working against us, I will indeed be thankful. My prayer is that you shall work to the glory of Christ and the welfare of our fellows, and be content to take the lowest places. May God greatly bless you. I thank you very much for your patient listening to me.

Mrs. Hoffman raised the question as to the manner of casting the vote for treasurer, objection having been made by several delegates to the secretary casting it, which the presiding officer did not hear because of the confusion. It was moved and carried that a formal vote for treasurer be taken.

Miss Pugh stated that while she did not hear the objection, she was surprised that the ballot should have been ordered cast by the secretary, with so small a plurality in her favor.

Later on, just before the ballot was re-taken, Miss Pugh arose to a question of privilege and made the following statement:

"This gives me an opportunity to say something that I intended to say and have been waiting for this time to say. Of course, I have not been waiting for what Mrs. Hoffman said, because that I had no anticipation of. You did me the very unexpected honor this morning to nominate me for treasurer again. I say you did me that very unexpected honor. More years ago than I would care to mention here it was the fashion when a young lady received a proposal of marriage for her to take the subject under consideration. I have taken your proposition under most serious and careful consideration and I must positively decline to let my name come before you again."

Upon dissent being expressed by several delegates, Miss Pugh again stated that her decision was final, and made these additional touching remarks:

"There is nothing in this world that I have valued in all my life more than I have the confidence of the women of this organization. It has stood for me for more than it has stood for a good many of you. At the New York Convention I was called home by a telegram to a desolated household. My father's last words to me, as he laid his hand on my head and I went out to that Convention, were to bid me go, and when I came back he was no more. It was but a few weeks till I had no mother, and the household was broken, and just a few weeks till the Convention at which you honored me with this office, and in all those years it has stood for me for home, for father, for mother, for hearthstone, and yet I feel now that the time has come that my official relation must cease."

The informal ballot for treasurer was as follows:

Total number of votes cast, 317. Mrs. Helen M. Barker, 167; Miss Hay, 71; Miss Esther Pugh, 45; Mrs. Caroline B. Buell, 11; scattering, 23.

The formal ballot announced later, was:

Total number of votes, 290. Mrs. Helen M. Barker, 190; Miss Hay, 95; Miss Pugh, 4; Mrs. John Smith, 1.

Mrs. Helen M. Barker was the declared then duly elected treasurer of the National W. C. T. U.

The revision of the constitution occupied a large part of the afternoon. The amendments as proposed last year were first taken up. Amendment No. 1 was lost, both Mrs. Rice and Miss Gordon, superintendent and associate of the juvenile department, speaking against it. The amendment read as follows:

(Offered by Mrs. Jones, of Virginia.)

Next year I, or some one in my place will move that the constitution be so amended that the superintendent of the Loyal Temperance Legion department be made a member of the executive committee.

The second amendment offered by Mrs. Hunt, reading: "At the next Convention I, or some one in my stead, will call for such amendment of the constitution as will make the National superintendents members of the executive committee," occasioned much discussion, all of which will be found in THE DAILY of October 21. The amendment was put to vote and lost.

Amendments No. 3 and 4 were adopted. They read as follows:

(No. 3, offered by Mrs. Benjamin.)

An amendment to be known as Sec. 1, Art. III. Juvenile organizations known as Loyal Temperance Legion in any auxiliary state or territory or District of Columbia shall be entitled to one voting delegate for every one thousand members having paid fifty dollars into the National treasury; said delegate to be a member of the W. C. T. U., and an active worker in the L. T. L.

(No. 4, offered by Mrs. M. McGee Snell.)

At the next Convention of the National W. C. T. U., I or some one in my place, will ask such a change of the constitution as will make National evangelists members of the Convention.

Mrs. Stevens moved to substitute "the editors" for "the editor and associate editor," in the article on membership. This was carried.

Notices for new amendments were then given as follows:

MRS. NICHOLS, of Indiana: I, or some one in my place, will offer an amendment one year from this time by which the president of the board of trustees of the Temperance Hospital will be placed in this section after the business manager of the W. T. P. A.

MRS. STEVENS, of Maine: I wish to give notice that next year I, or some one in my place, will move to amend Article VI of the constitution so that it shall read, the annual or biennial meeting in the first line and also insert "biennial" after "annual" when it occurs again.

MRS. GRIFFITH, of District of Columbia: I wish to give notice that next year I, or some one in my stead, will move an amendment to Article VI to read "the annual meeting shall be held in September or October."

MRS. KELLS, of Mississippi: I would like to make this notice that next year I, or some one else, will move that the chairman of the board of superintendents and the chairman of the board of organizers shall be members of the executive committee.

MRS. EDHOLM, of California: I want to give notice that I, or some one in my place, will next year move to amend the constitution by making a member of the Convention the editor of the Oak and Ivy Leaf.

The following was also given (we did not learn by whom): "At the next annual meeting I, or some one in my place, will propose an amendment to the constitution to place the president of the board of Temple trustees in this Article, so as to make her a member of the National Convention."

During the interim of the ballots, two reports were read.

That of Mrs. English, on work among miners, contained among others this excellent paragraph:

The department of Work Among Miners is no longer an experiment. It justly claims a place among the departments of Christ's work. It is not local; mining is a large part of the industry of all our states and territories, except three. In these mines are found 640,000 men. I can think of no product that so generally enters into the home and business life, than does the fruit of the toil of the miner. His labor brings the fuel that heats and illuminates our homes, grinds and cooks the grain for our food, runs the great looms that make our clothing, makes possible rapid transit from place to place on sea and land; he picks the ores which make our money, jewels and our gravestones.

In fact, every person, thing and place is interested in the result of the miner's toil. But what of the miner himself —his spiritual and temporal welfare? Do we think of and seek to reach him and his family as we should? Public attention is turned to these when sudden disaster buries hundreds in the earth, or when a strike cuts off the supply of coal, or perhaps when an election calls for the marshaling of the men 300,000 strong, for the battle of ballots. When these are passed over, they settle down unthought of to the dull and tedious routine of their life underground. They are cut off from the privileges of society, living in little villages or huts far up the sides of mountain or down in the isolated valley. Added to this is the too frequent blight of ignorance and crime and cruelty.

Dr. Mary Wood Allen reported for the purity department; space forbids only a brief extract as follows:

The gospel of Jesus Christ is the basis of all church work for the salvation of human souls and the basis of all W. C. T. U. work is the same gospel of Christ and their effort is for the salvation of souls. This being the case you may ask, why multiply organizations, but the W. C. T. U. comes in as another worker with the church, an added weapon in the hands of the church towards the same end.

The church as an organization cannot work directly for legislation. The W C. T. U. can and does. The women who are interested in the purity department can look after and are looking after the legislation of their different states. They are keeping their eyes upon legislators. The church holds out its hands and says to sinners, "Weak and wounded, sick and sore, come and receive the pearl of great price." But they cannot offer shelter, and the W. C. T U. comes in with this work. We cannot do much for fallen women until we have homes for them, so all over the country we have established rescue homes and midnight missions and industrial schools.

FRIDAY EVENING.

The exercises opened with the singing of "Coronation" by the audience. Mother Thompson led in prayer, after which "America" was heartily sung.

The first speaker was Mrs. Leonora B. Lake, of St. Louis, a large part of whose address we give below:

Madam President and Friends, I shall try to talk against the railroad trains, organs, chorus singing and all the rest, for I believe God gives to every cause a voice that must reach out over all these turbulent noises to the hearts of the people.

The subject that I have chosen to speak about here tonight is one that is not often presented to an audience. I refer to a temperance institution, and that institution is the home, the most sacred, the most holy, the most important of all institutions that the brain of man has ever devised or the hand of man has ever accomplished, because it bears upon it the Christ-like mark, and when I speak of the home I speak of one in which the spirit of Christ prevails.

The home is the place where Christian influence is at work, where Christian doctrine is taught in actions, not alone in prayer, in words where the child is made to respect itself and to be respectful to others, where religion is not laughed at, and where the unholy and inhuman monster of drink has not taken hold. Hence it is for this home to night that I make a plea, and I make it here before the Woman's Christian Temperance Union because they are the most powerful, they have belted the world, they have spread their influence out further than any other organization of either men or women or both, that we have any record of on the pages of history, and I make this plea to them for such homes as I speak of, to whom the Woman's Christian Temperance Union is an unknown quantity, to whom these conventions are something so far off that they are dimly heard, and I ask the women of this Convention to go from here to their homes in the different states and territories and cities from whence they came, and make an effort to reach just such homes, to carry into them the doctrine of total abstinence, to ask them to help us preserve the children. For, hearken, friends, with all our Sunday-schools, with all our churches and services, to-day, the beer-can has a greater army of children rushing to the saloon than have the Sunday-schools and churches of all denominations put together.

And until we reach that class of people who think it is not a sin to send a child for a pint of beer, who do not realize that they are perhaps contaminating the life of a child for all the future and into eternity by sending it into those associations, until we reach that class of people our work will not have been commenced.

There is one class of people whom I would rather have than all others put together, and that is the mothers of the land; give me the mothers so that I may mould them into my opinions and twenty-five years hence I will give you voters who cannot be bought or sold and who will not hold a caucus in a saloon I will give a body of men who, if they own property in a city or in a village, would sooner scratch upon one of its boards and set fire to it and burn it to the ground than rent it for a saloon, a gambling den or a house of ill fame. And that is what our people are doing, church members or no church members. This is a place to speak plainly, and like every other Irishman I talk plainly. Give me the mothers today and I will give you twenty-five years hence a race of men, one of whom would rather go out and pick stones for a living than stand behind a bar and deal out death and damnation to the men and women of this country.

Some one has said that a nation never rises above the virtues of its women and I would set so high a standard for our women that the nation would be raised in spite of itself. What percentage of the women of this country have we in our whole organization? A very small percentage, and I would rather have for my opponents ten men than one woman who set her face against my cause; and why, because the men will reason and women never. I hear the sisters behind say, No; they are not my opponents, or they would not be susceptible to reason.

The Catholic Woman's Temperance Union organized last June with its 450 members, and they have for the basis of their operation, prayer, example and advice; prayer first, prayer to God for strength, incessant prayer for wisdom to do the right thing at the right time; prayer for those who are weak and faltering. Example by keeping their children from rushing the can for beer, by keeping them at their own homes, by keeping them in their little temperance organizations, by doing all the thousand things that only a mother can do to influence and stamp impressions upon her child.

By advice, advising with weaker friends and acquaintances to let the tempting glass alone, to come into the Catholic sisters' Temperance Union, to shun the evil, and come to a realization of the glory and the courage that comes with strength of character—that is the work of the Catholic Temperance Union, and while you may not hear us from the platform, our work is going on. We work among the women in their homes, and do all we can to bring about the time when there shall be no need that woman be taken away from her home to face the world in defense of right and with a protest against wrong. But as such is the case, and as such are the conditions, I say God bless the woman, whether she be Catholic or Protestant, Jew or Gentile, black or white, that has the courage of her convictions and the determination to do her best.

But as we cannot force this idea our Woman's Temperance Union are trying to do this work in their homes, trying to carry this precept of prayer, example and advice. We go into homes that never heard of a convention, because they don't read the papers; they can't read them, many of them, and they know no more about conventions than if they lived—well, I don't know where, because most everywhere in the world they know there is a W. C. T. U. Hence, we go to these people, we read to them, we ask them to meet us at each other's houses, not at some hall, not at some church, where they could say to us, I haven't any clothes to wear, and I can't leave the children; but if we find a woman with a particularly large family, we go there and we talk to her and her children together, and we carry to them this gospel of temperance. We tell them the danger that they are in, and the danger the children are in in running to the saloon for beer in that way. We are trying to do our part in this great crusade against the evil of intemperance. We draw object lessons for the children, we draw a picture of a man who drinks, and then the picture of a sober man, and we ask them which they would rather be. We have two hundred and eighty-seven boys in our Temperance Legion, and one hundred and sixty-five girls, besides our women. We have the League of the Cross, we have the Catholic Total Abstinence Society. Right here in this city there are three splendid flourishing Catholic temperance societies.

Mrs. Andrew was then introduced, and spoke most entertainingly. We will give in our next issue that part of her address not given in THE DAILY.

The third address on the program was by Dr. Kate Bushnell, so well known for her brave work in this country as well as in India. That part of her address omitted in THE DAILY issue will be given in the regular UNION SIGNAL.

The session concluded with the singing of the Doxology.

SATURDAY MORNING.

Mrs. Trego led the Convention in prayer and "A charge to keep I have" was sung.

The Chair introduced Professor Dickie, Chairman of the committee of the Prohibition party, who spoke as follows:

I believe if there is any great organization in America, and indeed if there is any great organization on earth whose development has justified the wisdom of its founders, it is the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. I was talking on the cars yesterday afternoon with a gentleman who knew the direction in which I was traveling and he said, "After all, what have these women done?" And I believe I paralyzed him by telling him of things that he had never heard of, and then I wound it all up by saying, "If that splendid organization had not succeeded in doing the vast amount of outside work they have done, never secured any legislation anywhere, if they had put scientific temperance education in none of the public schools, if they had never been instrumental in redeeming a single drunkard, the uplift to women themselves had justified its existence."

It has been the inspiration and is the promise of the future for American womanhood and the womanhood of all the world. I am glad to look into your faces. God bless the Woman's Christian Temperance Union! I am glad to see it spread its scope, its energy, its heroism, its devotion, so far as it stands for the great purposes that have animated it in the past, so long I am sure God's blessing will crown its work with marvelous success.

The election of superintendents was next taken up, and the nominations of the executive committee were accepted with one exception. That was of the press department and was referred back to the executive.

The Rev. L. P. Mercer addressed the Convention, cordially offering the use of his church, the New Church Temple, for the services of the Sabbath day. After careful consideration, it was decided to hold the services in the Art Palace, because of the larger auditorium, and hearty thanks were extended to Mr. Mercer for his kind offer.

Miss Pugh asked permission to present to the Convention the new treasurer, Mrs. Helen M. Barker, and said she hoped that all would be as kind to the new treasurer as they had been to the old one.

Mrs. Barker's speech of acceptance was as follows:

Sisters of the Convention, late last night to my very great surprise, I learned that I had been elected, by a majority of your votes, to fill the position of treasurer for the National W. C. T. U., to take the place of one who has for many years so faithfully performed its duties, one who has done her work so thoroughly that not one single woman in the W. C. T. U. has ever questioned her honor, her integrity, her faithfulness, or her ability. I realize that it is no easy thing to take a position and follow such a woman as Esther Pugh, and had I been here yesterday when the question was between Miss Pugh and myself, I should have withdrawn my name and should have voted for Miss Pugh as our future treasurer. I have no hope that I can do the work as well as she has done it, for she has had more experience in this line than I have. I enjoy taking care of the little money that I have of my own, but I abominate taking care of other people's money, and yet you have placed me here and I have only to say that for the present I will do the work that you have placed in my hands as God gives me the ability, and I bespeak for my imperfections, your charity, for my lack of ability, your prayers and your sympathy; and I desire to call to the knowledge of every delegation sitting here that not by one word of my own, not by any electioneering have I been placed in this, in some respects, unenviable position, and it was a more total surprise to me than anything else that could have come to me. I say I will take the position, believing, perhaps, that it is my duty at the present, and do this work to the best of my ability.

MISS PUGH added: I want to ask your special help for Mrs. Barker. She takes this office under very difficult circumstances, as you know, to take hold of an empty treasury. It is just what I did seventeen years ago, I took hold of a bankrupt treasury and your help brought it up. Now, you will have to do the same for her.

The chairman of the telegram committee reported the sending of the following cablegram to Miss Willard at London:

"Hail, beloved Chieftain. Reëlected with enthusiasm. Mizpah."

After further consideration of the by-laws, and several minor changes, which will appear in their proper place in the National Minutes, the noon-tide prayer was offered by Mrs. Palmer, of Iowa, and the Convention adjourned.

SATURDAY AFTERNOON.

After prayer by Mrs. S. M. I. Henry, and a song by Mrs. Graham, consideration of the by-laws was then continued.

Mrs. Lathrap offered the following substitute for section 6. "By arrangement between the executive committee and the board of superintendents a joint session may be held during the annual convention when methods may be considered and questions of mutual interest decided, reports of such joint meeting to be made to the annual convention. This was adopted."

Mrs. Benjamin then moved to amend Section 1 of Article III by adding "superintendents shall be nominated by the executive committee and elected by the annual meeting, the vote to be taken on each candidate named, the general secretary of the woman's branch shall be elected in like manner." The motion was carried.

After several minor amendments were made, a happy episode occurred. Dr. Shaw stepped to the platform and said:

There has been a very pleasant duty conferred on me this afternoon. Madam President, it has devolved upon me to present to you in behalf of the friends of this association this grip and this umbrella, and to your associate, Miss Pugh, this grip and this umbrella. I suppose the ladies selected me, Madam President, and Madam Treasurer, on the ground of my fitness for this special duty because I have been living in a grip for a very little less than forty-six years; I have been sheltered by an umbrella for about the same space of time. My home is in a grip, my covering an umbrella and from my personal experience I know it will keep off not only the sun that scorches and burns, but the rain that shrivels and destroys all your good clothes, and with the large salary received as an itinerant lecturer for the W. C. T. U. you will need to guard your clothes. It is not a suggestion, ladies, that you are to go, but an intimation that when you do go, you shall come to us and because we didn't want you to stop too long, we could not invite you to bring a trunk and therefore we invited you to bring your grips along. They will hold all you need while you stay.

We have been accustomed to see your beautiful and pleasant and friendly faces once a year, we all want you to come to our homes once a year. Within these satchels you will find a small sum of money; it is not as large as we would like to have it, because it won't take you to the houses of all of us. In the grip you will find all the paraphernalia necessary to the comfort of a W. C. T. U. lecturer, therefore, on behalf of this organization it gives me great pleasure to give you these little things in their name, hoping to see you again. It is not often that people who give things want them returned. We want them returned and you with them.

MRS. BUELL responded: I have not the least idea that you expect me to reply to any such speech as that. I have only this to say that I thank you very much for your part in it, very much indeed, and I want to say just this: Miss Shaw has talked of living in a grip and living under an umbrella. I am happy to say that in the days that are to come I do not expect to live in a grip or under an umbrella, not all the while. But way off in the East in the land of steady habits there is an old homestead which is a pretty good sized one; there are about twenty-five rooms in it and they are all good large rooms. It belongs by descent to the family which I represent and I want to say right here that being a good large house, although it would not accommodate you all at one time, it will accommodate a great many of you, and you hereby have a cordial invitation to come whenever you can and stay as long as you can, and bring your trunks. If there is not room enough in the house, we will put the trunks out in the barn, for there is a good sized barn, then if there isn't room enough in the house and the barn for you all, there are several boats on the lake and there are two islands in the middle of the lake; it is a beautiful camp, we will put up tents and we will tent you out on the islands in Lake Pokotepog, in the middle of the state of Connecticut. I shall be glad to see you any time when you come.

MRS. FORBES added: Connecticut is a good place to come to and we will take good care of our dear sister.

MISS PUGH responded: I have been trying to think of something to say to express my ideas, and I haven't an idea yet equal to the occasion. I have not an ancestral home to invite you to. I was thinking that there was a fine irony in giving me an umbrella. With an umbrella I can pitch a tent. It has been a matter of curiosity with some of the women to know what I am going to do with myself. I am going to visit for a whole year. I got a letter from a cousin this morning inviting me to visit her and it struck me that for the first time in twenty years I can accept that invitation. But I am going to have some place somewhere that you can all come, I will let you know when I can invite you. My tent is going to be pitched somewher in Hoosierdom. The sorest thing to me in all this change is that I am not going back to Ohio. I have got nothing to say against Indiana, but I want to go back to Ohio, but the changes are such that I won't go back there any more. It won't be Esther Pugh of Ohio, it will be Esther Pugh of somewhere out on the swamps of Indiana. No? Isn't that right? Oh, it is gas. I will invite you to my fireside with natural gas.

MRS. CALKINS, of Indiana, interposed: The Hoosier women desire to say that as Connecticut will take good care of Mrs. Buell, so will the Hoosier women take good care of Miss Pugh.

MRS. MONROE: Ohio has something to say about that.

The Chair introduced Dr. Henry Reynolds, of Michigan, who spoke words of warm appreciation.

The following was substituted for Section 3 of Article VI of the revised constitution: "The headquarters of the union shall be in the Temple at the corner of Monroe and LaSalle streets, Chicago."

MRS. HALL, of New York, gave this notice: "Next year I or some one in my place will move that the constitution shall be so amended as to include a first vice-president."

After a number of amendments and changes, which will appear in the National Minutes, the by-laws were adopted as a whole.

The report of the committee on resolutions was presented to the Convention, and after numerous revisions, was adopted. (See page 21.)

On motion all unfinished business was referred to the executive committee, and after singing the Long Meter Doxology the Twenty-first Annual Convention of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union was formally adjourned.

SATURDAY EVENING.

Many of the delegates remained in their seats at the close of the business session and a good-sized audience filled the floor and gallery to enjoy the bright and varied program provided for Y evening. About fifty young women, representatives of our Y Branch from fifteen states and a few foreign lands, occupied seats upon the platform surrounding their much-loved General Secretary, Mrs. Frances Barnes, who presided with her wonted ease and grace. The full stenographic report of this attractive program will be found in the November Oak and Ivy Leaf.

ANNUAL SERMON.

Lady Henry Somerset preached the annual sermon October 22, from the text, Acts 11:26, her topic being

WHAT IS IT TO BE A CHRISTIAN?

I propose to leave out of view the primary steps by which one comes to be a Christian, and deal only with those characteristics by which a Christian should be known among his fellow men.

The word Christian means a Christ-man, therefore a Christ-woman. The revelation of the full meaning of the word came with new force to one who was bearing the penalty of that action which brought release to the most suffering children of our land: W. T. Stead wrote while in prison, "I had a new concept which changed my life; I saw God meant every one to be a Christ." It was not "following" Him only that Christ enjoined on His disciples; it was living in Him as the center and focus of that divine God-life to which He has called all His children. We have heard the old, well-worn phrase, "follow Christ," until it has become associated with a far-off, breathless, often hopeless pursuit, as of some swift walker who must always elude and out-distance us.

The fundamental idea of a Christian is, I venture to think, therefore, not well expressed by a "follower of Christ." "I am a Christ because His divine life exists in me," seems to be a higher, clearer vision of the truth.

Time cannot alter for us the ethical standard that Christ's teaching sets up. We have been ready enough to pronounce severe judgments upon the Pharisees of His day; we have despised the cowardice of His disciples, and we have condemned Judas as the arch traitor of the race. There have been times in our lives when we have read the story ever new in the exquisite simplicity of its recital, and it has made us feel that the way to Calvary would have seemed an easy road following the footprints of such a Leader. We have lingered in spirit by the gentle waters of Galilee, and felt enthralled by the words of wisdom that fell from those inspired lips; it would have seemed a light thing, so we thought, to have left our nets, or to have risen from the receipt of custom to throw in our lot with that sublime life; but we often fail to remember that we gaze at those scenes through the soft haze of time—that the magic hand that hallows the crude outline has chiseled and fashioned this story and taken from it the hard angles and strong curves—giving to these supreme events, as to all other history, a master touch of "the splendid fair and soft, the glory of old days." We forget that the stable in Bethlehem was composed of coarse and common wood; that the manger held the same straw that stocks our barns; that the virgin mother was a peasant girl about whom strange tales were told, and one on whom her friends and companions look askance; that the life lived out in Nazareth was that of an ordinary carpenter, working through the routine of a monotonous existence in a humble home; and that when the hour of that great ministry began, it was as a peripatetic preacher, an acknowledged fanatic, and a social anarchist, that Jesus was regarded by the cultivated and educated of His day.

These are the facts that we are apt to overlook. The church of later ages has associated pomp and splendor, "all that art yields and nature can decree," with the worship of this same Jesus of Nazareth; but not in the swelling tones of the cathedral organ, not in the mist of rising incense, nor the golden haloes and glowing colors of medieval art, do we find the reality. Those rugged, weather-beaten, storm-tossed men who followed Christ on earth were surrounded by no mysterious light from heaven; they walked the shores of the lake in peasant's garb, they knew nothing of the culture of the schools, their very "speech betrayed them." The common people, and those only, heard Christ gladly. The historians of that day have ignored Him altogether; possibly the fact that a man holding dangerous tenets had been executed with two thieves at Jerusalem was recorded in the annals of the time, but of what interest was this to the haughty Roman, the artistic Greek, or the orthodox Hebrew? True, some lonely hearts remembered the gentle touch and tender voice of Mary's Son, some hearts were wrung with inextinguishable grief, some stories were whispered among the humble folk of that evening time at Bethany when the dead man stepped forth a living witness of this Christ's unearthly power; but these strange tales gained no credence among the wise, the rich, and the powerful. Such superstitions would die as others had before them—so they thought. Wherein, then, lay the undying power of Christ's teaching? It lay in this: Divine truth held in the heart of the common people is the one immortal thing on earth; rooted in the fertile soil, that which was at first sown in the valley blossoms at last on the pleasant uplands of prosperity. To be a member of a Christian church in those early days has meant to myriads the sundering of family ties, the contempt of the cultured and the great, and at the last, the arena, the torture-chamber, and the faggot. To be a member of the church to-day often means added endearment in the home, the improvement of social position, a comfortable corner in an attractive place of worship, and the customary eulogy when we leave the world. Church membership is now too often considered an excellent insurance, providing a lease of comfort and consolation in this world, and the freehold of eternal happiness hereafter. If to be a Christian, however, means in any real sense to be a Christ-man, we must take towards the whole aspect of our time the attitude that Christ took towards the age in which He lived, and in doing so we shall probably find that we have to descend the marble steps that have led to the "dim religious light," into the garish day of the market-place and the "maddening crowd" of the street. Here we are face to face with humanity as it exists, ignorant, selfish, greedy, noisy, fickle, ungrateful, but at the same time generous, aspiring, loving, immortal; hearts throbbing with their strange contradictory impulses, brains reeling under the mystery of life, backs bent with the burdens of ceaseless and unrequited toil; men and women made in the "image of God," but stamped with the trade-mark of sin. To be a Christian means to act in this strange and motley scene as Christ would act if He stood in the midst of the ceaseless, deafening, bewildering hubbub of the nineteenth century.

"Where, through the long-drawn aisle and fretted vault,
The pealing anthem swells the note of praise,"

Can we imagine Christ standing in the aisles of the gorgeous church, filled with men and women who one day in the week ask that His will be done on earth as it is in heaven, while they carefully keep their dimes for the collection, and then, feeling that they have done the civil thing to heaven, emerge complacently to join the Sunday parade in Hyde Park and to talk of the last race or the most recent scandal.

How would Christ view the well-spread board, at which His blessing is punctiliously invoked by the man whose luxuries are gained by the sweated toilers in the market of human life, and by the bargains that are best described in the old caricature of the pious grocer, "Tom, have you dusted the tea and sanded the sugar? Then come along to prayers."

Then in thought let us walk down Whitechapel with Jesus Christ—Christian Whitechapel with its forty public houses in one straight line within one quarter of a mile; with the shadows of women with babies in their arms thrown across the swaying glass doors of the gin palace; with the portals of the music hall standing wide open, licensed by Christian magistrates, where the songs sung are the very echoes of hell.

Turn down the side streets to the sweaters' dens, where worn and white women work for starvation wages; it is the necessary competition that keeps them chained day and night to Death's treadmill in this Christian land.

Go with Him at midnight among the women who walk the stony streets of shame; and dare we say to Him, "Evil has always existed, must always be," as say many modern exponents of His teaching? It is only a Christ-man, the anointed of God, who sees the world, not as man views it, but from the spiritual heights of hope, help and love. To many, the dreary, deeply dyed, ingrained conventionality on the one hand, and hereditary sin on the other, seem to paralyze all practical effort to face the existing situation from this divine standpoint. Hemmed in by exigent conditions, however much they may recognize the incongruities of our modern profession with our daily practice, they know that to them a complete revolution in their social conditions is at present impossible; but the great law of spiritual dynamics must always be, "According to thy faith be it unto thee." It is the attitude of mind, heart and purpose that determines our Christianity. We may not all of us be able to take at once "the middle of the road," and keep step with the marching hosts who are told off to active service, but if our hearts keep time to the rhythm of the music of Christ's militant army it will not be long before we shall find ourselves among them.

To be a Christian means to count one's self in and not out when any new adaptation of Christianity presents itself, and makes its appeal to hearts ripened in the sunshine of God to a tenderness that renders them responsive to every need of human brotherhood. It means to despise no smallest opportunity to make the way of life safer and better for all about us. It is an attitude of mind that my mother used to define by saying that it would always cause us to stoop to pick up the pin that might injure another. It is an infinite tenderness to individual weakness and error—the patience of a mother for the fretful, wayward child. . . . To women the call of opportunity comes in this kindly age as never hitherto. They are no longer gleaners, but strong-armed harvesters in the white fields of God.

The temperance reform, the purity crusade, the care of the defective, dependent, and delinquent class, the city "settlements" that bring our most consecrated young people into contact with the lives most cursed by poverty and sin, the work of that great new dispensation, the Salvation Army, and a hundred other missionary and social efforts, all send their earnest plea for help to every young woman who has a heart to hear and heed. The pinched lips of custom no longer cry, "Thus far shalt thou go and no farther"; but the glad tidings come from the book of inspiration newly given to this more enlightened age, "The Lord gave the word; the women that published the tidings are a great host."

But although to be a Christian does not involve the tooth and fang and claw red with the blood of martyrs, it does always involve the sneers of cynics, the arrows of relentless criticism, and the cheap wit of the thoughtless and the crude; and perhaps hardest of all to face is the stern fact that the "world's people," as they are called, will not deal more severely with one who in every-day life would follow Christ in theory and in practice, than will many of those who in our time as in His are called "chief priests and rulers."

But above the jangling of voices of this dissonant age sounds the ever-reassuring voice, with its other-worldly message, "He that loses his life shall find it." Find it, not in opal clouds only, that are our imaginations' stairway to the New Jerusalem; find it not in day-dreams about the golden street, the robes of white, or the choirs of angel voices; but find it, this true, holy, higher life, here and now, in the redemption of the tempted, the regeneration of the home, the purification of our social life, and the rehabilitation of the state; find it in the laughter of the children, in the smiles on the weary faces of women, in the deep-voiced thanks of men restored to the liberty wherewith Christ maketh free; find it in the peace that no man taketh from us, the eternal union of the human and the divine.

RESOLUTIONS.

PREAMBLE.

We, members of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union assembled in this, the twentieth year of our organization, render thanks to the Lord our God for His protecting care and guidance in the years that have passed, and pray that more entire consecration may mark our service in the future. We reaffirm our allegiance to the mighty work that has been ours and that is before us, looking unceasingly to the only source of power, the Lord our Master.

Resolved, That the right of franchise should not be extended to foreigners until they have become thoroughly acquainted with our laws and institutions; and that a uniform naturalization law be placed upon our statute books.

WHEREAS, The object for which the Woman's Christian Temperance Union was organized, is the abolition of the liquor traffic; therefore,

Resolved, That we pledge our moral support to the Prohibition party, which is the only party that in its platform and by its ballots declares for protection of the home against the saloon, for the enfranchisement of woman, and for the preservation of the Sabbath; and that wherever the gathering forces of reform come under this banner, we are with them for every righteous cause.

GOVERNMENTAL.

Inasmuch as there has been introduced into both houses of Congress a bill to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors in the District of Columbia, and

Inasmuch as the congressmen who introduced it propose to introduce other bills to prohibit the said traffic in the territories so as to make the question of prohibition national, therefore

Resolved, That we memorialize Congress to pass such prohibitory bills.

Inasmuch as our work among emigrants at Ellis Island is seriously hindered by the rescinding of the order (which three years ago we secured) prohibiting the sale of liquor at our ports of entry, therefore,

Resolved, That we memorialize Congress to re-establish that order.

Resolved, That in view of the increasing lawlessness in our country we denounce the lynchings, burnings and torturings of our fellow-citizens for real or supposed crimes; and that we demand, in the name of justice and humanity, that no one, however guilty, be deprived of life or liberty without due process of law.

Inasmuch as in many of our states the age of legal protection for girls extends scarcely beyond babyhood, be it

Resolved, That each union in every state where such law exists, be urged to use its influence with its legislatures toward raising such age to at least eighteen years.

RELIGIOUS.

Resolved, That we rejoice in the recent decision of the International Sunday-school Convention of St. Louis, whereby the action of the Pittsburg Convention regarding the Quarterly Temperance Lessons was confirmed and these lessons made a permanency in the regular course of the International Lesson Series.

WHEREAS, We believe that as a Christian nation we should stand for the Lord's day as a day of rest, therefore,

Resolved, That we condemn the World's Fair Directory for their lawless disregard of the express will of the people in opening the Fair on the Sabbath day.

SOCIAL.

WHEREAS, The white ribbon being the symbol chosen by the Woman's Christian Temperance Union to express the principles and loyalty of its organization.

Resolved, That we magnify the importance of wearing the bow of white on all occasions, knowing it to be a great help and encouragement to our faithful and earnest workers and a constant silent protest against the legalized liquor traffic.

WHEREAS, We condemn gambling, therefore,

Resolved, That we discountenance the card table in the club room and the progressive games in the homes of Christian women.

Resolved, That while congratulating the Michigan women upon having obtained municipal suffrage we, with them, will continue to work for full suffrage.

We send our warm congratulations to the British Women's Temperance Association upon its adoption of the "Do-Everything Policy," as opposed to the "One Plank Platform" and on the re-election, without an opposing candidate, of Lady Henry Somerset, that champion of progressive movements on the part of reformers as well as reforms.

Resolved, That as our round-the-world missionaries, Mrs. Elizabeth Wheeler Andrew and Dr. Kate Bushnell, in their investigations and labors in India, have struck the heaviest blow ever yet dealt to sex-slavery, that we rejoice in the vindication of their honor and integrity by the public apology of Gen. Lord Roberts, Commander-in-Chief of the British Army in India, at the time of their work in that country.

Resolved, That we express to Lady Henry Somerset our deep sense of her devotion to our beloved President in the months that are past and that, as she again leaves our shores—followed by our tenderest regards and the affections of hearts ennobled by her presence and uplifting words in our Convention—that she bear to our precious leader the sympathy, the prayers, the unfaltering love of the most loyal constituency on the globe.

Resolved, That we rejoice in the work of the National Reform Association which is soon to celebrate its thirtieth anniversary, and whose aim is identical with that of this organization to enthrone Christ the King of the cloisters, the camp and the court.

THANKS.

Resolved, That we express our heartfelt thanks to Mrs. Caroline B. Buell and Miss Esther Pugh for the ability and fidelity with which they have served for many years the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and that our loving appreciation will follow them in their retirement from our service.

Resolved, That we tender our thanks to our White Ribbon prima donna, Mrs. Alice J. Harris, of Massachusetts, for her services in our behalf. Regretting her enforced absence at close of Convention, we are grateful to Mrs. Frances Graham, of New York, for so ably supplying her place.

"Luvbyrd Goes a-Courting" is one of several humorous contributions to the "Lighter Vein" department,—illustrated by C. D. Gibson.

THE NEW NOVEL BY MARK TWAIN, which will begin in the December CENTURY, like several of Mark Twain's stories, has for its scene a steamboat town on the Mississippi River forty years ago. It is perhaps the most dramatic novel that Mark Twain has ever written. "Pudd'nhead Wilson," a hard-headed country lawyer, furnishes much of the fun that one naturally expects to find in a story by the author of "The Innocents Abroad," but he appears in quite another light in the murder trial which forms the thrilling climax of the story. The plot introduces a novel and ingenious employment of science in the detection of crime. The story will run through six or seven numbers. Other important serials to begin soon include:

> There is this trouble about special providences,—namely: there is often a doubt as to which party was intended to be the beneficiary. In the case of the Children, the Bears and the Prophet, the bears got more real satisfaction out of the episode than the prophet did, because they got the children.—PUDD'NHEAD WILSON'S CALENDAR.

A NEW SERIES OF COLE'S ENGRAVINGS.

The publication in THE CENTURY of engravings of Old Italian Masters by Timothy Cole has made an epoch in the history of American art by the popularization of the work of the world's greatest painters. Mr. Cole is now engaged upon a supplemental series on the Old Dutch Masters, the first results of which are such as one might expect from the enthusiasm of Mr. Cole in his new work. The first of these will appear in the Christmas number.

IMPORTANT PAPERS ON MUSIC.

Following the articles already printed in THE CENTURY on musical topics by such eminent composers as Messrs. Gounod, Massenet, and Saint-Saëns, THE CENTURY will print a group of similar papers on the great composers of the past, from the pens of the most famous of living musicians. These will include a brilliant paper on Schumann by Grieg, another on Schubert by Dvořák, a third on Berlioz by Reyer, the composer of "Salammbô," and others of equal interest. A study of Grieg by William Mason will appear soon.

IMPORTANT EXPEDITIONS.

At the present time THE CENTURY is gathering, and will soon print, the results of expeditions recently completed or now being carried out in distant and little-visited parts of all the five great continents of the world.

December will be a great Christmas Number.

Four Dollars will bring you this splendid magazine for one year. Begin with the new volume, November number. THE CENTURY is always issued ON THE FIRST DAY OF THE MONTH. Dealers will receive subscriptions, or remittances may be made to the publishers direct by check, draft, money- or express-order, or registered letter. Single numbers 35 cents each.

A Lansingburg Miracle.

A RAILWAY MAN TALKS.

Literally Half Dead, His Case Pronounced Hopeless by Prominent Physicians. A Story of Surpassing Interest Verified under Oath.

(From Troy, N. Y., Times.)

I am the most conservative reporter on the staff. I despise the chimerical, I court the real. I burrow in facts. I am from Lansingburg. We don't often get a good thing from there, but here is one. F. C. Kimball last night gave me the following:

"I am a plain, straightforward man. Originally from Lansingburg, where now reside my mother, brother and sister. Several years ago I moved to Rochester. There I was in the employ of the Erie Railroad as yard and freight superintendent. After a strain to my back, caused by heavy lifting, three years ago, I developed so-called rheumatism. It was an increasing thing for two years,—at times worse, again better. I worked intermittently. If I would shut my eyes I would fall down. My feet and legs soon lost feeling—were numb. This extended to my stomach and at times to my hands. Doctors Lee and Spencer of Rochester finally pronounced my case progressive locomotor ataxia, said it was incurable, and that they could only ease my sufferings, and so I lay. Up to this time I had been sick nearly two years. Before this and for several months I was confined to my bed. Pins stuck into my limbs the full length gave me no feeling whatever; my legs seemed wooden. To pound them gave off a noise like wood. So I say, as I lay there I was absolutely one-half dead—dead from the waist down. There was one word written in large characters all over that sick room—C-L-A-Y. Life departed from my limbs, that word best expressed what was left. You, of course, have read of John Marshall. The reporter in describing him, described me exactly. I sent for the remedy which cured him,—for Dr. Williams' Pink Pills, to Schenectady, N. Y., and tried them. I took them irregularly for two months. They didn't seem to help. All of a sudden one morning one of my legs began to prickle—seemed as though rubbed with nettles. Then, perhaps, you think I did not investigate that medicine. I began to mend fast; got some circulation, got control of my bowels and after a few weeks got out of bed and tried to stand. At last I fetched it. Could walk—now can run. And Pink Pills cured me. The doctors said I couldn't be cured, but I am. What I am now telling you is merely a reiteration of what I long ago wrote to the Dr. Williams' Medicine Company at Schenectady, and my affidavit to the same is now in their hands. Here also is a letter which my mother wrote to them and to which she has made affidavit, as you see."

186 Second Ave., LANSINGBURG, N. Y.

Dear Sirs:—My son Fred has just written you a letter concerning himself to which I desire to add a few words in entire corroboration of all he has said. He has told you of his agony and his cure. The remembrance of the whole thing makes me shudder as I think of it. It is all too wonderful for me. I was resigned to his fate. Now as I look at him walking about and feeling well, with his old health and ambition returned, it does seem that he has been born again and rescued from death for a fact. Could I, therefore, say too much to you of thanks in the fullness of my gratitude? Can I well cease blessing you? Yet the intensity of my feelings makes my words of thanksgiving to you seem but empty indeed; for the lost is found, and he that was dead is alive again.

Yours,
HARRIET J. KIMBALL.

Sworn and subscribed before me this 5th day of April, 1893. M. L. FANCHER, Notary Public.

Mrs. Kimball said: "While I believe in answers to prayer and prayed earnestly for his recovery, for I am a Christian woman, and believe my prayers were answered, I do think Pink Pills were the means the Lord used to effect my son's cure. I want you to meet my daughter, Mrs. G. H. Morrison, with whom we are living here, and the Rev. George Fairlee, pastor of Westminster Church, who lives with us, and hear what they have to say." So Mrs. Kimball brought them in, and while the story as told was most complete and could be added to by nothing they might say, yet the reporter heard from the lips of the sister and their pastor, corroborative words of all that has been said. The reporter also ran across the son-in-law, Mr. G. H. Morrison, cashier of the National bank of Troy, and spoke to him of Mr. Kimball. He is a busy man and though he could only be detained for a moment, he said: "I know nothing of the case technically. He says he was cured by Dr. Williams' Pink Pills, and I think that is about the size of it."

Mr. William H. Flandreau, the druggist at 814 River St., Troy, said: "It is the most wonderful cure from locomotor ataxia—a so-called incurable disease. Mr. Kimball tells me he owes his recovery to Pink Pills entirely and I have every reason to believe him."

Pink Pills restore pale people and sallow complexions to the glow of health, and are a specific for all the troubles peculiar to the female sex, while in the case of men they effect a radical cure in all cases arising from mental worry, overwork or excesses of whatever nature.

These Pills are manufactured by the Dr. Williams' Medicine Company, Schenectady, N. Y., and Brockville, Ont., and are sold in boxes (never in loose form by the dozen or hundred and the public are cautioned against numerous imitations sold in this shape) at 50 cents a box, or six boxes for $2.50, and may be had of all druggists or direct by mail from Dr. Williams' Medicine Company from either address.

Publisher's Notes.

A PHILANTHROPY FUND.

Now and then there come to us burning words of appreciation, which we reproduce that the fire may be enkindled in other hearts. The following is from the pen of a motherless girl, but fifteen years of age: "Iam only a poor girl, fifteen years old. I have no mother, and I have to keep house for my papa and take care of the children. There are five children of us, the youngest seven years old, but, thank God, this is a temperance family and a Christian home, though we are very poor. I just cannot get along without my UNION SIGNAL, for I cannot attend meetings much, and it is such a blessing to me; so, if you possibly can, please continue the paper until I can get the money, and I will send it to you. The love to work for temperance so burns in my soul sometimes I can hardly stay at home. Your true temperance sister."

It is needless to say THE UNION SIGNAL will still make its weekly visits to this humble home.

We wish our more fortunate temperance workers would supply us with a "philanthropy fund" to meet just such demands as these. Who will take the initiative?

Co. G, Orphan Asylum, Milwaukee, Wis.

"The tears welled up from my heart as I read the touching letter of the young girl who is mothering her little brothers and sisters, and 'cannot get along without THE UNION SIGNAL.' Bless the dear girl! I know who would delight 'to take the initiative' in starting a 'Philanthropy Fund'—my bright little Co. G in the orphan asylum of this city (Milwaukee). The children count it a great joy to give from their limited treasury, and I think other L. T. L's in Wisconsin will gladly follow. Co. G will give $1 now; more by-and-by."

RELIGIOUS EVENT OF THE 19th CENTURY

The recent proceedings of the

WORLD'S PARLIAMENT OF RELIGIONS

held in the Memorial Art Palace, in Chicago, September 11-27, inclusive, under the auspices of the World's Columbian Exposition, has been characterized as a step of 100 years into the future.

CHRISTIANS, MOHAMMEDANS, BUDDHISTS, CONFUCIANS, BRAHMINS, HINDOOS, alike were listened to with eagerness, and by great multitudes.

THE GOOD TO GROW OUT OF THE GREAT CONGRESS OF RELIGIONS would be almost nullified if the world could not have at hand, in a convenient form, what was said and done at this great gathering.

WE HAVE MADE ARRANGEMENTS TO SUPPLY A REPORT OF THE PROCEEDINGS OF THE CONGRESS at a phenominally low price, so as to put the work within the reach of all.

These proceedings will be issued in eleven weekly parts, the first on October 30th. They have been carefully re-edited from the verbatim newspaper reports, and are handsomly illustrated with nearly 100 portraits of noted speakers.

Signal Notes.

A PINT of wine makes a deal of noise.

DR. CUYLER says of some ships going to Africa that "heaven goes in the cabin and hell in the ship's hold." How long will it take us to convert the heathen in this style?

THE annual import of opium in Japan is but one thousand three hundred pounds, and it is used for medical purposes only, a striking contrast that between the eleven million pounds sent into China.

SWITZERLAND was the first European country to incorporate in its constitution the principle that it is the duty of the state to protect its working classes by prohibiting excessive hours of labor.

LIEUTENANT WINGFIELD, of the English army, walked six hundred and fifty miles in twenty-six days, never at a lower altitude than thirteen thousand feet, a remarkable feat, and performed entirely without stimulants.

AN English surgeon distinguishes between drunkenness and inebriety in this way: The drunkard is a person who drinks whenever he has an opportunity; the inebriate is a person born with an unsound mind; the one is vicious, the other diseased.

THE cause of the workmen is gaining headway in every part of Europe. A royal commission in Holland framed after the English model has been investigating the condition of the laboring class. The wages are very low and the hours excessively long. The report calls attention to the general effort to prevent Sunday labor, although the workmen are said to be growing irreligious.

THE aptitude of children to imitate their elders has often been illustrated by the anecdote of the boy at the dinner party who said, "I'll take what father takes." But it was never better illustrated than in the following incident. A gentleman had occasion to take a walk early one morning after a light fall of snow. He met a young man who was the father of a bright eight-year-old boy. Farther along he saw the boy coming, looking intently on the ground and acting rather strangely. Upon approaching him, the boy looked up beamingly and pointing to the ground said: "There's my father's tracks," and continued on with long strides following in his father's footsteps.

COMMENDATOR BODIO, who conducts the statistical department for the Italian government has published a resumé of the incidents of crime during twelve years, in which he finds that crime is steadily on the increase. Another authority declares that the increase of alcoholism and of crime are coincident. The two reports show that in the wine-growing countries of the South there is the same tale of misery and want and crime as among the northern races. In five years, from 1887 to 1891, two thousand two hundred and thirty-four persons died of delirium tremens and dipsomania. By the new Italian penal code, drunkenness is made a specific crime, and in 1890 there were over sixteen thousand convictions for it.

THE success of the so-called institutional church in reaching the "masses" in our large cities is as marked as is the failure of many of the more aristocratic up town churches. The object of the institutional church is to begin with the people just where they are, to meet the needs of which they are conscious, and so generally lead them to be conscious of needs higher and nobler. Berkeley Temple, Boston, is doing much in the preventive and reformatory lines. The temperance guild is the most remarkable feature of the institute and it is stated that ninety per cent are permanently redeemed from intemperance. An orphanage for boys taken from the slums and a vacation home for working girls are under the support of the Temple. The Dorcastry, the special organization for women and girls, provides instruction in practical subjects.

How clean and neat,
How fresh and sweet
The kitchen looks,—a charmed retreat
Where one might sit
And weave a bit
Of homely rhyme, describing it.

Had I the skill
To make, at will,
A picture of the place, I'd fill
The sketch with hint
Of tone and tint
From the deft housewife's magic mint

Of neatness, and,
With cunning hand,
I'd draw those "Ivory" cubes that stand
On yonder shelf,
Among the delf,
Each one a treasure in itself!

Cancer, Lupus and Tumors.

Dr. McMichael, of Chicago, who has made the subject a special study for twenty-five years, has recently published the result of his investigations in his treatise on "Cancer and Tumors." It is a work of sixty-four pages, characterized by plain, unvarnished statements, and its total absence of extravagant and bombastic claims inspires the confidence of the reader, whose reason and common sense are appealed to. Dr. McMichael is an authority in his special branch of science, and has achieved remarkable success. By his method he succeeds in effecting permanent cures in 80 per cent of cases treated, without cutting; while 97 per cent of the cases operated upon with the knife eventually die from return of disease. The most remarkable features of the work are the reports of cases extending over a period of twenty years. In many instances the disease had been cut out by surgeons two and three times, and then given up as hopeless, and were afterwards cured by Dr. McMichael's method. Copies of the book will be sent free to any address. In writing please send the addresses of friends who would be interested, and copies will be sent to them also.

It does not advertise a medicine or any other catch-penny device.

SINCE OUR LAST ISSUE.

Japan has been suffering from floods.

Packing up has been the work of the week at the World's Fair.

President Peixoto, of Brazil, is organizing a fleet to defeat the rebellious admiral.

William T. Stead, the editor of the Review of Reviews, London, arrived in Chicago last week.

The World's Fair closed with a cash balance of $2,500,000 in the treasury and all debts paid.

The British troops have defeated the Matabeles in South Africa and captured Buluawayo, the stronghold of the natives.

Miss Clara Barton presented a memorial to Congress November 2, asking assistance for the sufferers from the Southern cyclones.

The members of the British House of Commons reassembled in London, November 2, Mr. Gladstone being received with applause.

Potter Palmer, husband of the president of the Board of Lady Managers, has donated $200,000 for a woman's permanent memorial building in Chicago.

The Geary Chinese law has been declared constitutional, but Congress last Thursday passed an amendment extending the time in which Chinamen may register.

Mrs. Palmer delivered her final report to the Board of Lady Managers Friday. She was given a banquet in the evening and a testimonial in the form of a valuable medal.

An additional endowment of $550,000 has been secured by the Chicago Theological Seminary (Congregational) from the raising of a fund which was consummated last week.

By the explosion of a contraband cargo of dynamite on board a burning vessel in the harbor of Santander, Spain, November 3, a most shocking destruction of life and property is reported.

President Cleveland appended his signature, November 2, to the silver repeal bill, which relieves the United States Treasury from the enforced purchase of fifty-four million ounces of silver yearly.

The Indian commission to the five civilized tribes which was authorized by the last Congress has just been appointed by the President, the members being ex-Senator Dawes, of Massachusetts, M. H. Kidd, of Indiana, and A. S. McKennon, of Arkansas.

THE report of the annual meeting of W. T. P. A. stockholders and directors will be found on page 13.

JENNIE SMITH, our National railway evangelist, led several most helpful meetings last week in Willard Hall. In her own thoughtful manner of seeing ways to help that others have neglected, she discovered next door to the Hall a city fire engine house, where at the close of a noon meeting she held an impressive service with the firemen, giving them an invitation to the daily noon meetings, which they heartily and gratefully accepted. Mrs. Matthews, of England, Madame Barakat, of Syria, and Miss Frances Griffin have also given helpful and inspiring service as leaders. On last Saturday Mr. Moody spoke in Willard Hall to an audience that overflowed into the corridor. This is the first of a series of meetings at the noon hour to be conducted under the management of Mr. Moody, and more eagerly than ever do those that "hunger and thirst" for the "bread of heaven" and the "water of life" come where they can find spiritual food. Of all the tides that ebb and flow in the tempestuous sea of life, none is so blessed as the "noon-tide" of prayer, when we may grant to our goaded souls a hush that is holy enough to let us hear the footsteps of angels.

FURTHER statements concerning the white cap affair in Osceola, Neb., will be read with interest in our correspondence columns. Mrs. Hitchcock, the state president, is at present investigating the matter, and will write THE UNION SIGNAL full particulars concerning it. By the affidavit already published it will be seen that the W. C. T. U. officially had nothing whatever to do with it.

A DISPATCH from Topeka, Kan., states that a Grand Island railroad agent at St. Joseph, Mo., has refused to accept a shipment of wine because it is contrary to the state prohibitory law which subjects to a fine any common carrier that transports liquor sold in violation of the law. With agents such as this guarding the fort at every "port of entry" to prohibition domains, we would hold our own and present an incontrovertible object lesson to would-be violators and antagonists.

IT is said that a more cringing, cowardly, nerve-shattered prisoner was never seen in a courtroom than Patrick Prendergast when summoned to answer to the indictment for the murder of Mayor Harrison, at Chicago. That such a miserable, fear-stricken object could have dared a murderous deed can only be accounted for on the supposition of temporary insanity. The pity is that such moral incapables and brain-clouded beings cannot be legally confined before their insane malevolence finds vent upon a chosen object.

OUR round-the-world missionaries, whose presence lent such an inspiration to our conventions, have all departed to their foreign fields. Miss Ackermann sailed November 1, and has already reached England, whence, after a short rest, she will proceed directly to Australia to again take up her duties of Australasian W. C. T. U. president. She will resign the presidency in March next, at the time of the annual meeting, and continue her temperance missionary journey around the world. Miss Ackermann's address for the winter will be 2 Francis street, Hyde Park, Sydney, New South Wales.

MRS. ANDREW and Dr. Bushnell left Chicago November 3, and sailed from New York on the 8th instant. A few days only will be spent in England, as passage is engaged in an India vessel early in December from Brindisi, Italy. They expect to reach Burma January 3, and will remain there a month, strengthening and organizing unions and reviving our work and workers. They will give two months each to China and Japan and plan to reach Honolulu the middle of July. Two more months will be given to the Sandwich Islands, and San Francisco will be reached by the first of September, if no interruption occurs to their arrangements. Our country is to be congratulated on the prospect of having these two consecrated workers on their native soil in another ten months.

MR. J. B. WESTENIUS, the delegate from Sweden, representing one hundred and twenty thousand Good Templars to the recent Grand Lodge Convention of I. O. G. T. in Des Moines, Iowa, was a most interesting and interested visitor in W. C. T. U. headquarters last week. He said he could not return to Sweden until he had thoroughly studied the church, school and temperance questions of America. His conclusion for the latter was that the women are doing a wonderful work here, but he would like to have them introduce a new department in the W. C. T. U.—one that shall teach American temperance men how to work. Mr. Westenius returns to Sweden determined to introduce W. C. T. U. methods into the Swedish work. While here he has lived among laborers in order to study the American labor question from the standpoint of the masses, instead of the politician's, varying his investigations by excursions into some of the great colleges and universities. It is seldom so practical and wide searching a worker crosses our pathway.

THE British committee on state regulation of vice held a meeting in the Westminster town hall, London, November 1. Many leaders of the social purity movement were present. Mr. Stansfeld, M. P., presided. He declared it was the duty of parliament to prevent the iniquities in India which Mrs. Andrew and Dr. Bushnell had exposed, and a resolution was adopted urging that immediate steps be taken to secure the discussion of this abominable evil in the House of Commons. Great Britain is thoroughly aroused over the matter and it is certain aggressive measures will be adopted.

TWELVE states held elections last Tuesday, four of which elected governors—Massachusetts, Ohio, Iowa and Virginia. Iowa, which has been prohibition battle-ground for many years, has had a Democratic governor for two years. According to the Republican papers, since their party has "dropped prohibition as a political issue this year, it stands an excellent chance to win." We go to press before the returns are in and do not know how this prophecy of the success of the backsliders has been fulfilled. But we trust there are sufficient loyal anti-liquor men in the state to insure the integrity of its home protection laws.

A PLAN to remove the Manufactures building to a central location in Chicago, for use as a People's Palace on the plan of the one in London, England, is being favorably considered by prominent Chicagoans. William T. Stead urged the idea at a labor meeting, saying, "I got here from London in time to attend the closing day of the Fair, but that day's pleasure only was worth the trip. Above all else, though, the idea came to me that some of the palaces standing there should be dedicated to the use of the common people. Little outlay would be necessary to remove and alter some building so that a people's palace could be created. It would be a city hall for the labor interests, a headquarters with reception rooms and drawing rooms for the use of the people. In London and Glasgow we have found that besides the parks for the use of the people in summer we need covered places where they can enjoy their leisure hours in winter. In Glasgow it is proposed to erect winter gardens for the people in every populous center in the city." We cannot have too many such resorts in our congested cities to counteract the deadly influence of the saloon rendezvous. May this project materialize in a definite form.

TOTAL abstinence from a Christian standpoint has at last been crystalized into organization. An entirely new religious movement in national form has originated in New York City. It is called "The Christian Men's Union for Total Abstinence," and its object is "to arouse Christian men throughout the nation, and organize them into unions for united effort, in Christ's name, to save the youth from spirituous and fermented beverages, and to rescue those already enslaved." It calls upon all Christians to lay aside political and denominational differences, and join this purely interdenominational, unsectarian and non-political society. Such aggressive work as holding meetings in liquor saloons on Sunday afternoons is a part of the plan. In other words, these good men seem to be beginning just where the good women began in Hillsboro, Ohio, twenty years ago. Query: Will they follow out the natural sequence as fearlessly and stand where the W. C. T. U. stands to-day—prohibition for the nation as well as total abstinence for the individual. We welcome this new union, and believe it will be a strong ally of our older union, but we beg of its members, who have the sacred rights of the ballot box, to remember that a Sunday afternoon prayer-meeting in a saloon will not go far in coping with the demoniacal spirits that live there unmolested during the other six and a half days of the week. Preach total abstinence, yes, preach it from the housetops; but at the same time vote out the saloon, that vampire of our Christian civilization!

PASS IT ON.

BY HENRY BURTON, M. A.

Have you had a kindness shown?
Pass it on;
'Twas not given for thee alone,
Pass it on;
Let it travel down the years,
Let it wipe another's tears,
Till in heaven the deed appears—
Pass it on.

Did you hear the loving word—
Pass it on;
Like the singing of a bird?
Pass it on;
Let its music live and grow,
Let it cheer another's woe,
You have reaped what others sow,
Pass it on.

'Twas the sunshine of a smile—
Pass it on;
Staying but a little while!
Pass it on;
April beam, the little thing,
Still it wakes the flowers of Spring,
Makes the silent birds to sing—
Pass it on.

Have you found the heavenly light?
Pass it on;
Souls are groping in the night,
Daylight gone;
Hold thy lighted lamp on high,
Be a star in some one's sky,
He may live who else would die,
Pass it on.

Be not selfish in thy greed,
Pass it on;
Look upon thy brother's need,
Pass it on;
Live for self you live in vain,
Live for Christ you live again,
Live for Him, with Him you reign—
Pass it on.

Liscard, Liverpool, Eng.

A TWO-EDGED CIRCUMSTANCE.

BY MRS. F. M. HOWARD.

"Well, uncle Bartly, when are you coming out to visit us?"

The querist sat at the abundant breakfast table of a Western farmer; a table laden with everything needed to satisfy the most exacting appetite.

"Wall, I re'ly don't know, Jinnie. It's hard to leave the farm, and then too the railroads charge so all-fired steep fer carryin' a feller, that it seems like throwing good money away to travel. What with payin' taxes and hired help, a farmer don't get much rest for the sole of his foot, now, that's a fact."

"But he gets enough to eat, at all events;" the young woman glanced over the table with an amused smile.

"Yes, vittles is tol'able plenty in most farmhouses, I'll allow. If it wasn't for the taxes them town folks is always a-pilin' up, and the extortions of the monopolists, a farmer's life would be a middlin' free an' comf'table one."

"But the more desirable a town is made as a dwelling place, the greater the value of land in its vicinity as I understand it."

"Wall—yes,—" with some reluctance. "I vallied my farm at forty dollars an acre before the town folks down yonder put in their artesian waterworks, and built the bridge, and the new court-house. I wouldn't take less'n sixty for't now."

"I'll bet you wouldn't tell that to the tax assessor, pa," remarked a bright boy of twelve.

"Wall, no, Holly. I'm a middlin' poor man when he comes 'round. Of course I wouldn't lie to no man to save a dollar, but it don't pay to be too all-fired candid in this world. Ef a man don't look out for himself there ain't nobody going to look out for him."

"I suppose that is true, uncle, on general principles," the young lady answered with a smile. She was a bright-eyed, wide-awake Eastern teacher, accustomed to thinking for herself and others, and with her share of the typical New England shrewdness.

"But to come back to the subject of your visit East; I have a plan to propose. When I bought my ticket to Chicago, through mistake the agent handed me two instead of one. A stray drop of mucilage had stuck them together, and I did not discover it until after I started. Now, if you will go back with me you can come home on this ticket. It is good for ninety days, so you will have plenty of time."

"Wall, wall, Jinnie, you was in luck, sure," laughed the farmer. "You got a good one on the railroads that time; serves 'em right. They'll pick a man's pocket, an' then turn it inside out if they get a chance, and I like to see 'em come up with onct in a while. What d'ye say, mother? Think I'd better go?"

"Why, yes, father, I reckon you'll never get a better chance. Holly and I can run the farm."

"But, pa, is it—is it just honest to use the ticket without paying for it?" The young boy's frank blue eyes had a shade of trouble in them.

"Honest! ha-ha-ha," roared the farmer. "Of course it's honest, Holly. What'll them rich corporations know or care for the vally of one ticket. Their divydends at the end o' the year'll be fat enough without that, I reckon. Never you worry about that, Holly—the railroads gouge the farmers whenever they can get a chance, and it's no more'n fair to play 'em tit for tat."

Holly joined in the laugh, still the doubt in his honest young heart was not entirely relieved. He could not see how (if it was wrong to cheat at marbles, or to lie in trading jack-knives, points in honor which had been carefully instilled into his mind) it could be right to profit by another's mistake, even at the expense of a rich corporation. At that rate, if he could find a rich man's watch he would be justified in keeping it, since the owner would be perfectly able to buy himself another, a tempting conclusion — as a watch was the very height of his boyish ambition. Then, too, following the logic, anything which one might find of another's was fair prey, provided the original owner was rich enough, and mean enough to deserve the loss.

Altogether the line of reasoning led to very puzzling conclusions, and, very wisely, Holly settled back on the three "Shalt nots," which he had already made the guide of his young life, "Thou shalt not steal, Thou shalt not bear false witness, Thou shalt not covet," and quietly resolved that he would have nothing, so long as he lived, that carried a doubt with it.

Jennie Mason's first impulse had been, upon finding the surplus ticket, to return it at once to the agent who had made the mistake; then, as the train rushed along, some such specious reasoning as Bartly Mason had employed came to her mind, and she resolved to defer the matter at least until she reached home again, never dreaming in her ignorance of the routine of business in a railroad office, that the loss would affect anything but the sum total of the road's earnings.

Bartly Mason took the trip. His wife packed his grip with sincere delight that he was going to have a change after his many years of faithful labor on the farm. She was one of those unselfish, plodding souls, who take up the routine of living with the precision and regularity of a machine. Occasionally the oil of ambition failed, and she would lay off for a day with an exhausting headache or other ailment, but she never dreamed of stopping the machinery long enough to give the parts a complete rest. What will such women do when they are stranded in heaven at last, without any milkpails to wash, no hungry men to cook for three times a day, with lunches between times in harvest, unless, as "Gates Ajar" suggests, there should be a heavenly dairy fitted up in some corner of the city where lonely farmers' wives may occasionally ply their old occupations, and rest from the monotony of rest.

It was a small country town from which Jennie Mason had started on her Western trip, one of those sleepy little places which seems carved out in stone, so impregnable is it to the assaults of time. The houses look just as they did twenty-five years ago. The wheels of progress had shut up shop and taken in their sign long ago, and one could go there after years of absence and locate, in the night, every spot he had ever known. In such a town the railroad agent is a sort of huckster at the trade of transportation—passenger, freight, express agent and telegraph operator combined, at a salary so small that there is no possibility of his becoming a bloated bondholder off his savings.

The agent in this town in particular, James Franklin, barely managed to eke out a scanty living, for there were four hungry little mouths to fill, and the mother not strong. They lived in rooms over the station. Mr. Franklin came upstairs at the end of the month with a troubled face; the very day on which Mr. Mason and his niece were starting away from the World's Fair city for the East.

"What is it, James?" his wife asked anxiously, as he sat by the table, barely tasting the food which she had prepared with special deference to his tastes. She had come to dread the monthly balancing of the office, revealing, as it sometimes did, errors which had not appeared in the less searching weekly statement.

"There's a ticket lost, Martha," he replied, with a furtive look toward the children, those "little pitchers" whose ears he dreaded to fill with the tale of family care. "I missed it three weeks ago, but I hoped I might have mislaid it, or that it would turn up from some source."

"Oh, James, was it for a long distance?"

"To Chicago, Martha. There was quite a rush that week and I sold more tickets than at any time this season, most of them to strangers. I must have passed out two to somebody, and I hoped that whoever it was might be honest enough to return it."

"I fear not, dear. The most of people think that a stolen ride at the expense of a railroad company is the sweetest of luxuries." Mrs. Franklin's lips quivered and she could scarcely restrain her tears. It meant so much to them—the loss of a long distance ticket, and their sad eyes fell involuntarily on a thin, well-patched overcoat hanging in the entry.

"Well, never mind, Martha. I can wear the old coat another winter," he said with a pathetic effort at cheerfulness. "We never know just how much we can give up until we are obliged to make the trial."

But Martha did mind, and indulged in a hearty cry upon her knees in the little bedroom after her husband had gone down to his work. If it had been her own need to be sacrificed, she thought she could bear it better, but James had worried along so patiently with that old coat, year after year, and a passion of love and tenderness for him swept her very soul as the tears fell fast on the worn counterpane. She felt better as she rose from her knees. She had spoken to One who comforts His children even as she, the mother, drew her little ones close to her heart when they were grieved or hurt, and though the lost was not yet found, peace like the falling dew came to her trusting heart.

Another month rolled around, and the Indian summer was in its prime when Bartly Mason came to the little station to board the homebound train. He had enjoyed his visit greatly; had met old friends and acquaintances whom he had never expected to see again. He felt almost like a boy as he went over the old, unchanged haunts where he had spent his youth, and he could scarcely believe the language of his mirror which revealed wrinkles and gray hairs.

A friend, having business to transact farther on, had driven him to the station early, and there was an hour and more to spend before the train would arrive. The monotonous ticking of the telegraph was not very entertaining, and he strolled out upon the platform, seating himself on a box at the corner of the building, and had commenced whittling a stick when childish voices broke upon his ear.

The Franklin children were playing just around the corner—playing housekeeping with some boxes and a set of little, nicked dishes. Archie, aged ten, was the father, and May the eight year old mother, while the smaller tots were "the children."

"What makes you feel so bad, Archie?" said May with wifely solicitude, as she poured her mimic tea.

"It's that lost ticket," replied the little father with a deep sigh; "somebody's got it, and I'll have it to pay for out of my sal'ry."

Bartly Mason started, and involuntarily raised his hand toward his breast pocket.

"It's too bad," replied the little mother sympathetically. "If it was right near by, it wouldn't cost so much, but a-w-a-y off to Chicorgo makes it offal dispensive."

"Yes," Archie answered, "I shall have to wear the old overcoat this winter again, and it wasn't much warmer than a paper coat last winter." Evidently the ears of the "little pitchers" were not only large but intelligent, and they understood the situation perfectly.

Bartly sat there thinking deeply. He had not the least doubt but that the lost ticket which was making so much trouble in the home of a poorer man than himself, one who would have to suffer actual need in consequence, was the very one which lay snugly put away in his wallet at that moment, and the knowledge made his cheeks tingle. He knew even less of the routine of a railroad office than these little children, and he hastened into the office to investigate.

"S'pose you never do such a thing as lose a ticket, do ye?" he asked cautiously, after he had pumped the agent on business matters a few moments.

"Well, yes; such a thing might easily happen."

"Then somebody'd have a ride at the company's expense, I reckon."

"Oh, no, sir. You're quite mistaken. It wouldn't damage the company a penny's worth; it would be my loss entirely."

"You don't say! Now that's unjust—I'll vow it is!"

"No, not unjust at all, sir," Mr. Franklin replied with a sad smile. "I am responsible for every ticket placed in my hands for sale; any other system of doing business would place the company at the mercy of any or every dishonest person who might be able to get into their employ."

"They're able to stan' it," Mr. Mason answered somewhat hotly. "Look at the money they get out of us farmers all over this kentry."

"There are two sides to every question, sir," Mr. Franklin replied mildly. "Look at the enormous capital invested; every car represents thousands, every mile of track would buy a farm. I think, sir, if you were to run a railroad one day, you would gladly return to your farm and pay the railroads what seems to be even an exorbitant price for doing your business for you. We outsiders see only the smooth side of a capitalist's life, and have little conception of the weight of care great enterprises bring."

James Franklin went up to his dinner that day with a light heart and a happy smile.

"It was a well-to-do Western farmer who had it," he said, after he had told patient Martha that the missing ticket had been paid for. "Whoever bought the duplicate ticket had given it to him to return home with, and he actually thought he was doing the cause of justice good service in beating the railroad companies out of the price of it. I dare say he wouldn't steal a potato in the ordinary lines of life, and you should have seen his face when he understood the true state of the case, and paid over the money."

"I am so thankful," Mrs. Franklin replied, "but could he have used it without your stamp and signature?"

"Curiously enough, I had it all completed, ready for use. I remember being called away while I was selling tickets that day, and I must have laid another over it, and forgot that I had one already stamped. But it's all right now, so let me see you look happy again, little woman."

Bartly Mason was on his way home, also a happier and wiser man, for the just righting of a wrong; and he carried with him some new ideas of business management, also of strict honesty between man and man, regardless of station or employment;—a new definition of human rights slowly formed in his mind as he plodded between the plow handles.

OUR COUNTRY'S CRISIS.

An Impending Conflict Inevitable.

BY W. JENNINGS DEMOREST.

Our country is rapidly nearing the breakers of anarchy and despotism, and a revolution must come. It will need all our courage to face it, for we need not flatter ourselves that opposition to this fearful curse, the drink traffic, will be an easy and welcome task, or that we can be secure from its awful ravages by merely waiting, praying, or wishing for it, or that moral suasion, only, will reach and destroy this terrible cancer now eating into and consuming the morals and vitality of the nation.

TREMENDOUS OPPOSITION.

The enemies of our country, the liquor dealers, are now so thoroughly fortified and intrenched in their political relations, are so largely surrounded by selfish interests, and encouraged by numerous powerful allies, that they think themselves well-nigh impregnable, besides having a strong hold on the appetites and passions of their victims; these together with the prestige of custom, and a law of license on their side, altogether defy our endeavors to disturb and destroy their hold on the minds and habits of the people.

The liquor dealers and their allies also have many social means and methods which will call a halt on our enthusiasm, intimidate the apathetic with sophistical arguments about "personal liberty" and their old party obligations, and also appeal to the vile passions of the lawless elements of society, to obtain and perpetuate the privilege of poisoning the people with their fascinating and dehumanizing alcoholic poisons.

THE NECESSITY FOR ACTION.

But these formidable obstacles, comprising the selfish designs of this great liquor monopoly fortified by the habits and prejudices of the people, are among the mountains of difficulty that must be met and overcome, or our homes, the results of labor, our religion, indeed, our whole civilization, are destined to destruction, devastation, and ruin that will challenge all history with its awful horrors.

LAWLESSNESS AMONG THE PEOPLE.

These statements can be readily accepted, and the results easily foreseen if we realize the enormity of the numerous outbreaks of violence and passion, and the reign of terror resulting through the use of alcoholic poison in the slums of all our large cities, combined with the clamor of riotous outlaws, the ignorance, vice, crime and anarchy, now largely pervading the whole of society. This is especially apparent in the despotic rule of the irresponsible, unscrupulous oligarchy of liquor dealers and their allies, who now have control of our courts, our legislation, and nearly all the offices of trust and responsibility, all committed to the protection and perpetuation of this dangerous and piratical business.

A BASIS FOR REFLECTION.

These well-known and terrible facts should make all thinking men, laborers, merchants, all loyal patriots, tremble with fear and anxiety at the possibility of still greater business distress, accompanied by an outburst of crime and lawless outrages, to blight our industries and destroy our civilization. And all this may be the final outcome. Such considerations should arouse the people to an active and enthusiastic determination to throttle this cruel and vicious monster of injury and lawlessness without delay; and it can only be done by a relentless opposition. Active, conscientious conviction must take the place of apathy and indifference.

We must have no surrender, no evasion, no conciliation, no concession, no compromise, on this question of protection or toleration of this terrible curse of liquor selling.

THE BALLOT THE ONLY REMEDY.

Voters, in order to arrest business depression and save themselves and their homes from an impending doom of lawless riot, anarchy, and destruction, must rise in their political strength and strangle this fearful diabolism.

And now is a most auspicious time for determined, conscientious action. Our only alternative is the ballot! No cowards should be put on duty at this juncture of our country's emergency, in this war on alcoholic beverages. We have the right, we have the reason, and we have the remedy.

The ballot is to be our strong arm, our effective weapon of defense, and a sacred trust to be used for the destruction of this terrible curse of alcoholic poison. Justice and security demand that we make good use of this God-given privilege of freedom to vote for the right on this important issue. But how terrible will be our responsibility if this political duty be deferred until it is too late.

ALTERNATIONS FOR WEAL OR WOE.

Either a gloom of anarchy, terror and destruction to all enterprise and industry, or an awakening of bright hopes for future prosperity based on a moral revolution, awaits our prompt and decisive action; and this vital matter of success for both capital and labor, with security for our homes, is entirely dependent upon the expression of our conscience and patriotism through our votes at the ballot-box.

The moral dignity of our nation, the development of material prosperity, and the future of our civilization, with most important consequences for weal or woe to each individual, stand waiting in abeyance for your answer.

GOOD NEWS FROM NORWAY AND DENMARK.

BY REV. CARL F. ELTZHOLTZ.

NORWAY.

The Norwegian Total Abstinence Society held its twenty-sixth general meeting at Aalesund, Norway, Aug. 10-14, 1893. Hon. S. Aarrestad, the efficient president of the society and a member of the Norwegian parliament, (Storthinget) presided. The president stated that more than two hundred delegates had been registered. According to the official report from the board of managers, published in Menneskevennen, the society had, at the close of 1891, 853 local unions with about 100,000 members. In 1892, fifty new local unions with 2,908 members had joined the society. Five local unions, which either had disbanded or died, had been dropped from the list. The increase of new members had for the whole society been 4,071.

The Norwegian Total Abstinence Society had therefore at the close of 1892 a membership of 104,071 in 898 local unions. Of this number 16,727 are children or young people under sixteen years. The society had in 1892 fifty-six woman's temperance unions with a membership of 1,299, and seventy-three children's temperance unions with 7,208 members, and fifty-seven singing societies. Twenty-nine local unions have their own temperance halls.

The Norwegian temperance people are agitating for temperance in a most vigorous manner—through the written as well as the spoken word. In some public places they are posting temperance pictures which illustrate the bad effects of drink as well as the benefit of total abstinence. This is an excellent idea, such pictures posted in public places will undoubtedly do a great deal of good. The Norwegian government had appropriated 7,000 crowns to aid the society in its temperance work. The good cause is making sure progress in Norway. Under the competent leadership, with which it has been blessed from the beginning, it is gaining ground year by year.

DENMARK.

The Denmark Temperance Society held its fourteenth annual general meeting at Svendborg, Denmark, July 11-13, 1893. About 370 delegates had, according to a report in Dansk Afholdsblad, been registered. The meeting was opened with public worship in one of the churches. The Hon. Cl. Johannsen, who has been the successful president of the society since its organization, presided over its deliberations. He is highly esteemed by the temperance people for his work's sake. The president reported there had been an increase of 2,500 members during the year. The government appropriation to the temperance society had for the past year been 4,000 crowns. This sum has now been increased to 6,000 crowns.

The Rev. Dean Th. Sorensen, of Shanderborg, was reelected as vice-president by acclamation. Dean Sorensen is highly honored and much beloved by the Danish temperance people who in him have found a faithful and tried friend, an able defender of the good cause. He gave his esteemed name and great influence to this movement when it was yet in its infancy and weakness—despised by many.

That the Danish temperance reformation is successful will be seen from the following extract of a letter to this writer from the president of the Denmark Temperance Society: "The temperance cause has made great progress, and we must acknowledge that it was raised at the right time. The soil is now ready and prepared for greater reforms in this direction, and I do believe that within a few years we will have laws enacted which will greatly assist us in our work. Our organization is strong all over the country. We have very efficient and energetic circuit presidents, who are faithful agitators within the bounds of their own circuits and we also have many good temperance lecturers." From these few remarks it will be seen that the temperance cause in Denmark as well as in Norway is in a good and healthy condition. There are other temperance organizations in the field in both countries.

WOMEN'S INVENTIONS AT THE WORLD'S FAIR.

BY ELIZABETH CUMINGS.

The word invention has come to have a narrow and special meaning. In common use it is supposed to signify some mechanical contrivance of utility, forgetful of the fact that invention is the imaginative and creative faculty, the treasure of the artist as well as of the artisan. But with the narrow meaning of the word in mind, I turned my back upon the pictures, the statues and the stitchery, and the architectural beauties of the Woman's building, to gaze upon the things for which one can get patents, and file caveats.

It ought to comfort those fearful of too much freedom for women, that the first object one sees in the inventions room in the Woman's building is a washing machine, a very effective machine it is, too, so far as one can judge by looks, and the second object is a cake beater. Seeking comfort in a narrow space has stimulated women into contriving chairs that expand into step-ladders, or into a combination of clothes-horse, ironing-board, bosom-board, and clothes receptacle, and cabinets that become beds and bureaus. What seems to be a plush panel hung up to make a bright stretch of color in the hall, turns out to be a stepladder with a neat pail rod; and a cabinet of books or bric-a-brac is not a cabinet but a trunk of an appearance defiant to the baggage smasher. Cookers that save heat and flavors and stove space, various beaters that save muscle and minutes, a flat-iron heater that gets a maximum of work out of a minimum of coal or gas crowd the space allotted, among them a most interesting exhibit of articles made from what is called cellular brick.

A dinner pail, warranted to keep the dinner warm or cool, stands side by side with a foot-stove and a water-cooler and filter and a refrigerator. I could not discover whether the patent applied to the cellular brick, or to its application in the manufacture of the articles I have named, but I take it for granted it must be the brick. Perhaps it should be explained that for the dinner-pail, foot-stove, car-warmer and small articles it was made thin. Portable bath tubs of rubber cloth for infants, and portable cradles attract the mothers, and a bread-raiser in which the heat can be regulated to a fraction, entrances the housekeepers. A refrigerator, with ventilating drawers, which saves the milk from the onions and mutton, and a filter stand beside various portable kilns for china firing, all patented. One, I was told, used either gas or electricity.

A small model exhibits what seems an excellent device for feeding cattle and watering them while being transported, and there is a model of a car-coupling which I gazed at respectfully, but was not wise enough to understand. There is a neat patent saddle, and a contrivance for freeing a buggy or other vehicle from a runaway horse is described. At one time there was a little wooden horse on exhibition with harness complete, I think, but perhaps scared by the throngs he has galloped away. Before he left, however, I was assured by one who knows all about harness, that the contrivance alluded to is a good one. A portable weaving machine, and a sewing machine fitted with a patent quick-threading needle are also on exhibition.

A baby incubator, which the uninitiated fancy a device to keep flies off, surgical appliances, as a rubber boot for the application of hot-water heat to the foot, various abdominal supporters, a magnetic truss, hospital bed, and spinal support are shown, also invalid cups, etc. Toilet supplies warranted to furnish beauty of a sort at low price, patent medicines, and polishes and cement were on exhibition, with an interesting collection of evaporated vegetables, and sweet potato flour, the process of preparation of course covered by patents. The retouching of photographs being almost exclusively in the hands of women, it is pleasant to note a lens support for retoucher's use in the Woman's building, and in the women's exhibit in the Illinois state building a photograph-holder and lens, also for retouchers. A rein-support which insures against accident if a horse switches a heavy tail over the lines, and takes away all shadow of excuse for the cruel practice of docking, is exhibited in the Woman's building, and in the Illinois building I saw numerous fire escapes and fire-ladders. One was an ingenious combination of metal rods and chains with an underlining of fire-proof cloth, which can be kept in the room; another was a net; and another which looked as if it would be a useful machine for a fire department to own, was a sort of extension truck and ladder, and had for its inventor one Jane Finnigan.

In the Illinois building is a long line of carefully mounted drawings of patents issued to women. Among them I noted a land-pulverizer, a gang-plow, various car-couplers, various stoves and heaters, a portable summer-house, a most ingenious adjustable scaffolding for windows, for the use not only of Biddy or Sambo during house-cleaning, but of the painter and glazier as well; adding machines, paper dishes and buckets, a patent shoe, and patent method of repairing boots and shoes, educational appliances to be used in kindergarten work, an invalid-bed, and a revolving trapeze. A pocket lamp suggested new possibilities for coal oil, and a stovepipe cleaner new chances for domestic serenity; in the case devoted to models a door harp occupied one corner, husking pins a place of honor in the middle, and a treasure belt another corner. Typewriters and sewing-machines I found alike owe something to women, but in the name of humanity, of higher living and higher thinking, let me, in parenthesis, abjure my sex not to devise new attachments to the latter, that they may thereby delude themselves into making more superfluities by machinery.

A patent pavement and patent games, a swimming device, a sterilizing oven for the extermination of bacteria, a fruit-dryer, and a portable sink engaged my attention; there are methods of dress cutting, and the cutting of garments for women and children enough to drive a mantua-maker distracted. In one corner of the Manufacture's building is an exhibit of a sewing machine that makes not only lock-stitch, but chain-stitch, and whose bobbin holds a thousand yards of thread, a boon to the busy mother; there is an elevator designed by the same inventor which by an admirable contrivance closes the shaft, thereby lessening danger from fire, and the certainty of death for the unlucky wight falling into an open shaft, and which stops itself, if by any possibility the ropes break. The same woman is the inventor of the fire-escape with fire-proof cloth protection which I have already described.

In the Woman's building perhaps the one thing that seemed most suggestive was the framed card bearing the name Martha J. Coston. Just how many lives have been saved and will be saved by the wonderful series of signals which she has brought to perfection, cannot be known. Her husband's mind conceived the first idea of the plan, but he died before he could work out its fullness. Her telescopic and self-igniting night signals are used not only by the governments of the United States, Italy, Denmark, Great Britain and Holland, but are also employed by the merchant marine of these countries, the life-saving service and the society of the Red Cross. A full exhibit of these signals is given in the Government Life-saving Station on the Lake Front.

In the Spanish exhibit in the Manufactures building is a notable example of invention in its broad sense. The two most beautiful objects under the forest of arches are superb vases of steel encrusted with gold. The process by which the gold is applied upon the steel, as well as the vases, and their exquisite and lavish ornamentation are the invention of a Spanish woman artist. Money is a certain measure of value, and one of these vases is held at $20,000 the other at $40,000. The magnifying glass fails to reveal a trace of the secret of their manufacture. The inventor smiles upon you from a frame near by. You listen to the exclamations of delight at the pictures and tracery, at the charm of the form of the two, and note that no one is surprised that a woman did it, even a woman in conservative Spain—and it dawns upon you that silence is significant.

Vice in the British-India Army.

BY ELIZABETH WHEELER ANDREW.

I have been asked to state a few facts in regard to the British soldiers in India, of the system to which we referred Monday night, that system of contagious diseases act, by which women are procured and put into slavery and subjected to the laws of that system in India. I was asked concerning the effect on British soldiers of this contempt for women which they would naturally have when women are held as slaves for them in the lowest possible relations, and I wish to say that we have had many evidences as we traveled through India of the debasing effects on British soldiers themselves.

Now, when we visited Herat, a large cantonment in the northwest of India, there we found a regiment of soldiers who had just been sent out from England; the freshness of the English air was still upon their cheeks; many of them were very young men, indeed, it is said that the great proportion of the Indian army is composed of very young men, and these youths had only been there from January 25, for I saw it recorded in the registry of the cantonment, and we visited the camp on the 8th of February. So you can see they had only been there a fortnight, and already as we walked through the encampment, the soldiers would come to the row of little tents, where there were already thirteen women, and their mahaldarnie, that is the woman who is in charge of them—less than a fortnight since the English boys first came on India's soil, and yet already the school of vice was established.

In that same encampment we went into a large opium tent and saw both men and women lying there in various stages of intoxication from opium. It was a sad sight, and we felt that if the mothers of those English lads could see what temptations they were exposed to they would hesitate long before they would be willing to allow their boys to go out to India. These boys all go out for short term service, and so you see changes are being made and larger numbers coming in all the time and many a boy has said: "I lost my virtue, I lost my home-instilled principles out in India, and I do not feel that I can ever regain the footing I had before this service."

I remember a scene in Northern India where we went into one of those terrible places that they call chaklas,—the government houses of shame. We went in just about twilight. We had been before at noon and did not find the women home. When we went in, a native man lifted up his hands and cried out, "Oh, God, to see such a sight as this, women of virtue and respectability coming to such a place as this!" He could not believe that we would turn aside from sight-seeing in India, which usually brings people there, to come to this most wretched place. We returned at twilight, because we could not get there sooner, and I remember well this place made of unburned brick walls. We went inside and on one side there were little single rooms built with one wall, the other wall being composed of the wall of the chaklas itself, and these rooms had no doors, they were simply divided off by mud walls between, and then a native mat of grass hung at the door.

We went in and sat with the women and talked with them and questioned them as to the laws by which they were governed in this place. There was an old wicked crone who was the mahaldarnie in charge of them. There were five different young women in there with thin cotton garments which waved in the bitter wind. We were warmly clad with our heavy cloaks, but these poor girls had on nothing but these thin garments, and the weather there was very cold as night came on. The winds swept through there, and by and by it got darker and darker, and the woman rose and lighted a native lamp, a little saucer with a bit of wick in the oil, and she set it in a niche in the wall. There was no furniture in the room, except the couches we sat on, which were of the rudest description. The women sat on the mud floor and put their fingers over the little bit of charcoal that was burning there. That was all they had to comfort them. They talked in low, pitiful tones and we asked them for their histories, and asked them what were the laws by which they were governed, and then we said to them, "But how strange, there are only five women here for this regiment?"

"Yes, only five."

"How can there be so few in number?" We never found more than fifteen women apportioned to a regiment of a thousand men. But here there were but five.

They replied, "The men of this regiment are so cruel, they drink so terribly, and they beat and kick and treat us so terribly that the women cannot stay, they are afraid to stay."

"Are you not afraid?"

"Yes."

"Why do you stay?"

They said, "Where should we go?"

Now, could we answer that question? Where could they go if they went outside the cantonment? These women that had run away had merely run to another cantonment near by, but not many more women would be allowed to stay there, and if these other women ran away they would run to starvation. There was no work for them; they had been brought up in this way and here they were, helpless creatures, bound under this terrible system.

We asked questions, I remember, of a woman who came in at another station; we said to her, "What is your history? How did you come into this terrible life?" She seemed so kind and so gentle, it was difficult to understand how she could ever have chosen to live such a wretched life. She said: "It was famine time in the district where I was born, and I was just a little girl; a sepoy's daughter adopted me when I was twelve years, and the sepoy took me and sold me to a mahaldarnie to sit in the chaklas."

A mere girl came to us at the North Station, and sat down on the doorstep bitterly sobbing, as she told her story. She looked so gentle, so lovely, I can see her face now before me as refined as the face of any woman in this audience, as she said to us: "I was the daughter of respectable parents at Simla, I was married when I was a little child. My father and my mother and my husband all died before I was eleven years old. Then a woman came and talked to me, and told me how sorry she was for me, because I had lost these relatives and my husband and she said: I am very sorry for you, but it will do you a great deal of good if you will go out and see the beautiful cities. I did not know this woman very well, I did not know that she was a wicked woman, and then she pleaded and pleaded with me; but I said to her: 'You are not my caste, I am a Hindoo. How could we live together? I would break my caste and you would break yours.'" She said that would make no difference to me, she would be as a mother to me. In other words, she seemed willing to sacrifice her caste in order to get this girl away. Then she said to me, 'Come and go with me just a month to see these wonderful cities and I will bring you back. I will pay all your expenses, and bring you back in a month.'"

And so this little dove was caught and carried away by this woman to a city of which she told me, and where we had visited the chaklas. She said: "I was sold to a British commissioner and the woman took the price, the two hundred rupees. I never saw the money. She took my jewels away; in a year he died and then what was there for me but to go into the soldiers' chaklas?"

And so we found her, and as I tell you to-night, about these little widows, the poor wretched little creatures, my heart aches for them. We would have been so glad if we could have said to them: "Come with us," but we could not do it; we were held by our investigation at that time; we could only say to them: "We will help you, believe in us, because our God will help us to help you." We knew we must finish our work, get the evidence, and this must come before the British Parliament ere the matter could be settled; and now we have the promise from our English friends that it shall be settled and settled right in parliament; that laws ought to be passed in that parliament which shall prohibit this state of things utterly, and not only that, but that rescue homes are to be established where these poor wretched little Indian women can go and can learn of Christ and can meet with their elder sisters and be ready for that later meeting when we come before our Father's throne on high.

Response to Addresses of Welcome.

BY MRS. S. F. CHAPIN.

The good book tells us that "Out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh," but it is equally true that the heart sometimes gets too full for utterance, as it is on this occasion. Had I been able to do as Joan of Arc said she did with her white standard, "Command it to go, and then follow it," I might have caught inspiration from the gracious words of welcome you have received to this Magic City, which sprang Phœnix-like from its ashes, in a day, and has grown to such proportions, that the St. Louis papers are forced to admit that "there is a possibility when we celebrate the next centennial, that Chicago may rival New York, and stand next to St. Louis, if Mrs. Maloney's cow does not burn it down again."

I love to take shelter under great names. Mr. Longfellow told me that an Englishman called upon him, and gave as a reason for so doing that "he had hunted in vain in this country for ruins, so had called on him." I suppose that is the reason your committee has called on me, who has for months, from overwork and most harassing circumstances, attendant on a bitter Prohibition campaign, endured such crucifixion, that with health shattered, am unable to be present with you on this great occasion. To attend a Woman's Christian Temperance Union Convention at any time is a joy unspeakable to all who wear

"Our winsome token,
The bow of ribbon white."

But at this particular time, when the nations of the earth are represented, and we realize that we have "One

Lord, one faith, one baptism (of the spirit), one God and Father of us all, who is above all and in all," and that the band of ribbon white really belts the globe, it is a bitter disappointment to me not to make one of your number; and I have only arrived at the point, when I can say with Henrietta Maria, "Lord, because Thou hast permitted it I submit," with every heart-string quivering.

Would it had been my privilege to welcome you to my own home in the old historic City by the Sea, a city now wearing a consecrated coronet of sorrow:

"For the angel who walked in the darkness was here;
He walked through our city, and in every street
He left the print of his merciless feet.
Desolation and ruin are everywhere spread,
And the living tread light on the hearts of the dead."

I cannot close this response without saying a word to our "Santa Philomena" who has crossed the sea to be with us, and spare our beloved president a journey which would have been hazardous in her state of health. For all her kindness and devotion to our leader, for her courage in standing amid persecution in defense of the right, we would crown her with more than canonical rite, our Santa Philomena; and as she stands with the lamp of truth in her hand, and moral courage enough to throw its divine rays upon society's impurity, condemning it, I will appropriate Longfellow's lines to her:

"On England's annals through the long
Hereafter of her speech and song,
That light, its rays shall cast,
From portals of the past.

"A lady with a lamp shall stand,
In the great history of the land,
A noble type of good
Heroic womanhood"—
Our Lady Somerset.

LETTER FROM ENGLAND.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—The last week in September and the first in October were a red-letter time for women's temperance work in a large area of the west of England and South Wales. Swansea, Bristol, Newport and Cardiff have each been visited, and large meetings addressed there by Lady Henry Somerset and some of her coadjutors; and in Cardiff, which has been the central scene of the activity, unprecedented and brilliant success marked the autumnal meetings of the British Women's Temperance Association. In every instance great crowds came out to witness the new crusade, and if some listened to the women speakers with critical ears, these were few and far between, as related to the vast numbers who paid the tribute of sympathy.

At Swansea Lady Henry Somerset not only addressed an afternoon conference and a great public meeting in the Albert Hall the same night, but between the two performed the ceremony of laying a memorial stone for a new temperance hall. This last project has been long talked of and wished for in Swansea, but it remained for the deep and lasting enthusiasm produced by Mr. John G. Woolley, on the occasion of his mission nearly a year ago, to bring the movement to a practical issue. A company has been formed, and the hall is in course of erection. It is to be a fitting monument of the temperance cause. It will gratify Mr. Woolley's many friends to know that not only is there this tangible memento of his visit, but that he is remembered with enthusiastic affection by very many friends in Swansea. It was very appropriate that Lady Henry should lay the stone.

The Bristol gatherings included those of the Western Temperance League, a great organization, covering sixteen counties. Lady Henry Somerset spoke for the British Women's Temperance Association, and created some amused interest by reading a portion of an "open letter" which a liquor paper of the would-be-smart order had addressed to her in its pages, and by the quietly strong way in which she brushed aside the flimsy sophistry of liquor literature and made its words the basis of a powerful appeal to women everywhere to come out from conventional seclusion and take their part in the great work of temperance reform.

For the succeeding day a special conference of the B. W. T. A. had been arranged, and was held in a large hall in the fashionable Bristol suburb—Clifton. The building was packed in every part, and as many more wished to get in and could not, an overflow meeting was held in another building. At the original meeting Lady Henry Somerset presided, and spoke on the general aims and methods of the association. The "Question Box" gave Lady Henry an opportunity, of which she made effective use, to clearly explain the position of the B. W. T. A.—that it is non-party as to politics, unsectarian as to theology, and total abstinent as to basis. Other questions dealt with related to the use of alcoholic wine at the Communion, possible substitutes for alcohol as mediums (as to which the inquirer was pointed to the London Temperance Hospital, where the results show that alcohol is not needed) and other topics. The lucid answers given quite charmed the crowded audience.

Newport (Monmouthshire) paid the lady speakers the compliment of a densely crowded hall, and a large one at that, on an extremely wet night. Mr. Edwin Grove, the genial chairman of the county council made an ideal chairman; and Mrs. McKinnon, of Dumfries, made an effective speech, preparatory to the longer and sustained effort of Lady Henry Somerset. A pleasing incident was the presentation to Lady Henry of a beautiful bouquet for Miss Willard, and the fact that it happened to be that lady's birthday lent additional interest to Lady Henry's graceful words of acknowledgment. The evening meeting was preceded by a very useful afternoon conference on woman's work.

It was in Cardiff, the largest town in Wales, however, that the British Women's Temperance Association was most prominently in evidence—meetings spreading over four consecutive days being held, and followed throughout the week by supplementary meetings, all of them of a strikingly enthusiastic kind. The first big meeting had relation to the undenominational Christian Mission, which does a wonderful work among the miners and iron workers of Monmouthshire and South Wales. Lady Henry spoke as a trustee of the mission, and in doing so evinced again her deep sympathy with the toiling masses. Incidentally she won a cheer by mentioning a visit to the iron works at Pittsburg, Penn., where she sought out and talked with the Welshmen emigrated there.

On the second night, a great chapel was strained to the utmost by the crowds who attended. The occasion was a welcome to Cardiff offered to Lady Henry Somerset and the B. W. T. A. executive, arranged by the Blue Ribbon Temperance Society—a society which for fourteen years has kept up a weekly meeting. Twenty bouquets were presented by as many children in the name of the different societies. Mrs. McLaren for England, Mrs. McKinnon for Scotland, and Mrs. Hughes for Wales, preceded Lady Henry Somerset in responding, and then the latter held her audience for a considerable time, as she once again expounded women's work for temperance.

Sunday afternoon saw nearly three thousand people gathered for a special united service conducted by Lady Henry Somerset. The subject of her address was, "What it is to be a Christian," and the address itself was a sustained appeal for reality in applying true Christian principles to the problems of nineteenth century civilization, and particularly to the crying evils wrought by drink. Sunday evening saw the realization of an unique arrangement by which, in twenty Cardiff pulpits, women evangelists proclaimed gospel and temperance truth, in most cases to very large congregations.

HENRY J. OSBORN.

London, Eng.

SUNDAY IN FRANCE.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—Among the conclusions which I am convinced two-thirds of my compatriots carry away from France is this: "The French never observe Sunday." They come to Paris to "do" the city in a fortnight—or less—and spend Sunday in going to Versailles to see the fountains play, or in going to the theatre, and form their judgment on this amount of investigation.

The conclusion is unjust to the French, and worse, it is dangerous for the observer, especially if he is inclined to be lax about the day. He sees that the people are orderly, quiet, happy, and naturally says to himself: "If one can be all that these are, and ignore Sunday, why should not we do it in America if we want to?"

But he argues on false premises. The French who are religious, that is, good Catholics, and there are a great mass of them, observe Sunday according to the requirements of the church. They do not work; most of them give their servants a half holiday; they go at least once to church, and the rest of the day the united family spends at home, in an excursion to the country, in a gallery or museum; and it must be remembered that their religion does not forbid this relaxation. It even teaches it, for I have seen priests playing leap-frog with young men on Sunday, and nuns playing tennis with little girls in their charge on that day. In their way, then, a large part of the French observe Sunday. It is not our way, to be sure, but that is another question.

But in non-Catholic France, that is, that part of France which has broken openly with Catholicism and affirms that it has no religion, there is still a "Sunday question." It is an agitation in favor of the day on moral, social and hygienic grounds. How difficult this agitation is and what it has to contend against it is impossible to understand without knowing something of the politics of the country.

Sunday was observed legally in France until two hundred years ago. When the Revolution came the new government in its hatred of the abuses of the Catholic church, and in the name of liberty, attempted to abolish every custom, every tradition which Christianity had introduced into France. Of course it upset Sunday. The necessity of a regular day of repose was recognized, however, and the decade, or one day in ten, established as a legal holiday. The government had a hard time enforcing the new regulation, such was the religious sentiment of the people and such the force of habit. It was obliged to inflict punishments for neglecting the decade, which were much more severe than the pains which the most fanatical priest had ever attached to breaking Sunday.

In 1814 the government changed, the church was restored, and a new Sunday law passed. Such confusion had come into the customs and ideas of the people, however, that the day was little observed and work went on all the week around. In 1880 in spite of the fact that the law was practically a dead letter, it was repealed because it looked like a concession to the church.

The absurdities which are practiced by French politicians in their opposition to the Catholics are astounding. There are said to be men who will not even pronounce the names of Paris streets named after saints, lest in some way the church party be countenanced by it. Many excellent bills which come before the Chambers are killed, delayed or distorted by this childishness. For instance, last November (1892) a bill was passed forbidding women and children under eighteen to work more than six consecutive days in seven, but the day of rest was left to the employer. To have named Sunday would have pleased the clericals. This same bill was delayed for a long time because of this discussion.

In spite of this political significance of Sunday in France, there is a non-religious movement in favor of its observance. Among the syndicates of working men the question is constantly agitated. Only a few weeks ago a new deputy of Paris, elected to the Chamber in the August elections, a hair-dresser by profession, declared in a meeting of the hair-dressers of Paris that in England the followers of their trade were far in advance of those in France, since there they did not open their shops on Sunday—an utterance which has its value because coming from a working man's delegate. In nearly all of the syndicates of Paris efforts are making to secure Sunday rest.

It is not only in Paris, but throughout France. In the past summer at Nantes, the campaign has been very active, and certain results have been obtained. At Crevsot, the principal stores have been closed, either a part or all day. Commencing with the first Sunday of August the retail shops of Montpellier were closed. At Cannes, the retail shops were closed all day throughout the summer. All of these results were obtained by the action of syndicates.

In Paris nearly all the great stores close because the owners consider it wise, but most of them deliver goods on Sunday unless especially ordered not to do so. One however, and that perhaps the most extensive, the Louvre, refuses to deliver anything.

The mail carriers' rounds have been recently reduced by one for letters, by two for papers. Express and freight are delivered unless the person sending states that the package is not to be given out on the day, or the one expecting it writes to the office to hold it until Monday. This puts the matter into the hands of the public which, it must be confessed, shows little interest in availing itself of the privilege.

Much of the interest at present shown on the Sunday question is due to the excellent "Popular League for Sunday Rest," founded in 1889. This league, which bases its agitation purely on social, moral and hygienic grounds numbers in its ranks many eminent men of all parties and religions. It holds annual meetings in Paris and publishes a bright little monthly bulletin of its work, which not only reports what is doing in France on the Sunday question but throughout the world.

There are branches of this league throughout France, some of them of great activity. For example, I have the report of what the committee at Lille, in the north, has been doing in the past summer. It includes a propagandism in favor of non-delivery of freight and express which has been partially successful. An order that all the notary public offices be closed, a half-day observance on the part of leading dry goods houses, and the closing of factories and shops,—certainly a respectable summer's work.

But there are enough examples to show that the conclusion of the hurried traveler, "The French never observe Sunday," is founded on insufficient observation. As a rule, I believe that the observer sees nothing in Paris on Sunday that he would not see in making an excursion out from New York on Sunday, in going to the parks of Chicago, the theatre in Cincinnati, unless it may be the work which is going on, but of that he sees little in the excursions which as a rule he takes.

Certainly, Sunday observance is not a sentiment by any means so wide-spread or so profound as in the United States. Its aim is different, too. It looks to a day of repose and amusement. Nevertheless, the sentiment exists, and when we remember the hard experience the day has been through with in France in the last one hundred years, and the political tool it is still, for certain members of the government, the present movement to restore its prestige becomes respectable and noteworthy.

THE W. C. T. U. DENIES THE "WHITE CAP" OUTRAGE.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—Your last issue contains a mention of the "white cap affair" at Osceola, Neb. I see that papers all over the country are printing the account as first sent out to the Inter Ocean. I send you a clipping taken from the Nebraska State Journal, of Lincoln, the leading Republican paper of the state, of the issue of October 29. This affidavit, it seems to me, is as strong a denial as one could wish. I hope you will give it in the next UNION SIGNAL.

W. C. T. U. LADIES NOT RESPONSIBLE FOR THE OSCEOLA OUTRAGE.

OSCEOLA, NEB., Oct. 28.—[Special.]—Just one week ago to-night was the date of the affair that caused this little city a vast amount of unfavorable notoriety. Some of the dispatches to the daily press have been very untruthful. The W. C. T. U. has been charged with being the originator of the whole business. This is not so and they offer the sworn statement of its officers. It is as follows:

STATE OF NEBRASKA, POLK COUNTY, SS.—Personally appeared before me, T. H. Saunders, a notary public in and for Polk county and the state of Nebraska, Mrs. S. O. Whaley, president of the W. C. T. U., and Mrs. L. M. Shaw, secretary, who, being first duly sworn, depose and say that they are the officers of the W. C. T. U. of Osceola, Polk county, Nebraska; that they as a society did not countenance the outrage that took place on Saturday night, October 21, 1893, and that none of the members of their society were engaged in it except one accused.

THE PARTING OF THE WAYS.

The Husband to his Wife.

BY REV. J. P. HUTCHINSON.

The hour of departure has arrived, and we go our ways—I to die, and you to live. Which is the better? God only knows.
—SOCRATES.

To depart and be with Christ which is far better.—PAUL.

We'll come to it, my darling wife, though when, we do not know,
For God in mercy hides from us the day when we must go
And face the wondrous infinite, the land beyond the sea,
Which no living mortal knoweth, but where every one shall be;
We are marching, marching to it, through sunshine and through snow,
Through times of light and darkness, of happiness and woe,
Through many nights of sorrow and many sunny days,
But we'll come to it, my darling, the parting of the ways.

Sweet are the hours of childhood, dear, who can forget the place,
So hallowed with a mother's love and with a father's grace;
The warbling of the flowing brook where we so often played,
The meadow and the orchard where we so often strayed,
The school-house and the dear old church where much to us was given;
Ah! in the past, forever gone, how much there is of heaven;
No wonder when we think of home we sing its well-won praise,
But even then we had to know the parting of the ways.

When mother went away, dear wife, I thought no cup could be
More bitter than the bitter draught presented unto me;
No cross could be more heavy than the cross I had to bear
Of entering my mother's home and yet no mother there;
But I have learned, my darling, through years of toil and pain,
That if I could, I would not have my mother back again;
And the first sweet view of glory that met my youthful gaze
Was when my mother left us at the parting of the ways.

How sweet to wearied limbs is rest when the day's toil is done;
After the bloody battle-field how sweet the victory won;
After the burning fever the cool air sweetly given
As though a benediction were breathed from God in heaven;
After the doubt that nevermore we'll see the ones we love,
How beautiful the faith that we shall meet them all above.
A glimpse of glory is obtained and heaven's own beauteous rays
Illuminate our spirits at the parting of the ways.

So let us journey on, my dear, still trusting as we go,
Although it be by mystic paths of which we nothing know;
For they who live and love and trust are safely in His care,
In this world, or in others, for God is everywhere;
And if He guards us here and there His face be seen,
May we not trust Him in the path that darkly lies between?
So let us fill with faith and love and music all the days
That lead up to, and far beyond, the parting of the ways.

LIKE FATHER, LIKE SON.

BY LIZZIE YOUNG BUTLER.

Little Mrs. Luce stood beside her breakfast table scanning it with critical eyes. Everything was as dainty as the most fastidious could desire, from the platter of fish with its garnish of curly lettuce to the nodding pink and cream roses in a vase near by. And the little woman, looking with pleased eyes for a brief half second ere she touched the bell, was in dainty keeping with the table appointments. Yet she wore no white morning dress with lace finishings at neck and wrists; bless you, no. At such a suggestion Mrs. Luce's rippling, contagious laugh would have echoed through the room, and she would have told you that such garmenting for the early morning would be hardly suitable for a woman who was cook, nurse, and indispensable worker in this new home. But as fresh-looking was she in her print gown with its white cord at the throat, as the swaying blossoms or the spotless linen.

"Come, darling. Mamma has your chair ready. Did you enjoy your run with papa?" inquired Mrs. Luce as the family gathered for the morning meal. Two years' old Ray Luce was his mother's treasure, and Papa Luce was already planning his boy's future which was to be happy and remarkably brilliant.

"The coffee has an unusually appetizing odor this morning, dear," remarked Ford Luce with a loving glance at his wife across the table as he drew his chair. A moment's silence was followed by a hearty blessing, then the talk flowed on.

"How much more homelike and delightful it is to have a blessing on the food. I am so happy, Ford, for now our home seems perfect."

"I am happy, too, little wife. When Christ is our daily family guest, the whole home takes on a new beauty and even the performing of daily duties becomes gladsome when done for Him," rejoined Mr. Luce.

"Yes, yes, Laford, but you were perfect in your old mother's eyes before you joined the church. Not but what I'm glad enough you're a Christian; mercy knows I couldn't be gladder."

"That's so, mother. Let me help you to fish; doesn't it look tempting?"

"O Ford! I've just thought. Monday is election day. How are you going to vote—what ticket?" quickly asked Mrs. Luce.

"Why, what a question, Myra. He's always voted a Republican ticket and his father before him. He isn't going to change now as old as he is," Ford's mother rejoined in a decided tone, which was intended to settle the matter without further talk.

"Of course, little wife, I'm a Republican, you know. How else should I vote?" queried Ford Luce, looking into his wife's face with admiring eyes.

Mrs. Luce's expression underwent a complete change as she replied: "I hoped you would pass in the Prohibition ticket now —"

"Nonsense, Myra. You are so full of notions," interrupted Ford's mother.

"If Christians do not uphold this temperance question, who will?" earnestly asked Mrs. Luce, the blood dyeing neck and cheeks.

"You well know, little wife, that I am temperance clear through—"

"Then why not show your colors at the polls?" eagerly broke in Myra.

"Well, dear, I have thought of the matter much and this is the way it always presents itself: If I throw the temperance ticket what good will it do? Should a great many of the Christians do likewise the result would simply be defeat for the Republican or Democratic party and nothing gained for temperance. When victory is assured then will I gladly show my colors."

"Don't say that, Ford. There is principle behind the ticket. Think of our precious boy, here, growing up to manhood in such a state of things. Think of other mothers' boys even now in the whirlpool. I pray for the triumphant victory of the temperance cause before our boy goes forth; and, I want you to be true to the right and leave results to Him who ruleth. Many give just such a reason as you have. If all would 'step over the line' think of the hallelujahs which would rend the air."

"But I don't think you understand fully, Myra."

"To be sure she doesn't. We womenkind never had such notions when we were young, and no business with 'em, either," broke in Ford's mother.

"Wait a minute, mother. You can't know all about it, Myra. As I said, when we see that the temperance ticket will be a sure go then we—I for one—will be glad to pass it. But we must be patient."

"Patient! Patience is a virtue, generally, but applied in this instance it is a crime instead. Now just see here, dear. Did you ever think, Ford, that in the old time when Jesus' little band occupied but one small portion of a corner under the royal purple, and it seemed to many that it would soon be scattered as the four winds, that those who left all to follow Him, never raised a question of its ultimate success? They swelled the numbers of the little band, because, though but small, they believed that to be right, and they could do no less. Where would this widespread, earth-covered kingdom be now had those believers given as an excuse for not then following the right and being counted in on that side: 'This is only a small band. If we join it, our old way will be weakened and the new not reach victory. We'll wait awhile until success for the despised Nazarene is assured, then we will shout with the others.' It isn't an enticing picture," eagerly and earnestly pursued Mrs. Luce. "But it is true, for the way voters are proceeding concerning this temperance movement. If it is right and a result heartily to be desired, as I know you believe, Ford, put your shoulder to the wheel and push with all your strength, like a whole Christian. Persuade others to make the start with you, but don't be hindered if they prefer to wait. This is so near my heart—oh, Ford, I must see you wholly in the right way."

"You shall be glad of my thoughtful looking at this matter from your standpoint, faithful little temperance woman. You have shown me a new side to the subject. I feel as though I should like to see the white ribbon tied on the tea-urn and the door knobs to show people the stand of the entire family. Now, I'll go and enlighten Frank Henderson and a few others by giving them your Bible picture. We'll be Prohibitionists, won't we, little man?" said Mr. Luce as he rose from the table and patted his boy's cheeks.

"'Course! Ford 'ishionist! Myra 'ishionist, oo!"

Then they laughed, but the old mother's glasses grew dim though she said: "Fie, fie!"

And Myra, holding up her lips for the good-bye kiss said: "Like papa, like son. What shall it be?"

"Temperance now and ever, 'in His name.'"

And Mrs. Luce's face beamed with joy and her heart throbbed with hope's fruition. With a quivering laugh, and tears in her eyes, a little later, she tied the white ribbon signet on her husband's chair, saying to herself: "This town will see the grandest election yet. Ford never does things by halves. Thank God for temperance!"

LIFE'S GIFTS TO WOMAN.

The grand oratorio of Creation,
Flashed forth from the Infinite Mind;
And the rich chords rose as the Master willed,
From suns, stars, spheres, seas, trees, flowers and wind;
Till the Universe chanted the song of Love,
Echo'd by nature below, and the choirs above:
When God saw that the harmony thus far was sweet,
His thoughts blossomed in souls, and the song was complete.

"God has made the most beautiful thing on earth, for to-day a woman is born!" was the glad news that thrilled through the Heavenly hosts on Creation's momentous morn.

Then spake the angels one to another: "What shall we give to this fair earth-sister? We have already bestowed upon our first earth-brother dominion and strength."

While the "morning stars" chanted Creation's song and Paradise thrilled with the strains, a shining band of the heavenly hosts flew on snowy wings to Eden, they found fair Eve, the most beautiful flower of earth, in a bower of roses.

"I will give her Love," said a bright, shining one, "which of all life's gifts shall be most precious to woman," and she kissed the sleeper upon her red lips, while another angel then said, placing a wreath of golden immortelles upon Eve's fair brow: "I will give her Hope."

Then said a smiling seraph, touching the soft cheek of the sweet sleeper: "I will give her Joy."

"And as woman must be gentle and meek," whispered another, "my gift shall be Humility!"

Then murmured an angel, of all most divine, with eyes starry and brow serene: "I bestow on this mortal the gift of Faith, eternal seal of immortal birth!"

As this seraphic band unfolded their lustrous pinions to cleave the blue up toward the gates of pearl, two sad-faced ones entered the flower-arched portals of Eden.

"She must learn the worth of these great gifts," they said, "which God has now bestowed upon her, lest she should think her earthly bower enduring, which, like a dream, is fleeting, and should forget her soul-mansion and her destiny beyond; she must learn our lessons of weakness and woe, which are allotted to all human lives," said those two sad-faced ones, Pain and Grief, "for in this earthly garden of discipline must be sown the seed of the immortal flower of character which shall hereafter be transplanted to the gardens of Paradise."

As Faith rose aloft on shining wings she glanced down on the mortal beloved, and she dropped from her blazing crown a gleaming star which still glows with undimmed radiance in the sanctified souls of many of Eve's self-sacrificing daughters.

ST. GEORGE AND THE DRAGON.

You have heard of the wonderful dragon,
That the brave saint fought of old—
The scaly beast with the fiery breath!
Ah! it makes the blood run cold,

To think of the terrible conflict there
On the barren sands of Doan,
And the blood-red crest of the dragon's wrath,
And good St. George all alone!

How bravely he fought from the early morn
Through a weary summer's day,
While the blazing sun looked down from the sky
On the still uncertain fray!

Now up and now down for the good St. George
The scale of the battle turned,
While his blows he rained on the dragon's crest,
And the red sun blazed and burned.

But fiercely he fought with a faith sublime,
Forgetful of thirst and pain,
Till he gained the well-earned victor's crown
And the wild, red beast was slain.

So the dragon died, and the realm had rest,
And the Saint has passed away;
But a fiercer dragon than St. George slew
Is wasting our land to-day.

In the North and the South his trail is found,
On the East and West it lies;
He blights the land with his breath, while he gloats
Over human sacrifice.

An army, each year, with its thousand strong,
Grows pale at his touch and dumb,
And reels to the grave he has dug so deep—
This terrible dragon, Rum!

The wise and the strong, the brave and the fair,
Are held alike in his thrall;
And a million homes in our land to-day
Have seen how the brightest fall.

The mother's hope, and her life, and her joy,
The staff of her waning years,
In the merciless grasp of the dragon's fangs
Is held in spite of her tears.

The harvests that wave over prairie and hills
For hunger's terrible needs,
But rot in the reeking dens of shame
Where the loathsome monster feeds.

O Heaven! that a sight like this should be,
And the clouds still drop sweet rain,
And the sunshine weave its tangled gold
For a harvest time again!

O beautiful land! rouse up in thy might
And arm thyself for the fray,
For the forces are gathering near and far,
And the right must win the day!

O freemen! list well to the bugle-call,
And step to its martial tune,
When the tented hosts of the battle camp
On the flowery fields of June.

When the cannon shall peal and the battle pall
Roll up over hill and plain,
Pray Heaven that its bolted wrath may fall
On the dragon forever slain!

CHILDREN OF THE MIDWAY PLAISANCE.

The day I spent among the children on the Plaisance will always be remembered with great pleasure, and I only wish all the little folks I know could have seen their queer little neighbors who were here from all quarters of the globe.

The Laplanders were busy putting their huts in order, so as to be ready for visitors. It was very amusing to see them laying down fresh, green boughs on the ground for carpets. There were two or three children playing around, and I know they think this must be a land of summer, for they have had no snow to play in for such a long time.

Inside the hut a dear baby was swinging in its cradle or "stock," as it is called. It was certainly the funniest cradle I ever saw, it looked for all the world like a scissors case, and the baby was laced in with only its head showing. In these stocks the mothers carry their babies on their backs, and the little creatures do not mind being laid down in a snow-drift while their mothers are at work.

There were a number of reindeer grazing on the grass, and I am sure our children will acknowledge that old Santa Claus showed a great deal of discrimination when he selected them to draw his sleigh, for what but the tiny hoofs of the reindeer could ever go over the house-tops without waking the little sleepers who are anxiously listening for the coming of the dear old man, who always remembers them so bountifully.

In the Cairo street the boys were wonderfully bright. They looked as if they had tumbled out of bed and forgotten to get dressed. They all wear the red fez. If it was not for it they might be taken for girls, but a girl is never allowed to wear the red cap. One little fellow wrote his name in my note book, and such writing. He began backwards. He said "Chickago," and seemed very proud of it.

The boys from Nubia have three deep scars on each cheek, showing that they belong to a slave tribe. It is a mark of servitude, and they are very sensitive about it. The children were learning to speak English and eagerly watched everything. When an Egyptian girl is married, she colors her hands red, black or blue, and the men stain their finger nails yellow.

The donkeys and camels all came from Cairo, but they seemed very well contented with America, and they were kept busy carrying boys and girls who looked with wonder at these people from the far East. It made them think of the colored pictures in their Bible story books.

Near the street in Cairo I met a woman from Jerusalem. She was carrying her baby which she always has with her.

The diminutive people from Java were so pleasant that it was a pleasure to visit their curious village. During the coolest of our cool days the babies rolled around outdoors with just a thin gown on and no shoes or stockings. We would think they would all die of croup. Two little boys had a long board on a piece of upright bamboo and were having a jolly see-saw. To my question, "How old are you," one of them held up both hands, signifying ten years. The mothers carry their babies in a sort of scarf, which they put over their shoulders, and here the little one rests very comfortably. The pet of the village was a monstrous orang-outang, such as we find pictures of in our geographies.

The Turks had no children in their villages, but the Algerians had some of the cutest children imaginable.

In the Dahomey village the little folks looked as if they might be carved out of chocolate, they were so brown, but they seemed very much like other little negroes, and it is to be hoped that they will not grow up quite as fierce and warlike as their ancestors.

On the Fair grounds there were some strange babies, but not many people knew where to find them.

There were only three women from Ceylon in this country, and one of them had a little baby, which she guarded with the greatest care. Through the influence of a friend I had a peep at the little Ceylonese, who was lying on the floor sound asleep, utterly unconscious whether it was in Colombo or Chicago.

One day, by using all the arts I possessed, and with the addition of a coin, I persuaded an Indian mother to lift the cover off the cradle and let me see her baby. He certainly did not look unlike a little American boy. These Indians came from Vancouver Island, and they seemed homesick to get back to their country.

How often the thought has come to me that this year has brought to our children living examples of the people to whom they send money and missionaries.

Only a glance at the hideous idols which are found so plentiful in the India and Ceylon buildings makes us shudder. But we feel that this year is going to make a great change for the better in our neighbors over the sea.

LITTLE ONES IN OLD NEW ENGLAND.

Away back in the Puritan days in New England there were some very strict laws regarding conduct. These were called "New England Blue Laws." Many of the "Blue Laws" were made especially for the children. And, in reading these laws, one can easily imagine that the life of a little Puritan boy or girl must have been far from gay and attractive.

Just fancy such laws as these! On Sunday no woman was allowed to kiss her children. Nor could she do so on fast-days. And there were two or three fast-days every week. On Sundays and fast-days children were not allowed to walk in the garden or elsewhere. They could not speak on any subject besides the Bible and the catechism. They were not allowed any sweets, nor even hot food, as it was considered sinful to cook on Sunday. They were taken to church three times a day, and worst of all, they were severely punished if they tried to amuse themselves in meeting, or if, from fatigue, the poor little things were unlucky enough to fall asleep at church.

How nice to know that such days have gone by long ago.—Ledger.

DEAR BOYS AND GIRLS:—Last week the great World's Columbian Exposition, which many of you have visited or have read about with so much interest and longing, came to a close. Soon the beautiful "white city" itself will have passed away, but not the lessons it taught, and the marks it has left behind. They will never disappear but will become a fixed part of the history of the world.

The W. C. T. U. convention week at Chicago, (the mother's week), was also children's week at the World's Fair. Schools were closed in Chicago, and thousands of children visited the Fair at a low price of admission, ten cents, or through the generosity of rich people, were admitted free. Wasn't that a pleasant plan? The happy children thought so, who were near enough to take advantage of the opportunity.

In 1900—that isn't such a very long time, yet many of you won't be called children then—the world will doubtless see another great exposition to usher in the twentieth century. Those of you who could not attend the World's Fair this year, can forget the disappointment in thinking of the glories of the coming year. And we'll all use our influence, won't we, no matter how small it may be, in making it an exhibition only of things that are lovely and of good report. Yours hopefully,

I send herewith answers to puzzles Nos. 234 and 235, which were published in THE UNION SIGNAL for Oct. 5. I think there must have been a mistake somewhere though, in No. 235, for in the first part of it you have "Jer. 8:1," and that verse begins with "A," which would make the answer "Anna Gardon," and in the second part you have "Rev. 7:17," and that verse begins with "F," which would make the answer "Fountfin." I think the right references are, respectively, Jer. 9:1, and Rev. 17:7. Those each begin with the right letters.

Sandusky, O. NORMA EVANS.

You are quite right, Norma. Others too have noticed the same error. A bad nut is rarely found in our Soft Shelled Nuts and I am glad there were sharp eyes to pick it out.

There are no saloons in our town, but sometimes men send off to other states for liquor and keep it in their homes. There are a good many L. T. L's in our town, and we hope that when we grow up to be men and women that there will be no drunkards around, for our banner says, "Tremble, King Alcohol, we shall grow up." Please accept me as your niece,

The answer to puzzle 234 is, Frances E. Willard. She is our greatest temperance worker. I am an L. T. L. boy.

I am glad you added that sentence, which wasn't expected in the answer. It shows you are an L. T. L. boy who knows, Fred.

ANOTHER MILESTONE PASSED.

The World's and National Conventions have come and gone, and the W. C. T. U. has entered upon the twenty-first year of its eventful existence.

Although our readers have been generously treated with convention matters for the past two weeks, we feel sure that they will enjoy with us a brief retrospect of the great meetings, in which some of the strongest features will be brought into more prominent relief.

Notwithstanding the fact that the annual meeting has been referred to as "stormy," we must say that our National Convention still continues to hold its own as pre-eminently orderly and courteous, and to pose before the world as the most decorous, deliberate body on this continent. A certain amount of friction is inevitable in an organization whose interests are world-wide, and only the most short-sighted critic will prognosticate disastrous consequences from the pronounced differences of opinion manifested in the last Convention. Our women are too deeply in earnest, they realize too well the sacredness and imperativeness of their mission to allow any disagreement to become a serious obstacle in the way toward the goal which they have set out to reach with unbroken front.

The very individuality which is so prominent a characteristic of our workers is naturally productive of an occasional "passage at arms," which, as the past history of the organization has abundantly proved, leaves no trace of bitterness or ill-will. And while the discussions on the floor of the Convention showed that the W. C. T. U. was not the "mutual admiration society" it is sometimes charged with being, they at least revealed no acrimonious or self-seeking spirit. On the contrary the most vivid impression left by the Conventions on the unprejudiced, popular mind was, as in previous years, a conviction of the intense earnestness and consecrated purpose of W. C. T. U. women. A goodly proportion of silver-crowned heads were among the delegates; others were in the conscious strength of womanhood's prime; still others of more youthful years; but women all of them who had consecrated their lives to the service of God and humanity; who believed emphatically that they were called to work and not to weep, and who had heard and heeded the world's moaning. In short the World's and National Conventions were bodies which not only compared favorably with but surpassed any which have convened in the Art Institute during this summer of memorable congresses.

We may say without fear of contradiction that the one arbitrary voice heard in the Conventions was that of the shrieking, puffing locomotive. The iron monster proved to be no respecter of persons or of subject matter. Platform and floor were in turn yielded to the tyrant which had previously tortured in like manner a hundred or so world's congresses, claiming the right of way on every program with the utmost impartiality. What with the struggle to rival the steam engine and the atmospheric conditions incident to a hall erected as a temporary structure for the summer months, the woman with a strong pair of lungs possessed a decided advantage over her less fortunate sisters in the recent conventions.

It is to be regretted that the pressure of other business made it necessary to omit the presentation to the convention of the majority of the superintendents' reports. The outlining of W. C. T. U. work in its forty different departments by our faithful, hardworking superintendents must always arouse keener interest and increased respect for our organization among "outsiders" who are as yet unfamiliar with our methods. For it is in the departments that lie the strength and uniqueness of the white-ribbon movement, and the fact that each branch of work bears a definite relation and fits in so beautifully to the whole, demonstrates not only the right but the expediency for its existence.

The reports of the departments as to something accomplished, something done by each to advance the cause of humanity form most potent arguments in favor of our much criticised "do-everything" policy. THE UNION SIGNAL proposes to establish new departments for these noble workers. That for the National organizers will appear in next week.

Our returned missionaries received an enthusiastic welcome, and may be said to have occupied the place of honor at both Conventions. The story of the marvelous things the Lord has wrought through the efforts of these intrepid leaders was listened to with intense interest by the vast audiences which did not refrain from giving audible expression from time to time of their indignation at the terrible wrongs inflicted upon their enslaved sisters in far-off India.

A feature of the National Convention which caused disturbance in the minds of some of our faithful workers was the non-observance of the devotional hour from eleven to twelve o'clock each day. Now that it may not go out to our great constituency the world over that the twentieth annual convention was a prayerless assembly, we desire to state that the National W. C. T. U., as is its invariable custom, opened every session, morning, afternoon and evening, with devotional service, and that also in compliance with a rule from which it never deviates, it observed the noontide hour of prayer.

Aside from these four daily seasons of outwardly expressed devotion and loyalty to their Supreme Leader, it seemed to be the sense of the Convention that the rest of the time, which was one day less than usual, should be given to the transaction of such business as had called them together. We would be the very last to detract one iota from the power and the blessing which comes from united and audible petition. White-ribboners know what divine energy lies in prayer, but we must bear in mind that work is the complement and the supplement of prayer; in fact, work is, more often than we think, the very essence of prayer itself; it often embodies better than words that form of prayer most acceptable to the Father. Let us not forget that God works through us to will and to do, and that to some minds "much speaking," much asking, implies a doubt as to God's willingness to give. Do we not often glorify God most by asking less and taking more? This is the question of many a devout heart.

The Conventions were brought to a fitting close by the gospel message given by Lady Henry Somerset in her sermon of Sunday afternoon, when she led her hearers to mountain heights whence they caught a clearer glimpse of the promised land, and of the glory that will be—that even now is.

THE DREAM CITY VANISHES.

The great Columbian Exposition is no more. The wonderful "White City" will be hereafter but a delightful memory. Like all external forms, however beautiful or beloved, it passeth away. But though the body disintegrate the spirit is immortal; though its form vanish its spirit will live forever as a far-reaching, all-pervasive influence of untold, and at present, unimagined blessing to human kind.

For six months Jackson Park has been the rendezvous of nations. Its magnificent scenic display has excited the wondering comment of the Old World and the New; its harmonious blending of art and nature, its revelations in scientific and industrial fields with their brilliant prophecies for the future, have held entranced the progressive thought of five continents and the many isles of the sea.

Regretfully Chicago witnesses the demolition of so much beauty and grandeur, of the artistic creations which have earned for an erstwhile plain and conventional park the name of the "Dream City." Regretfully she sacrifices this offspring of her own heart and hand, this wondrous production of her own brain and brawn on the altar of stern necessity. Regretfully, indeed, she sets about destroying this fair and significant symbol of her enterprise, her ambition, her strength and prosperity, this triumph of Western civilization. Reluctantly she bids farewell to the World's Fair with all its wonders, its beauties, its curiosities, and even its anachronisms. Reluctantly she says "good-bye" to her Oriental guests whose picturesque forms have become so familiar in her streets these summer months.

And the Midway Plaisance, where, as a daily paper graphically describes, "the occident and the orient were mixed in the most gigantic amusement pot-pourri the world has ever seen, where the lines of latitude and longitude were tangled together like a skein of silk after a kitten's play"—the "Midway" will live in the memory as an amusing and confusing picture of human life in the various stages of development. But withal we never care to see its like reproduced because of the many questionable if not immoral shows and performances.

Chicago retains a valuable souvenir of the Fair in the lagoons, the well-drained roadways and a few of the finest buildings that are to remain as permanent adornments of Jackson Park, not to mention the improved transportation service between Hyde Park district and the city.

The grand total of admissions to the Columbian Exposition was 27,529,400, three times as many as at the Centennial. When we remember that the greater part of this attendance was crowded into the last two months the general exemption from accident was remarkable. There was no loss of life by either the cable, the elevated or the Illinois Central trains, nor by the steamers, while Jackson Park itself, with the exception of the cold storage holocaust, was singularly free from disaster. Great praise is due, not only to the transportation companies for the capable manner in which they handled the unprecedented crowds, but also to the crowds themselves for their orderly and decorous conduct under trying circumstances. It is a fact universally conceded that those cosmopolitan crowds were the most good-natured and courteous that the world has ever brought together.

We must always be glad to remember that the tragical death of Chicago's chief executive, though occurring simultaneously with the closing ceremonies of the Exposition, had no connection whatever with that enterprise, and, while casting sad and humiliating reflections upon our national and municipal system of government, detracts nothing from the glory and triumph of the Columbian celebration.

But how did the World's Fair contribute to the uplift of man? How serve the Divine purpose in the development of the race? In the first place, as regards the individual, it appealed to the higher sensibilities; it gratified and intensified the esthetic sense which every human being, be he prince or peasant, possesses in more or less degree. It appealed to and tended to develop that love of the beautiful latent in every human heart, and one of the most potent forces in drawing men Godward. "The esthetic interest of the Fair," said William Dean Howells, "has quite eclipsed the industrial, which is a great thing for America."

To a visitor on the lookout for impressions, the satisfying sense of the general harmony which it conveyed seems to have been one of the most striking features of the Fair. It was evident that nothing was done in a haphazard way. Landscape, architecture, decoration—all evinced unity of purpose, all spoke eloquently of a broad-minded coöperation. How suggestive the thought! This thing of beauty, this symphony in form and color was the result of faithfulness to a pre-conceived design, of an eye single to a common plan.

The crowning achievement of the nineteenth century, which will be the talk of the world as long as the present generation shall last, was made possible by the coöperative effort of every artist and of every individual workman. Think of the immense labor, and the many forms of it, involved in carrying out the multitudinous details necessary to the completion of the harmonious whole! It is a splendid illustration of what may be accomplished, not only in organized movement, but in the whole plan and purpose of life by working "you in your little corner and I in mine" under the direction and in accordance with the plan of the supreme Architect.

The impetus given by the Fair to the advancement of the world in general, no one can at such close perspective as the present even estimate. It has, we know, accomplished much in fostering the spirit of brotherhood among men, and consequently in the unifying of the race. The eminent logician, Dr. Alger, of Boston, stated in the religious parliament that the unification of the race, which is slowly but surely taking place, is to come along seven different lines, viz., esthetic, scientific, ethical, political, commercial and religious. That the recent Exposition has carried us forward a very perceptible distance along each of these lines no one will deny.

The family of Adam—shall we not say the family of God?—are better acquainted with each other than ever before, hence there exists more of kindliness and good-will between man and man. There has been a laudable emulation between states and between nations, but there has been no ignoble strife, no mean rivalries, and we have no hesitation in saying that the Columbian Exposition departing leaves behind it a world upon a higher plane of thought and endeavor than it found it at its coming. The congresses themselves, as auxiliary to the great enterprise, have furnished wonderful momentum to the unification idea, and accelerated every movement for the "assent of man."

Of woman's share in the Exposition we cannot specifically speak here further than to say, that the prominent position she occupied, both in the display and in the management, including jury service, marks an epoch in the history of this planet, and points out, as nothing but the logic of events can do, her true place in the world. Who after this will be audacious enough to circumscribe for woman her "proper sphere"?

The work of the "White City" is done; its mission is accomplished, and more things have been wrought by its brief summer's existence than at present the world dreams of. Its hospitality, its government, the division of its work into departments, its coöperative spirit—all is immensely suggestive, and reveals possibilities concerning which the thoughtful citizen will not fail to ponder. Not willingly detracting from its glories, we cannot refrain from adding that we still believe and will ever believe that but for the great mistake (to use a mild term) made by the management in first deciding to keep the Fair open Sundays in defiance of the overwhelming religious sentiment, the Lord would have caused His face to shine upon this Exposition and this country, and we would have had an outpouring of spiritual as well as material blessings such as we have never known.

HOW OUR "CHIEFTAIN" RECEIVED THE NEWS.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—"Frances Willard in England and the World's and National Conventions in Chicago? It is not possible!" I have said to myself when I have thought of the twenty years during which she has never once been absent, and has led with peerless power one of the marvelous movements of the age. How many hundreds, yes thousands, of women on the home side of the Atlantic have echoed this thought! I am confident that my comrades will thank me for writing just a word to make vividly real the fact that though the ocean rolls between them and our beloved leader she has been with them in thought every moment during these months of separation, and the atmosphere of her den at Reigate, Lady Somerset's home, as she dictates to her stenographer the daily mail that is to cross the water, and talks of them all by name, is so much like the dear old den at Evanston that I have found it difficult to realize that I am not there.

"Another cable from the Convention" was the cry that rang out about eleven o'clock this morning in the cheery tones of Hannah Whitall Smith, for we are guests in her beautiful country seat at Haslemere during Lady Henry's absence. All gathered in the cheerful study where our president was dictating to her stenographer, and uttered exclamations of delight while she read with bowed head, in grateful, humble tones:

"Reëlected with enthusiasm! Hail, beloved chieftain! Mizpah!"

We thanked the Heavenly Father for the electric current under the ocean depths which brought us face to face with a constituency so loyal and loving-hearted.

We could see the familiar faces, and space was annihilated as with beating hearts we seemed once more to present to you your leader while we then and there joined in the words of the song which so fully expressed the tenderness of the tie that binds us together—"We all belong."

Each day cablegrams have come; the "Y's" and "Loyal Legioners" vieing with the "W's" in their desire to clasp hands with one who so often playfully calls herself their "elder(ly) sister."

Appropriate replies with Scripture passages were promptly sent tingling along the wires to Chicago, and the executive committee of the British Women's Temperance Association cabled to their president and the Convention the Aaronic benediction.

It is cheering to note the improvement in Miss Willard's health since she came here. Friday's Hill House, the home of our friends, Mr. and Mrs. Pearsall Smith, is five hundred feet above the altitude of London and Reigate, and the neighborhood was chosen by Tennyson, the poet, and Tyndall, the scientist, as the location of their summer homes; the first making the selection because of its unrivaled landscapes, the second because of its famed healthfulness.

Here George Eliot wrote Daniel Deronda. Mrs. Humphrey Ward, the author of Robert Elsmere, lived near by, also Frederick Harrison, the well-known author, and many journalists and lesser literary lights. Lord Egmont is the great landed proprietor of this vicinity, driving through whose parks we saw herds of from a dozen to a hundred deer, and the most magnificent avenue a mile long of chestnut trees not less than six hundred years old.

Haslemere is but forty miles from London, but one can find woods so quiet and moors so wild that they seem at the "world's end," rather than so near its great center.

It will gladden the hearts of the white-ribboners to know that through the persuasions, not to say the commands, of her kind host and hostess, Miss Willard drives about among these beautiful scenes over two hours a day in an American carriage behind a pair of trusty steeds, and that she goes to her room about eight o'clock in the evening and rests until eight the next morning.

I cannot close without expressing the gratitude I feel as a loyal W. C. T. U. woman when I remember the unselfishness of Lady Henry Somerset, who, in addition to her own arduous duties, has undertaken so many of the heavy cares that would otherwise have fallen on the shoulders of our "chieftain," and thus enabled her to continue the quiet life which alone can give such restoration of nerve force as will enable her to take once more the duties that our love and faith have so long called upon her to perform. Indeed, I am not afraid to prophesy that by next June Miss Willard will be able to resume her active work for the National society. ELIZABETH GORDON.

GODLINESS IN GOVERNMENT.

Many persons seem to think that Christianity deals only with the individual, and has nothing to do with the character of nations. But there is a gospel for nations as well as for individuals. The state no less than the church owes allegiance to Christ. It is the duty of the state or nation to recognize and serve the Lord. Let us notice for a moment some of the ways in which this can be most appropriately done. The state should recognize the sovereignty of Christ in its fundamental law. Our fundamental law is the Constitution of the United States. It is the utterance of the nation. It is the instrument by which our national conduct is measured. It is the standard to which all our laws, customs and institutions must conform. It is studied in our schools and colleges as a textbook in civil government. It is chiefly from the Constitution that foreigners, coming to this country, study American institutions. It is, therefore, the most important political document with which we have to do, and the proper medium through which the nation should declare its relation to God.

The state should recognize the Divine authority in its legislative enactments. No government has a right to make laws contrary to the law of God. "Shall the throne of iniquity have fellowship with thee, which frameth mischief by a law?" (Psalm 94:20.) A wicked government is "a throne of iniquity." It "frameth mischief by a law" when it attempts to protect or regulate any public evil. Christ came to destroy the works of the devil, not to regulate them by high license or otherwise, and this should be the policy of all governments constituted and administered according to the will of God. The state should recognize the supremacy of Divine law in the practical administration of the government. It should feel under moral obligations to be true in its diplomacy, faithful in its observance of treaties, and pure in its administration of justice. It should transact no business on the Lord's day, and perform no act in violation of the moral laws of the Bible. God commanded the nation of Israel, saying: "Fear the Lord thy God, to walk in all His ways, and to love Him, and to serve the Lord thy God with all thy heart and with all thy soul, to keep the commandments of the Lord and his statutes." (Deut. 10:12, 13.)

A nation should recognize the Divine law in the selection of public officers. God has laid down this civil service law for nations: "Thou shalt provide out of all the people able men, such as fear God, men of truth, hating covetousness, and place such over them to be rulers." (Exodus 18:21.) These are the qualifications needed in those who are to be intrusted with the administration of government. No man is mentally and morally fit to be the ruler of a nation who does not possess these characteristics.

The unclouded sunlight makes the desert.—An Arabic Proverb.

An English manufacturer recently admitted to one of our white-ribboners that although it was his custom to give two glasses of beer a day as an extra to men who cleaned his chimneys, he found that a neighboring manufacturer who gave money instead of beer, got his work much better done.

Two sermons in one text are found in the passage: "Adorn yourselves as becometh women professing godliness."

A distinguished Christian writer has said that women are divided into two classes, one needs to be preached to on the word "adorn," the other—and, alas, the larger class in social circles—on the latter half of the passage; it may be well for any woman who reads these lines to ask herself whether in her "daily walk" she illustrates both halves of the text.

The power of habit over the human mind has seldom been more curiously illustrated than by the dutifulness with which members of the Society of Friends have obeyed the dictum of George Fox, who declined to say "good morning" to anybody on the principle that "it was a good morning, and there was no need of saying so." Until the present generation, and possibly even now, stanch and true-hearted members of this society keep up the custom of declining to use this genial and brotherly method of address, not because they are not themselves genial and brotherly, but out of deference to George Fox's whim. As is well known, he declined to uncover his head to any one, saying that to do so was "hat worship," and forgetting that the custom originated in taking off of the helmet by warriors as a token that they did not fear those into whose presence they came, for the helmet was a protection from the flying arrows or the sword strokes of enemies, and to remove it was a token of confidence and affection.

Said Principal Jones, who is the head of the University of Wales, to our National president, (and she thought the sentence worthy to pass into an aphorism)—"Recognition of the intellectual equality of men and women is a fundamental necessity and a primary condition of your new reformation."

The most extreme instance of a literal observance of St. Paul's command that women should pray with their heads covered which has come to our notice is that of a worthy woman who shall be nameless, who was an evangelist and who, in order to be always according to rule, took occasion to wear a little white cap; but she was once called on suddenly to pray when she was not thus prepared, whereupon she quietly drew over her head a tidy of the chair in which she was sitting and proceeded with her devotions.

Mrs. Isabella Bird Bishop recently spoke at the missionary conference in England with several gentlemen of distinction, but high journalistic authority gives her address the palm. One correspondent says: "For an hour or more she poured forth a stream of eloquent and thrilling speech, in language of singular literary grace and power of expression, and carrying with it a cumulative pathos and impressiveness that could not be described. Before she ceased to speak twilight had deepened into darkness, but the audience—the largest of the convention—was held spellbound to the very last." Mrs. Bishop bears high testimony to the value of medical missions. She says that there are now one hundred and sixty-nine missionaries abroad who hold British medical diplomas, and nineteen of these are women. She declares that "the life of an Oriental woman is really without hope, her circumstances developing fierce passions of hatred, jealousy and intrigue, while her better nature is altogether stunted." Mrs. Bishop had a medicine chest with her, and she states that women came to her literally hundreds of times and asked for something to make a favorite wife look ugly or odious, or to destroy a favorite wife, or the favorite son of a favorite wife. She thinks that the position of women in Mohammedan countries is more degraded than in any other part of the world. Statements like these cannot be encouraging to the American Consul who, after having spent some years in Oriental countries, has come home decked out in the full costume of a Mohammedan and set at work to convert his countrymen to that faith, doing so—as he has the impudence to declare—"in the interest of women." ON DUTY.

NORTH DAKOTA

IN CONVENTION.

The fourth annual convention of North Dakota is numbered among the things of the past and we have once more entered upon a new year. Never was there a more courageous or a braver band of white-ribboners than can be found in this new state of North Dakota, especially upon the frontiers where discouragements not a few meet them on every hand. Many of our unions are located in sparsely settled districts. The members, many of them, being obliged to ride ten and fifteen miles to their place of meeting, and yet these meetings are well attended and great interest manifested in various ways. The corresponding secretary of a certain union during the summer months was present at every meeting, although much of the time she found it necessary to walk the distance of five miles.

Our convention just closed convened at Larimore, September 22, and continued until the evening of the 25th. There were over eighty delegates present, and considering the fact that Larimore is located some distance from the center of the state, the stringency of the times which is felt to a greater or less extent by us all, and many being away at the World's Fair, we consider it a good representation and a good evidence that our dear women are thoroughly alive to the work. Much interest and enthusiasm were exhibited by our workers, and the dear people of Larimore will ever be held in grateful remembrance for their hospitality and untiring zeal to make the event not only pleasant but profitable.

Mrs. N. H. Knox, so well known to the eastern workers, who for eleven years was president of New Hampshire, has taken up her abode in our state, and we are truly glad, for we find in her not only a great help but an inspiration.

Our convention opened Friday p. m. and the afternoon was occupied in the reading of reports from the general officers, county presidents and superintendents of departments. The reports all showed that our work is progressing, and although we meet with many discouragements and impediments innumerable, yet we have much to encourage and strengthen us. Friday evening, after the usual addresses of welcome, which were exceptionally good, Mrs. Emma F. Vail, president of Sargeant county, responded to the welcomes in a manner which was most pleasing and effective. I would add that we have in her a most earnest and consecrated worker, and I also am pleased to add she is only one of the county presidents of whom we have reason to be proud. The usual annual address of our president was omitted as sickness had rendered it impossible for her to prepare it.

The remainder of the evening was occupied by the Y's, with Mrs. Hattie K. Pierson, state secretary of the Y. W. C. T. U., presiding. Some excellent papers were read, causing us to feel that we have among our girls, not only most earnest workers, but young women of talent and much promise of future usefulness. The program of the evening was sandwiched with music both vocal and instrumental, which was an interesting feature throughout our entire convention, giving a pleasing and enjoyable variety.

Saturday was occupied with reports and various other business. The most interesting report was that of our home for needy women located in Fargo, which henceforth will take the name of "Florence Crittenton Home," it being one of the homes to receive a portion of the generous gift donated for that purpose by Charles N. Crittenton a year ago at Denver. We are truly grateful for this timely gift and we are indebted to our retiring president for her efforts in securing it. Saturday evening came the presentation of the prize banners; Elliot receiving the W banner and the Lisbon Y's the Y banner. Last year the Lisbon W's and the Sanborn Y's were the fortunate winners of the banners. After the presentation of banners Miss Elizabeth Preston, state evangelist, gave us a very interesting lecture upon "Our Country."

Sabbath morning union services were held in the M. E. church and we were addressed by Mrs. N. H. Knox, her theme being "Woman and Christianity." Sabbath p. m. at 3 o'clock a children's meeting was held in the opera house conducted by Mrs. M. V. Wood, of Fargo, and at 4 o'clock Miss Emma F. Bates, principal of the Valley City Normal, addressed a large audience on the subject of purity, and we feel sure that the thoughts so well expressed that not even the most fastidious could criticise, contained seed that will take root and bring forth good fruit.

Sunday evening Mrs. Knox again spoke to a crowded house, her subject being, "The Progress of the Temperance Reform."

Monday, the last day, was a busy one, as all such days are, so much being necessarily crowded into the last hours. Miss Adelaide M. Kinnear, who has been our faithful and efficient president since the organization of the state, declined reëlection, on account of poor health, and Miss Elizabeth Preston, our state evangelist, was elected her successor.

One year ago we added to our department work the schools' savings bank, with Mrs. H. C. Ruth, of Portland, superintendent. Mrs. Ruth is well known to the eastern workers, having been superintendent of this department in New Jersey several years. She is now a resident of our state, a thriving business woman, having in charge near Portland several large farms, which are owned by eastern capitalists. She is a firm believer in equal suffrage, and is proving to the people of North Dakota woman's ability to judge of "No. 1 hard," and as an honest, conscientious and upright business manager, she is doing most excellent work in this department. Her work in this state has been done entirely through the W. C. T. U., Cooperstown being one of the last to fall into line. Mrs. J. N. Brown of this place has just written a most excellent article upon the subject of Schools' Savings Banks, which was published in one of their local papers.

Good work is being done in nearly every department, and although this year in many respects will doubtless be a hard one, we hope much, for we know God will bless every earnest effort.

MRS. DELIA W. SHINN,
State Corresponding Secretary.

DELAWARE.

STATE CONVENTION.

On Wednesday, September 27, the fourteenth annual convention gathered in the Wesley M. E. church at Dover.

When the train from the north arrived at the station, a number of the good sisters of Dover were there to welcome the officers and delegates and conduct them to the church where the convention was held. Soon after our arrival a joint session of the executive committee and superintendents was held.

The convention was called to order by the president, Miss Margaret S. Hilles. Devotional exercises were conducted by Mrs. R. H. Matlack, superintendent of evangelistic work. A very cordial welcome was tendered us by Mrs. T. K. Jones which was responded to by Miss Margaret Eastburn.

The afternoon session was well attended. After the roll-call of officers, superintendents and ex-officio members, by the secretary, Mrs. Marguerite H. Green, and the committees on credentials, finance, resolutions and courtesies were appointed, the president gave her annual address, which was full of practical suggestions, and we hope will incite those who listened to greater activity in the work. The report of the executive committee was read and it showed they had not been idle by any means.

In the evening the church was crowded and an interesting and varied program was given, the main feature being a Demorest medal contest that was participated in by four girls and two boys.

The medal was awarded to one of the girls. The whole class did well, however. And just here let me say, we want to make medal contests one of our special lines of work this winter and we recommend that each contestant be given some little reward for his effort—a book or a subscription to one of our temperance papers. Four ministers of the town, three Methodists and one Presbyterian, gave us words of welcome and encouragement, and a hearty God-speed; and last but not least, was the music rendered by a boy choir, a duet by Mr. Wolcott and Mr. Smithers, and a solo by Mr. Smithers. All the music was beautiful. We know when we go to Dover we will have good music, for they are a musical people in that town.

Thursday morning was well taken up with the reports of the corresponding secretary and treasurer and a general discussion. Thursday afternoon and Friday morning were mostly occupied by reports of superintendents, that were listened to with interest. Nearly all the superintendents were present. Many of the reports denoted progress and good work accomplished. The franchise department is growing in interest, for our women are beginning to see that it is on the ballot that much of our success depends. The superintendent of prison and jail work gave a full report, showing that she is well acquainted with the condition of these places. She portrayed very clearly the terrible life of idleness the prisoners lead and recommended some means of securing employment for them. The superintendent of social purity in her report gave an account of the Industrial Home for unfortunate girls, that has been established by the untiring efforts of a few of our Wilmington sisters, and they secured an annual appropriation of $1,000 from the state. Several girls have been admitted to the Home, and are now under the care of a good, Christian, motherly woman.

The superintendent of Sabbath school work gave good suggestions, whereby the local superintendents may be able to accomplish better and more work. The superintendents of evangelistic, non-alcoholics in medicine, Sabbath observance, scientific temperance instruction, railroad, temperance literature, the press, THE UNION SIGNAL, juvenile and young woman's work were heard from in their turn.

Thursday evening the church was again filled with an audience that listened attentively to a most interesting address, by Mrs. J. K. Barney, of Rhode Island. Excellent music was furnished by the glee club.

Through the efforts of the W. C. T. U. a bill was passed last winter in the legislature prohibiting the sale of cigarettes to minors, under the age of seventeen years.

The annual election of officers was held on Friday morning, and the result was: President, Miss Margaret S. Hilles; corresponding secretary, Mrs. E. Elma Pyle; recording secretary, Mrs. Marguerite H. Green, and treasurer, Mrs. Hattie M. Phelps. The committee on credentials reported ninety-seven delegates and officers present, besides several visitors. Dr. Harriet French, of Philadelphia, and Mrs. Milligen, were among the list. A Sunday-school convention was in session in the town, and several ministers who were in attendance there, gave us a call. The committee on resolutions reported and after some change in one or two they were adopted. Superintendents for the ensuing year were appointed. An impressive memorial service was held, for several of our sisters have "passed over to the other side."

Friday evening's program was under the auspices of the Y's. Miss Bessie Mills, superintendent of Y work, presided, and Miss Clara Parrish, of Illinois, gave a very able address, urging the young women to organize, and after the meeting closed, they succeeded in organizing a Y. W. C. T. U., of fourteen members. This evening we were delightfully entertained with good music. The noontide hour of prayer was observed throughout the convention, and most helpful and impressive Bible readings were given by Mrs. Barney, Mrs. Matlack and Mrs. Tomkinson.

Friday evening closed one of the best and largest conventions we have ever held.

TWENTIETH ANNUAL MEETING.

The state convention was held at Jefferson, September 27, 28 and 29, with fine results. There were delegates from forty-five unions and let it be said to their credit that they were to be found in their seats almost constantly. The sessions were held in St. John's church and the people of Jefferson were most hospitable.

The convention was called to order on Wednesday after noon. Miss Cutter, of Clairmont, was chosen reporter, then the different departments of work were taken up.

Sacramental wine was the first one considered, and was reported by Mrs. J. B. Pearsons, of Epping. This department has been established two years and in closing she recommended that the department be abolished. Nothing has been done except to give information regarding the buying of wines in an unfermented state. It would seem as though this were one of the last departments to be abolished; so long as there is a church in our state that uses fermented wine we cannot cease our work along this line. We cannot consistently pluck out the mote from our brother's eye until we have first removed the beam from our own. We cannot say that our weaker brother shall not sup his wine over the saloon counter while one Christian church in the state has fermented wine upon the communion table. There is a sacred responsibility resting upon the church member to guard his fellow brother from harm, and so long as we (in the name of Christ) place to his lips a cup containing the fermented wine, a great and moral wrong is being done.

Sunday-school work was reported by Mrs. H. L. Wellington, of Keene. "Our place is to ask each Sunday-school to devote two collections per year to this purpose —temperance sermons, concerts and praise meetings should be held from time to time."

Mrs. F. H. Bailey's report of press work in the state contained an urgent request that every local union do its individual part to make one grand final report.

Soldiers' and sailors' work, reported by Miss C. E. Rowell, urged that the work be not neglected but that every county send some reading yearly to these men.

Peace and arbitration was reported by Mrs. S. P. Nichols.

Mrs. Kate L. Brown in reporting for drinking fountains, said they should be erected in every town. Keene reports having supplied two barrels of ice water for several seasons. Twenty-two towns are well supplied.

The report upon narcotics from Mrs. Hoffman urged untiring work in this direction by showing that the superintendent is doing faithful work.

Mrs. C. C. Bellows has a great field for work in purity of literature. Her efforts have been exerted to clear her district of the indecent pictures that appear in connection with the cigarettes.

On Wednesday evening Miss Mary Danforth, who has been a missionary to Japan and who recently returned, delivered an excellent address, in which she related her trying experience there and told of the prevalence of the liquor and tobacco habit. She gave some very interesting facts regarding Miss Mary Allen West, who carried the white-ribbon to Japan and died there.

Miss C. R. Wendall, president of the convention, delivered her annual address. It was a telling and scholarly production and we regret that we are unable to publish it in full—her many friends who could not attend the convention would enjoy reading it. The following is the corresponding secretary's report: whole number of unions in the state, 101; new unions, 7; number of members, 2,796; new members, 424; honorary, 272; gospel meetings, 172; parlor-meetings, 25; lectures, 236; copies of UNION SIGNAL, 503. Mrs. J. K. Hatch, the motherly matron of the Mercy Home at Manchester, made an interesting report of her work there, from which we should judge that good work was being done in her care for destitute and abandoned women. During the convention she received several letters from "her children" who had been helped and were now in good homes. Their tone was like that of a Christian girl to her mother.

The address of welcome by Mrs. Kate L. Brown opened with these pleasing words: "I was glad when asked to welcome you at this time. The crystal year of our united lives has come, and although I have not the gift of Miss Willard or Mrs. Livermore, I have the warm heart of a woman of the grand mountain region of New Hampshire and give you the welcome that comes pulsing from the inmost soul."

On Thursday a. m. temperance literature was reported by Mrs. Geo. Bowers who firmly believes that the interest and success of any union is measured by work done in literature departments. Mrs. A. E. McIntire, the treasurer, reported a good financial standing. Bible reading was reported by Mrs. D. W. Goodale. Mrs. C. W. Pratt came forward with her report on legislation.

Dr. Ellen A. Wallace, of Manchester, reported upon the subject of hygiene. "Laws of health should be taught to the youth. If you have no regular board of health see to it that you have one appointed."

Miss C. E. Rowell, agent for THE UNION SIGNAL, gives the number taken in the state as 503, but finds subscribers are in arrears. The papers are in reading rooms generally. The pastors are often supplied. There are some subscribers outside the unions. Many complimentary words were spoken of it and much testimony was given of the help derived from it in the work.

Sabbath observance was reported by Miss C. E. Burrell, who seemed a little discouraged at the advance in this work. A trip to the western cities might have the effect of increasing her confidence and respect for the good New England Sabbath observance in comparison with that of the West.

Scientific instruction was ably presented to the convention by our state president, Miss C. R. Wendall, who feels that much has been accomplished the past year, that the teaching of non-alcoholics in the common school is on the increase, and the time will come when it will be an established rule that the children shall be taught with regularity and not in the present spasmodic manner.

In Mrs. Lyon's report of work among the lumbermen, she expressed a warm desire that there might be a strong, robust man to go into these lumber camps and minister to the needs of these men. There is much work to be done and the shut-ins and the children can aid here by making "comfort bags," to cheer the hearts of these men so far from home. Put into them every useful thing you can think of.

In speaking of the Mercy Home the president of trustees, Miss C. R. Wendall, said that four years had passed since it was established; they now have a well equipped laundry, by which in time they hope to be self-supporting. There have been one hundred and ten inmates, from thirteen to fifty years of age; between three and four hundred callers in that time. John J. Bell, of Exeter, has made a valuable collection. Among the present needs are more shoes, one hundred yards of cotton cloth and a cow. A cheese, given by Mrs. Samuel Noyes, of Colebrook, was sold at auction, and the proceeds given to this home.

A Demorest contest on Thursday eve drew a full house.

Good words came from the superintendents of evangelistic work, state and county fairs and jail and almshouse. At the Belknap almshouse there are two hundred and twenty-six inmates. Flower day has been observed.

The police matron at Nashua coöperates with the W. C. T. U. with excellent results. A new police station has been built, with a department for women and matron. The choice of officers for the coming year resulted in the reëlection of the same.

ITEMS.

Since last October, 1892, sixty-nine medals have been used in our state, five gold and one grand gold.

The superintendents of the various departments remain the same as last year, with the exception of Mrs. Sol Cutter, of Nashua, who is superintendent of railroad work, and Miss Addie Jones, of Manchester, on narcotics.

The closing address of the convention was made by the venerable Mrs. Kinsley, one of the pioneers of the state. "Even as these hills rise Heavenward so may the hills of God arise around our work," were the closing words of her inspiring speech.

On Friday evening Mrs. Josephine R. Nichols delivered an eloquent address, full of force and animation. It was filled with thoughts long to be remembered and gave courage to all who heard it.

The only banner appearing at the convention was that of Manchester W. C. T. U. It was made by a friend aged seventy-six years and bore this inscription, "In the name of our God we will set up our banner."

Let the words of an editor present speak for the convention: "Never has it been my lot to see so intelligent a body of women gathered in convention. They are doing a grand work for humanity. May God bless their efforts."

All the excuse I can give for the delayed report is my attendance at the World's Fair during the month of October. Being appointed National delegate to the convention I spent a part of each day during National Convention week in listening to the rich treats brought together from all parts of the world. It was a time long to be remembered. Miss Wendall, our president, Mrs. Geo. Bowers and Mrs. E. A. Shaw, Mrs. Hook and others were also in the New Hampshire delegation. When the state officers were called to the platform beside Lady Henry Somerset and many other noted people to have the group photographed, our leader's face beamed kindly from the throng.

STATE CONVENTION.

The nineteenth annual convention of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Pennsylvania was held in Lancaster, October 6 to 10 inclusive.

The delegates' prayer-meeting held on the evening of October 5 was largely attended, and the spirit of consecration which prevailed set the keynote for all further sessions. The delightful weather, unbounded hospitality of the citizens, and the daily Bible readings by Miss Greenwood, all conspired to make the sessions most enjoyable and interesting. Lancaster is truly a city of "magnificent distances," and is the county seat of Lancaster county.

Friday morning the convention was called to order by the president, Mrs. Hammer. Miss Boyle, of Chester county, offered prayer. The roll-call of officers and delegates showed that all the state officers, with the exception of treasurer, were present. Thirty-six vice-presidents (leaving twenty-five counties not represented) and fourteen state superintendents were present. The report of the executive committee was read and adopted, after which the of departments were called for. Miss Pew, department of prison and jail, presented an excellent report. The work of this department is to make jails reformatory instead of penal institutions. Mrs. McCleary, soldiers' and sailors' department, read her report. The principal work this year has been to secure by legislative enactment the closing of saloons on memorial day. The effort was unsuccessful.

Revs. McKinley and Meminger were introduced and wished the convention Godspeed.

Mrs. Clements gave her report of the evangelistic work. Twenty-eight counties were represented in this report and one hundred and forty-one sermons preached. Allegheny county was the banner county in work done in this department.

Rev. Satchell was introduced and welcomed the convention.

Miss Elizabeth Greenwood, National superintendent of evangelistic work, led the devotional hour, the subject of her address being "The Privileges of a Christian." Rev. Mr. Gaul and Rev. Behney were introduced to the convention at the close of the devotional hour.

Mrs. George, superintendent of Sabbath observance, presented her annual report.

After devotional exercises in the afternoon, the president read her annual address which was a most able production. The report of corresponding secretary showed a most gratifying increase in the number of new unions organized during the year, as well as in other points. The reports of the superintendents were continued.

Friday evening session was held at the court-house. Addresses of welcome were made by Revs. Satchell and Meminger, Mrs. Mary A. Heitshu and Mrs. Ella M. Gordon; responses by Mrs. Annabel Morris Holvey and Miss A. E. Thomas.

After the reading of the Scriptures, and prayer by Mrs. N. L. Bird Saturday morning, the reading of the minutes and their approval followed. The reports of superintendents were continued. At eleven o'clock Miss Greenwood gave a Bible reading, after which the committee on grouping counties eported. Then followed noontide hour of prayer, at the close of which the announcements for the afternoon were made and convention adjourned.

Saturday p. m. Mrs. Mair offered prayer. The reading and approval of minutes of preceding session followed. The report of Mrs. Gage, superintendent of social purity, was read by the secretary. Mr. J. C. Martin, husband of the National superintendent of that department, was introduced to the convention and spoke at some length, complimenting the convention upon its grand work, and wishing the ladies still greater success. Miss Anna H. Shaw was introduced, and was greeted with the white ribbon salute. Mrs. Ellen Osborn, of the Brooklyn training school, and formerly a missionary to India, was also presented to the convention.

The treasurer then read her annual report: Total amount of state dues contributed was $4,341.82 which was $300 less than last year. Master James Meminger, infant son of the pastor of the church, was presented to the convention, and made an honorary member. Misses Greenwood and Shaw were made members with every privilege except that of voting. An amendment permitting one delegate for every fifteen dollars worth of dues paid on the five per cent basis was called for discussion; vote taken, and amendment passed. Miss Boyle reported place of holding next convention at Philadelphia. Pittsburg invited the convention to meet there in 1895. A vote of thanks was tendered Miss Boyle for her efficient work.

Mrs. Chase, superintendent of Sunday-school work, gave her report; it showed the number of Sunday-school pupils in the state to be 1,229,153; there are forty-three county superintendents. At 4 p. m. the convention adjourned to visit the Millerville state normal school. Upon arriving there the delegates were met by the president and teachers of the school, and formed in procession singing the grand old "Coronation" hymn. The first place visited was the gymnasium, where we witnessed a very fine exhibition of exercises by a class of young ladies. At the close we were escorted through the other buildings.

Saturday evening session convened at the court-house, which was densely packed to listen to Dr. Anna Shaw. The devotional exercises were led by Mrs. Olive Pond Amies. The children of the Loyal Temperance Legion marched in, one hundred and fifty in number, and their performance, consisting of music and recitations, was highly creditable. Miss Bell Braham presented the banner to Center county for having the greatest number of graduates. Miss Jones presented another banner to Sullivan county for having organized the greatest number of L. T. L's during the year. Then followed the lecture by Miss Shaw, her subject being "America Undiscovered by Columbus." At the close Miss Mae Emery of the state normal school sang a solo and Mrs. H. H. Forrest made the collection address.

SUNDAY SERVICES.

Many of the pulpits in the city were occupied by the W. C. T. U. ladies. Miss Anna Shaw and Miss Greenwood delivered fine sermons at Millersville, also at Lancaster. Mrs. Hammer, Mrs. Holvey, Mrs. Reid, Miss Jones, Miss Thomas, Miss Carrigan, Mrs. Amies, Mrs. Best, Mrs. Welsh, Mrs. Rhodes, Mrs. Clements and others occupied the various pulpits and gave excellent satisfaction. A juvenile mass-meeting was held in the court house, with addresses by Mrs. Chase, Mrs. Hulbert, Mrs. Lovell, Mrs. Amies, Mrs. Ross.

At Monday morning's session Mrs. Alfred Reid offered prayer; the reading of minutes of last session was listened to and approved. Mrs. Mary H. Jones, of Philadelphia, vice-president, was introduced and received the white ribbon salute. Mrs. Mary F. Lovell offered an amendment that the executive committee be composed of the general officers and secretary of the Young Woman's Branch, which was adopted.

Mrs. A. P. Hamilton read her report. Reports from forty-three counties showed that 1,597 copies of THE UNION SIGNAL are taken and 57,700 copies of the Bulletin. Mrs. A. B. Holvey gave a fine report of press work. Captain Allen and Lieutenant Ward, of the Salvation Army, and Rev. Lentz were introduced. At the close of the remarks made by the latter named, Miss A. E. Thomas appeared, and in a few well chosen words presented Mrs. W. B. Rhoades with a beautiful album. Mrs. Rhoades responded very beautifully, though completely taken by surprise. Miss Greenwood then gave her daily Bible reading, and the large number of visitors present showed this to be one of the most interesting features of the convention. At the close Mrs. L. A. McBride read a poem, "Charge of the Light Brigade," a parody written by herself, which was much enjoyed. Revs. Mitchell and Gerhard were introduced. The noontide prayer was offered by Mrs. Rhoades. Mrs. M. H. Jones made her report as editor of State Bulletin, showing that $87.25 had been expended

Mrs. Clements offered prayer in the afternoon after which the annual election of officers was held, resulting as follows: President, Mrs. Hammer; corresponding secretary, Mrs. Chambers; recording secretary, Mrs. O. P. Amies; treasurer, Mrs. Woods; vice-president, Mrs. Jones. Reports were given by Mrs. Lovell, department of mercy, Mrs. Amies, school of methods, Miss Burch, THE UNION SIGNAL reporter; H. F. Jones, contest work. The committee on plan of work made their report which was accepted.

Monday evening was Y night. Mrs. W. B. Rhoades had charge of the program. Miss Crawford, state Y organizer, made a good address on "Y's and Otherwise." Miss Helen Sanborn, of Boston, gave a good address on physical culture. Miss Essick delighted the audience with her solo and received an enthusiastic encore to which she responded very beautifully.

The memorial service showed that eighteen members of the Y. W. C. T. U. had died during the year. Tuesday morning session consisted in the hearing of the reports from remaining superintendents, reading of resolutions, address by Miss Sanborn. Mrs. Ross was elected superintendent of health and heredity in place of Dr. DeGrau who resigned. In the afternoon a consecration meeting was held. The presence of Miss Dornblazer, who was unavoidably detained, was missed very much and many expressions of regret at her absence were made.

THE STATE CONVENTION

was held this year at Junction City, a beautiful and hospitable town on the U. P. R. Road, north and east of the center of the state. Not being favored with personal enjoyment of the good things always in store for those in attendance, and no report having as yet been sent me, I shall draw largely from that of the secretary, Mrs. S. M. Hartough, as published in Our Messenger.

The convention assembled on Tuesday, Sept. 26, at nine a. m. in the Presbyterian church, which had been gaily decorated with flags, flowers and potted palms, converting the pulpit and organ loft into a bower of beauty. The opening service was led by Mrs. Clark of Kansas City. Roll-call showed present three officers, the seven vice-presidents, four of the state superintendents and the editor of Our Messenger.

The reports of district presidents were all of an encouraging nature, showing increased interest throughout the state, in our several lines of work. The various committees were appointed and the closing hour of the morning was spent in a Bible reading beautifully given by Miss Spencer of Emporia.

Mrs. Julia A. Chase conducted prayer service at the opening of the afternoon session. Reports of corresponding secretary and treasurer were presented to convention, Mrs Woodbridge, secretary of the National W. C. T. U., was present, and with the president, Mrs. Grubb, had supervision of the question drawer.

The morning of the second day of convention, according to constitutional requirements, was devoted to election of officers, which resulted as follows: Mrs. L. B. Smith, of Ottawa, president; Mrs. S. A. Thurston, of Topeka, corresponding secretary; Mrs. S. M. Hartough, of Leavenworth, recording secretary, and Mrs. M. L. Berry, of Cawker City, treasurer. Miss O. P. Bray is still editor of Our Messenger. These officers, with the exception of the president, have faithfully served us for several years.

It was with many regrets that the members of the Kansas W. C. T. U. were forced to part with their late president, Mrs. Grubb, and every mark of confidence was expressed toward her that it was possible to bestow. Her removal from the state necessarily severed the pleasant relations she sustained toward us, and while our hearts are full of sorrow at her loss we feel that her mantle has fallen upon a worthy successor, and will give her our earnest support, and as far as possible help to lighten the burden she bears.

Memorial services were conducted by Rev. E. F. St. John. Our promoted sisters were tenderly remembered and recalled, especially the beloved daughter of Mrs. Grubb.

REPORTS FROM SUPERINTENDENTS

were in the main very encouraging. A telegram of greeting was received from the Maine W. C. T. U. then in session. Is. 60:2, 3. Compliments returned. Is. 42:16. These silent messages are tender chords which help to bind together the white-ribbon sisterhood of the land. On Thursday morning the citizens of Junction City kindly furnished carriages for the conveyance of the delegates to Fort Riley, where every kind attention was paid to the visitors, and naturally the visit was greatly enjoyed by all. The delegates elected to the World's W. C. T. U. were Mrs. Grubb, Mrs. Smith and Mrs. Thurston. The delegates to the National W. C. T. U. were: Mrs. Truax, Mrs. Ella W. Brown, Mrs. M. L. Parsons, Mrs. Jennie Kemp, Mrs. Dora Evans and Rev. E. F. St. John.

Many pleasant episodes made this, the fifteenth annual meeting of the Kansas W. C. T. U., a happy remembrance to all in attendance, among them, the introduction and greeting of friends, the presence of the National secretary, Mrs. Woodbridge, who gave one of her stirring and strong addresses, and of the representatives of the Soldiers' Union from the Fort.

Songs and recitations interspersed the solid work, and the suffrage symposium of Thursday evening, sparkled with wit and abounded with humor, and was participated in by Mrs. Stoner, Rev. Harshaw, Mrs. Unruh, of Oregon, and Mrs. Grubb. The citizens, the pastors, the press and the railroad agent all received well-deserved thanks for their kindness, hospitality and untiring efforts in contributing to the success of the convention. The words, "Welcome W. C. T. U.," suspended across the main avenue, spoke volumes of themselves. Mrs. Kirby, president of the local W. C. T. U., cordially welcomed the delegates. This with Miss Kimber's bright response and the interesting annual address of the president, Mrs. Grubb, with music kindly rendered by local talent, formed the program of the first evening. Mrs. Woodbridge spoke the second evening and the suffrage symposium occupied the third, each and all filled to overflowing with good things. Among the resolutions adopted was one of loyalty to the National W. C. T. U., and to Mrs. Carse, as founder of the Temperance Temple, one urging thorough work in the franchise department the coming year, one urging women to assist in the election of such school-boards as will employ only such teachers as have a high grade of morals, one of appreciation of the good work done in the Industrial School by Miss Spencer, one of thanks to Mr. Anthony Comstock and the five brave women of the World's Fair committee for their action on the obscene dancing in the Midway Plaisance, and one of thanks to the entire press of the state for favors shown during the year, as well as the usual thanks extended to all who so well deserved praise for kindly aid, and lastly came the following:

WHEREAS, Circumstances require the removal of our beloved president, Mrs. Sophia F. Grubb, to another state, therefore

Resolved, That with due appreciation of her faithful, efficient labors, her Christian counsel and unfaltering leadership in tribulation and grief, we tender her our heartfelt sympathy in her bereavement and give her our prayers for her future success, with our watchword, "Mizpah—May the Lord watch between thee and me."

DISTRICT CONVENTIONS.

The several districts have each held their annual conventions, that of the first district being held in Leavenworth with good attendance. The weather was very unfavorable, yet the most of the members proved their loyalty by braving the storms. Reports from superintendents were in much better shape than a year ago. The first evening's program consisted of the welcome to delegates by Mrs. Fields, and the response by Mrs. Chase; also the "president's message." A colored quartette added much to the evening's entertainment.

Mrs. Ella W. Brown, our W. C. T. U. lawyer, was unanimously reëlected district president. Mrs. J. M. Kemp, of Cherokee, state superintendent of railroad work, and Mrs. J. C. Haines, of Augusta, state W. C. T. U. superintendent of medal contest work, each gave instructive talks on the work of their respective departments. In the evening Mrs. Haines held a gold medal contest, the contestants being girls from different parts of the district, which proved very interesting and profitable. Mrs. Haines will visit unions and organize contest classes when arrangements are made for her to do so. As a means of creating a temperance sentiment in a community nothing could do more effective work.

Fourth district convened at Marion, and the delegates were met at the trains by white-ribboners with carriages, having the horses decorated with our badge of ribbon white. The church in which the convention was held was tastefully decorated with flags, bouquets, plants, banners and other devices. President Haynes led the consecration service. During the evangelistic hour the prayers of the convention were asked for Miss Spencer, who has the confidence of the white ribbon host. Mrs. Kemp was present in the interest of her department of state work. Greetings were received from the second district then in session at Pleasanton. Visitors were introduced, and at 2:30 Mrs. Unruh gave one of her fine chalk talks to the children. In the evening Mrs. L. F. Keller welcomed the convention; the response was made by Mrs. Nannie Brown, followed by Mrs. Unruh's address, "Why we are Cranks." Rev. W. R. Watson made the collection speech. Thursday's business hours were enlivened with talks by Mr. and Mrs. Carruth. Rev. Watson spoke on "The Present Outlook of the Temperance Question." The president also gave an excellent address. Mrs. S. A. Thurston, state superintendent franchise department, was present and took charge of that topic in the school of methods. Mrs. Haines was reëlected president, Mrs. L. Stotts, secretary, and Mrs. A. G. Ayers, treasurer. Mrs. Unruh's evening address was about "Our Boys and Girls."

Fifth district met in annual session at Clifton. Greetings were given by Mrs. Totten, and response by Mrs. H. Harger. President Evans delivered a fine address. The treasurer reported money enough to meet all expenses—a fortunate circumstance in this year of financial panics. Mrs. Kemp visited this convention also, in the interest of her department, and urged that pastors all over the state be asked to give one sentence of their prayers in churches, for the railroad men. We scarcely realize how much we owe to the faithful performance of duty by the railroad employés. Miss O. P. Bray, editor of Our Messenger, was present and aided in many ways to make the meetings interesting. The evening speakers were Rev. J. Collins, who spoke on social purity, and Rev. Eugenia St. John, whose theme was "Gold and Silver," men representing the gold and women the silver. This speaker gave an enthusiastic talk for "free silver," and said woman would soon be where she should have been long ago, "on a par with gold." School of methods was conducted by Miss Bray. Officers elected: Mrs. Dora A. Evans, of Clay Center, president; corresponding secretary, Mrs. E. F. Bumstead, of the same place, and treasurer, Mrs. Barlow, of Blue Rapids.

Osage county W. C. T. U. convened at Barclay. Excellent papers were read on scientific temperance instruction, "Economic Effects of Alcohol," "Peace and Arbitration," "Need of Consecrated Workers," also one on social purity. At the gold medal contest in the evening, Miss Gertie Addis, of Quenemo, took the prize, while a neatly framed picture of Mr. Demorest was presented to Mr. Gerry Watkins, of Barclay. Miss Jaquith, state evangelist, was present and took a helpful part.

Report from Lyon county convention announces good work done for the year, but somewhat retarded by "Columbian Clubs," and the World's Fair. They passed strong resolutions endorsing the work of Miss Spencer, who is a Lyon county girl. The first county convention of the Loyal Temperance Legion was held in Emporia, Mrs. M. M. Comans, superintendent, assisted by Mrs. Unruh. Mrs. Comans is one of our busiest W. C. T. U. workers.

The Morse union of Johnson county deserves especial mention. Its members are principally farmers' wives and daughters. The union owns its own headquarters, which cost $700; is paid for and is regularly chartered by the state. It has held thirteen medal contests, also twenty-two lectures, a number of them by speakers of national repute, besides numerous literary entertainments of a character to advance W. C. T. U. work in the community. It sends delegates regularly to all conventions, and is now agitating the suffrage question.

Ex-president Grubb was an indefatigable worker, and in one of the reports concerning her travels she mentions attending Jewell county convention, which, by the way, is the banner county in point of number of unions. She speaks of the excellent fashion they have up there of taking their children and young people to their conventions, and also of the large attendance of men at each session, as many men as women, and almost equally interested.

NOTES.

The Ottawa union, of which our new state president, Mrs. L. B. Smith, is a member, gave a reception in her honor on her return from state convention.

The dinners and suppers for the state convention were served in the basement of the church they occupied by the different church organizations and the local union. Dinner on Thursday was furnished by the colored people.

A very pleasant surprise at the last meeting of the executive committee was a communication expressive of good-will to the cause and thanks for our visit from a lady who had been noticeable for her constant attentions to the guests in the dining-room, who proved to be, not a W. C. T. U. woman, as we had supposed, but a warm friend of the work. Her greeting to the workers closed as follows:

"So, women, be proud of your union;
Wear your white ribbons out in full view;
There is many a fond mother saying,
God prosper the W. C. T. U."

NEWS IN A NUTSHELL.

"WE have a number of old papers, UNION SIGNALS and Organizers, can you tell us of some place were they would be acceptable?" writes Henrietta Strickland, New Marion, Ind.

REV. W. H. BOLES, of Eureka, an "always-to-be-depended-upon" worker in prohibition and reform ranks, will soon enter the gospel temperance field in Illinois, and his helping hand is most gladly welcomed.

MRS. A. F. NEWMAN, of Lincoln, Nebraska, has met with a great sorrow in the loss of her husband, David Newman, a leading Christian worker and business man of that city. THE UNION SIGNAL offers its tender sympathy to this sister in her hour of loneliness and sorrow.

THE reading of the able and suggestive paper, by Mrs. Louise Downs Quigley, of New Jersey, on "Public Meetings," called out animated discussion and unstinted praise at the Missouri convention. They hope to see its fruits in more earnest work along this line, and a consequent awakening of conservative women all over the state to the duties and privileges that await them.

THE eleventh annual convention of Virginia held in Staunton, September 20–22, passed among others the following resolution:

Resolved, That we, the W. C. T. U. of Virginia in convention, send expressions of sympathy and love to our beloved leader, Frances E. Willard, and pray that God in His mercy will bring her safely home and spare her to a long life of increased usefulness.

W. T. P. A. STOCKHOLDERS AND BOARD MEETING.

The annual meeting of stockholders of the Woman's Temperance Publishing Association convened at Willard Hall at 10 a. m., October 18. The small number present, owing to the W. C. T. U. convention in session at the Memorial Art Palace, led to an adjournment until Friday evening, October 20, at which time many were in attendance.

Mrs. Matilda B. Carse, president of the board of directors, presided. Mrs. Caroline F. Grow, business manager, made a clear and pleasing presentation of the status of the association. In pursuance of the object of the meeting eleven directors, in whom the interests of the association will be invested during the ensuing year, were elected, as follows: Miss Willard, Illinois; Mrs. Bailey, Maine; Mrs. Carse, Illinois; Mrs. Plumb, Illinois; Mrs. Hagans, Illinois; Madam Demorest, New York; Mrs. Fessenden, Massachusetts; Mrs. Woodbridge, Ohio; Mrs. Hoffman, Missouri; Mrs. Tyng, Illinois.

These directors met on the following Monday and elected Mrs. M. B. Carse, president; Mrs. M. A. Woodbridge, secretary, and Mrs. L. A. Hagans, treasurer. The reports of Mrs. Carse; Mrs. Grow, business manager; Miss Sudduth, managing editor of THE UNION SIGNAL; Mrs. Kells, office editor; Miss Stewart, editor of the Oak and Ivy Leaf, and Miss Guernsey, editor of publications and of The Young Crusader, were read and approved.

Mrs. Fessenden, Mrs. Hoffman and Mrs. Tyng resigned from the board of directors, and Lady Henry Somerset, Mrs. E. B. Ingalls and Mrs. Mary T. Lathrap were elected to fill the vacancies.

Miss Willard was reëlected editor-in-chief of THE UNION SIGNAL, Lady Henry Somerset, contributing editor, and Miss Margaret A. Sudduth, managing editor; Mrs. Harriet B. Kells was reëlected to her present position. Miss Jennie A. Stewart was made associate editor of THE UNION SIGNAL, and reelected editor of the Oak and Ivy Leaf. Miss Ada M. Melville, who has for some time contributed most acceptably to our publications, and filled the position of book and magazine reviewer for THE UNION SIGNAL, was made editor of The Young Crusader. Mrs. Katherine Lente Stevenson, corresponding secretary of Massachusetts and a well-known author, was elected editor of books and leaflets, and will also contribute to the columns of THE UNION SIGNAL. Miss Ruby I, Gilbert was continued as cashier and bookkeeper.

The interests of the association were carefully considered and plans laid for prosecution of the work.

NOVEMBER MAGAZINES.

The series of brilliant articles on his European trip is continued by Bishop Vincent in the November number of THE CHAUTAUQUAN, this time dealing with his visit at Norrköping, Sweden, and other places of interest in that interesting country.

T. L. Flood, editor, Meadville, Pa.

The actual work done in hospitals in Paris by means of hypnotism is fully described in MCCLURE'S MAGAZINE for November, by R. H. Sherard, and illustrated with numerous photographs, showing the patients in the various forms of hypnotic trance.

S. L. McClure, Limited, 743 Broadway, New York City.

The November number of CURRENT LITERATURE gives in its 160 pages a remarkable full and complete reflection of the progress of the world. The new departments, "Sport, Recreation and Adventure," The New Education, and "Medical, Surgical and Sanitary," show a strong grasp of the vital thought of the time in these lines, and will do much to increase the interest and entertainment already given by the magazine.

Current Literature Pub. Co., 52-54 Lafayette Place, New York City.

The fiction of WORTHINGTON'S for November is noticeably good, and that enthusiastic student of bird-lore, Mrs. Olive Thorne Miller, contributes a most entertaining article concerning the curious ways of birds in mating time, entitled "The Lover in Feathers." The department matter is of the highest quality, and will receive, as has that of all preceding numbers, the highest commendation of its readers.

A. D. Worthington & Co., Publishers, Hartford, Conn.

A thorough and timely study of "The New Testament Teaching of Hell," by William W. McLane, D. D., of New Haven, Conn., opens the Review Section of THE HOMILETIC REVIEW for November. To those whose knowledge of that teaching is derived from the authorized version, this study cannot fail to be helpful as emphasizing the distinctions that ought to be kept in mind in the use of the word "hell" in the various passages where it occurs.

Funk & Wagnalls Company, Publishers, 18 and 20 Astor Place, New York City.

The November number of the CALIFORNIAN is refreshingly interesting in its large variety of contributions. The magazine continually savors of the fresh and vigorous spirit of the Pacific slope. "Irrigation in California," "California at the World's Fair," "Football in the West," "Parks and Reservations" and "Chinese Fisheries in California" are the subjects of some of the articles. John Vance Cheney, Prof. G. N. Richardson, Clifford Howard, Arthur Inkersley, and J. H. Gilmour are among the contributors. The frontispiece of the number is a striking one by Alexander Harmer, subject, "The Last of the Cliff-Dwellers."

47 Lafayette Place, New York City.

The November ARENA closes the eighth volume of this popular review, which, by the conspicuous ability of its contributors, its unequaled, fearless and healthy reformative impulses, has become a power in our land. This issue contains, among other brilliant papers, a noteworthy article written by the late Richard A. Procter, in which the eminent astronomer reviews the claims of Bacon and Shakespeare at length. This paper was originally a portion of a correspondence between Mr. Procter and his daughter. The Bacon-Shakespeare case closes in this issue. It contains verdicts from Henry Irving, Governor W. E. Russell and others. In this notable verdict twenty of the most eminent writers and critics in America and England are for Shakespeare, one votes for Bacon, and four are undecided. Rabbi Solomon Schindler contributes a very thoughtful, though rather Socialistic paper, entitled, "Thoughts in an Orphan Asylum." E. P. Powell's contribution is a strikingly interesting "Study of Thomas Paine." Louis Frechette, the poet-laureate of Canada, appears in an interesting historic story entitled "La Corriveau."

NEW BOOKS.

THE SOCIAL LAW OF GOD, a paper-bound volume of over two hundred sermons on the ten commandments, by E. A. Washburn, D. D., late rector of Calvary church, New York, published by Thomas Whittaker, 2 and 3 Bible House, New York City.

This is a very forcible work, its strength lying not so much in persuasive eloquence as in its clear, calm logic. Each chapter has for its text a commandment from the Old Testament with its correlated word in the New Testament, showing the advancement from the letter of the law which "killeth" and the spirit in which is life. Dr. Washburn says in his closing paragraph, "I have sought to read the Hebrew text in the full light of a gospel, 'quick, powerful, sharper than a two-edged sword, a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart.' I have hid none of its obligations and smoothed none of its rigors. If it has seemed sometimes too stern for the voice of our religion, I can only repeat that in a time which loves a Christianity of opinion more than duty, of license more than the law of liberty, or on another side a Jewish ceremonial more than its moral truth, we need to know above all the unity of faith with a real holiness." The sermons will be of real aid to the student of Bible truths.

There lies on Our Library Table the best book of all that ever has or ever will have a place there—a copy of the Bible. It comes from the publishing house of Thomas Nelson & Sons, 33 East 17th Street (Union Square), New York. This special volume is one of a new and enlarged edition of the OXFORD TEACHERS' BIBLE with a perfected appendix of the well-known Oxford Helps to the Study of the Bible. These "Helps" comprise compendious and exhaustive information on all points of Biblical study, analytical, critical, chronological, historical and geographical; a glossary of antiquities; dictionary of proper names and subjects; concordance; new indexed atlas with fifteen maps; sixty-four full page plates which are authentic reproductions of documents, monuments and contemporary portraits, illustrating the history of the Old and New Testaments. This edition can be had with or without the illustrations at prices ranging from a merely nominal figure to the cost of the most elegant editions.

POEMS HERE AT HOME, by James Whitcomb Riley. Illustrated by E. W. Kemble.

Riley's poems hardly need a passing word of comment or commendation, they are their own best evidence. Tear and smile and laugh-provoking, couched in a language of the people that never finds its way into our unabridged dictionaries, lowly-born of the inspiration caught from the commonest details of life's roadsides, yet anon taking flight into regions vast with grandeur, they are beloved by thousands and have their abiding place in that most sacred of our country's shrines—by the fireside of the home. In his "Proem" the author makes a plea for his book. We quote but one stanza:

"Putt in old Nature's sermonts,—them's the best,
And 'casion'ly hang up a hornets' nest
'At boys 'at's run away from school can git
At handy-like—and let 'em tackle it!
Let us be wrought on, of a truth, to feel
Our proness fer to hurt more than we heal.
In ministratin' to our vain delights—
Fergittin' even insecs has their rights!"

Perhaps his poems of the foregoing style are the more often quoted. But for contrast witness the following:

"O the sun and the rain, and the rain and the sun!
There'll be sunshine again when the tempest is done;
And the storm will beat back when the shining is past—
But in some happy haven we'll anchor at last.
Then murmur no more,
In lull or in roar,
But smile and be brave till the voyage is o'er.
O the rain and the sun, and the sun and the rain!
When the tempest is done, then the sunshine again;
And in rapture we'll ride through the stormiest gales,
For God's hand's on the helm and His breath in the sails.
Then murmur no more,
In lull or in roar,
But smile and be brave till the voyage is o'er.

A UNIQUE VOLUME.

Record of the World's Parliament of Religions at a Nominal Price.

If one were offered an opportunity to procure at a nominal price a volume written by the leaders of religious thought in all the world, each writing on the subject nearest his heart, one would hardly hesitate to embrace the opportunity. Think of a book—a religious book—a history and sketch of the religions of the world prepared by such authors as Prof. Philip Schaff, Col. Thomas W. Higginson, Rev. Edward Everett Hale, Miss Frances Willard, Joseph Cook, Rev. Dr. Haweis, Cardinal Gibbons, Archbishop Ireland, Rabbis Wise, Hirsch and Gottheil, Rev. James Brand, Rev. Theodore Cuyler, Professor Charles A. Briggs, Julia Ward Howe, Rev. George C. Lorimer, President Washburn of Robert College, Mr. Justice Amur Ali, P. C. Mazoomdar, Right Rev. R. Shibata, Rev. Mokurai Shimaji and other Japanese Buddhists, Pung Quang Yu, Prof. Max Müller, Hon. Kanwar Harnam Singh and other eminent Indian scholars, Lady Henry Somerset, Mrs. Ormiston Chant, the Pundita Ramabai, of Poona, India, Miss Lazarus, Count Bernstoff, of Germany, Bishop Dudley, of Kentucky, Rev. Dr. Lyman Abbott, Commander and Mrs. Ballington Booth, and many others of no less eminence.

Such a volume is the record of the World's Parliament of Religions, carefully prepared and illustrated with portraits of the leading delegates, which we are now able to offer to our readers at a nominal price. It is a volume of unique interest and permanent value.

The Hon. Stephen M. White, Senator in Congress from California, responding to a toast at a World's Fair banquet given in Chicago the other day, made use of these words:

"One of the most notable features evolved by our great international Exposition has been the religious congress, at which all who desired were permitted freely to explain their theological views, and were granted respectful audience. Thus men of varying modes of thought and education for the first time encountered each other and received accurate descriptions of dogmas heretofore but little understood. How impossible would such a gathering have been but a few years ago. And how strongly does it foreshadow that peace and good-will among men which we all claim to be desirous of maintaining. When in this great theater of freedom such scenes are enacted, how lonesome is the lot of the bigot, the plotter against his brother, the insidious defamer, who in hidden counsel plans against the advancement of the citizen whose integrity and ability he concedes, but whose ideas regarding religion he does not like."

It is a fact that "such a gathering" would not have been possible at any other time or in any other place than under the shadow of the Columbian Exposition. This fact alone would explain the very general anxiety of religious people the world over, to perpetuate their recollections of this great event in the enduring form of a complete record of the proceedings and a description of the delegates who gathered from every clime to represent every known religion. Such a record in handsome and convenient form, properly illustrated with portraits of the principal delegates, our readers may easily obtain.

THE CHAIN THAT BINDS THE WORLD

The idea of religion is inherent in Man. No race has ever been found that did not have some form of worship.

CREEDS ARE MANY

BUT ALL PAY ALLEGIANCE TO ONE SUPREME BEING

The KORAN of the Mohammedans
The EDDAS of the Scandinavians
The TRY PITIKES of the Buddhists
The FIVE KINGS of the Chinese
The THREE VEDAS of the Hindoos
The ZENDAVESTA of the Persians and the HOLY BIBLE, or the SCRIPTURES of the Christians are the Seven Bibles of the world and they all lead the mind toward one idea, WORSHIP. The readers of each one, the supporters of all creeds, were represented at the great

Parliament of Religions

Recently held in Chicago under the auspices of the World's Columbian Exposition. Noted expounders of every faith were there, among thom H. Dharmapala, Secretary of the Maha-Bodhi Society of India; Rt. Rev. R. Shibata, High Priest of the Zhikko sect of Shintoism in Japan; the Hon. Justice Ameer Ali, of Calcutta. At every session of the Congress eloquent speakers were heard. The various creeds were ably discussed and the large audiences were daily treated to lectures of intense interest.

This "Parliament of Religions" was undoubtedly the most important event of the century and the effects must be far reaching.

WE HAVE SECURED VERBATIM REPORTS

of the different sessions. They have been carefully revised, edited, and illustrated with nearly 100 portraits, and are now prepared to give the public the benefit of this labor and expense at a cost, trifling in the total and in a manner which will make it possible for any one in whatever circumstances to possess this valuable work. Its desirability is apparent. It will be welcomed by all.

To place this World's Parliament of Religions within the reach of all we have adopted the following liberal plan:

One-third of the California fruit ranches are either owned or managed by women.

It is said there are Protestant churches in seven hundred and eighty-one towns of France.

It is in the heart that God has placed the genius of woman, because the works of their genius are all works of love.—Lamartine.

France, Belgium, Greece, Italy and Switzerland constitute the Latin union, and use a system of coinage that is alike in weight and fineness, differing only in name.

The Queen Regent of Spain has decided to carry out the wishes of her late husband, and will establish a college in the Escurial for the teaching and study of the Christian sciences.

After seeing a distillery, brewery and tobacco factory, a bright old country woman remarked, "Ain't I thankful we women folks hain't got all that stuff to smoke and chew and swallow down."

The Krupp firm whose exhibit of artillery in the World's Fair has attracted so much attention, has sold 15,000 cannons to the various nations of Europe. May the new peace and arbitration movement render them useless!

One department of the Salvation Army deserves more mention. It is the shipping department, which welcomes strangers to foreign shores, and through its inquiry department is often the means of restoring long-lost friends to their families.

The last returns of the Indian Army Temperance Association have been recently published. They show the total membership to be twenty-one thousand two hundred and seventy, an increase of three thousand five hundred and seventeen over the returns of last year.

The progress of invention and discovery is shown by the constant addition of new words to our language. Under the letter "A" Worcester has six thousand nine hundred and thirty-three words, the Century, fifteen thousand six hundred and twenty-one and the Standard, nineteen thousand seven hundred and thirty-six.

Fifteen dollars a day represents the average amount paid into every saloon in the United States. This multiplied by two hundred and fifty thousand, the number of saloons, and that result by 365 days, gives the total of $1,268,750,000, which amount represents the drink bill for one year. No wonder there are hard times for working men and their families!

Prof. Goldwin Smith, who has written against prohibition and total abstinence men, now gives the following opinion: "When I see the havoc, the ever increasing havoc which drink is making with the industry, the vigor, the character of the British race, I have sometimes asked myself whether if it is incumbent on Legislature to stop a cattle plague by closing the ports against contagion, the most deadly of all man's plagues ought to be allowed to spread without control."

A school which, perhaps, has not its like in the United States, is the Professional School for Girls, in Rome, Italy. It is a sort of technological institute of the arts and sciences peculiarly useful and practical for women in business or daily life. It has a large number of teachers and eight hundred pupils. The subjects studied range from intellectual philosophy and civil law to the management of domestic accounts. The practical side is always first; for instance, in chemistry, the experiments lead to the re-discovery of certain fadeless tints; in botany to the reproduction of flowers in tapestries, etc. Geometry is studied to assist in the art of embroidery. The gowns which are made in the dressmaking classes are purchased by the ladies of the nobility as well as the Queen, who is greatly interested. If a more æsthetic and artistic character could be given to practical work in this country, it would perhaps attract more American girls, and help to keep them out of shops and factories.

MEDAL FOR THE CHAMPION WAGON.

Very satisfactory results are being realized by a large number of our American manufacturers of agricultural implements at the World's Fair. The Joliet Strowbridge Co., Joliet, Ill., exhibit in the Agricultural Building their Broad Cast Seeder and Peerless Feed Grinder. These are both well known pieces of farm machinery, and many good sales have been made at the Fair. The Champion Wagon, of which the Strowbridge Co. are special agents, is exhibited in the Transportation Building. The Champion, by the way, has captured the medal, which is a sufficient recommendation. They will send free, to any one applying, circulars giving full information concerning the above named articles. If interested address them.

NIAGARA FALLS.

Next to the World's Fair, all our foreign friends want to see Niagara Falls, and in the minds of many, Niagara Falls is placed first. One of the first questions they ask an American either at home or abroad is about Niagara, but to many of us Niagara Falls is too near. Were it on the other side of the world, thousands of American globe trotters would hasten there, who pass it by now because they can go there any time.

The Michigan Central has made it, perhaps, too easy of access, for its through trains from New York and Boston run directly by and in full view of the great cataract, and those passing by daylight stop five minutes for passengers to view the Falls. The wise traveler, however, will stop over there as long as his time will permit to view the beauties and the grandeur of the falls under different aspects and from different points of view. The longer he stops the more he will find to repay him for whatever expenditure of time and money he incurs.

Every merchant, farmer, doctor, lawyer, in fact everyone, should have one of the "Handy Manuals," a compendium of a million facts.

The Woman's Board of Missions of the Interior (Congregational), at Rockford, Ill., last week, reviewed the work of the year.

Additional gifts to the Chicago University this week, amounting conditionally to one million dollars, are for the purpose of creating a general fund.

The United States Brewer's Association has officially protested against any increase of the tax on beer, on the ground that it would give large breweries a monopoly.

Sir Andrew Clarke, Gladstone's physician, an eminent practitioner, and president of the Royal College of Physicians, has passed away, and his funeral took place last Sunday.

The new Minnesota Fuel Company, formed by the citizen's committee, has been unable to obtain coal owing to the influence of the coal trust and is forced to wait till next year to supply consumers at reasonable rates.

The publication, Saturday, of a letter from Secretary of State Gresham to President Cleveland, in which the former recommended the withdrawal of the United States treaty with the provisional government, and the restriction of the monarchy in the Hawaiian Islands, has aroused much comment.

IN the Calendar at the head of this page will be found the announcement of Crusade Day and of the Jubilee Crusade number of THE UNION SIGNAL. This number will be issued December 21, and it is our intention to mail it so promptly that it will reach all subscribers and purchasers before the Saturday which commemorates the event.

THE Young Men's Christian Association of Dayton, Ohio, is wide awake to cast its net wherever men may be caught and saved from the snares of the tempter. On election night, Nov. 7, they kept their association hall open all night, the news being received over a special wire for all who attended. Music, songs, readings from platform during intervals, and refreshments served as attractions; tobacco, bad language and kindred abominations were kept outside. A good suggestion for all societies.

MARCH 20, 1894, will be the ninetieth birthday of America's "Grand Old Man," General Neal Dow. It is proposed to celebrate this event in keeping with its importance, both in this country and in England. It is a little early to give particulars, but suggestions for the celebration and a sketch of the General's life will be given in due time in THE UNION SIGNAL and other temperance papers. Each friend of our reform will be glad to learn that the remarkably long life of this famous leader has not dimmed his faculties nor dulled his enthusiasm.

THE scripture text at the head of Mrs. Carse's Temple Items this week is truly indicative of the "Temple builder's" character. Despite the opposition she has received, and the "hard times" generally, Mrs. Carse is dauntless in her determination to free the Temple from debt and present it to the National W. C. T. U. She not only "asks in faith" but "nothing wavers." Her new plan for fifty cents per member from the W. C. T. U., the Y and the L. T. L., is certainly reasonable, and one which will bring a large revenue at once, redeem a part of the bonds, buy up a large portion of the stock and rejoice the heart of the bravest woman that ever lived.

MISS ALICE M. GUERNSEY was called to her eastern home in Rutland, Vt., last Tuesday, by the death of her beloved mother. Four times since coming to her editorial position in the W. T. P. A. has Miss Guernsey been summoned to her mother's bedside. Promptly has she obeyed the summons and each time until the last has she been happily rewarded in her mother's continued lease of life. It is pathetic to know that the last call was too late to see the dear form in life as the spirit had departed before the faithful daughter left Chicago, though she fortunately did not know it. The sympathies of scores of friends will be extended to Miss Guernsey in the loss of her nearest earthly friend.

DECEMBER 23, 1893, should be a memorable milestone in the onward march of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. That date will witness the completion of twenty years since the Crusade fires were lighted in Hillsboro, O. Every local union in the United States is earnestly exhorted to begin plans at once for a fitting celebration of this unique and important event. THE UNION SIGNAL of November 30 will give a program for its public celebration, written by Miss E. S. Greenwood, and suggestions for its observance socially by Miss Willard. There will also be hints as to ways of securing new members and thus make the day a real "membership Crusade day." This number of November 30 will be one especially sought by the workers. On December 21 we will issue what we anticipate to be the finest number ever printed on our presses. This will be a combination Crusade and Christmas number. (Did our readers ever notice how congenial those two words are?) This number will be one particularly adapted for distribution at the public anniversary meetings or to hand to the new member secured on that day. It will be for sale by the hundred and our presses will no doubt be kept humming with the large orders. Further plans will be unfolded in each number of THE UNION SIGNAL, as from this time on to December 23, CRUSADE DAY is to be the peaceful battle-cry of our organization. Appoint the local committees and read THE UNION SIGNAL. We will furnish the ammunition.

SELDOM have we been more startled and grieved than on reading the report of William T. Stead's address at a meeting in Central Music Hall, Chicago, last Sunday afternoon. Hoping that he had been incorrectly reported, we referred to Mr. Stead such parts of the report as concerned the reform in which we are engaged, and he replied: "I think this is about right, and it is quite true." This is the passage referred to: "I tell you you have to deal with evils so closely mixed up with our social conditions you must take counsel with the best of those associated with the evil in order to wipe out the worst. The wise people will try to improve the saloon system. The people that do most harm and least good in this matter are the temperance people. (Hisses.) I am glad there are some people here to hiss me. How many saloons are there in Chicago? Six thousand odd. How many of them claim to be decent? Two thousand odd. You want to shut them all up, some of you. (Several voices, Yes, yes.) And you will want to shut them up until the day of judgment at the rate you are going. Join hands with the 2,000 saloon-keepers who are trying to do well." In his private note, Mr. Stead said he was "sorry" that we thought his remark "unfriendly (to the temperance cause), it was not so meant." We mean no attack on Mr. Stead. We have been led to regard him as a friend and regret that his public utterances are not consistent with this view. It makes small difference how we regard him compared to the great constituency back of us and the greater public that weighs a man by his words. Mr. Stead's proposition to the temperance people of Chicago, to "join hands with the two thousand saloon-keepers who are trying to do well" (!) is about the inanest if not the insanest advice to which we have ever listened, and for which we have not the slightest fear of adoption, for fortunately temperance people, or at least prohibitionists, are too level-headed to see anything but the maddest folly in such a suggestion. Mr. Stead, no doubt, had none but the best intentions in calling this mass meeting. It was entirely under his own jurisdiction, the invitations being couched in the following language: "W. T. Stead, who was imprisoned for his sympathy with the fallen, invites you to be present at Central Music Hall this afternoon and evening." He hoped to reach the outcast and despondent, and expressed himself as bitterly disappointed at the intelligent, sober, well-dressed audience that greeted him. The Tribune thus describes the assembly: "Preachers and saloon-keepers, gamblers and theological professors, women of the levee and members of the W. C. T. U. (We have yet to learn who these 'members' were.—EDS.), anarchists and professional people sat side by side yesterday on the platform at Central Music Hall. From it the love of Christ and of men was preached, dynamite was threatened, free silver and tariff reform were advocated, the churches were attacked and defended from the floor. There were hisses and cheers in almost equal proportion; a man rushed out of the house crying, 'No dynamite! Christ is enough for me!' A woman made a speech from the center of the house." (This, we are glad to say, was a plea for temperance.—EDS.) On the whole it is doubtful if such a demonstrative anarchistic and altogether peculiar meeting was ever gathered before under any roof. Mr. Stead, no doubt, could have left many a helpful message to reformer and laborer, but he struck too wide of the mark in inviting such a well-known anarchist as the lately-pardoned Fielden to speak, and permitting churches and temperance leaders to be villified in the same breath which exalted the saloon-keeper and the tramp. When we think respectfully of William T. Stead, hereafter, it will be in connection with his social purity efforts in the Pall Mall Gazette exposures, rather than for any stroke for righteousness along the lines of temperance endeavor. We regret that his visit to the New World will not result in any accretion to the former high respect held for him here.

THE PHANTOM CITY.

BY HENRY A. DELANO.

Oh, mirage of splendor and glory,
That rose like a phantom of night,
Eclipsing all fable and story,
Or dreams of pagan delight.
White city, of domed architecture,
Of temples, palaces, halls,
Of triumph that conquered conjecture,
Of triumph that knows no recalls.

As a dream when one waketh at morning,
A vision that melteth at light,
I see thee dissolve without warning,
O mirage of grandeur so bright.
Were thy towers only clouds of a painting
Aurora had sketched on the sky?
Thy arches but rainbows, now fainting,
'Mid colors of darkness to die?

Ye are gone! The glory and beauty,
Pavilion, and court, and bazaar,
No guard nor wheelman on duty,
No caliph, mikado, or czar.
Gone, with your Persians so royal,
Egyptian, and Spaniard, and Moor,
Celestial, and Buddhist so loyal,
Esquimaux, and Arabs of yore.

All nations, all sunshine, all tropics,
All the splendors of orient zones,
All questions discussed and all topics,
Chicago, the home of all homes.
Our cold West is warmed by the vision,
(All rivers to ocean must run),
'Tis not all a dream of elysium,—
Mankind, henceforth, shall be one.

HEPSY'S NEW BUNNIT.

BY HARRIET FRANCENE CROCKER.

Hepsy come in last night with one o' them peculiar-shaped bundles in her hand that every one knows is a new hat or a bunnit. There's somethin' in the color o' the wrapping paper an' the way it's pinned together that makes it as plain to be guessed at as a piece o' cheese.

Says I, a-liftin up my hands: "Hepsy, hold!"

Hepsy looked kind o' 'stonished (I s'pose I am an eloquent an' dramatic feller sometimes) an' stood still.

"Can't I tell you what's in that bundle, Hepsy?" says I.

"I shouldn't wonder if you could," says she, "it's a new ——"

"Hold on," says I, "don't tell! It's a new bunnit, ain't it?" I spoke it in my triumphantest voice.

"It is, Adoniram," says she. "What a fortunate woman I was to pick out sech a brilliant man for a life-companion! I wonder what I should 'a' done if I had happened to get some other kind of a man. It's dretful to contemplate," says she, lookin' towards the ceilin' with a look o' gratitude on her expressive countenance. (I can't bear to hev Hepsy go an' get sarcastic! I never see any one that could be sarcasticker than she can when she sets out. I hate to have her set out.)

So I says (to kind o' turn the subject): "Well, let's see the bunnit, Hepsy?" an' Hepsy took out the pins an' held it up fer me to see. Now I have always had a good deal o' taste in the millinery line. Miss Jenkins used to say so when I was a-keepin' comp'ny with her, before I ever see Hepsy, an' Miss Jenkins was a milliner, so she ought to know.

I took it an' held it on my hand while Hepsy laid off her things an' put on her apron an' got out her knittin'-work. I was a-lookin' it over reflectively, an' I guess Hepsy must o' seen I didn't approve of her taste, but she didn't say a word. "Hepsy," says I, "now a bunnit's a thing that is very conspicuous. It comes out every Sunday to meetin', an' if you're a little late everybody's eyes is fastened onto it as it goes up the aisle. It comes out on all funeral occasions (onless it's dretful stormy), an' when you call on the minister's wife an' when you go to Serrycuse an' sech places on the cars. It's a conspicuouser article o' wearin' apparel than your Paisley shawl or your alpacky dress. It shows plainer than anything else you can wear. When you're settin' in meetin' that's about all the folks that's settin' back of you can see, you know. It stands to reason, Hepsy," says I, "that a bunnit should be a becomin' thing an' a stylish thing. You'd oughter had some birds onto it. All the women do, I notice—a green parrot an' a couple o' hummin' birds an' a blue-jay's wing or a oriole's breast. I'd like to have hed the trimmin' o' this here bunnit myself. I'd a' fixed it up stylisher than this, you can depend! I'm surprised at Mis' Doane's taste, I surely be," says I.

Hepsy up an' says: "Don't go to blamin' Mis' Doane about that bunnit, Adoniram Peabody! It's my taste an' my choice an' my bunnit. You ain't got to wear it, neither has Mis' Doane, an' it's trimmed jest exactly to suit me. Mis' Doane says, says she, 'Oh, Mis' Peabody, do let me put a blackbird's wing an' a oriole's breast on your bunnit. Black an' yeller is so stylish this winter!' Says I, as solemn as I felt (an' that was solemn enough), 'Mis' Doane, I don't believe in wearin' corpses on top o' my head. There ain't no pleasure in it for me,' says I. 'Please trim it jest as I ordered—a little bit o' yeller velvet mixed in with the black, for I hain't no scruples against havin' it stylish, an' some ribbin, if that ain't enough,' says I, 'an' black ties.'

"'So you don't enjoy wearin' birds on your bunnit, Mis' Peabody'? says she, as she laid back the wings an' things in the showcase.

"Says I, 'Mis' Doane, you've got an awful nice baby, ain't you?'

"'Oh yes!' says she, 'the sweetest, cutest little fellow! he's jest got a tooth!'

"'An' do you love him, Mis' Doane?' says I calmly. She looked astonished.

"'If I didn't know you, Mis' Peabody, I should think you was crazy! Love him—the idee! Love him! What do you mean?'

"I went on calmly—'But if it was the style, Mis' Doane, it wouldn't be much of a sacrifice to wear little dead babies on hats an' bunnits! Ain't this what folks is doin' every minute—wearin' little bird babies—that might be alive an' singin'; little dead, stuffed bodies that'll never fly in the blue sky any more an' never swell their little throats with sweet, ripplin' music? Is the flash of a bird's bright wing prettier on a hat or bunnit than it is, full o' life an' joy an' motion, skimmin' through the air, makin' its passage rich with song? Is the soft, silky cushion of a bird's breast more beautiful perched on the top of even the prettiest woman's hat than it is in some forest-hidden nest, with tiny baby-heads nestling beneath it, an' gentle mother-love fillin' it with sweet happiness an' purest joy?"

"'Oh,' says I, 'think of it! These little hummin' birds had to be killed by runnin' red-hot needles down their innocent throats, so their plumage wouldn't be damaged! I've read about it in the papers an' it's turned my blood cold to think of it. An' this bright-breasted oriole!' says I, 'think o' the sharp, cruel bullet that stopped it mebby in the middle of its lovely song, an' hushed its voice an' stilled its little heart forever! An' all this sufferin' that women might wear 'em on their hats!'

"'Any woman, though she may be innocent of any wrong intent, jest as much as sanctions the killin' o' more birds for that purpose when she wears one on her bunnit; she jest as much as says to the boy with a shot-gun, 'Go an' kill a lot more, boy, it's all right—it's stylish. They look pretty an' so it's all right.' You can't blame the boy if he goes an' shoots a lot more. His mother an' his sisters wear 'em on their hats, an' like's not his sisters have party dresses with 'em on too.'

"Mis' Doane, she had my bunnit all trimmed by that time. We had gone back into her settin'-room behind the shop an' she had ben trimmin' it an' rockin' the baby's cradle with her foot while I was talkin'. I know she was moved by what I said—I know it, Adoniram! There was tears on her eye-lashes when I got through, but I pertended not to see 'em. I was busy wipin' my own eyes."

I had out my red bandanne an' was a-rubbin' my eyes an' coughin', but Hepsy made as if she didn't hear me or see me an' begun to fix up the fire. I laid the new bunnit down on the table an' took up the Weekly Star. But Hepsy come an' put her hand onto my knee an' wouldn't let me read the news. I never see Hepsy look prettier than she did that minute! Her face was so tender an' pitiful, an' her snappin' black eyes was softened by tears, an' her cheeks was flushed by excitement.

"It seems kind o' queer to me, Hepsy," says I, "that your white ribbon women, that's so apt to be at the head of all reforms an' good works o' various kinds, ain't made a start on this line. It's kind o' queer they don't throw all their influence (an' I'll own it's a good deal) onto this question, an' help to put down sech a murderous fashion!"

Hepsy reached over an' give me the sweetest kiss she'd give me for many a long day—an' she smiled as tender an' lovin' as she did the day we was married.

"They'll do it yet, Adoniram—the white ribbon women will do it yet, God bless 'em! I know they will! They're too great-hearted an' noble-souled an' full o' Divine love an' human love an' love for all the world, to go on countenancin' sech an evil! Don't you worry, Adoniram, dear, they'll do it yet."

I felt happy—real happy. I don't know when I've felt happier than I did that minute. Mebby it was because Hepsy'd give me that kiss. Pretty soon I up an' says: "Well, Hepsy, I do honestly think your new bunnit looks better the way it is than it would with a parrot an' a hummin' bird or a blackbird's wing or a oriole's breast onto it. The velvet looks real nice an' tasty an' I'm glad you've got it. How much did it cost?" says I.

"A dollar an' eighty cents," says Hepsy; "an' if it had ben trimmed with birds it would 'a' cost four dollars at the very lowest. But it ain't the price," says Hepsy, "it's the principle of the thing. When I wear this bunnit to funerals I sha'n't feel that there had to be a funeral fer its adornment—a bird-funeral, with little, helpless, hungry babies in their motherless nest for mourners. When I set in meetin' with it on I sha'n't have to feel guilty when the minister happens to read in the ten commandments 'thou shalt not kill,'—an' when I go to Serrycuse on the cars I shan't have to try to hush up my oneasy conscience all the way. Yes, Adoniram, I'm goin' to take solid comfort a-wearin' my dollar an' eighty-cent bunnit. But, good land! where's the time gone to! Here it's nine o'clock an' I've got to set my bread yet. Wind the clock, Adoniram, an' put out the cat, an' go to bed."

An' I did.

RAILROAD TIES.

BY JOHN G. WOOLLEY.

You ask me to write upon the "temperance situation." You would as well ask me to describe the histology of a wig.

There is no temperance situation; that is the trouble. The bulk of the Christian people still hold to the nebular theory of the temperance cause. To wit: That it consists of luminiferous gas in the wake of some celestial blow-off without solid matter enough in it, as Professor Huxley says of certain nebulæ, to soil a cambric handkerchief. The temperance cause is not a thing but a phenomenon; interesting, variable, and mysterious enough to suggest power, like the aurora borealis which has been known to make many young women shudder and cry: "Gracious, let's go in, isn't it awful!"

. . . . . .

There is a great deal of temperance sentiment, but as yet it remains to be demonstrated that it can be applied to any practical gear. The prevalent opinion is that if it can ever be made to work it will be upon the same principle that the Keeley motor does not, viz.: the sympathetic relation of sound waves.

It is reasonably certain that "there is something in it," and possibly a great deal, for experiments have shown that if two political principles be balanced upon a pivot, in a vacuum, and exposed to this mysterious influence, they will revolve slowly—after each other. One may see a similar thing in any jeweler's window in the toy which I think is called a heliostal, but the problem is to get it to work out of doors.

. . . . . .

The case is not hopeless but does not tend to enthusiasm. Where there is a will there is a way, or words to that effect, but I regard it as reasonably certain that the theory of sympathetic currents will have to be abandoned, and, indeed, the whole nebular hypothesis. To expect to move anything by free sentiment is no more hopeful than an attempt of a steamship to whistle itself across the ocean. It was a very pleasant and useful invention that of hanging a smoke bell over gas jets to catch the particles of soot that floated up unconsumed for want of oxygen, but one never thinks of doing anything with that.

We have, indeed, little else to do, we fanatics, but to make a situation.

The liquor traffic, though it does "bestride the Christian world like a Colossus," is, in fact, a puny, sneaking thing in comparison to the church, and presents no overwhelming difficulties, except the apparent impossibility of getting the Christian man to take a square look at it.

It is one of the saddest and profoundest of mysteries that the Christian man, who is, beyond question, the most potential factor of the social system, should, as such, command so little respect of the other forces engaged in the world's work and cut so poor a figure in current reforms.

The next, and the greatest discovery to be made in electrical science, we are told, is the extraction of energy from coal without the agency of steam or water power—an event which will revolutionize the industrial world.

The effect upon social science would be similar, doubtless, if one should discover or invent a process of converting Christian hysterics into light, heat and motion, without the necessity of using the Republican or Democratic party! We have a lever that will move the world if we can get a place to stand, and there is only one way to do that—make it.

THE RELATIONS OF CHRISTIAN NATIONS TO THE OPIUM TRAFFIC.*

England's Wrong to China.

BY REV. S. L. BALDWIN, D. D.

The East India Company has the unenviable distinction of introducing the British trade in opium into China. They carried on for years a large smuggling business, under the direction of the notorious Warren Hastings, who was then Governor-General of India.

This first stage of British opium monopoly is a dark and damning page in the history of the times. It was "conceived in sin and born in iniquity", and it had such a career as might be expected from its origin. It sullied the reputations of all who were connected with it, and brought deep and lasting disgrace to the British name.

The method of carrying on the trade was as follows: Natives wishing to make purchases would apply through brokers to British merchants at Canton, who would issue orders on the receiving ships. Carrying boats armed with guns, and manned by crews of desperate character, plied between Lintin and the city. They were popularly designated "fast crabs," or "scrambling dragons." These boats, with more or less connivance by the Chinese authorities, delivered the illicit drug to the purchasers at Canton. The illegal traffic was not allowed to progress, however, without frequent and vigorous protests. Honest and patriotic officers would frequently take strong measures for its suppression, and on various occasions imperial edicts were issued against it. Among these, a notable instance is that of the Emperor Tao-kwang, in 1821, on the occasion of the confiscation of certain cargoes at Canton, because of opium smuggling. In his edict, referring to the export trade in tea and other articles as beneficial to foreigners, he says:

"Yet these foreigners feel no gratitude, nor wish to render a recompense, but smuggle in opium, which poisons the empire. When this conduct is referred to the heart, it must be disquieted; when referred to reason, it is contrary to it. In broad day on earth there is the royal law; in the shades after death are gods and demons. These foreign ships pass an immense ocean; they likewise go through gales of wind, boisterous seas, and unknown dangers entirely preserved by the condescending protection of the celestial gods; and therefore, they should hereafter rouse themselves to zealous reflection, to bitter repentance, and to reformation, and alter their inhuman, unreasonable conduct."

Subsequent history, up to the time when the British government abolished the control of the East India Company over British subjects in China, in 1834, is but a repitition of that already given. It is a history, on the one hand, of a company of professedly high-minded English gentlemen, vested with extraordinary powers, proclaiming in their public documents hearty acquiescence in the laws against opium, and ostentatiously forbidding all connection with it on the part of their agents, while secretly stimulating and encouraging the traffic in every possible way, and complacently pocketing the enormous gains of the nefarious trade. Before the traffic passed from the control of the company, opium had cost China $11,618,-167, while she received for her tea supplied to the whole of Great Britain only $9,133,749. In 1834 the British government abolished the East India Company's monoply of trade in China, and threw it open to all British subjects.

Under the new management, Lord Napier was sent as first British superintendent of trade to China; but the Chinese government, which had been dealing for a century with a trading company, refused to have anything to do with "the petty English nation"; and the only official notice taken of his lordship's arrival was a tide-waiter's report that "three foreign devils have arrived." The increasing traffic and its increasing irregularities led the Chinese government to take more energetic action for its suppression. In 1836 an edict was issued, mentioning by name nine prominent opium merchants, and demanding their expulsion. Captain Elliot, who was then superintendent of trade, did not comply with this demand. In January, 1839, a proclamation was issued requiring that the receiving ships be sent away, and threatening hostile measures in case of non-compliance. Commissioner Lin was sent to Canton, clothed with extraordinary powers to deal summarily with the matter.

He demanded three things: 1. That all the opium on board the ships should be handed over to the government to be destroyed. 2. That the owners of the vessels should give a bond that they would never again bring opium to China. 3. That if afterward any was brought it should be confiscated, and the smugglers should be punished with death. These terms were concise, and easy to be understood; and they were evidently propounded in downright earnest. If not acceded to, the lives of foreigners were threatened. The foreign residences were surrounded, and many British subjects put in great peril. Under this pressure, Captain Elliot, promising indemnification by the British government to the merchants, collected over twenty thousand chests of the drug and handed them over to the Chinese commissioner, who proceeded with great heartiness to the work of destruction, which occupied twenty days—a thousand chests being destroyed each day, (in June, 1839).

Soon the melancholy spectacle was presented to the world of a Christian nation making war upon a heathen nation in the interest of an abominable, death-dealing traffic. Other causes have been assigned, such as "insults to the flag" and mal-treatment and murder of British subjects, but these things grew directly out of, and were intimately connected with, the iniquitous trade that was at the bottom of the whole difficulty. The public opinion of the world and of the British people themselves has designated the war of 1840 "the opium war," and it would be impossible to label it more accurately or more truthfully.

We need not enter upon the details of this bloody war, but at its close China paid Great Britain for her temerity in attempting to shut out the opium traffic the costly price of twenty-one millions of dollars—six for the opium destroyed, three for debts due English merchants, and twelve for the expenses of the war and the cession of the island of Hong Kong to England. It is true, as has been often stated, that this war opened China to Christian missions and to the influences of Christian civilization, but this fact constitutes no reason for gratitude to the British government, nor justification of its action. Stimulating the production of opium in India, encouraging and promoting the contraband trade in China, going to war when the noxious drug was confiscated, and exacting an indemnity for it, the government appropriately ended its iniquitous conduct in the matter by cheating the merchants on whose behalf it had demanded the indemnity.

We cannot better close our review of this war of 1840 than by quoting the strong and truthful words of Mr. Gladstone, uttered in his place in Parliament that year:

"They gave you notice to abandon your contraband trade. When they found that you would not, they had a right to drive you from their coasts on account of your obstinacy in persisting in this infamous and atrocious traffic. You allowed your agent to aid and abet those who were concerned in carrying on that trade; and I do not know how it can be urged as a crime against the Chinese that they refused provisions to those who refused obedience to their laws whilst residing within their territories. A war more unjust in its origin, a war more calculated to cover this country with permanent disgrace, I do not know, and I have not read of. The right honorable gentleman opposite spoko of the British flag waving in glory at Canton. That flag is hoisted to protect an infamous, contraband traffic; and if it never were hoisted except as it is now hoisted on the coast of China we should recoil from its sight with horror. Although the Chinese were guilty of much absurd phraseology, of no little ostentatious pride, and of some excess, justice, in my opinion, is with them; and while they, the pagans, the semi-civilized barbarians, have it on their side, we, the enlightened and civilized Christians, are pursuing objects at variance both with justice and with religion."

For sixteen years after that war ended, the trade in opium was still contraband in China. Still the East India Company stimulated the production of the drug in India, and still the smuggling into China was encouraged and promoted, with this great additional advantage, that Hong Kong had become British territory and an exceedingly convenient storehouse for the drug, which could thence be easily smuggled into China. Not unfrequently difficulties arose; and these finally culminated in another war.

The French had some "grievances" against China, and united with the English in the war, which was followed by the "Treaty of Tientsin" in 1858, and the "Convention of Peking" in 1860. In these negotiations Lord Elgin sought the legalization of the traffic. The Chinese, feeling themselves helpless before their conquerors, reluctantly consented. They proposed a duty of sixty taels (over eighty dollars) a chest; but the English commissioners would agree to no higher rate than thirty taels, which was therefore the rate adopted and inserted in the tariff.

When the treaty was under revision in 1869, Sir Rutherford Alcock agreed to raise the duty to fifty taels; but the British government refused to ratify the treaty, and the original treaty of Tientsin remains in force.

Thus at last the opium traffic was legalized in China; but it did not thereby become one whit less abhorrent to God and to all righteous men. Legalized iniquity is iniquity still; and it is not in the power of legislative enactments or treaty stipulations to lessen the crime of an accursed traffic, or to shield its abettors from their responsibility to a just and holy God. The Emperor Tao-kwang had said to Sir Henry Pottinger, when the latter proposed the legalization of the traffic: "It is true, I cannot prevent the introduction of the flowing poison; gain-seeking and corrupt men will for profit and sensuality defeat my wishes; but nothing will induce me to derive a revenue from the vice and misery of my people." His successor was obliged to do that which he so sturdily had refused, but the vermillion pencil never moved so reluctantly as when it sanctioned the legalization of the opium trade.

THE ISSUE DEFINED.

BY ADA M. BITTENBENDER.

[The following excerpt is made from the very able letter of acceptance issued by Mrs. Bittenbender on her nomination for Supreme Judge of the state of Nebraska, on the prohibition ticket. When this is read the world will have learned how Nebraska values women and constitutional government. May a new era have been inaugurated on November 7, in the great state of rolling plains—and women judges?—EDS.]

THE QUESTION.

"Is a traffic fraught with effect so disastrous legal? Or, in other words: Are provisions for licensing the traffic in intoxicating drinks constitutional? This is the most important question awaiting decision in this or any other state.

"Although the supreme court of Nebraska has decided in favor of the validity of the liquor law when attacked by the liquor interests, the court has never been called upon to construe its validity when attacked by the home interests. When called upon to decide the question in interest of the homes of the state, Nebraska's supreme court will be asked to consider: 1st. The inherited, inalienable rights of every American citizen contained in Magna Charta—'the keystone of English liberty' which guarantees to the people in perpetuity protection to every freeman from loss of life, liberty, or property, 'but by lawful judgment of his peers or by the law of the land.' 2nd. The Federal constitution, the preamble of which reads: 'We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this constitution for the United States of America,' together with the fourteenth amendment which provides that 'no state shall . . . deprive any person of life, liberty or property, without due process of law.' 3rd. The 'Bill of Rights' in the constitution of Nebraska which declares 'all persons . . . have certain inherent and inalienable rights; among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. To secure these rights, and the protection of property, governments are instituted among people, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed. . . . No person shall be deprived of life, liberty or property without due process of law.'

THE INEVITABLE CONCLUSION.

"We, the people, in our sovereign capacity, make constitutions. We delegate to our representatives in the three departments of government the power to carry out our will as expressed in constitutional law. This is the source and extent of representative power.

"Is it the will of the American people, as expressed in any constitutional law, either directly or indirectly, that power to license the traffic in intoxicating drinks is derived?

"Think.

"Does the traffic tend to 'promote the general welfare?' Does it help to 'insure domestic tranquillity?' Does it aid in 'establishing justice?'

"Think on.

"Is not the traffic in intoxicating drinks conceded to be by all except those engaged in it and their corrupt allies, a greater destroyer of life, liberty, property and happiness than all other causes combined?

"Think until the inevitable conclusion:

"Provisions for licensing such a traffic are not, cannot be 'the law of the land.' They are in conflict with and destructive of every constitutional and God-given right.

"In speaking of the bad effects of the drink traffic, in deciding liquor cases, the supreme court of Nebraska has said:

It must be conceded that the traffic in intoxicating drinks is an evil. (State vs. Boys, 31 Neb., 514.) It is a well-known fact that the unrestricted traffic in intoxicating liquors as a beverage produces destitution, misery, and crime, fills poor-houses and prisons, and indirectly adds largely to the burdens of taxpayers. (Senate file 31, 25 Neb., 864.)

The statistics of every state show a greater amount of crime and misery attributable to the use of ardent spirits obtained at these retail liquor saloons than to any other source. . . . There is no inherent right in a citizen to thus sell intoxicating liquors by retail; it is not a privilege of a citizen of the state or a citizen of the United States. (Crowley vs. Christensen, 137 U. S. A. 86.)

"In the Pennsylvania oleomargarine case, (127 U. S., 678): 'It is the settled doctrine of this court that, as government is organized for the purpose, among others, of preserving the public health and public morals, it cannot divest itself of the power to provide for these objects.'

"In the Kansas liquor cases (123 U. S., 623): 'There are, of necessity, limits beyond which legislation cannot rightfully go. While every possible presumption is to be indulged in favor of the validity of a statute, the courts must obey the constitution rather than the law-making department of government, and must upon their own responsibility determine whether, in any particular case, these limits have been passed. . . . The courts are not bound by mere forms, nor are they to be misled by mere pretenses. They are at liberty—indeed, are under a solemn duty—to look at the substance of things, whenever they enter upon the inquiry whether the legislature has transcended the limits of its authority. If, therefore, a statute purporting to have been enacted to protect the public health, the public morals or the public safety, has no real or substantial relation to those objects, or is a palpable invasion of rights secured by the fundamental law, it is the duty of the courts to so adjudge, and thereby give effect to the constitution.'

"Applying these principles and decisions, how can provisions for licensing the traffic in intoxicating drinks be constitutional?

"Since 'the welfare of the people is the supreme law,' and since 'the lives, health, and property of citizens' and 'good order and the public morals' belong 'to that class of objects which demand the application of the maxim,' as says our Federal supreme court in the case of Beer company against the commonwealth of Massachusetts, (97 U. S., 25), and 'the legislature cannot by any contract divest itself of the power to provide for these objects'—'no legislature can bargain away the public health or the public morals; the people themselves cannot do it, much less their servants'—how can the traffic in intoxicating drinks be lawful?

"Since 'the protection of the lives, health, and property of the citizens, and the preservation of good order and the public morals . . . are to be attained and provided for by such appropriate means as the legislative discretion may devise,' (Beer Co. vs. Mass.) is authorizing a traffic carried on only to the defeat of these objects, an 'appropriate means' to secure them?

"Is that kind of recognition of such a traffic legitimate exercise of 'legislative discretion?'

"I ask again what I have asked repeatedly: Since 'that discretion can no more be bargained away than the power itself,' (Beer Co. vs. Mass), and since both the power and the discretion have been wrongfully used, what is the remedy? Is it not either a change in the legislation, or a declaration of its illegality by the judicial department of government?"

Lincoln, Neb.

THE ARMY CO-OPERATIVE BEER SALOON.

BY FRANK ROBERTS.

The commanding officer's annual inspection report for this United States Army post which has recently been rendered to the 30th of June, has the following questions and answers, in that portion of it dealing with the post-exchange:

"What article brings in the largest profit? Beer."

"How much beer was sold the last fiscal year? $16,308 (775 barrels)."

The profits for the period are given as $3,712.20.

The exchange was opened towards the end of July, so it has been running for eleven months; and the profits are over one-fifth of the amount realized on the sales. This amount is divided among the various organizations at the post, and is spent by the company commanders in supplying food for the mess tables. This is authorized by the regulations, which lay down everything in connection with this institution, as they do in any other connection. We must therefore charge the government, which sanctions such a scheme, with feeding its soldiers at the expense of making drunkards of them. These dividends are eagerly looked for by officers as well as men. With the former, they act on the theory of feeding the men well and getting them into a contented spirit through the appetite; and with the latter they work on the line of drinking as much as possible, because they get part of their money back again, and they like to see their tables well provided.

In one company, B, 11th Infantry, the First Sergeant was a notorious drinking man, and as a result the men in the company followed suit. Only such men as did drink, and would keep him well supplied either with beer or whisky, or failing these, would lend him money to obtain the same, were of any use in the company as far as he was concerned, and he made things thoroughly unpleasant all round. When leaving the post for another station the ground outside the room he occupied was a sight. The scene was viewed by several, and a dealer in old bottles would have done a good day's work if he could have been on the spot to collect the large and varied assortment of bottles, and the concentrated essence of beef bottles, the latter being required to build this First Sergeant up, and steady his nerves when he had occasion to brace himself for any special duty. These bottles lay for over a week, silent but powerful witnesses of the kind of a man who had occupied those quarters.

An officer in the post, not very long since, had a barrel of whisky brought to his quarters, and could be seen "gloriously drunk" riding aimlessly about the post for a few days after its arrival. Spirits are not allowed to be sold at the post exchange, but any quantity of whisky is brought in, as the numbers of bottles strewn about testify.

Much more might be written as to the effect that has been produced by the opening at this post of the post exchange, an institution lauded to the skies by the authorities as vastly superior to the old post trader system. With that old system we have nothing to do. We must look at facts as they are, and while writing of happenings at one place, they are as bad elsewhere, and correspondence from other widely scattered posts from reliable authority states practically the same state of affairs as existing with them.

The Scientific American says: "The use of beer is found to produce a species of degeneration of all the organism, profound and deceptive. Fatty deposits, diminished circulation, conditions of congestion, perversion of functional activities, local inflammation of both the liver and the kidneys are constantly present. Intellectually a stupor amounting almost to paralysis arrests the reason, changing all the higher faculties into mere animalism, sensual, selfish, sluggish, varied only with paroxysms of anger that are senseless and brutal. In appearance the beer drinker may be the picture of health, but in reality he is most incapable of resisting disease. A slight injury, a severe cold, or shock to the body or mind will commonly provoke acute diseases ending fatally. Compared with inebriates who use different kinds of alcohol, he is more incurable, more generally diseased. The constant use of beer every day gives the system no recuperation, but steadily lowers the vital forces. It is our observation that beer drinking in this country produces the very lowest form of inebriety, closely allied to criminal insanity."

This is from the leading scientific paper, and this very drink, so unsparingly condemned, is the very one the United States government is providing for its soldiers. Reading the above, one need no longer wonder how it comes about that officers and men of the army are so infatuated with the institution that provides them the drink that has changed or is changing their "higher faculties into mere animalism," and is arresting their reason. The only question is: How is it all going to end?

While it is true that most of the men are thoroughly under the control of the liquor fiend, it is also true that a very large number of these drinking men—aye, drunkards, plain English is best—would gladly see these saloons closed. Many men, who, when sober, are all that one would expect to meet, have been so "under control" of the beer that their will power is utterly gone. There was a man in the company I belonged to who, when I first joined it, was not drinking; he would stay sober a while, and then break out. This man was well educated, quiet, obliging and a fine looking man. When he once commenced drinking, however, he was utterly lost to all sense of decency, and had literally no control over himself. And yet, because he might have a little money that could be squeezed out of him, the old, reliable drunkards would flock around him and ply him with drink, knowing full well what would be the result. While at Fort Apache he was tried by court martial and dishonorably discharged the service, forfeiting all pay and allowances. Had there been no canteen, in all probability he would have been in the service to-day.

Troop D, 1st Cavalry, has a non-commissioned officer who is "under the influence" every pay-day. The officer commanding his company, after the paymaster's visit last January, was speaking to some of the men with reference to some cases of fighting that had occurred while they were crazed by drink, and he threatened to stop their privileges, that is, prevent their having access to the canteen for a short time. This non-commissioned officer turned to the officer and exclaimed: "I wish to God you would debar me from entering, too. That place has been the ruin of me." The officer walked away, probably astounded at such an outrageous denunciation of a government institution. Many other similar cases could be quoted, and the writer to the Army and Navy Journal, in its issue of last December 22, was perfectly right when he said, "even the drunkards curse the exchange as making them drink more."

It would be interesting, purely from a statistical point, and with a view to still further ventilation, to obtain at this far-off post a statement from each man as he leaves the headquarter, after receiving his money from the paymaster, of how much money he has handed over in payment of the checks he has signed in favor of the canteen. Each check represents a dollar, and the authorities, knowing that gambling would soon reduce the number of men with money to a very small percentage, and therefore, not so many to spend their money at their institution, have devised the scheme of letting the men run in debt for beer between pay-days; having the men under so much "better control," they swoop down on them as they leave the pay-table, and collect the amounts due. Last May there was collected in this way, putting it in round numbers, nearly $2,000. This was at a post consisting of one troop of cavalry, two of infantry, and one Indian company, besides the small contingent of hospital staff. The average number for the time this canteen has been open has been two hundred and fifty, and we may deduct during this time thirty-five, or thereabouts, as non-drinkers.

Referring, for a moment, to the extracts from the post-commander's report, we find that counting the entire garrison the average consumption of beer for each man has been 3 barrels, or 216 bottles; the cost of each about $65, with a profit of $13 per man, or to each company of about $925. The latter are the figures that are flung in your face when a word is said about the canteen: What sort of food would there be if it were not for the canteen funds? As a first sergeant, sitting opposite me at dinner one day, remarked: "And yet, with this spread before us, there are fools who run down the canteen." He fairly represented the soldier's view, and the authorities knew their men when they promulgated the scheme.

LETTER FROM OUR "CHIEFTAIN."

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—During the absence of Lady Henry Somerset and Anna Gordon, I am most kindly cared for by my long-time friends, Robert and Hannah Smith, and am penciling this letter "up a tree."

THE BO-TREE AT HASLEMERE.

My host, while visiting Max Müller, became interested in the story of that great professor's Oriental friend, Azam Gaorishankar Vdayashankar, ex-minister of Bhazznacar, one of the kingdoms of India, who, after serving his prince fifty-five years (thirty-two of them as prime minister), retired from the world to his House in the Garden. In July, 1887, finding himself advancing in years, and fearing that he might leave this world while only "in the third stage," he resolved firmly to enter into the fourth stage of a Brahman's life—that of Sanyasi. He had enjoyed the sweets and bitterness of power, the smiles of fortune, the pleasures of hope, with some of the distress of disappointment. So far, while in the third stage, it was a life of holy living, according to his light. His mind breathed sentiments of piety and love toward God, but he had a yearning after a more purely spiritual estate. As required by the Hindu religion, before retiring for this purpose from the world, he obtained the consent of the members of his family and relations; he then wrote farewell letters to his friends, European and native.

Thousands of neighbors, including his sovereign, proceeded to his home to offer greetings to the venerable sage. But while he was open to receive visits and to give occasional advice at the request of his sovereign, his time was mostly spent in reading and religious meditation, all his property and secular cares having been given to his family. We know that when Buddha made "the great renunciation," he went alone and sat under a "Bo tree" until he entered into the Nirvana of complete renunciation of the world.

So when my host, with thoughts of quiet hours in the evening of his life, sought separation from the bustle of a large household, he selected a great oak tree in the front of the upper portion of the woods at his country seat in Surrey, and building spiral rustic stairs around its trunk, he made, about twenty-five feet up in the tree, a "House in the Garden" and called the oak a "Bo tree." This retreat from the world is eight by sixteen feet, faced all around and on top with glass, and floored with boards arranged like an opened fan, with the tree trunk as a center. Here are rustic chairs and a fur-covered lounge, and I am writing this beautiful sunny October day before the large open window, looking over the tops of the trees extending for a mile down into the valley, and beyond this a finely wooded, beautiful country to the "downs" or hills, twenty miles away, which overlook the English Channel,

Goethe well said, "In the tops of the trees there is rest," and rest more perfect, more complete, could scarcely be found or conceived of in any earthly outward surroundings. It is the glory of Scripture that its words have so many meanings, deeper and deeper as we are able to see more, our "views" being merely what we, at this point of our experience, are able to see; and here has been given me a deeper meaning of the words, "And when he had come to himself." Is it not true that even in our work for the Master, amid all our activities, we come to many things before we can say, "I have come to myself." Whichever of many varying meanings this may have to my comrades, when it is true to them inwardly they like their "elder sister" will each one exclaim with a new and deeper meaning, "I will arise and go unto my Father."

In this soothing, inspiring sunshine, sitting all alone, beholding the delectable mountains, the varying shadows of the light clouds chasing each other over the hills, and the miles of calm tree tops beneath my window, the morning passes, then the lunch bell rings; then comes my daily three hours' drive, my faithful little stenographer, Edith Goode, my dinner, and—can you believe it? at the early hour of eight—my bed. I believe that by these days of mingled work and deep immersion in the quiet of nature I am regaining life and health for my place among the workers of my native land. With every pulse of returning health and energy my heart beats with longing to be once more among them.

This beautiful home is named "Friday's Hill," a name thought to have originally been "Freya's Hill," the same as Ceres, the goddess of increase, and here it is supposed that in Druidical days the religious heathen gathered to their human sacrifices. We have a better altar and a better sacrifice, not of death, but of life and all it contains, to the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ.

I do not need to say that my heart, hopes and prayers have been with you in the great conventions. As yet no word has come except the beautiful and loving cable-messages, but we look for "Lady Henry's ship" on Tuesday next, and Anna's but a few days later, and then we shall know all. Tender greetings from "our Hannah." God bless you all!

THE SALVATION ARMY IN LONDON.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—It is the usual hour for evening prayer-meeting in the Christian world. An immense and motley crowd of about twelve thousand men, women and children, most of them in Salvation Army bonnets and jerseys, are gathering in the Agricultural Hall, Islington—a barren, barnlike structure, in which Moody addressed his first London audiences.

From a seat on the platform, located a little on one side, the writer notes that there is order in the seeming disorder. The hall is dimly lighted, but every one is well behaved, and cordial, fervent greetings are being exchanged among the "soldiers." The gallery is packed, and one thousand children fill the tier of rough seats leading to it. The orchestra, or "bandsmen," occupy a prominent position. Every seat on the floor is taken, and the audience faces an immense white screen, with a smaller one beside it. The eye naturally goes from the screen to a temporary platform in the center of the hall, on which are three or four men in charge of a magic lantern.

There is a cheer in true Salvation Army style as General Booth, his son Bramwell, who is the chief of staff, with his wife and children, enter and are seated in front of your correspondent. They are accompanied by leading commissioners, colonels, majors and captains.

Mrs. Bramwell Booth, a dove-faced woman of a strong type, not over thirty years of age, is the mother of six children, all of whom are on the platform, the girls looking so quaint in their army bonnets; little Dorothy, three months old, is in the arms of her nurse, who is one of the "lassies."

General Booth has the strong, marked features of a leader. His figure and manner are more like those of an intensely active American than of an easy going, plethoric Englishman. He is evidently living for a purpose, and no time is to be lost.

Every one knows that the services are to be a memorial of Mrs. Catharine Booth, the wife of the General, to whom more than any one else the Army owes its success, and of whose departure to another world this is the third anniversary.

The hall is darkened. By aid of a lime light the words "PERFECT SILENCE" are flashed upon the screen, and out of the hush that follows rise the voices of hundreds of children singing in perfect time and tune the impressive hymn, "Oh say, shall we meet you all there?"

The screen now bears the words "SILENT PRAYER." An intense stillness comes upon this huge medley of humanity. Some influence not of earth has quieted it. "RISE AND SING," followed quickly by the hymn, "All hail the power of Jesus' name," brings the assembly to their feet to unite in a grand chorus, led by the children's voices and the "bandsmen."

Various Scripture texts appear in quick succession, and as their meaning is grasped, the happy "Hallelujah," "Glory to God," and other devout exclamations ring out through the hall. The screen now flashes "THE LORD'S PRAYER," which is reverently repeated. "CHILDREN ONLY, SING," appears on the smaller screen, and the sweet voices take up the strain of the hymn which they read from the large screen, "There is a better world they say! oh, so bright!"

A life-sized picture of Mrs. Booth is displayed, and the direction "FIRE A VOLLEY" is greeted with voluminous, inharmonious, but tender and long-drawn-out "A—mens."

Now come various views of Mrs. Booth. One represents her preaching in the Free Trade Hall, Manchester, and in another she is standing with her daughter, La Maréchal, before an immense audience. There is also a view of her as a young girl befriending a drunkard. A thrill goes through the assembly as a picture of her tomb appears, and also the sentence: "I shall come to see you if I can." "How do I know that she is not here now!" must have been the thought in many a sympathetic soul, and subdued expressions of deep feeling are uttered. It is appropriate that the next words to be read are: "Who being dead yet speaketh."

And now, while the children are singing softly and sweetly, selections from Mrs. Booth's sayings and writings are flashed upon the screen, and your correspondent will give you all she was able to note in the darkness and brief time during which each was visible: "Turn your back on the world." "Don't pore over the past, let it all go." "There is time to sow a good, broad acre to the Spirit yet." "May He give you grace to reject the tempting bait." "Anchor to the throne of God, and when the reckoning time comes you will be safe." "Love one another, oh, love one another." "I do not believe we shall be fastened up in a corner of heaven playing a harp." "The war must go on. Self-denial will prove your love to Christ. All must do something." "Promise me that you will be faithful to the Army." "PROMISE! FIX BAYONETS!" appears on the smaller screen, and every right arm is raised.

The children are of course remembered by the "Mother of the Salvation Army," and many are the pictures and blessed utterances which appear on the screen specially for them, and most heartily do their childish voices respond! The assembly seems like a family gathering, mellowed and enriched by a beloved and honored mother's love and presence.

"THE GENERAL WILL ADDRESS US," is flashed upon the side screen, while his full-sized portrait appears upon the larger one. The lights upon the platform are turned up, and applause from the immense audience echoes and reechoes through the building as General Booth's tall, thin form is seen.

He speaks with evident emotion and there is intense silence that not a word may be lost. He thanks them for their appreciation of the sainted woman whose life is still fresh in their memory, and exhorts each to ask himself: "How will my life look when I view it from eternity." "What will you do with your life?" he asks, with tremendous earnestness. "It is the reservations that are the damnation of your consecration."

As soon as the great leader is seated, the lights are down again, and all are singing softly, "We shall meet one another again."

"SELF-DENIAL WEEK COMMENCES NEXT SATURDAY," is the reminder that now appears, and "REMEMBER THE STARVING WIVES AND CHILDREN OF THE COAL MINERS," follows. These are received with loud applause. Then follows a consecration service, and no human voice breaks the solemn communion which each has with his Creator and Saviour. Following the swiftly flashed directions thousands of hearts repeat together words of renewed consecration, and standing in the darkness, with only the light that illuminated the screen to remind them of Him who is "Light," "and in Him is no darkness at all," thousands of right hands and arms of men, women and children are raised, in silent covenant and prayer.

In a few minutes the vast hall is emptied. The crowd fills not only the sidewalks but the streets, and is treated with great respect in its rush for the omnibus and "tram." London recognizes the Salvation Army as its foremost factor in dealing with the degraded and lost, and will never forget the devoted woman who braved persecution and ridicule in her Christ-like efforts to save the masses, and rouse the apathetic and indifferent of other classes. Women of the W. C. T. U. should read the account of her life recently issued, and learn how much every woman is indebted to one who by the grace of God blazed her way through a dark forest of prejudice in regard to "woman's sphere," and has made it possible for others, more timid and conservative, to follow in her path.

ELIZABETH P. GORDON.

Reigate, England, October 28, 1893.

BY MATILDA B. CARSE.

Let him ask in faith, nothing wavering. For he that wavereth is like a wave of the sea driven with the wind and tossed. For let not that man think that he shall receive anything of the Lord. —James 1: 6, 7.

The World's and National W. C. T. U. Convention of 1893 has come and gone. The Temple and its management came in for a marked share of attention; a large portion of one day was spent in discussing it. After every point had been thoroughly explained by the Board of Temple Trustees and by their lawyer, Mr. Moses, the Temple report was passed in open convention without a dissenting voice. This is the first time in the history of the enterprise that such a satisfactory outcome has been attained. It will be seen by the Temple report, contained in the daily and weekly UNION SIGNAL, that I ask white-ribboners to stand by me for two years longer, and to do all they can to aid the enterprise. I hope by that time to have a sufficient sum secured from outside sources, as well as from within the ranks, to make the W. C. T. U. complete owners of the building without a dollar's worth of indebtedness resting upon it.

My sisters, will you lend a hand? Boys and girls of the L. T. L., will you help to pay for the "House Beautiful?" We want your aid at once. Do you think fifty cents apiece from every woman, boy and girl in the temperance army would impoverish them? I am sure you will all say No. Where is there (unless she is ill) a white-ribboner that cannot save fifty cents, or at least earn it? And any bright girl or boy can readily earn that amount in doing errands for parents or neighbors. If, during the next two months, all white-ribboners and members of the L. T. L. would each send us fifty cents, it would net us $175,000 in the treasury by January 1. If our white-ribboners would each give a dollar and the boys and girls fifty cents each, we would be in possession of $275,000, a sum almost sufficient to enable us to purchase the balance of the capital stock not yet in our possession. We are very anxious to have a large sum in the treasury by the first of the year, and we are going to make an unprecedented offer to secure it.

All persons, young or old, who will send us fifty cents on or before January 1, 1894, shall receive in return a small but beautiful photogravure of the Temple. All persons who send one dollar on or before January 1, 1894, will be presented with one of our lovely Columbian souvenirs, made out of that marvelous metal, aluminum, which is even more beautiful than silver, as it never tarnishes, and has all the shine and beauty of the latter. On one side of the medallion is the most superb cut of the Temple ever executed. On the other the face of our great leader, Frances E. Willard, with suitable inscriptions. The medallion is enclosed in a pretty box daintily lined with silk. To a white-ribboner no more valuable addition than this could be secured to a parlor cabinet, and surely it would make a charming little Christmas present to any one, for it is a gem as a work of art.

We wish that each union would send directly to Miss Sara G. Johnson all gifts for the Temple, instead of through their state treasurers. A great many mistakes could be avoided by doing so. The reason that some of the states have money from their local union for the Temple sent through their state treasurer, is to ascertain how much has been sent by the local unions during the year. It seems to us this end could be much easier accomplished, by having the treasurer of the local union notify the state treasurer that she has sent a certain sum to the Temple, and this could be easily verified from Miss Johnson's report in the UNION SIGNAL. Twenty-two dollars, credited in Temple Items of October 26 as from Mansfield, Wis., towards a state tablet, should have been credited to Marshfield, Wis., W. C. T. U.; this union hopes to raise $100 for the Temple.

The Medina county, Ohio, W. C. T. U. has sent $30 as a first installment on $100 paid towards placing the name of Mrs. J. C. Gray on a tablet in Willard Hall. Mrs. Gray is the honored and beloved president of the Medina county union, and no one is more worthy of aeplace of honor in Willard Hall than she. The Plymouth county, Mass., W. C. T. U. sends $20, making $40 it has now paid towards a tablet for the county president, Mrs. Weston; $10 has been received from the Baltimore, Md., W. C. T. U. as a first installment towards a tablet in honor of Miss Mattie Carshite, its first beloved president; the Florence, N. Y., W. C. T. U. sends $5 toward a tablet in honor of Mrs. E. M. Thacher; Mrs. Kate B. Northup, state superintendent of Temple work for Nebraska, sends a cheery letter full of kind things about the Temple, and encloses $7 towards the Woodward tablet and $3 from the sixth district towards a tablet in honor of its able and beloved president, Mrs. Ferguson; $2.50 comes from the Manchester, N. Y., union towards a tablet for Mrs. M. J. Berker; West Boylston, Mass., Y sends $2 to the Barnes tablet.

A two-cent stamp sent to Mrs. Matilda B. Carse, The Temple, Chicago, will secure a mite-box. Remember, any one placing in the box $2.50 from May 1, 1893, to May 1, 1894, will receive the lovely Columbian souvenir made of aluminum with a cut of the Temple on one side and on the reverse the face of Miss Willard with suitable inscriptions. All money orders should be made out in the name of the treasurer, William D. Preston, and sent to our financial secretary, Miss Sara G. Johnson, The Temple, Chicago, Ill.

TARRYING BY THE STUFF.

BY ADELINE HOFF BEERY.

'Mid hail of lead, and smoke of bombs,
Pelting the army's front,
Brave souls, for right and honor's sake,
Shoulder the battle's brunt;
O'er fallen hosts the dear flag floats,
And to the cheerful drum,
Each man a hero, powder-burnt,
The troops come marching home.

Waiting for news, the frailer ones,
Patient, though prest with care,
Fill up the long days in far homes
Watching the altars there;
Keeping the children and the sick,
Knitting and mending gowns,
Eating and sleeping in the hills,
And in the lonely towns.

With trophy-laden companies
The hamlets are alive,
And plumes and breast-marks nod and flare
When the last troops arrive;
How shall the hard-earned spoil be shared
'Twixt these, who brought it in,
And these, who kept the household stuff
Far from the martial din?

How equitable the decree—
As one, so the other's part!
Comfort your souls, ye least of His,
And blind and halt, take heart!
All cannot pluck fame's amaranth,
Some must be kitchen queens;
Yet for best service anywhere—
Life and a crown it means!

LUCY'S OPINIONS.

BY BERTHA TAYLOR.

"Well, wife, I suppose you realize that the boy will be home to-morrow for his vacation," said Abner White, untying his muffler, his genial face fairly aglow with pleasure at the thought.

"Yes, and I have just finished a pair of mittens for him. I wanted to buy him Whittier's poems but the hens would not lay eggs enough, so I had to give it up."

"Is that so? How much would they cost?"

"Two dollars."

"Well, that is a good deal to pay for a book. I bought him one to-day and it cost only a dollar. Here, how do you like it?"

"Barry Lyndon!" she exclaimed. "Oh, Abner, I wish you would exchange it for something else. I don't want my boy to read that book."

"Why not, I should like to know?"

"Because it is a poor, trashy affair."

"Oh, nonsense! It won't hurt him any. He is one boy in a hundred."

"But it is not at all true to life, and it can but hurt him more or less. I tell you a great deal of harm comes from reading just such books as that."

"But if they are so harmful why don't we hear more said against them in the papers and from the pulpit?"

"Really, I do not know. It seems to me that people are rather asleep on that subject. It would be better if they would wake up and save the boys and girls before it is too late."

"Well, well, I believe you are getting to be a regular crank on the subject."

Mrs. White straightened up and began in earnest. "Abner White, listen to me; I may be a crank, but I know that whatever one reads directs his thoughts and meditations, whether he knows it or not, and of course his life is influenced by his thoughts. Now, I say no one has any business to read anything but what will make him more manly and better fitted to make others happier and better."

"Why, Lucy, I never knew you felt like that. You and I used to read 'most everything."

"I did not always think as I do now, but I have reached the conclusion gradually—through reading THE UNION SIGNAL, I believe. It has made me more conscious of my responsibility to the world. Now such books as this one tend to lower one's ideal of manhood, and that, in itself, is a terrible thing—a terrible thing." Abner said nothing, but turned the book over and over in his hands and whistled softly, "More than that, it lessens his sense of the responsibility of existing for twenty to seventy years among a crowd of beings whose lives are influenced more or less by his every word and act."

"Isn't that putting it pretty strong, Lucy?"

"None too strong. We may think ourselves granite or flint, but we are, after all, only soft clay, and are being shaped by every other piece with which we come in contact. Some pieces are less susceptible than others, but even the hard ones chip off." By this time the book lay quietly on the table, while the whistling became more and more indistinct.

"The outgrowth of all this, as far as the reader is concerned, is to weaken the character and the resolution to do right. Besides, his life influences others, and theirs, in turn, reflect and react upon him, and both are worse for the other." The listener forgot to whistle.

"On the other hand, good, solid reading, which creates or even excites a desire for better things, contributes just so much toward making the life what it should be, for 'The wish is father to the thought,' and that brings it right back to the clay images again."

"Well, I don't know as you have made it perfectly clear to my mind just how it hurts a boy to read such a book. Perhaps I am stupid, but I can't quite follow you."

"Haven't I? Why, that is as plain as day. He is, of course, interested in the hero and anxious for his welfare and success, and so cannot, if he tries, blame him seriously for what he does, and there he is being 'builded after that fashion.'"

"Well, well, if you are going to preach a sermon, stick to your text. You said in the first place that the trouble with this particular book was that it was not true to life, and here you go off on a tangent and say nothing about that."

"That is the very worst thing about it, Abner. It is the giving false colors to life and people that works all the mischief. How can Frank work his problems without first understanding their nature? 'By the same token,' as old Patsy says, how can he demonstrate the problem of life if he sees it through crooked glasses? It reminds me that when I was a little girl and put on mother's glasses, I would take such high steps and expect to put my foot on the floor, but it would come down with a force that nearly threw me down. It often jarred the glasses off, though, and let me see the room as it really was. Now it seems to me that is just like life. We get on crooked glasses and keep making blunders and mistakes and getting hurt or jarred, and sometimes even fall to the depths of despair or disgrace, all because we are not looking at life as it is. We may be thankful if the glasses do fall off in some of our blunders. Indeed it is better for us to fall if we will not take them off without."

"After all," thought Abner, "I may as well exchange the book for the poems and pay the difference. It isn't much."

"Perhaps reading matter has a more decided effect on me than on many others, for in order to enjoy what I read I have to live in it. But I think Frank is like me in that respect."

"Is that so?"

"Yes, and I want him to read what will make him true and brave." And the little woman's eyes glistened. "We do not want to furnish our boy with that which will blunt his usefulness, Abner."

"I declare," thought her husband, "that book shall be changed this very day."

"Another point," she continued, all unconscious of his thoughts, "think of our putting crooked glasses on others, or seeing them put them on to go into a room which is new to them, and not telling them that they are crooked, or think of our watching a dealer selling these same crooked glasses and not lifting up our voices in protest. 'No man liveth to himself.' Life is a strange room to us all, and it is important that we see it as it is. Whether a person is a Christian or not, I do not see how he can help seeing that he is shaping some part of some person's life by everything he does. I tell you, Abner, I think it decidedly wrong for us to read a single story which we know to be a wrong one—we need to keep our glasses clear in order to distinguish the good from the bad."

"That's so, that's so, wife. I declare! I guess you are right."

"Well, well," said Abner, as his wife went to the kitchen to prepare supper, "this book is going right back to the store." He wrapped it up carefully, but paused in the act of tying the cord. "I don't know what business I have to take it back where it will be sold to some other man's boy. It may be a foolish thing to do, but"—he opened the stove door, and then hesitated, and then said, resolutely, "I am going to burn it up."

Just as it was blazing at its brightest, in walked Lucy.

"Well, little woman, I guess your lecture was worth two dollars. Here, take it, and buy the poems."

THERE is not any benefit so glorious in itself but it may be exceedingly sweetened and improved by the manner of conferring it.—Seneca.

WHOSE AFFAIR IS IT?

BY MINNIE E. BIRD.

"What did you think of it?" was the first question asked upon my return from the World's Fair. I gave the commonplace answer that we all give in speaking of things beyond words. But in my first moment of leisure, the genuine, earnest thought of it came back from that last morning under the columns of the Peristyle, looking out upon the blue waters with their wonderful green and purple lights: "How it all depends upon the individual."

I had answered one inquisitive soul very promptly that I liked best the skulls and the mummies, having in mind at the moment those in the Anthropological Building, but I observed subsequently that they were not all in that building. The latter were walking about the grounds in any number.

The people who were seeing the Fair were not less interesting than the Fair itself "more, finally," as Patience Strong would put it. Aside from the people who were nervous and irritable and cross, because they were tired, (alas, for the wedding trip to the Fair!) there was a pitiful procession of visitors whose lives had stopped. They were not all poor and illiterate and ill-clad, either, but they had fellowship with a multitude who were. These were "doing the Fair," as you saw.

There is vast difference between the man who has no interest and the man who is interested elsewhere. I strove to impress that fact upon my party, because I was myself so frequently "interested elsewhere." Per exemplum, I had had an afternoon in the Woman's Building, seeing many things I wanted to see, and some which I surmised I should be expected to have seen when our nightly reckoning came. It was worse than I expected, for all my good seeings "were slighted off" when I had to confess with shame of face that I had forgotten "the Queen's laces." The next night I returned in high feather and conscious of my integrity, as I announced, "I've seen the royal laces."

One could easily discriminate between the people who were looking on in the Woman's Building with good-natured contempt and all their hearts in Machinery Hall, or vice versa, and those others who had come to the Fair with not much idea of what they were to see, and none at all how to see it. Their lives had stopped somewhere; no matter what happened or when—poverty, often enough, but not always. A fine, manly fellow, a grocer's clerk, said to me: "I cried myself nearly blind when I found I could never go to college, and then I went to work." Before he left talking one could catch in every word the great tugging unrest and discontent that has entered his life never to leave it, just as you can detect it in the lives of half, aye, more, of the men and women you meet. Not mummies these, for the ache remains; but some of them will tell you it were better so.

Mummied men have passed through the gates, who have gone out in the keen, sharp agony of returning life. I have talked with some of them, until the ache came into my own heart. The Fair stands for an intellectual uplift in the restlessness of the closing century, and a hunger which will not rest content with fair words or fond formulas. It demands food.

According to one's bent and in proportion to the training, the little world in Jackson Park was enjoyed. In it one might wander until the last days of October, and carry away at last nothing but a vague confused memory. Some of us go so through the great world beyond Jackson Park. But I am sure there would be at the least a gleam of sorrow, of questioning, of divine discontent in the once dull eyes knowing others had read in it what to them was sealed. Then, if you went to these, they might tell you in a word, "I am hungry." You remember that other "Son of God" also was "an hungered."

One can only take away hunger by satisfying it. The evil forces of society have entrenched themselves within the wants of society, as it is, not as it ought to be, or, possibly, might be; and on the whole, we have given more thought to exterminating evil, than to competing with it. Even the church has more frequently said, "do not," "do not," than it has suggested something better and equally interesting to do.

Give the boys some place equally interesting to them, and they will desert the street corners (the saloons know that). Give them something to do and they will not "shoot craps," and busy themselves in under-graduate, criminal pastimes. Boys' Clubs in New York slums have proved it so.

University Extension and the Chautauqua idea have superseded neighborhood gossip and the delinquencies of the cook, here and there, where people are already alive to their definite want; but they have not reached those remoter districts you can call to mind where the Sunday church service is still the great recreation of the week, and the county fair of the year. That is where you find the dull faces and patient eyes, the shut-in souls and the greatest percentage of insanity. The state engages to care for the life and security and rights of its individual members, and their education so far as practicable; it leaves their souls to heaven and their happiness to themselves.

And we, who have more "freely received," many of us, leave them in the same good hands, and will not perceive a prayer in the dull eyes that look at us, in the smothered sigh a plea, in the mental hunger start a duty. "I was an hungered and ye gave me no bread" may sound in our ears before the day of reckoning comes.

Foreign America mutters from the slums of New York and Chicago and San Francisco, in hunger of brain and body and soul. Our own in country side and hamlet and dull country towns are awakening to a hunger that yearns in their faces. Comparison is easy nowadays, and when comparison comes peace passes. There is a stage of hunger when one is not even conscious of hungering. That is near to death. The measure of "Life, death and the vast forever," depends upon the man who holds the measuring line, but the line is somebody's affair. Whose?

TURN IT DOWN, BOYS!

If urged to lift the glass that tempts,
In city grand or humble town,
Be he that tempts the king or czar,
Quick, turn your glass and set it down!

If those that ask you vex and tease,
Perhaps condemn you with a frown,
Be firm, mind not the laugh and sneer,
Quick, turn your glass and set it down!

If health you crave and strength of arm,
Would keep your hardy hue of brown,
Nor have the scarlet flush of sin,
Quick, turn your glass and set it down!

If in your trouble others say,
"In sea of drink your sorrows drown,"
Look out lest drowned the drinker be!
Quick, turn your glass and set it down!

Cold water, boys, hurrah, hurrah,
Will help to health, wealth, and renown,
If urged to give these treasures up,
Quick, turn your glass and set it down!

WANTED—A STRONG BOY.

So read a sign in a store window as we passed by the other morning. At noon it was gone, presumably because the boy had come. The placard, however, had done more than accomplish its direct object. It set us thinking. "Wanted—a strong boy." In how many places that legend might be truthfully displayed! The world wants boys that are strong, first of all, in body. A stomach fed chiefly on cake and peanuts, and a nervous system undermined by the deadly cigarette, make a poor basis for stout, fleet limbs and sturdy arms. Other things being equal, a merchant or lawyer wants a boy who can pull a strong oar, make his home run on the ball field, and keep his wind in a half-mile run. Other things being equal—what other things? Certain ones that are the real measures of strength, whether in boys or men. Has he grit? Can he stick to a thing? Is he quick to take in a situation, ready in an emergency, bright witted where others blunder? Is he equal to responsibility? Can he be left with a given task with a certainty that he can be literally left with it, and his employer find it fully done in due season, without a second of intervening anxiety or oversight? These are some of the elements of strength that make up the model "strong boy" who is so universally wanted to-day.

But is this all? We think not. If we were gauging the real power of a boy for such a position as has been described, we should wish to know something more than the size of his biceps and the tenacity of his grip on a given bit of work. We should want to know about the strength of his love for that father and mother who have sacrificed so much for his advancement. We should look for some indication of a tie binding him to the house of God as a regular, thoughtful attendant. We should inquire as to the connecting links in his life between his daily conduct and the word of God. Has he come into an earnest, loyal relation to Jesus Christ, as his Saviour and Master? Is he "strong in the Lord and in the power of His might"?

Yes, there is a great demand for strong boys. Satan wants them that he may rob them of their present and prospective vigor. Christ wants them, that through their youthful robustness the weak places in His army may be reënforced. The church of to-day, as well as commercial corporations, may well hang out the sign in unmistakable characters, and keep it displayed—"Wanted—strong boys!"—Cumberland Presbyterian.

THE POWER OF HABIT.

Youth is the forming time of habits and these, unless carefully watched, will grow until they bind like ropes and handcuffs. There are few young men who are awakened to the evils of a bad habit in time to conquer as did a certain young man who had thoughtlessly formed the habit of taking a glass of liquor every morning before breakfast.

An older friend advised him to quit before the habit should grow too strong.

"Oh, there's no danger; it's a mere notion. I can quit any time," replied the drinker.

"Suppose you try it to-morrow morning," suggested the friend.

"Very well; to please you I'll do so, but I assure you there's no cause for alarm."

A week later the young man met his friend again.

"You are not looking well," observed the latter; "have you been ill?"

"Hardly," replied the other one. "But I am trying to escape a dreadful danger, and I fear that it will be long before I have conquered. My eyes were opened to an imminent peril when I gave you that promise a week ago. I thank you for your timely suggestion."

"How did it affect you?" inquired the friend.

"The first trial utterly deprived me of appetite for food. I could eat no breakfast, and was nervous and trembling all day. I was alarmed when I realized how insidiously the habit had fastened on me, and resolved to turn square about and never touch another drop. The squaring off has pulled me down severely, but I am gaining, and I mean to keep the upper hand after this. Strong drink will never catch me in his net again."

ESQUIMAU CHILDREN.

The Esquimau Village at the World's Fair has made the home life and customs of this kindly people very familiar to the child visitors, many of whom belong to THE UNION SIGNAL family. You pitied them in their fur clothing during the hot summer, but I fancy you would be much more to be pitied should you venture into their homeland and try to live in a snow hut. Here is what an exchange tells of their life:

It is cold in the land of the Esquimaux—very cold, colder than you who live in the temperate zone can imagine. It is never warm there and never what we would call "pleasant." The sun, when it shines at all, shines feebly. and the snow and ice never melt. The people try to keep warm. That is all. But as for taking walks for pleasure or indulging in out-door sports they never do such things at all on account of the cold. Although wrapped up like little mummies for the first few years of their lives, the Esquimau children are playful little beings, and love toys as dearly as do the children of any other country. And what do you suppose they play with—these far-away, half-frozen babies? They play with icicles, for these are the only playthings they can find. With their stout, stubby little hands they make necklaces out of icicles and fasten the prettiest of them to wires to make ear-rings of. Their games are played with small snow-balls or ice-balls which are frozen so hard that they can be handled quite awhile in-doors before they will melt. Perhaps the Esquimau children have a game with ice marbles, and who knows but their little toy-wagons may be hollowed out of blocks of ice.

A GERMAN TRICK.

German children are said to be more "slow" than those of other civilized nations, but they frequently reach the mark as soon as their more rapid brothers. The following is a German idea. Try it.

Cut a strip of paper two by fifteen inches. Draw a line on both sides along the exact middle. In order to distinguish between the two sides, indicate one line by dots, the other by dashes. Paste the ends of the paper together so that the center line will be continuous, but join the dotted line to the line of the dashes. This will give a twist to the ring. With a pair of scissors carefully cut through the middle line all the way round the ring. How many rings there will then be you will see for yourself.

A GEOGRAPHY GAME.

Sides are chosen, then one side begins by giving a word, say Boston. The one at the head of the other side "caps" it by saying New York. (Boston ends with N and New York begins with N.) The second pupil on the first side says Kingston, while the second pupil from the second side calls out New Orleans, and in this way the game goes on. If, after the time allowed, a certain number of seconds, a pupil fails to give a word it is marked as a failure for that side. An umpire should be chosen and an account of the words kept.

AFRAID.

It is often hard for a little one to realize the actual presence of the Heavenly Father, and many of our children may have felt sometimes as did little George in this story:

George's mother had company. The nurse was away. Mamma put him to bed, and told him to go to sleep like a good boy. He was hardly persuaded even when she told him God was with him. At last he consented, and she went down-stairs. After an hour's chat what should she see at the parlor door but her boy, saying: "Mamma, you tum up and tay wif Dod and let me tum in here."

IT is related by a prominent clergyman in Boston that, as he was walking down street one day, he saw a little fellow undertaking to ring a door-bell. In the kindness of his heart he stepped up to the boy and, saying a kind word to him, assisted in ringing the bell. The little fellow looked up to the Reverend Doctor and said, "Mister, it is time for us to scoot."

THE Willard Fountain, the gift of the temperance children of the world, has been removed from the World's Fair and now stands in Willard Hall. There it will stay until it is presented to the city of Chicago next spring.

DEAR BOYS AND GIRLS:—There were many happy ways of observing Miss Willard's birthday, September 28; but none were pleasanter than this, I feel sure:

This is the way the junior division of our Loyal Temperance Legion celebrated Miss Willard's birthday. After school we went to the house of our leader, each one carrying a bundle of clothing, or picture papers or cards, to put in a barrel to go to poor colored people in North Carolina. We filled half a big barrel and the W. C. T. U. ladies filled it full. We played awhile out-doors, then formed in line and marched through the parlors singing, "Saloons must go," and as we passed a picture of Miss Willard each one saluted. Then we were seated and had all the grapes we wanted to eat. While we were eating, our leader told us stories about Miss Willard when she was a little girl. As we went home each one received a card with the fountain girl's picture. We had a good time. We wish Miss Willard's birthday came two or three times a year. If you wish, some time we will write you about one of our L. T. L. camp-fires. Our leader sometimes reads to us from the Cozy Corner. We think it is a nice name. Good-by, with the love of the

LOYAL TEMPERANCE LEGION.

Geneseo, N. Y.

What a nice celebration that was! Of course we want to hear about the camp-fires, and as our beloved leader's birthday will come again next year, I hope our L. T. L. Cozy Cornerers will remember this happy way to observe it.

NEPHEWS AND NIECES.

We have five saloons in our town. When I am a man I hope to vote for prohibition. I belong to the L. T. L. I am proud of my badge and wear it all the time.

Vinita, I. T. MILTON RATCLIFF.

And I know you will never be ashamed to show your colors, Milton.

I am a little girl ten years old. I live on a farm with my grandma. We have three horses and two cows and one calf and one pig. My grandma and mamma are both white-ribboners. I belong to the Juvenile Temple. I used to belong to the L. T. L., but they do not have one any more. Grandma takes THE UNION SIGNAL and I like to read the little children's letters in it.

Ovid, N. Y. LENA M. ARDEN.

Happy little farm girl! Do you not go to school, Lena,

I am a little girl eleven years old. I think I will join the Cozy Corner if you will let me. I belong to the Band of Hope and the Loyal Temperance Legion. Papa is a Prohibitionist. I play on the violin, mandolin, organ and piano. I love music. I am sorry to say there are six saloons here. MARGARET B. GRANT.

Oakland, Md.

We are glad to have so musical a member, Margaret, and hope your talent will aid you in good work through life.

Last week the W. C. T. U. women held a convention here. They had several delegates from different places. It was a district convention; Mrs. St. John and Miss Bray lectured. The church was decorated with sun flowers and asparagus. And in the front they had a motto, "For God and Home and Humanity." And one evening they held a gold medal contest. I am eight years old.

Clifton, Kan. JESSIE DENMAN.

Did you help entertain the temperance convention, Jessie? The Cozy Cornerers are all "helps" you know.

ANOTHER VIEW OF THE WOMAN QUESTION.

Now that the great Fair is really over, with its Woman's Building, its Board of Lady Managers, its auxiliary congresses, of which not the least in importance and interest were the Woman's Congress and the conventions of the W. C. T. U., it may not be out of place to pay our respects to a brand new (?) idea on the woman question which has been launched with all the complacent, patronizing self-assurance with which the possessor of these rare specimens always unfolds them to his benighted inferiors. In general this new-fledged idea is to the effect that women's work for woman is uncalled for to the extent of being absurd and is entirely destructive of the end aimed at.

A most extreme presentation of this view of the case by Helen Watterson is to be found in a recent number of the Forum. The writer exhausts her wit in describing how "Woman," whom she constantly refers to as "She" and "Her," gets herself written up in all sorts of periodicals and books, and continues thus: "She goes into councils and congresses for the purpose of self-celebration, and, announcing as Her motto, 'Not women, but woman,' restricts Her study of the world's interests to such aspects as are either directly affecting women, or directly affected by women. Into the 'Woman' side of all these subjects She burrows with utter unconsciousness, that by so doing She is defeating the very purpose for which these women's gatherings are called—namely, 'the amelioration of the condition of women.'"

The writer goes on to explain this display of rhetorical fireworks by saying that to talk about a right implies that one does not actually possess it. She neglects to explain how keeping still about it will put one in possession of the right. She does remark that the strongest assertion of a right is the assumption of it, which remarkable statement we suppose no one will question. The only obstacle to this short and easy way out of the difficulty being that thus far the courts have absolutely refused to permit this "assumption" of rights in defiance of the laws. "Ostentatiously to parade ability is not to dignify it." . . . "The only proof of equality of work is equality of work."

The woman's exhibit at the World's Fair is cited as a sad illustration of the blind folly of women in their determination to exalt "Woman." For this exhibit, she says, "I do not think it possible to find a raison d'etre either in logic or in sentiment," since the Fair "is an exhibition not of workers but of work," and the sex of the worker no more enters into the matter than does "the color of his hair or the shape of his face." Hence, to make a separate exhibit of woman's work seems to imply that it is a marvel that women can do these things, and regards a clever woman as in the same category with a trained monkey.

The truth of this statement per se does not affect the argument, as the point at issue depends upon other considerations; we might grant that the Fair is simply an exhibit of work regardless of workers, but it is worth while to consider it, since it is a fair example of the sweeping assertions of which the article is full.

The World's Fair, like every other fair, was very largely an exhibit of workers as well as of work. It might be truthfully said that the nationality of the worker had no more to do with the character of his work than the color of his hair or shape of his eyes. In fact, we have abundant proof that steam engines, scientific research, or any other lines of invention or discovery, have no peculiar relations to the English, French, German, Russian, Scandinavian, or any other national type of brain. Yet the exhibits were all grouped by nations. The religious and educational work of different denominations were shown by themselves. Yet, no one likened the Congregational church to a trained monkey, or was overcome with merriment at the suggestion that the Methodist church suggested a dog that walked on its hind legs. The Indian and colored schools were "segregated." Perhaps they would better not have been, but to such an extent was the exhibit that of "workers," that those who had charge of the arrangements thought fit to thus separate them. The baskets made by blind people cannot hope to receive any more consideration in the market than those made by persons of unimpaired eyesight; nevertheless, the work of the blind was not mixed indiscriminately with the other exhibits. This does not at all imply that woman's work is to be considered as work by inferior persons any more than is that of different nations or different denominations. These are simply illustrations to which many others might be added which prove that the World's Fair was very largely an exhibit as well of "workers" as of "work."

The article has throughout the tone so common in magazine articles of a certain class, "I have found the conclusion of the whole matter, and wisdom shall die with me"—a type called forth by the pressing demand for something new and striking, something contrary to the prevalent drift of sentiment to please the fancy of the modern Athenians. Yet there is in it the grain of truth necessary to its passing currency at all. The only difficulty is, that it assumes a condition of things which does not exist. It assumes the existence now of that "Hereafter" in which "Woman" "devoutly believes," "compared with which the opportunities of the Hereafter are as shadows in the night."

If women were accorded their rights, it would indeed be very absurd for them to ceaselessly assert them, but at present it seems the only way by which they will ever acquire them. Had woman's ability to do the same things that men do never been questioned, our friend would doubtless have been spared the spectacle of a woman's building and a woman's exhibit. We do not think there would have been a board of lady managers, but that women of ability would naturally have had their place upon the hoard of directors and among the commissioners. The fact is, however, that this ideal state of things does not exist, and as centuries of keeping quiet concerning both rights and ability have resulted in deprivation of the former, and a general belief that the latter are a missing quantity, it does not seem entirely unreasonable to try a different plan.

Every one knows, even the writers of magazine articles, that woman's place and work in the world are not undisputed points, and that the question of their "sphere" hinges upon that other question, "Can women do the work which hitherto has been done by men alone?" We shall not prove this by words, for

> "By speaking we prove only we can speak;
> Which he, the man here, never doubted. What
> He doubts, is whether we can do the thing
> With decent grace we've not yet done at all."

To prove this we must not only "do it" but we must "bring our statue," and let the world see that we can do it. This is the purpose, the legitimate purpose of the woman's exhibit and of woman's work for woman. As a result, woman's work along all lines has been placed before the gaze of the world and has forced the verdict,—

> "She who did this thing was born
> To do it,—claims her license in her work."

It is not women who have "segregated themselves" and their work. When women discovered themselves, they found they were already "segregated." By common consent they were allowed to be the inferior half of the human race, radically different in physical, mental and moral qualities from the other half, and with a "sphere" distinctively their own, outside of which they might never step. It may be remarked that said "sphere" was the only thing to which they did hold a title, and even this was liable to be infringed upon.

The story of women's growing dissatisfaction with their limitations, their dawning consciousness of abilities supposed to be exclusively masculine, it is needless to relate. But the battle is still on. Though many a field has been won and wonderful advance made, the end is not yet. To ridicule the action of women who in councils and congresses plan to secure the rights of "Woman," and who exhibit woman's work that the world may know its character beyond a peradventure, is to show either profound ignorance concerning the status of the question, or a consuming desire to have something new and striking for a magazine article.

No one can go farther than we in our desire to annihilate false sex discriminations; we do not believe in Woman's Colleges, in Woman's Missionary Societies, in the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, in woman's anything, except as steps to something better. Our boys and girls are better off in schools together, after the plan of God who put them in families together, but while we were waiting for the great institutions of learning to open to our girls, Woman's Colleges had to do the work. Had woman occupied her rightful place in the councils of the church, the cause of missions would have been far in advance of where they are to-day, and woman's missionary societies would never have existed. But the time came when foreign missions could not go forward another step without the aid of women. It would not do, agreed the doctors, to admit the sisters to the general councils of the church lest the great commandment of the law—"I suffer not a woman to usurp authority over the man"—be broken. Better that all the heathen perish! So Woman's Foreign Missionary Societies must come to the rescue.

Had woman held her rightful place in the state, she would have throttled the liquor traffic at its birth. Out of her agony and her faith was evolved the Woman's Christian Temperance Union as the means by which she might make her influence felt, her one only line of attack upon the enemy. "Some glad day" when woman shall have obtained her rightful place, and shall be able to exert her normal influence, when her work is no longer doubted or discriminated against because it is woman's work, we shall hear no more of woman's societies, woman's achievements, woman's rights, and there will be none so glad to lay aside forever distinctions which have lost their significance as the women who in "Councils and Congresses" are devoting their lives to the bringing about of this very consummation.

OUR VIEW OF THE ELECTIONS.

For an "off-year" in politics the recent elections possess more than ordinary interest and significance. In these tumultuous times the bewildered politician, scarcely knowing "where he is at," listens eagerly for the voice of the people as interpreted by the popular vote. Regarded as the pulse of the body politic the state and local elections indicate an unusual amount of energy and vitality. True there are symptoms of fever and unrest, but this condition is far more to be desired than one of torpidity or inanition, for while revealing the presence of disease it at the same time affords evidence of inherent power to overcome it. The returns evince a healthy growth throughout the entire political organism of a spirit of independence. They show that party lines are less arbitrarily drawn; that the party lash has less power to intimidate than ever before. The events of last week have demonstrated that a party nomination is no longer equivalent to an election, but that the people as such (the male people, at least,) are beginning to exercise their much-talked-of "sovereign rights."

Not many elections have come and gone since the scratching of a party ticket required no small amount of moral courage. It meant the losing of political caste. But the man who was once scornfully referred to as a "bolter" or a "mugwump" is now an "independent"; and in politics, as in religion, to be independent is popularly regarded as evidence of a liberal and progressive mind.

The disgraceful scenes of riot and disorder which we have been wont to associate with the methods of cow-boys and western desperadoes, seem in these last elections to have been transferred to the "wild and woolly" east, notably to Brooklyn, the city of churches! But, "give the devil rope enough and he'll hang himself." The old adage is proving true in the case of the evil power known as the Tammany ring, and the result in New York encourages the belief that its days are numbered. The whole iniquitous system of political bossism has received just condemnation at the hands of an aroused people, and it needs no Delphic oracle to presage the speedy dethronement of the spoils system and the abolition of machine politics in this Republic.

It is a noteworthy fact, and one of more than local significance, that the two leading cities of the nation, New York and Chicago, have each taken a determined step in the direction of political reform; the former in the overwhelming defeat of Judge Maynard, whose fraudulent action two years ago gave the legislature of that state to the Democrats, and thus secured the election of Murphy, the brewer, to the United States senate; and the latter in the triumphant reëlection of Judge Gary to the Superior Court of Cook county. In the one case the point at issue was a free ballot and an honest judiciary, in the other the vindication of law and order as against a dangerous anarchistic sentiment. It augurs well for the future that the better elements of both Republican and Democratic forces were arrayed against a common foe; that they united to secure victory for a right principle.

The unexpected Republican majorities all over the country, though attributed by the party press to a growing sentiment in favor of its protective policy, are doubtless due in great measure to complications caused by the financial situation. Though not a party question, the administration of to-day stands as the champion of the gold interest, and while it is true that many voters attribute the continued business depression to Democratic tariff views, it is also true that many more ascribe it to the attitude of the administration toward silver coinage. This may or may not be the case, but as long as so large a proportion of the voting element in the west and south believe it, the party in power must pay the penalty.

A year ago an unsatisfied people clamored loudly for "a change." It came, but failed woefully to justify their expectations. Again they demand a change. It may be that another change—a return to Republican rule—will convince them that the differences between the two old parties is chiefly one of imagination. Theoretically they differ, practically they agree.

Even the tariff question, the chief bone of contention, is not a "test of party fealty" any more than is Prohibition to Iowa Republicans. Many Democratic leaders are pronounced protectionists (the late mayor of Chicago was one of them), and many "good" Republicans are free-traders. Were the Republican party to be re-instated tomorrow, the true cause of the popular discontent would still remain untouched. In fact, as far as the free-silverites are concerned, we shrewdly suspect they would find they had—to use a homely phrase—"jumped from the frying pan into the fire."

The gains of the Populists in nearly every state where they had a ticket in the field may serve as a wholesome reminder to the two old parties that they are losing touch with the great producing classes of the nation. The decline of ten cents a bushel on wheat within one week of "unconditional repeal," and the depreciation in stocks and American securities generally is not exactly the result promised or expected by repealers, and, to say the least, is suggestive.

At the present writing, returns being incomplete, it is impossible to speak definitely of the Prohibition "count."

It is evident, however, that party Prohibitionists have not been as aggressive as usual even in states where they constitute a balance of power. This fact is also undoubtedly due to the overpowering prominence of the money question, which for the time being has thrown all others into the shade. It by no means indicates that "the cause" is losing ground. The lively interest manifested in localities where prohibition was made a leading issue (as in entire counties of Virginia) attests the readiness of the people, and especially the agricultural people, to enlist under a home protection banner.

Kansas continues to furnish proof of the popularity of legal prohibition in that state. From the hour when the Populist administration stood revealed as a traitor to the constitution, its defeat has been a foregone conclusion. In Iowa the repudiation of prohibition by the Republicans, while successful in placing the party in power, has emphasized in the minds of the real foes of the liquor traffic the demand for a third party, state and national. Gradually is it borne in upon the consciousness of our non-partisan friends that only a Prohibition party is adequate to the enforcement of prohibitory law, whether it be local option or constitutional.

The most hopeful feature of the political situation today is the gathering of the reform forces. From every party, from every section they come, communicating to each other, as the distance between them lessens, the fervor of a purer patriotism, effacing every dividing line, except that between good and evil, between right and wrong—that line is drawn more distinctly with every advancing step. Soon the exigencies of the hour will unite them under one banner which shall not be Republican or Democratic, Populist or Prohibition, but a consolidation of the best in all. These reform forces will some day stand upon one grand platform, broad enough to contain all the good that each may bring, strong enough to resist the evil that may assail it.

To save the nation the Republican party was called into being; the nation has once more reached a crisis and the signs of the times all indicate the birth of its coming saviour. We may hasten the advent of the new party—the union of reform forces—by unwavering loyalty to the Prohibition party which is at present the best embodiment of home protection principles and of political purity.

A LATE Sunday edition of The Omaha Daily Bee occupies one whole page in an elaborate eulogy of King's Brewery, which was celebrating its thirty-fifth anniversary. The writer has done well by his subject, but he who reads with enlightened understanding relative to breweries and their nation-cursing output waxes indignant that the same language used to describe honorable and uplifting pursuits should be applied to the origin, growth and success of a brewery. The only consistent feature is the fact that a business which binds more law-breakers than any other is commended in a Sunday newspaper. In this celebration of a concern which stands as a "proud monument" and a "shining example"—"an institution of which any community might well be proud"—says that upon its anniversary day "ample refreshments" will be furnished, and that the "company's product will be dispensed with a prodigal hand." Wiser than serpents, truly, are the agents of evil, would they were as harmless as doves.

THE Epworth Herald contains a department of "Required Readings" which form part of the regular Epworth League reading course. In the issue of November 11 the material is taken from the General Rules, as they appear in the discipline. We quote the following strong utterance of the church on the subject of temperance:

"We, therefore, regard voluntary total abstinence from all intoxicants as the true ground of personal temperance, and complete legal prohibition of the traffic in alcoholic drinks as the duty of civil government. We heartily approve of all lawful and Christian efforts to save society from the manifold and grievous evils resulting from intemperance, and earnestly advise our people to coöperate in all measures which may seem to them wisely adapted to secure that end. We affectionately urge its strict observance by all our members. Finally, we are fully persuaded that, under God, hope for the ultimate success of the temperance reform rests chiefly upon the combined and sanctified influence of the family, the church, and the state."

FOR ten years France has made moral instruction obligatory in all the primary schools of the Republic. The results of this attempt, in which the most versatile of nations leads the world, are decidedly encouraging. The minister of education has published a tabulated record of five hundred and fifty-eight reports, sent him by as many schoolmasters, who agree in the statement that lying is not so frequent as formerly among their pupils, neither is bullying, scribbling on the walls, and torturing birds and animals. It is not surprising to read that politeness has increased, because true politeness is nothing more nor less than kindness in action. It is also stated that the mothers of the children have in many cases congratulated the teachers on the habits of neatness, cleanliness, love of work and obedience that their children have acquired in school. But nothing in the report is so interesting as the comparison that is made between the moral standard in schools under secular control and those under the control of ecclesiastics. It seems that ethical questions are now asked of the children before certificates are given. The following is one of these: "Suppose that in company with some of your friends you go to a fair; you have no money in your pocket, as your parents are poor; suddenly you find a purse, with a five-franc piece in it. Tell what you would do with the purse." Of the one hundred and eleven candidates, thirty were from secular schools and eighty-one from confessional schools. Of the thirty, there were twenty-three who knew it would be a theft to take that money, but the other seven said they would have bought toys, etc., if they had found the purse. Out of the eighty-one pupils from the church schools, only thirty knew that a thing that is found belongs to the person who lost it; the other fifty-one would have spent the money without the slightest twinge of conscience. One little girl answered that she would have taken the money home to her parents, and they would have found it very useful to them; it would have bought them three or four good meals, whereas, if it had been restored to the one who lost it, it would probably have been squandered. We can hardly imagine a better educational process than to ask such questions, and to make the "arrest of thought" in the conscience of the child a part of its every-day drill; indeed, we think this might well outrank the "discipline" of arithmetic and grammar.

That is a crisp motto of a society of native women in Bombay: "The world was made for women, too."

On Duty shares this beautiful, comforting thought from Phillips Brooks with her readers: "Give free and bold play to those instincts of the heart which believe that the Creator must care for the creatures He has made, and that the only real effective care for them must be that which takes each of them into His love, and, knowing it, separately surrounds it with His separate sympathy. There is not one life which the Life-giver ever loses out of His sight; not one which sins so that He casts it away; not one which is not so near to Him, that whatever touches it touches Him with sorrow or with joy."

The priests of Japan are not slow to utilize the power of organization in their efforts to arrest the progress of Christianity. "The Young Peoples' Society of Buddhist Endeavor" has come into being in imitation of the Christian organization of similar name. There is hardly any danger, however, that it will belt the world with the marvelous rapidity of the great Christian young peoples' society, the secret of whose power is in the life and teachings of Christ Himself.

A touching letter comes to On Duty from Mrs. Duncan, sister of our beloved Jennie Casseday, promoted to heavenly bliss. A few thoughts are excerpted: "I have been reading the Convention number and am greatly interested in it. I am always thinking of one who is this year no longer among you in the flesh, yet to whom, when on earth, these great yearly conventions of W. C. T. U. women were events long prayed over, much prepared for, often spoken of "in secret," and greatly helped on the way by her communion with God. If it had been possible I would surely have been among you this year only to look in faces that she loved, only to clasp hands that hers are no doubt now reaching out to. The love she bore you brings me at this season of the year very close to you all."

That was a happy hit made by Mrs. Potter Palmer in her address before the Evangelical Alliance, when she said: "I should like to call attention to the fact that while silent in the church on the first day of the week, it has been the high prerogative of women to aid in keeping alive the spirit and practice of religion during the remaining six days." Thus the lady intimated that while men do the preaching, they leave the practice to the "lesser half."

The Congregational Union representing that large and progressive denomination in Great Britain, adopted by unanimous vote the following resolution: Resolved, This assembly places on record its high appreciation of the devotion and courage with which Dr. Kate Bushnell and Mrs. Andrew brought to light the real condition of the cantonments in India, and gave their evidence before the departmental committee in so clear and conclusive a manner as firmly to establish the previous allegations of a serious infraction of law by the military authorities.

Dr. Emma Brainerd Ryder, an educated physician of New York City, who has been visiting India, gave between three and four temperance lectures to native college boys and others during her stay in India. The girls of Sorosis, the club formed by Dr. Ryder in Bombay, were temperance girls and thoroughly instructed concerning the W. C. T. U. Dr. Ryder's book, entitled "The Little Wives of India," published by Varley Brothers, Melbourne, Australia, is the most heartrending statement concerning the personal bondage of women that has seen the light since time began. Until this book was written, no one has dared to tell the truth concerning the marital slavery of the little women in the most mysterious, exalted yet debased country of the globe. I hope that many true-hearted men and women who read this notice will supply themselves with the book, it is for private circulation only, but its awful facts ought to be known to the public, for what one class of women can endure during thousands of years other women can afford to know. Organizers' Corner.

STATUS OF ORGANIZERS.

The mistaken idea prevails in many portions of the country that a National organizer is fitted only to organize new unions, whereas she must be a public speaker as well, especially prepared to enthuse and instruct the masses in regard to the distinctive features of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. She must be a woman of tact, consecration and knowledge of our many departments, willing to enter difficult fields, enlist new workers, strengthen and enlarge unions already formed as well as organize new ones, and instruct in regard to our special methods. Our National organizers are carefully selected, by our National executive committee, and elected by the Convention.

By the coöperation and concerted action of the state and county officers, the stronger unions may help the weaker, and greatly benefit their own work by employing the National organizers while going to and from their distant fields of labor, thereby reducing their traveling expenses which will enable them to give lower rates at each point.

The following is the list of National organizers for the present year, and whether W's or Y's they are all accredited public speakers and fully prepared to organize W's, Y's, L. T. L's, or speak to the general public and add to the membership of unions having been long in the work.

This "Corner" may be obliged to try several positions before it finds just the niche it can best fill, but it is the desire of the editors of THE UNION SIGNAL, and of the chairman of the board of organizers, that the list of names be kept standing in the paper, and that each organizer feel free to insert an itineracy of her engagements. Each one is hereby invited to send such material as will help in making out a complete calendar of engagements from time to time.

Below are the reports of the organizers which were prepared for the National Convention but not read for lack of time. If the other organizers will send in their reports they will be published in this Corner.

MRS. HELEN L. BULLOCK, New York:

Soon after our Denver Convention last November I spoke in Salt Lake City, Utah, on rescue work, in order to aid the women in establishing a rescue home for girls. Over two hundred dollars was secured that day, and the home soon opened. These good women have since informed me that their city council voted to give them one hundred dollars per month to maintain this work. I also spoke in Fort Douglass, and a good number of the soldiers gave their names for an "Army and Navy Temperance Union," which was soon after organized and mothered by Mrs. Griffith, first vice-president of Utah, a most faithful and consecrated worker in our ranks. Mrs. McClees is looking after these societies among the soldiers.

My next work was in Southern California, where I spent the winter, organizing new unions and strengthening the old. We traveled over the mountains and through the valleys, sometimes fording streams which suddenly rise and fall in that Italy of America, sometimes going in stages in the narrow road around the brow of the mountain, thousands of feet above the valley below. I must confess, that, notwithstanding the grandeur of the scene during that fifty-five mile ride over the mountains to Santa Barbara, I felt like the American girl after her first ride down the great toboggan at Montreal, Canada. The English girl asked her how she liked it; and she replied: "I would not have missed it for five hundred dollars." "Well," said the English girl, "let us go again." But the American girl quickly answered: "Oh, no; I would not go again for one thousand dollars."

In Los Angeles I spoke in the interest of the Ransom Home, securing a good sum of money for that work. Among the new unions in this state it was my privilege to organize the Mary Allen West union at Glendale, the same day that the remains of that faithful missionary were carried through California, and her niece was made president. This was one of the last places visited by Miss West before going to Japan, and she expressed much regret at leaving them without an organization, which doubtless helped to impress the women there with a sense of their responsibility. Over one hundred meetings were held in the state at which more than 500 white-ribboners enlisted in the service. Leaving California, March 15, I turned my face homeward.

Much as I longed to see my home, I regretted to leave this land of sunshine and flowers, and these earnest white ribbon sisters, who had by every possible act of kindness and appreciation aided in lightening the burdens, and making my stay among them one of the brightest spots in my life as an organizer.

My next stop was at Little Rock, Ark., where the faithful ones were earnestly working for the passage of two bills in the legislature, one to raise the age of consent, and the other to prohibit the manufacture and sale of cigarettes. To defeat the latter the cigarette dealers had put thousands of dollars in the hands of the legislature. I was greatly surprised to learn that in Arkansas the license law was so much better than in the North. If a majority petition that no saloon shall be within a mile of the church or school it must be so, and a woman's name counts as much as a man's on this petition. Our meetings were very enthusiastic.

We held one meeting in Missouri, gave three addresses at the Congress in the Woman's Building at World's Fair; worked about two weeks in New York state, and held thirty-three meetings in Pennsylvania. During the year I have given 114 public addresses, held forty-five parlor meetings, beside speaking in Sunday-schools, conventions and jails; have secured 723 active and 381 honorary members, and traveled 11,794 miles.

MISS BELLE KEARNEY, Mississippi:

On account of throat trouble, I have been enabled to work only three months and a half since the last National Convention. During that time I have visited six states, namely: Texas, Louisiana, Alabama, Mississippi, Kentucky and Virginia. I have organized ten W. C. T. U's, thirteen Y's and three L. T. L's; delivered eighty-five addresses; conducted twenty-two business meetings and attended six parlor meetings; secured two thousand one hundred and eighty total abstinence pledges and one hunred and sixteen signatures of college boys to the anti-tobacco pledge; attended the state conventions of Mississippi, Kentucky and Virginia, speaking at each; delivered an address before the temperance convention at Rest Island, Minn., in July, and at the International Convention of the Christian Endeavor Society at Montreal, Canada; have traveled thousands of miles in the interest of the Young Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

MRS. DELLE H. COX, Oregon:

When I compare my work since last Convention with that of the previous year I might feel discouraged had I not long since ceased to know the meaning of that word. If the battle of this year has not been so successful as last, know that it was not for lack of powder but percussion. I have not lacked inspiration, but out-spiration, for the financial depression has nowhere fallen with greater severity than upon the states in which my work chiefly lies—notably in Idaho, where twice during the year they have tried to arrange for me a canvass of their state, but could not guarantee even my expenses, and as the trip is a long and expensive one I dared not attempt it. I hope the National can lend financial aid to that bravely struggling state in her efforts to get upon her feet in the work. There is such a vast field for work there, especially among the railroad men and miners and their families. Who will help?

My first effort of the year was a month's work in Kansas, largely in sixth district. I was then called home by the sickness of my husband; that of my daughter quickly followed, and I found the year well spent before I was enabled to leave my home for the field. Then came the financial crash, and the result was no further work done outside of Oregon and but little there; all told, it is as follows:

Lectures in Kansas, 16; woman's meetings, 4; unions organized, 1; lectures and sermons in Oregon, 29; woman's meetings, 10; children's meetings, 2; organized Y. W. C. T. U., 1; total lectures, sermons and meetings, 61; organizations effected, 2; miles traveled, 3,200; letters written, 305; also spoke to the students at the Oregon State Agricultural and Industrial College; attended four county and one state convention; presented our work before the Grand Lodge of the A. O. U. W., Portland, Ore., also before the Grand Lodge of D. of H., same place; arranged for and held two Demorest medal contests, and have two others nearly ready.

E. NORINE LAW, Michigan:

At this time I am away off in Manitoba. The meetings are doing such great good that at the earnest request of the Provincial Executive Board I have promised to work up to the first of November. When the year is rounded up, I will have delivered one hundred and seventy-nine public addresses, often on Sunday speaking three times, have conducted six parlor meetings, held seventy-five afternoon meetings for the purpose of giving instructions to unions, conducted ten schools of methods, attended at Bay View and did a little service there, have been instrumental in gathering in seven hundred and ninety-four members for the unions, organized two county unions, organized in all but twelve unions this year. The reason of this is, that I have been called to attend county and district conventions and to address public audiences most of the time, also called to address Manitoba Provincial Convention, so that I have had but little time left to visit towns and work up new organizations. I have given much time and effort to the Upper Peninsula of Michigan, of which I still remain president. The year has been filled with the usual difficulties, but the victories have come all along the line. It has been a marvel to me many times how people could turn out and listen with such interest to the "old, old story" of temperance. I send to you a word of cheer. The victory is ours if we are but faithful a little while longer. Never have I felt so determined to push the fight to the finish. God help us to be true and loyal and stand to the end!

ELLA F. DENNY, Indiana:

My work this year has been confined to my own state, Indiana. I have visited forty different towns, organized and reorganized ten unions, delivered one hundred addresses, and given fifty Bible readings, preached twenty sermons, visited state prison, boys' reformatory, and conducted services in twenty different jails. Our state is doing grand work. Mrs. Beck, of Bloomington, is president; her gracious manner and consecrated life are a power for good. Miss Lodie E. Reed, corresponding secretary, is an indefatigable worker, and sees that every part of the state is looked after. Our recording secretary, Mrs. Alice V. Mendenhall, is the oldest recording secretary in the United States; I mean the oldest in continued service, as she has been elected twenty times. Our treasurer, Mollie G. Hay, never tires when there is money to be secured to prosecute the work. The Y's are ably led by Miss Margaret Dickson.

MRS. M. L. WELLS, Tennessee:

I spent six weeks in South Dakota assisting in the work of gaining the prohibition victory; spoke at thirty-eight mass meetings. During one week in Iowa I held five mass and two parlor meetings; went to Louisiana first of February, remaining in the state three months. During this time I addressed eighty-three mass meetings, twenty parlor meetings; seven children's meetings; organized six W. C. T. Unions and three L. T. L's.; was in attendance upon state convention held at Lake Charles. Also attended state conventions in Louisiana and Georgia. During the month of June illness prevented active work. During latter part of July and first of August I organized two W. C. T. Unions and one L. T. L. in Georgia, and attended a Chautauqua at the town of Demorest. Here I met with a serious accident, being thrown from a carriage, and have been unable since to do any work.

MISS CLARA PARRISH, Illinois:

The middle of February I began my work for the National W. C. T. U. Since that time I have traveled eight thousand four hundred miles, visiting twelve states, including the District of Columbia, taken part in sixty public meetings and twenty-eight parlor meetings, written eight hundred and forty-two letters and cards; organized nine Y. W. C. T. Unions, adding six hundred and seventy-five new members to our ranks, attended the state conventions of Michigan, Ohio, Maryland, Delaware and New Jersey and the Missouri Y conference in the interests of the work, and represented the young women at the World's Temperance Congress of Chicago, June 9.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA.

A LITTLE HERE AND THERE.

My letter to you is longer in coming than I had intended, not because I would not, but could not make the days long enough to squeeze in all the things pressing to be done. Our summer has gone with its pleasant outings, sandwiched with still pleasanter work, and our unions are all girding themselves for a full winter's work.

We held two schools of methods, the first in early summer at Carlsbad. It continued two days with Sunday added. The attendance was smaller than last year owing to the time being too early in the season, but those present pronounced it a good and profitable meeting and were determined to make it a greater success numerically next year. Mrs. Roberts, president of Bonsall union, gave a delightful talk Sunday evening on "God's Call to Women," illustrated by the women of the Bible, especially chosen for a special mission. Her consecration service Saturday at the noon hour strengthened us all.

Sunday morning, it being children's day, the services were especially for them. There were some temperance recitations and brief talks by Mrs. Mills, of Orange county; Mrs. Whitmore, of San Diego county, and the state president. In the afternoon the Loyal Temperance Legion was reorganized. One evening was devoted to the presentation of suffrage. A fine paper on woman's work, by Mrs. Helen M. Powers, of Santa Ana, was presented, and Aunt Patty's Suffrage Symposium, by Mrs. Garbutt.

The second evening was especially attractive. The Y's, active and honorary, drove over from Escondido and entertained us with recitations, songs, and report of the work. It did all of us old folks good to see the interest these young folks took in temperance, especially to see the knot of white ribbon tied in the coat lapels of the honoraries. Mrs. Hull, of Oceanside, read an able paper, bristling with facts on the viticultural commission of California, which revealed "ways that are dark." It was voted to put this paper in leaflet form for distribution among voters. It ought to open their eyes to the foolish, yea, wicked expenditure of the people's money.

Our second school of methods was held in August at Long Beach. It continued two days. The program was an interesting one, and what especially pleased. there was not a single failure in the program. Our school opened each morning with a delightful devotional meeting, which turned our hearts Godward and kept them stayed on Him. The first topic under consideration was the evangelistic, which was discussed under the three headings of "The Devotional Hour in the Local Unions," by Mrs. L. M. Stevens; "Gospel Temperance Meetings," by Miss G. T. Stickney, and "City Mission Work," by Anna B. Southwick. Mrs. Mary C. Glass, of Pasadena, read a strong paper on narcotics, which made us hate tobacco worse than ever, and vow to fight the use of the nasty stuff as long as we had breath with which to do it.

The Loyal Temperance Legion work was ably presented by Mrs. Ida H. Russell in "How to Organize"; by Mrs. J. E. Terpenning in "How to Sustain the Interest," and by Mrs. Celia Noll in "How to Interest the Women in the Work." Mrs. S. D. Blackman, of Orange, had a paper on press work, humorous, but withal profitable.

Perhaps no subject was better handled than the purity department under the two headings of "Traps for the Young" and "Purity in Art and Literature," by Mrs. Saxton and Mrs. Webster. Mrs. Josephine Marlatt from Columbus, Ohio, a preacher in the Friend's church and an ardent white-ribboner, conducted the mothers' meeting, subject, "Obedience." She showed how to do, and told how not to do in conducting such meetings. The model W. C. T. U. meeting, with Mrs. Hutton in the chair and Laura Carter as secretary, gave us a higher ideal to work towards in the conduct of our meetings.

The devotional hour of this model meeting led by Mrs. Conoway, of Santa Ana, closing with a beautiful duet, was indeed a hallowed one. Dr. Kate Black, of Pasadena, gave a talk on dress, full of lively interest. Her own comfortable looking dress helped to emphasize all of her statements. Then there was the parliamentary drill by Mrs. Lucy D. More, the practical paper on "How to Use Literature," by Mrs. Shattuck, and a suggestive talk on finance by Mrs. Cash, who has proven that she knows how to raise money as well as she knows how to tell other folks to raise it.

The two evenings were best of all. Our first grand gold medal contest was held the first evening, and the nine contestants did so well that we were sorry that we did not have a medal apiece for them. Anna Hare, of Los Angeles, was awarded the prize. On Thursday evening was held a mock legislature; the tabernacle, which seats at least a thousand people, was crowded. Forty women, who never had the ballot, pretended for one evening that they had it, and represented our state senate. The tables were turned, and men came petitioning for enfranchisement, and a bill was introduced "To Enfranchise Certain Men of the State of California, and Prescribe their Qualifications." The arguments pro and con before the committee and in the august senate chamber had a ringing satire in them that the audience was not slow to appreciate. I am sure the men of that audience, and there were many of them, left the tabernacle asking themselves the reason why things are as they are politically.

In San Diego county the seven unions on or near the Bay, San Diego First, San Diego Central, National City, Oneonta, Otay, Chula Vista, and Oneonta Y, have organized a union of unions.

All day meetings are held every three months. It was my pleasure to attend the one held in National City. It assembled in Aylworth Hall, a building put up by one of our public spirited white-ribboners and always thrown open to all temperance meetings. An excellent program had been prepared upon very practical topics pertaining to the work. What surprised and delighted me were the attendance and interest. I had expected to see some twenty or thirty of our workers, at the most, and there were all of one hundred wide awake, enthusiastic women who had come together to talk over the best interests of the work.

I cannot mention all of the subjects discussed. Among them, however, were: "How to teach Purity in our Public Schools," by Mrs. DeBurn, wife of the San Diego superintendent of schools. It was a thoughtful paper, forcibly expressed. Miss French, a young high-school pupil, interested us very much in her paper on the "Demorest Club, Its Aims and Methods." This club, composed of young ladies and gentlemen, was organized last winter by Miss Evans of Kansas. The members take the triple pledge, wear the white ribbon, their chief work being to hold the medal contests. At noon we were all served with a bountiful lunch in the dining rooms, and after the afternoon meeting treated to ice cream and cake.

To the pleasant all-day meeting was added a Demorest gold medal contest in the evening, under the management of Mrs. Dow. The hall was full, the music was fine, and the six young contestants made a close trial of their ability. Miss Dot Smith won the medal. She was also one of the contestants at Long Beach, where she was the favorite of many. While in San Diego, the two unions of the city gave me a public reception with so general a response from the people and so warm a welcome from the pastors as to prove that the white-ribboners of San Diego have won the kind favor of the good people there.

On my way home from San Diego I remained a day at Santa Ana, to attend a parlor social held at the hospitable home of Mrs. Lizzie H. Mills. It was a truly ideal social, where everybody helped everybody to have a good time. A noticeable feature was the presence of several ministers, with their wives, who seemed part and parcel of the W. C. T. U. God bless those ministers who are stanch enough and true enough and brave enough to be found in the company of those who are pushing on an unpopular reform. We have many such in Southern California, but not all.

At El Modena a gold medal contest was held a few weeks ago, which was exceptionally fine. It did my heart good to have a young man, Wilson Martin, of Santa Ana, win the medal.

A little union at Los Olivos, organized last winter by Mrs. Bullock, did considerable in the right direction by keeping all liquors off the grounds at a picnic given by three neighboring towns. It also served refreshments, by which sixty-two dollars and fifteen cents were cleared.

HAPPENINGS IN THE NUTMEG STATE.

The Loyal Temperance Legion conference, held in the Main Street Baptist church, Meriden, was an occasion long to be remembered. Being almost the first meeting of the kind in Connecticut, the novelty of it made it still more interesting. A profusion of lovely flowers, a large American flag and L. T. L. banner added to the beauty of the church. The day was fine and a large number of ladies and children were present when the conference opened at ten a. m.

Mrs. Fitz Gerald, state superintendent of juvenile work, Mrs. Downs, president of New Haven county, and Mrs. Holmes, president of the Meriden union, were seated on the platform. Mrs. Newell, recording secretary of the Meriden union, led the devotional exercises. Coronation was sung and the 22d Psalm and the Lord's prayer were repeated in response. "Throw out the Life Line," was sung, and Mrs. Fitz Gerald then took charge of the meeting. Little Jessie Cummings of the local L. T. L. gave the address of welcome, and Mrs. Andrews, state secretary, read a fine letter of greeting from Mrs. Forbes, who said: "I wish that you could at some time during the day form in one big procession, and with banners flying, march through the streets of Meriden, especially past the saloons of the city. Nothing you could do would make old King Alcohol tremble more effectually than that. We look to you, boys and girls of New Haven county, to help us fight old King Alcohol. You can do much to help on the temperance cause. God bless you, every one."

Mrs. Luce and Mrs. Partridge sent regrets. Mrs. Leeds was introduced and spoke in behalf of the Loyal Crusaders, a juvenile temperance society belonging to the Sons of Temperance. A letter from Mrs. Helen G. Rice, National superintendent, was read by Mrs. Downs. Miss Nettie Stevens, of Ansonia, recited "The Brave Wife" in a most excellent manner. Mrs. Downs read a paper on "Prayer," followed by singing "Sweet hour of prayer." Recitations by George Brown, Gretchen Kees and Henry Flagg followed. A letter was read from Mrs. Alice M. Hayner, of Oneco, state superintendent of juvenile work for the Good Templars. Jennie Peers, of Wallingford, gave a recitation, and Master Grove Hill sang "The Future Law Makers." Miss Gertrude Norton, president of Litchfield county, sent a very interesting paper which was read by Mrs. Morris.

Master Harold Clark gave a recitation which was followed by a march up and down the aisles of the church and was much enjoyed by the children. "The rallying song" was sung, and a little tot, Ethel Ball, spoke "Dolly's Pocket." A paper was read by Mrs. Andrews on "Advance in Loyal Legion Work." Gertrude Morris and Shirley Wilcox, from Morris Cone, sang very sweetly, "Some Glad Day," and Ruth Smith gave a recitation which was very fine. Bay Bannell told the boys of "something to do" and then Mrs. Newell read a paper sent by Mrs. F. M. Stanley, editor of the White Ribbon Banner, subject, "The Need of a Temperance Paper in every Family." Miss H. E. Culver, of Portland, gave a fine practical talk on the way of conducting an L. T. L. As she has been the leader of a large legion for six years, she surely understands her subject.

It was now noon, and after Mrs. Fitz Gerald had explained the reason for observance of the noontide hour, Mrs. Holmes led in prayer. All then adjourned to White-Ribbon Hall, which is close by the church, when over 100 were served with an abundant dinner. In the afternoon recitations were given by Mabel and Ethel Lacy, Mabel Coles and Bertha Smith. A letter was read from Miss Grace Curtiss, state superintendent of narcotics, in regard to cigarette smoking. Meriden's favorite little temperance singer, May Jopson, sang "Cold Water." Recitations were given by Philip Grarey, Flossie Tuttle, Blanche Ward, Charlie Dunlop, Alice Johnson, Robert Chapman, Teddie Carrier (the last two from Middlesex county), Edith Cummings and Alice H. Thomas.

Mrs. Leeds read a paper on "Band of Mercy" work. Mrs. Homer Curtiss, of Meriden, was introduced as "the youngest temperance worker" and she spoke a few good words to the children. A letter was read from Alice M. Guernsey, of Chicago, editor of The Young Crusader, also from Anna Gordon, world's superintendent of L. T. L. A collection was taken toward paying for Willard fountain. Mrs. Lines, of Waterbury, sang in her lovely way, "Sometime we'll understand." There was also a violin solo by Albert Chamberlain, with piano accompaniment by Miss Rose Abell, who played for all the singing of the day.

Rev. Mr. James, president of the Connecticut Temperance Union, gave an excellent address. subject, "Temperance Object Teaching." He was listened to with intense interest by the children, as well as the grown people and they also enjoyed the experiments he made. May Jopson sang a lovely little solo and then came the question box, conducted by Mrs. Andrews. The following resolution was offered and adopted and ordered to be placed in the state paper.

"A vote of thanks of the New Haven County Loyal Temperance Legion is tendered to the L. T. L. and W. C. T. U. of Meriden for their royal entertainment, to the church sexton, pianist, Mrs. Lines, for her services; Mr. Chamberlain; Mr. James and the two young men from Middlesex county; the escort committee and all others who have in any way contributed to the success of the day."

The convention closed by singing, "God be with you till we meet again," and as they slowly left the church all hoped that the

FAIRFIELD COUNTY CONVENTION.

Fairfield County W. C. T. U. gathered for its semi-annual convention in the Methodist church, Shelton, October 4. Twelve local unions were represented by delegates or reports. The convention comprised a promise service, two business meetings and an enthusiastic rally of the children. Mrs. Andrews, Mrs. Fitz Gerald and Mrs. Stanley, of the state union, were present and contributed much to the interest of the occasion. Among other pleasant features were a parliamentary drill conducted by Mrs. Andrews; a paper entitled "The Need of Temperance in every Temperance Family," by Mrs. F. M. Stanley, and an address by C. B. Foote, president of Connecticut Sunday-school Association on temperance work in the Sunday-school. Reports from local unions were encouraging. Mrs. Fitz Gerald was elected delegate from Fairfield county to the National Convention.

We record with hearty appreciation the presence of Revs. Arbucle and Keneston, of Shelton, Sands, of Bridgeport, and Kneesal, of Bethel. If our pastors were aware how much the temperance women prize their moral support and encouraging words, we are sure they would be oftener seen at our meetings. Fairfield county has now an organizer, and we hope during the coming months some of our unoccupied territory may be possessed. Mrs. Fitz Gerald has consented to take this position.

The children's meeting was unusually bright with recitations, chalk-talks and other pleasant exercises. An evening meeting was addressed by W. H. Spear, the temperance evangelist. A stirring blue ribbon movement is in progress in Shelton.

AT WILLIMANTIC CAMP GROUND.

Our temperance day at the camp ground this year was an occasion long to be remembered. A large company of cottagers who had hastened from their less favored localities in the city or town to the attractions of a residence in this lovely grove, besides many white-ribboners, who went up to the W. C. T. U. feast of tabernacles, hailed with joy the beautiful bright day that ensured the comfort of an outdoor meeting, and brought to them the long anticipated feast of good things.

At an early hour the speaker's stand was decorated with the National motto, colored charts, etc., and soon after the crowd came together. Our state president, Mrs. Forbes, with the speakers of the day, Mrs. M. E. A. Gleason, of Massachusetts, and Col. Geo. W. Bain, of Kentucky, Mrs. M. M. Andrews, Mrs. S. K. Luce, Mrs. F. P. Partridge, Mrs. A. M. Herr, and a goodly company of state superintendents occupied the platform.

The opening "service of praise and testimony" led by Mrs. Herr, of Norwich, was as our devotional services are always, spirited, earnest, a helpful preparation for the day before us. Rev. O. W. Scott, of Willimantic, in behalf of the camp-meeting association, extended a royal greeting, and most hearty welcome to the W. C. T. U., and said: "Seven years ago you were welcomed to the camp ground, why not seven times as much so now?" He paid a glowing tribute to the work of the W. C. T. U., and the results of their efforts in behalf of scientific temperance instruction, and other lines of work, and suggested the incorporation of the letters W. C. T. U. in the wills of those making bequests of their property. He said it was to their credit that the women have been largely instrumental in securing the law allowing the women to vote on all school questions. "Would to God you all had the ballot,—and you will have it sooner or later. There is no local union, be it ever so weak, but can do something to advance the cause of Christ in the localities where they are. One way in which you can help is in doing something to help women get the ballot. Nothing can settle things in politics but votes. May you get so enthused to-day that voices and votes, and vim and victory may join to secure a speedy adjustment of all these unsettled things."

Mrs. Forbes next addressed the company. She spoke of the difficulty that attends the endeavor to reclaim a drunkard—no matter by what kind of reformatory effort—with the liquor right under his nose; how rarely successful such an attempt is! Our hope is in the children, if we can reach them, educate and train them, we shall be able to save them, and to do much for our land, as they are to be voters. She referred to the impressive object lesson in the Liberal Arts Building at the World's Fair, when two little girls, one from Texas and the other from Kentucky, removed the black cloth coverings of those two states in Mrs. Mary H. Hunt's great chart, showing the states that had a temperance educational law in white, and those that had not such protective laws for the school children, in black. Connecticut was in white, but ought to have been in grey, for at that time Connecticut had only that miserable, little, insufficient text book. Mrs. Forbes also gave a history of the struggle the women had in the legislature to get their new temperance bill through. She spoke from a very full heart and it was a most interesting and pathetic narration of anxiety and persistence amid discouragements and unexpected obstacles. But Mrs. Hunt's influence and determined perseverance at last resulted in the passage of the bill through both houses, and we now have a good strong law.

Women were urged to study this law, to be conversant with it, be able to talk it up with influential people and watch its working. Mrs. Forbes spoke of their successful effort in behalf of the police matron bill and the bill alluring women to vote on school questions. Women were urged to avail themselves of the opportunity of voting on school matters. "Don't think it mannish, and you don't want to—do it for your children, and do it as unto the Lord."

Mr. James spoke of the effort and energy of both Mrs. Forbes and Mrs. Hunt, and warmly commended Mrs. Forbes for her own tireless work in the legislature, which he said her modesty had caused her to ignore in her account of the matter. He said God was in this movement. God swayed and changed the hearts of those men who had at almost the last moment opposed where they previously sanctioned the bill, and caused them to again change their attitude, and when the battle was all but lost, He turned the tide into victory. He urged white-ribboners to use tact, gentleness, earnestness and all the graces to interest those who are apathetic or opposed to our work. Mrs. Fitz Gerald told some of her humorous pointed stories, of which she has an inexhaustible fund, and finished with a solicitation for a real generous collection.

Mrs. M. E. A. Gleason, National lecturer and Massachusetts state superintendent of narcotics, was introduced. Her sweet-spirited earnestness won our hearts from the first, while her clear, convincing arguments, rapidly uttered and with the ease of one who is thoroughly conversant with her subject, held the close attention of the audience to the end of her address. In speaking of the evil effects of the tobacco habit, she cited several cases of tobacco cancer. General Grant and Emperor William, great men, born to conquer others, could not conquer themselves, and both fell victims to the tobacco cancer. The best medical authorities of Europe and America say that the worst consequences to the human system come from smoking, chewing or snuffing tobacco in any form. Other arguments followed, all apt and well put. In the afternoon Mrs. Gleason gave a most interesting and helpful Bible reading, subject "Consider Jesus." Col. Bain, of Kentucky, was greeted with great applause as he was introduced. His address needs no comment, it was telling in every point. His talk to the boys was most earnest and pathetic, in fact, his entire address was eloquent. Next on the program came the children's meeting in charge of Mrs. Fitz Gerald, and that one was what all the children's meetings are when our efficient superintendent of juvenile work conducts them, bright, interesting and full of good things and helps to all, old as well as young.

At this one Mrs. Gleason and Rev. J. H. James addressed the children, giving many impressive lessons, and making the occasion one they will long remember. The little folks always look forward to their meeting with great pleasure and interest, and can be heard "talking it up" long before the time arrives for it.

The evening exercises were very enjoyable. Professor Gray gave a brief address, and also a fine recitation. Five minute speeches by everybody were very bright and interesting features of the program. Good music, in charge of Mr. F. M. Stanley, enlivened the day and evening. Miss Rose Williams presided at the organ. Like all pleasant gatherings and good times, this one had its end as well as its beginning, and with braver hearts, stronger courage, a more earnest desire to be loyal and energetic in the great work in which we are engaged, we anticipate even a more blessed time when another year shall have rolled around and brought us together for another temperance day at Willimantic camp ground.

NEW JERSEY'S CONVENTION.

The twentieth annual convention of the New Jersey Woman's Christian Temperance Union was held in the city of Camden, in the Broadway Methodist church, October 3-6. The handsome edifice was well filled at all the meetings. A life-size picture of Mrs. S. J. C. Downs occupied a place on the platform. Also one of Miss Willard, amid a profusion of palms, flags, flowers, and banners. The executive committee met at three o'clock Tuesday afternoon. The evening meeting really inaugurated the convention proper; warm words of welcome came from the pastor, mayor and president of the local union. Rev. H. G. Moore, of Springfield, Ohio, gave an address on "Courage vs. Cowardice."

Wednesday morning, our state president, Mrs. Bourne, gave her annual address in which she said the total membership has increased, during the year; all lines of department work have been prosecuted with encouraging success. The question of equal suffrage occupied a prominent place, each general officer, with the state president giving pronounced testimony, which was greeted with the warmest applause.

Much merriment was caused by the curt speech of Mrs. Austin, of Passaic county. "In the city of Paterson, where I live," said she, "they put a brewer-mayor in, but we women didn't vote for him. Then the people, that's the men, sent a 'race track starter' to the legislature to make laws for us women! Oh! send us backbone! We want some to prop up jelly-fish electors on election day!"

A brief outline of the history of the state union was sketched, and due credit was given Mrs: Denman, the first president, who so faithfully did the pioneer work for seven years. Mrs. Dr. D. P. Kidder's and Mrs. Downs' early work were also commended. Many valuable suggestions were made as to the methods to be pursued in order to secure greater efficiency in local work.

Mrs. Penfield it was, who presented the state banner in 1886. This noontide banner was the inspiration of her seventieth year. She is never forgotten at the hour of twelve by white-ribboners in New Jersey. A message was telegraphed her in reply to a greeting.

The report of Mrs. J. T. Ellis showed a total membership of 6,123. The 151 unions in the state possess property worth $117,500 and the treasurer reported receipts of $2,953.17, with a balance of $403. Seven counties having raised $100 or more, each of them is entitled to one delegate to the National Convention.

The report of the Y. W. C. T. U., by Miss Campbell, showed that there were four new unions, four have disbanded, three failed to report and one became a young people's union. The total membership of the Y's in the state is 574. There were $2,445 raised in the past year, 17,297 pages of literature were distributed, 280 business meetings have been held and forty-nine social meetings. Miss Campbell attributed the decrease of membership to girls who marry and go out to other fields of usefulness.

Wednesday evening was given to the young people. The church was filled to over-flowing, and a drill by the uniformed Loyal Legion Guards was enthusiastically applauded. Girls dressed in white, led by one representing "Columbia" sang several songs, and one boy declaimed. The banner was presented to the union having the largest number of members in the state. Newark received the emblem last year. This year was presented to Florence union, Burlington county, by Miss Pierce, and was received in a neat address by Miss Higgins.

Miss Clara Parrish, of Illinois, made an address on "The Future of Young Women in Temperance Work." She said that Columbus had discovered America, but that the W. C. T. U. had discovered woman. What the world needed to-day was woman's voice and pen. She believed that a country may be measured by the appreciation of its womanhood.

The election of officers took place as follows: President, Mrs. Emma Bourne; corresponding secretary, Mrs. J. T. Ellis; recording secretary, Mrs. I. H. Demarest; treasurer, Mrs. N. L. Caminade. Mrs. E. A. Mickle, who has faithfully served as state treasurer for fourteen years, and has been called to pass under the shadow by the death of her beloved husband recently, positively declined a reëlection.

The resolution which received the most emphatic applause of the delegates was as follows: "The legislature of N. J. has passed one of the most disgraceful and infamous bills ever known in the history of the state, in legalizing race track-gambling, and in disregarding the protest of the people, and the veto of the governor.

"Therefore, be it Resolved, that the W. C. T. U. declares the passage of said bill an outrage and a menace to society, and that we stand for the repeal of every law upon our statute books which legalizes crime."

Woman suffrage was the trend of another resolution, in which the hope was expressed that the day was not far distant when the full elective franchise shall be restored to the women of New Jersey, from whom it was illegally taken.

Delegates were instructed to prepare to vote intelligently by keeping posted on current events; they were also requested to avail themselves of the privilege of voting for school trustees. Among the other resolutions which passed were, calling for necessary legislation for the appointment of police matrons in cities; for the enforcement of the state law in reference to the sale of cigarettes; for a National Sabbath rest law; that the age of protection for girls

IMPORTANT ANNOUNCEMENT.

The minutes of the World's and National W. C. T. U. Conventions, held from October 16 to 22, 1893, at the Memorial Art Institute, Chicago, Ill., will be published at the earliest possible date.

We think no one can fail to see that it will be impossible for any W. C. T. U. woman to pursue her work in the organization with efficiency and in harmony with plans adopted by the Convention, without the knowledge that can be obtained only by study of the minutes. As well might one expect to live an intelligent, Christian life without the Bible, or to instruct children in mathematics or science without text-books, as to do thoroughly good W. C. T. U work without them

We earnestly appeal to every woman in all the ranks to send to The Temple fifteen cents, that immediately upon publication, the minutes may be sent out, and there be no delay in the study of the recommendations which will be found in the President's (Miss Willard's) address and in the superintendent's reports, by which each may be "thoroughly furnished unto every good work." Address (inclosing fifteen cents), Corresponding Secretary W. C. T. U., The Temple, Chicago, Ill.

PARLOR MEETINGS.

Dear Superintendents:—Doubtless you are acquainted with the fact through THE DAILY UNION SIGNAL that this department, so faithfully officered for the past six years by Mrs. Anna M. Hammer, state president of Pennsylvania, has been transferred to her associate, and I hasten to greet you through this medium, which is far reaching, and express to you my love and interest in our special line of work.

I have studied this subject especially for eight years, and am thoroughly convinced that it is a power for the realization of our hopes, for by the parlor meetings we gain in membership, and by reënforcing our unions we are the more efficiently equipped for the contest.

It is marvelous how quickly the women unfold after becoming associated with our grand organization; and are thereby made more receptive to all educational impressions, which are not alone beneficial to the learner, but must reflect upon those with whom they are conversant. Indeed we have found in studying the various phases of the temperance course, that we cannot be one, but must be many sided, to cope with the shrewd intelligence of our opponents, and to every true worker comes an intense desire to bring the very best elements of knowledge and wisdom into her department.

There are heights we would attain (were it possible) in a very short time, but we have learned by our own and others experiences, that in order to win successfully we must patiently climb the ascent, and by and by we shall stand upon the summit of perfected hopes, looking not back wistfully to the days when we found it so difficult to be patient, and realizing the hardest task was to be patient with ourselves.

I fear the social element is too frequently overlooked in our eagerness to win the battle, and would suggest that we pause three or four times during the year, and invite to our hearts and homes those persons who are unacquainted, perhaps prejudiced, against the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. Women to-day are sitting at ease in their homes, ignorant of the vices that are alluring their children from the home, uninformed of the higher demands that come from the Divine Ruler to them, until you, His instrument, shall call them into this blessed service. We cannot make these meetings a real success without labor; but can we accomplish any object without close effort?

I have chosen Mrs. Maria W. Vaughn, of Moscow, Pa., as my associate, and expect to prepare a circular containing instructions as to the best methods of conducting these social interviews. In the meantime do not slacken your ardor but go forward; for the years pass so quickly, that we must continue moving to keep pace with them.

Shall we not endeavor to make more of a personal effort this year, that we may find new surprises all along the way? Let us dedicate our hearts, our homes, our service to the blessed Christ who will sanctify every exertion put forth in His name.

MARY D. TOMLINSON,
Nat'l Supt., Plainfield, N. J.

Our Library Table.

NOVEMBER MAGAZINES.

THE CENTURY ILLUSTRATED for November includes in its table of contents the names of Ralph Waldo Emerson, James Russell Lowell, Charles Eliot Norton, Colonel John Hay, George Kennan, Mary Hallock Foote, Mrs. Schuyler van Rensselaer, Edith M. Thomas, Charles Egbert Craddock, and many others. A very timely paper is a description of "Bismarck at Friedrichsruh," by Mrs. Kinnicutt of New York. The volume of THE CENTURY beginning with the current issue is to have a rich table of contents. Among its many attractions are a new serial by Mark Twain and unpublished essays by James Russell Lowell.

The Century Co., 33 East 17th Street, New York City.

ST. NICHOLAS for young folks, conducted by Mary Mapes Dodge, ranks high in the list of publications for boys and girls. The press and people of two continents have united in its praise and its circulation is almost phenomenal. Beginning with the current issue it will be enlarged for the coming year by the addition of about two hundred pages in the volume, and has mapped out for itself a richer program than ever. Articles on natural history, a series on American authors, stories of India by Rudyard Kipling, serial stories, Palmer Cox's famous "Brownies" and Mark Twain's inimitable humor in "Tom Sawyer Abroad," will make this magazine more beloved than before to the hearts of Young America, if that be possible.

The Century Co., 33 East 17th St., N. Y.

The November ANNALS OF THE AMERICAN ACADEMY is distinctively an economic number, as it contains four papers by well-known economists, which treat of various subjects in political economy. They are as follows: "Interest and Profits," by Prof. Arthur T. Hadley, of Yale University; "The Austrian Theory of Value," by Prof. S. M. Macvane, of Harvard University; "The Subjective and Objective View of Distribution," by Prof. John Hobson, of London, and "The Total Utility Standard of Deferred Payments," by Prof. Edward A. Ross, of Stanford University. Those who would keep abreast with the latest economic thought cannot well afford to overlook these important contributions to economic literature.

American Academy of Political and Social Science, Philadelphia, Station B.

The ATLANTIC MONTHLY for November carries on two serials, Mrs. Carazza's "The Man from Aidone," and Charles Egbert Craddock's "His Vanished Star," and also contains the second paper of Mr. W. F. Apthorp's "Two Modern Classicists in Music." This deals with Otto Dresel, a musician far less widely known then he deserved to be. Outdoor and indoor England appear in Miss Alice Brown's "A Pilgrim in Devon," and Sir Edward Strachey's charming "Talk at a Country House" on Books, Tennyson, and Maurice. In "Courts of Conciliation in America" Mr. Nicolay Grevstad tells of the grafting of a Scandinavian method of arbitration upon the laws of our own Northwest,—a most significant movement.

Houghton, Mifflin & Company, 11 East 17th Street, New York City.

SCRIBNER'S for November contains a paper of most pertinent interest to every one interested in the education of women, by Miss Katharine de Forest—a finely written account of the present conditions governing "Education for Girls in France." Miss de Forest is an American girl who has lived for a number of years in France, and having had exceptional opportunities for a careful study of this subject, writes with authority. American girls may learn many a valuable lesson from the French jeune fille, even while they rejoice over their own superior advantages from many standpoints. A distinctly American article in this issue is Isaac H. Bromley's contribution to the Historic Moments Series, giving his recollections of the "Nomination of Lincoln." Mr. Bromley was present at the convention of 1860, and was a close observer of the stirring event here described. He was also in the confidence of the leaders of the party.

Charles Scribner's Sons, New York City.

The latest issue of the MAGAZINE OF POETRY fully maintains the character this magazine has established for itself. Among other portraits that will be prized are those of John Ruskin, Elizabeth Stuart Phelps Ward, and Julia Ward Howe. This issue gives to its readers brief sketches and selections from the writings of nearly twenty authors, accompanied by portraits of most of them.

Charles Wells Moulton, publisher, Buffalo, N. Y.

Zoölogy, electricity, education, hygiene, philosophy, mathematics, and meteorology are all represented in the November POPULAR SCIENCE MONTHLY, education leading in number of titles. Henry L. Clapp contributes a thoughtful essay on "The Scientific Method with Children, in which he maintains that schemes of scientific teaching constructed for college students are useless for children, as they do not take account of the child's standpoint nor of his way of thinking. Under the title "The Pestalozzian System," Hon. George S. Boutwell reclaims for the schools of Massachusetts the credit for pioneer work in America that had been attributed to the Oswego Normal School by a writer in the MONTHLY for May. "An Argument for Vertical Handwriting," illustrated with cuts and fac-similes, is presented by Joseph V. Witherbee. The new style is claimed to be both more legible and more rapid than the old, easier to teach, and allowing a more healthful position of the writer. The opening article of the number is a fully illustrated paper on "The Conservation of our Oyster Supply," by Robert F. Walsh. The writer shows that an oyster famine is threatening us, and describes the modes of restocking depleted beds that are coming into use both here and abroad. The first half of the lecture on "Evolution and Ethics," delivered by Professor Huxley at the Sheldonian Theatre, Oxford, is printed in this number. Professor Huxley shows that the idea of evolution had a place in the thought of both Greece and India six centuries before Christ. This is but a portion of the list of good things that never fail to appear from month to month in this valuable periodical.

D. Appleton & Company, 1, 3 and 5 Bond street, New York City.

NEW BOOKS.

THE EASIEST WAY IN HOUSEKEEPING AND COOKING. By Helen Campbell. This author has put herself on record before the women of the world for one with large sense of those matters which lie vitally near to woman's weal. All who have read her inimitable story of "Dr. Martha Scarborough" will have made up their minds for a treasure trove in this later work, and in many respects they will not be disappointed. Freshly original, climbing up out of the worn ruts of "cook books," it will be hailed with true pleasure by the brainy housewives who desire to administer the affairs of the homestead by sense rather than after the traditions of their grandmothers. The author sets herself to discuss—and she does it with a master pen—the framework of the home, that is the house, its situation and arrangement; its ventilation; water supply; with skill that will bring joy to many readers she robs "The Day's Work" of many, if not most, of its horrors; she descends to the lower regions and has admirable ideas about "Fires, Lights, and Things to Work With"; washing-day and the various processes of "Cleaning" do not evade her cunning. In chapter seven she comes to the tabernacle of the soul, and her words about "The Body and its Composition" are invaluable because of the simple yet complete forthsetting of truths to which none should be blind. "Food and its Laws," "The Relation of Food to Health," "The Chemistry of Animal Food," will receive profitable reading. But here commendation must break off for criticism, since in her chapter on "Condiments and Beverages," under the head of alcohol, instead of the utterance to be expected is found a most uncertain sound. There is not the cry of "no compromise" here that Helen Campbell's hosts of woman friends will look for, since she takes the stand that "to the man or woman who lives by law, and whose body is in the best condition, wine in its many forms is a permissible occasional luxury, and so with beer and cider and the wide range of domestic drinks." True, she does state the evils of "alcohol taken in excess," but so do the enemies of all temperance reform, and they are its greatest incumbrance. Having thus established her precedent it is no matter of surprise that in the recipes which take up the balance of the book are found wine sauces, cider in mince meat, plum puddings flavored with "a glass each of wine and brandy," and even the old "tipsy pudding" and "wine jelly" recipes. Wine whey and egg-nog figure among recommendations for sick-room cookery, and one lays down the book grieved in spirit for the "trail of the serpent" where least dreamed of.

FREE.

The following remarkable statement, to which we direct special attention, is from a Tennessee farmer.

My age is 63. I suffered intensely from catarrh 10 years; dry scabs formed in nostrils, one or both sides stopped up continually, dryness and soreness of throat, hoarseness, intense headache, took cold easily, and had continual roaring, cracking, buzzing and singing in my ears. My hearing began to fail, and for three years I was almost entirely deaf, and continually grew worse. Everything I had tried, failed. In despair I commenced to use the Aerial Medication in 1888, and the effect of the first application was simply wonderful. In less than five minutes my hearing was fully restored, and has been perfect ever since, and in a few months was entirely cured of catarrh.

Signal Notes.

THERE are four women missionary physicians in Persia.

"THE three greatest scourges of family life are drink, debt and bad temper."

BY the will of Anna E. Brown, Quincy, Ill., her estate of $300,000 has been divided among humane societies, and homes for the friendless and orphaned.

STILL another occupation has been discovered for women, but this time not a desirable one. Elderly women in China are paid so much an hour to visit the homes of the wealthy and retail the latest bits of scandal.

GEO. C. RANKIN, who has been working among the poor of Glasgow for forty years, says that he can assert without a moment's hesitation that nine-tenths of the pauperism is a direct result, either primarily or latterly, of the use of strong drink.

THE great Baptist Furman University at Greenville, South Carolina, has opened its doors to women. This is a long step for the conservative, historic old palmetto state to take, and it is good to feel assured that "she shall be blessed in her deed."

THIS year surpasses all other years in the history of railroad accidents according to a railroad man. From November, 1892, to November, 1893, two thousand three hundred and eighteen persons have been killed and two thousand have been maimed and crippled. These figures include those killed on street railways.

AN English labor commissioner reports that the English peasant is deteriorating physically, the men are smaller. The test of a peasant's strength used to be demonstrated in the wrestling ring, but he has much less prowess now than formerly, and what he now calls a day's work is not more than used to be enough for a woman.

FIFTY delegates were in attendance on the International Congress for the suppression of Immoral Literature at Lausanne, Sept. 12, 13 and 14. Great interest was manifested and the speeches and papers averaged thirty each day. One element was lacking, and that was the presence of women, a few of whom sat in the gallery as listeners.

A MISSIONARY society began work in India eighty-nine years ago, and its missionaries were mostly moderate drinkers. Another began work thirty-five years later, with its missionaries all total abstainers. The one society added nearly six thousand members in thirty-five years and the other had only four thousand members in its eighty-nine years.

THE second Sunday in November is a day that for twenty-eight years has been set apart by the Y. M. C. A. of North America "as a time for general thanksgiving to God, who has so marvelously advanced the work of the associations, and to humbly pray for a continuance of His favor." In this call request was made for prayer for the salvation and upbuilding of young men in Japan, India, China, Africa, as well as in Europe and America.

AN encouraging report comes from an other labor commissioner who has been collecting reports from different parts of England on the condition of the agricultural laborer. He believes that the laborers are undoubtedly more sober than they were, and the improvement is seen in language and dress. One principle cause of the change is that farmers are giving money instead of beer at harvest time, and are serving oatmeal water or tea in the fields where they once supplied beer.

A NEW CURE FOR ASTHMA.

Medical science at last reports a positive cure for Asthma in the Kola plant, found on the Congo river, West Africa. So great is their faith in its wonderful curative powers, the Kola Importing Co., 1164 Broadway, New York, are sending out large trial cases of the Kola Compound free to all sufferers from Asthma. Send your name and address on postal card, and they will send you a trial case by mail free.

CONSUMPTION CURED.

An old physician, retired from practice, had placed in his hands by an East India missionary the formula of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure of Consumption, Bronchitis, Catarrh, Asthma and all Throat and Lung Affections, also a positive and radical cure for Nervous Debility and all Nervous Complaints. Having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, and desiring to relieve human suffering, I will send free of charge to all who wish it, this recipe, in German, French or English, with full directions for preparing and using. Sent by mail, by addressing, with stamp, naming this paper. W. A. NOYES, 820 Powers' Block, Rochester, N. Y.

PATENTS.

NOTICE TO INVENTORS.

There was never a time in the history of our country when the demand for inventions and improvements in the arts and sciences generally was so great as now. The conveniences of mankind in the factory and workshop, the household, on the farm, and in official life, require continual accessions to the appurtenances and implements of each in order to save labor, time and expense. The political change in the administration of government does not affect the progress of the American inventor, who, being on the alert and ready to perceive the existing deficiencies, does not permit the affairs of government to deter him from quickly conceiving the remedy to overcome existing discrepancies. Too great care cannot be exercised in choosing a competent and skillful attorney to prepare and prosecute an application for patent. Valuable interests have been lost and destroyed in innumerable instances by the employment of incompetent counsel, and especially is this advice applicable to those who adopt the "No patent, no pay" system. Inventors who entrust their business to this class of attorneys do so at imminent risk, as the breadth and strength of the patent is never considered in view of a quick endeavor to get an allowance and obtain the fee then due. THE PRESS CLAIMS COMPANY, John Wedderburn, General Manager, 618 F street, N. W., Washington, D. C., representing a large number of important daily and weekly papers, as well as general periodicals of the country, was instituted to protect its patrons from the unsafe methods heretofore employed in this line of business. The said Company is prepared to take charge of all patent business entrusted to it for reasonable fees, and prepares and prosecutes applications generally, including mechanical inventions, design patents, trade-marks, labels, copyrights, interferences, infringements, validity reports, and gives especial attention to rejected cases. It is also prepared to enter into competition with any firm in securing foreign patents.

MANY CREEDS, BUT ALL GLORIFY GOD.

The World's Congresses held during the World's Columbian Exposition were fit auxilliaries to that greatest event of the Nineteenth Century. Among them the was without any doubt the most important of them all.

Parliament of Religions

As Hope Springs Eternal in the Human Breast — So Faith Proclaims Whatever is the Best

Religion prevails, in one form or another, in the whole human family and the interest in it is therefore universal. This was plainly indicated by the extra large audiences which were present at the

and by the undivided attention they received. Thousands of people had their interest aroused but were not able to attend, and in order to scatter the good seed sown, we have arranged to supply the entire proceedings, taken from verbatium reports, which we can offer the public at a phenomenally low cost.

All The Great Religious Minds — from — All The Earth's Remotest Parts attended this congress and fully discussed their various faiths. In the work we offer is given all these discussions in full and they will be found vastly entertaining and instructive. Nearly 100 portraits of prominent speakers who attended this congress will be found in its pages. We shall issue the report of these proceedings in eleven parts, one every week at a cost of only 10 cents for each part.

HOW YOU MAY OBTAIN THIS VALUABLE WORK.

On receipt of ten cents we will send you Part One of the Report of the proceedings of the "Parliament of Religions" (to be completed in 11 weekly parts.) If you are a subscriber, or become such, we will accept One Dollar, (1.00), in full payment, if remitted at once, for the entire series, and will send you the parts as issued weekly, thus saving you the labor and additional expense of remitting for each number separately.

Cut or copy this coupon and send to THE UNION SIGNAL, The Temple, Chicago,

THE VEDA—BRAHMIN'S SACRED BOOK.

It Played a Part in the Recent World's Parliament of Religions.

The Veda is the sacred canon of the Brahmins. It is divided into four collections: (1) the Rig-veda, or love of praise (hymns); (2) the Sama-veda, or love of tunes (chants); (3) the Yajur-veda, or love of prayer, and (4) the Atharva-veda, or love of the Atharvans. Each collection is divided into three parts: (1) the sacred texts (mantra); (2) the ritual (Brahmana) and (3) the philosophical portion (Upanishads). The hymns of the Rig-veda are supposed to have been collected about 1000 B. C. A distinguished Brahmin scholar and philosopher was one of the most interesting of the speakers on the platform of the World's Parliament of Religions. He touched shoulders with Methodist and Moslem, Buddhist and Baptist, Confucian and Catholic, and goodwill and toleration marked the reunion.

All of the delegates spoke in turn, each for his own faith, and the total of their utterances was a most remarkable parliament. Opinions may differ as to the ultimate value of this parliament to the cause of religion, but there is no doubt that the record of the proceedings presents the most valuable compendium of religious thought and history that this century has produced—in no other century would it have been possible.

John G. Whittier, the poet of the people, shortly before his death wrote to a friend: "Nothing more impressive can there be than such an assemblage of the representatives of all the children of our heavenly Father."

The poet referred to the World's Parliament of Religions, which unhappily he did not live long enough to see realized out of the plans which so commanded his approval. Had his life been prolonged the heart of the gentle Whittier would have been moved from the center by the spectacle of all the religious world, with its dissenting and often descendent branches, gathered for once in perfect harmony, bowing each day in invocation of one God, and daily breathing their hopes of religious unity for all the world. Those who attended the congress carried away an impression which will last through their lives.

The less fortunate, who were unable to be present, yet watched the proceedings with keenest interest. In both classes a strong and abiding desire has grown up to have and preserve as a precious possession a permanent record of the proceedings of this wonderful Congress. To meet such a reasonable desire we have secured for our readers an opportunity which they will find described in another page, and of which we apprehend they will not be slow to avail themselves.

Brilliants.

The following series of "Brilliants" are unlike any other devotional books of this nature, in the fact that each volume is profusely illustrated, and is also embellished with a well-executed portrait of the author. The selections are, indeed, brilliants, and have been compiled by Mrs. Alice L. Williams, who had the assistance and advice of the authors. In the preparation of the Brilliants from Frances E. Willard, the author has placed much hitherto unpublished matter at the compiler's disposal.

THE CROSS AND GRAIL. By Lucy Larcom.

The tradition of the removal into Britain by Joseph of Arimathea, of the cup from which our Lord drank at the Last Supper, and the search for it by the Knights of the Round Table is the familiar story out of which the poem grew.

The frontispiece (see cut) represents the knight of old on his quest. The delicate colors seem to harmonize with the words:

"Sometimes, tinged with radiance strange,
Would the beaker seem to change
To the outline of a cross—
Emblem of life's gain in loss;
Glimpsing, fading like a cloud,
As he stood with forehead bowed."

The book contains other poems by Shakespeare, Longfellow, Whittier, Phœbe and Alice Cary. Illustrated by Dora Wheeler.

WHITE RIBBON CALENDAR.

December 18.—Peace Day, to be observed in the interests of national arbitration.

December 23.—Crusade Day, twentieth celebration of the Woman's Crusade, to be observed by a Jubilee Number of THE UNION SIGNAL, and as a membership Crusade day by the local unions.

SINCE OUR LAST ISSUE.

Christian Endeavorers in Illinois met, November 16, at Quincy, and those of Wisconsin gathered at Milwaukee November 17, for their seventh annual meetings, thousands of delegates being in attendance.

Emperor William was given an ovation at the opening of the new Reichstag in Berlin, November 16, and his speech, especially the parts relating to Germany's peace relations, was warmly applauded.

Rev. Dr. Chas. Deems, of the Church of the Strangers, New York, noted for his large spirit, literary labors and useful life, passed away, November 19, at his home in New York, at the ripe age of seventy-three years.

A strike of freight operatives has been instituted this week on the Lehigh Valley road in Pennsylvania, which promises to be far-reaching in its effects, as many thousands of other employés will be thrown out of work by the lack of railroad facilities.

The conference arranged between the mine owners and striking miners of Lancashire and Yorkshire by the Earl of Rosebery resulted in a resolution to establish a board of arbitration which shall govern the wage scale in future. The miners returned to their work Monday, to labor at the old rate until February, 1894.

The preliminary announcement is made November 17 of the formation of a new national organization to unite all moral forces against gambling. Among these who are pledged to help it with all their force, morally and financially, are Bishops Hurst, Vincent and Huntington, Norman B. Eaton, Noah Davis, Rev. Josiah Strong, Rev. A. J. Gordon, Dr. Francis Patton, and others.

The National Reform Association in session at Pittsburg, Pa., last week, in its resolutions, protested against the Wisconsin Supreme Court decision which declares the Bible to be a sectarian book, and its reading in the public schools of the state consequently illegal; and against prohibiting the reading of the Bible in the public schools, as has been done by the clause in the constitution of Iowa, and by the action of many boards of education in Minnesota and other Western states.

OUR readers will remember the charges made against our good brother, John G. Woolley, about two months ago, concerning his Rest Island mission, which he has conducted so unselfishly for the past two and a half years. They will also recall that at public meetings in Minneapolis and Lake City, Mr. Woolley was fully exonerated. Not content with this, however, he requested the examination of his books and vouchers, and a committee of well-known Minnesota men was appointed for this purpose. The report of the committee, recently made, shows that Mr. Woolley has contributed three thousand six hundred and sixty-one dollars of his own personal earnings to the mission, and proves how utterly false were the charges that he had misappropriated the mission funds. Forced by this trouble to break many of his engagements during the fall, Mr. Woolley felt it incumbent upon him to give up his mission and devote himself to the lecture platform for the support of his family. This has been done and he is now fitted better than ever, because untrammeled, to dedicate his eloquent zeal to his specialty—the forum of Christian temperance. Mr. Woolley will remove his family to Chicago and make it the center of his operations.

REJOICING sprang to every true reformer's heart on hearing the glorious news from the Centennial state last week. Bishop Berkeley's stirring lines, "Westward the course of empire takes its way," are again exemplified, and here are the earnest words of Colorado's W. C. T. U. president regarding this splendid result of their equal suffrage campaign: "Before this finds its way to the columns of THE UNION SIGNAL, the world will know that the women of Colorado are free citizens of the Commonwealth. The 7th of November gave a majority of over five thousand in favor of equal suffrage. Already saloon men are saying: 'I told you so. With equal pay for equal work will come prohibition of the liquor traffic. It is the death-knell to our business!' God grant that these predictions may come to pass. Though the state is passing through a trying financial crisis, there is a feeling that the worst is past, and we are now ready to meet the issues of the day. Let white-ribbon women all over the land pray that wisdom and strength may be given us to use this newly acquired power to aid in wiping out these great evils for the well-being of the individual and the glory of the Commonwealth." Now let the Eastern states arise in their might and overcome the powers of prejudice and conservatism.

MASSACHUSETTS has performed many gracious acts towards the W. T. P. A., but this time has eclipsed all others by having Lent(e) us her gifted corresponding secretary, Mrs. Katharine Lente Stevenson, who this week begins her duties as editor of the department of Books and Leaflets. This department was created by our publishing house in 1886, because of the growing demands of our constituency for a larger and more carefully edited class of leaflets and books on current temperance topics. Mrs. Elizabeth Wheeler Andrew was its first editor, and during the two years of her incumbency, so systematized and strengthened the department that it became one of the pillars of our temperance citadel. Upon Mrs. Andrew's resignation, in 1888, Miss Alice M. Guernsey was elected to the position, which she has filled up to the present time. Mrs. Stevenson is so well known to the UNION SIGNAL readers that they will be delighted to learn that she is to be a regular contributing editor to our paper. It is well that a versatile genius is Mrs. Stevenson's, for author, editor, poet and lecturer are all needed in one official at headquarters, and we are glad to have one that "fills the bill" so decidedly. Apropos to changes, we may remark that the name of Miss Jennie A. Stewart will be found among the editors for the first time in this issue. Miss Stewart has virtually occupied the position of associate editor for nearly two years, as well as editing so acceptably the Oak and Ivy Leaf. Miss Ada M. Melville begins her duties as editor of The Young Crusader with the January number, and her little readers may look for a real treat.

Two weeks ago we promised further word from Mrs. Hitchcock, president of the Nebraska W. C. T. U., concerning her investigation of the Osceola "white cap" affair, and we are glad to present her letter in full. She relates: "Upon my return home from Chicago, November 3, I found upon my table many letters of inquiry concerning the alleged outrage said to have been committed by Woman's Christian Temperance Union 'white caps' of Osceola, Nebraska. I thought it necessary to go at once to Osceola and ascertain the facts in the case. I took with me Mrs. S. M. Walker, the state vice-president, and we began the investigation with the following result: After diligent inquiry we find the W. C. T. U. of Osceola had no part or lot in any shape or manner, directly or indirectly, in the matter; had never discussed it in any meeting held by them at any time, and the only excuse any reporter has for implicating the organization is that one of the ladies that belongs to the union is claimed to be one of the 'white caps.' The name of no other member of the union is, or has been, mentioned as in any way associated with the affair, and more than this, a sworn statement of the president and secretary of the W. C. T. U. declares that the union had nothing to do with it. We also learned from the secretary, Mrs. Dr. Shaw, that the union had not been holding meetings for some months until after this malicious attack upon them, when a meeting was called to decide upon what course to pursue in order to defend themselves. The press of Osceola and the citizens of that place have not for one moment claimed it to be the work of the W. C. T. U."

A CURIOUS document lies on our desk. Its heading, or title, or superscription, or whatever the unusual form of address might be called, is the most curious part of the document. It is as follows: "An open Letter to the Members of the Gripsack and Umbrella Brigade of the W. C. T. U. Army." Below is the name of our quondam "friend," James B. Hobbs. We are a little puzzled to know just who are included in this euphonious "brigade." Its designation is so comprehensive that we shudder lest we, too, are addressed, for the guilty articles, "gripsack and umbrella," have we long possessed. But why do we shudder? Perhaps even Mr. Hobbs can have something agreeable to say. We feel a little delicacy in reading the letter, though it has been sent us for perusal, until our eye glances at the sentence, "I would be pleased to have this letter read by all members of the white-ribbon army." That settles it. We would do that much to please Mr. Hobbs, or anybody. We read. We discover that the contents of the letter are nothing new, despite the unique burlesque of a title. It is the same old tirade against the Temple. But we read patiently to the end. Our space and our readers' time are far too valuable to treat this document in full, and there is no need, because the same arguments were made in the recent National Convention and fully answered. But there are two points relating to our paper which we cannot let pass by. 1. Mr. Hobbs says: "I am debarred from THE UNION SIGNAL, as all other opponents of this scheme are, the Temple ring having complete control of its columns." Neither Mr. Hobbs nor any "other opponent" of the Temple has ever offered an article on this subject to THE UNION SIGNAL. Nor has any one ever offered us any contribution unfavorable to the Temperance Hospital or the W. T. P. A. We take this as a high compliment, for it must mean that the editors are known as faithful guardians of all the affiliated interests of the National W. C. T. U. 2. The aggrieved gentleman complains bitterly that his (?) six-column Tribune article of last February did not have a larger circulation. We have reason to know that it was not his fault that it did not. The article was written by a professional reporter, offered in turn to all of the leading Chicago dailies, and contemptuously refused until it secured the fostering influence of Mr. Hobbs, whose name at that time carried some weight, because he was looked upon as a friend of the W. C. T. U. Mrs. Carse was granted the columns of THE UNION SIGNAL in which to defend the Temperance Temple, just as the wife of Mr. Hobbs would be granted space in which to defend the Temperance Hospital, with which she is connected, should it be so mischievously attacked. There are other points in this tiresome "letter" which, to speak mildly, are not based on fact. One of them has been treated by Mrs. Hoffman, whose article will be found on page 13. It is with great regret that we introduce controversy into our columns, for we realize that the official organ of a great body has a much higher mission than that, but we feel it incumbent to notify our constituency, many of whom will doubtless receive this "gripsack" document, that Mr. Hobbs is no longer regarded by those who understand the situation as a friend of the National W. C. T. U., his words and actions not being in harmony with that relationship.

THE FEAST OF INGATHERING.

BY MRS. H. ROSCOE EDGETT.

"The earth is the Lord's
And the fullness thereof;"
His gift every cup
Of delight that we quaff.
Lo! firstlings of flocks,
And first fruits of the field,
And seed-cups, all bursting
With promise fulfilled.
Bring these from the hillside, and meadow and home,
For now is our Feast of Ingathering come.

Best thought of the brain,
Best skill of the hand,
And courage of heart
Break the seals of the land;
And chariots, scythe armed,
Sweep peaceful a-field,
And automaton hands
Bind the plenteous yield.
The sheaf in the garner, the cattle in fold.
Now gladly our Feast of Ingathering we hold.

Oh, wonders of harvest!
Oh, marvels of power!
What wealth of green growth
Had summer for dower!
Oh, people! come up
From cottage and hall,
With banners of boughs
Praise the Maker of all!
Assemble with shouting, and anthem and psalm;
Keep the Feast of Ingathering, with branches of palm!

A GOOD YEAR FOR MERCIES.

BY ELIZABETH CUMINGS.

"If you don't feel like giving money, we can give turkies," said little Mrs. Van Allen, nervously pinching up the bread crumbs near her plate. "We've had a good year for them at least."

"Give turkies for what?" growled Mr. Van Allen in a voice that made his step-daughter rise hastily and hurry to the sink with a second pile of plates. "Turkies is money."

"Yes—of course. I meant for the mercy offering Elder Beebe wants us to make Thanksgiving day."

"Umm!" Every line that could look cross in Mr. Van Allen's face hastened to do so. "With no crops, an' the roan colt gone lame an' sick, an' what potatoes there are a'rottin' like all-possessed, I don't call this a good year for mercies, Mis' Van Allen."

It relieved Axemia Loucks to pump water noisily just then. It saved her from saying aloud what she always felt when Pa Van Allen had one of "his spells," that she was thankful "he wasn't her truly relation." Spite of his faults, which were glaring, Axemia liked his good side, which was, it should be added, very good indeed.

Ordinarily Mrs. Van Allen was too wise to argue. But to so openly proclaim ingratitude seemed to her to invite misfortune, and like many another timid soul, the little woman believed Providence revengeful, so, forgetful of the experience gathered while living with Ephraim Loucks, and later with her present husband, she said, tremulously: "Why, Nicholas, we might be worse off, and you know yourself the people on the Flats must be helped somehow."

"We'd be worse off if I hadn't a worked like a catamount," snapped Mr. Van Allen, rising. "Them Flats folks can 'tend to their own apple sass. If the men drink up all they can earn it ain't my lookout if they don't have all the fixin's to eat." Then, pushing his hat firmly down on his head, he strode out and slammed the door emphatically behind him. "Your Pa Van Allen has had a good deal to try him this year," said the mother after an interval, during which Axemia washed dishes with unnecessary haste. "After the pickle fact'ry man had bargained to take the whole crop, it was discouragin' to have the cucumber vines wilt up an' blight as if fire'd struck 'em, and I must say myself that if on'y one tree in the whole orchard's to bear, I shouldn't a chosen the gilly flower."

"I don't s'pose we'll have any Thanksgivin' at all now," said Axemia, intent on her own grievances. "F'my part I shouldn't have the face to go to meetin' without a sign of an offering."

"Well, may be you won't have to," said Mrs. Van Allen, with an attempt at hopefulness. "Thanksgiving isn't here. Of course we'll have the usual dinner, and Roger'll be home."

"Goodie! goodie! goodie!" cried a merry little girl who had just come in, "I love to have Roger home." "So der I," clamored the little boy who pushed after her, much occupied with a basket of eggs and his nose. At his heels wriggled a nondescript dog that, wishing to attract public notice, barked briskly, and then, abashed and certain he would be sent into the wood-house, rushed behind the stove and made himself as small as possible.

"Ma, Dicky Beebe says Auntie Hull is sick—awful bad," continued the boy after a clearing-up snuffle. "He says his mother staid there all last night."

"I wish you'd let us go down to see her with a basket of eggs," said the little girl. "I like Auntie Hull."

"So der I," echoed the boy, unwinding his muffler.

"I guess," said Axemia, who had put a stout maple stick on either side of the oven, "that you twins had better toast your feet, or you'll have to take croup medicine for going out in this fog. Much comfort you'd be to Auntie Hull if she's sick."

"I suppose I ought to go right off and see her," said Mrs. Van Allen, who had gone to one of the wide windows and was trying to look into the mist. "She's one of the kind that would need everything and not say a word, and this sort of air is dreadful for the tisic. I've talked 'round time and again about having her come here, but I s'pose Pete's being so shiftless has set your Pa Van Allen against him, and, of course, to have one would be to have the other."

"I'm the one to go, mother," said Axemia, decisively. "You've got too much rheumatism for this wet."

It was an old-fashioned kitchen, spacious and convenient. The blue paint glistened, for it was of excellent quality. The range was of the best make, and had nickel trimmings. An open door revealed that the sitting-room had a heating apparatus equally costly, and that the bookcase was full of books and the rack full of papers. If Axemia was sometimes rebellious over the age of the beautiful old yarn carpet, and the queerness of the long-legged chest of drawers, she admitted that when her step-father bought new things he chose the best. A Western man would think little of the Van Allen farm. Stone fences shut it in. The house and barn had been built of stone. In some of the fields were huge cairns, but there were no end of stones left, a fact which gave rise, perhaps, to the legend that the Adversary, when flying over the region, broke his apron-string. But spite of the stones, fruit and vegetables of the best quality rewarded the careful farmer, and the creamery paid a gilt-edged price for the milk from the Van Allen cows. There was not only a neat spring wagon in the carriage house, but a buggy and a two-seated surrey, and Mr. Van Allen not only loaned money on occasions, but when his family entered the Corners meeting-house, there was always a twisting of heads, for they dressed well.

Perhaps, when a man usually free-handed has a poor and penurious streak, he feels very poor. It certainly was the case with Mr. Van Allen. He had felt abused and cheated the whole season through, as one crop after another failed, and at times, when pinched by rheumatism, he felt abused that his oldest son, the child of his first wife, should have inherited the tastes of his grandfather and taken to boats and the water instead of sticking to the farm. He had wanted to enter the navy, had Roger, but his father had opposed him so fiercely he had yielded. "Guns and water together are too much," the father had urged. "Your mother didn't leave me any other children, and if you must go on water stick to the lakes; land isn't so far off around them," he added with a shudder, for even the canal made him ill. In vain old Cap'n Jimmy Tubbs tried to explain the superior safety of the ocean. Mr. Van Allen would have none of it, and now at thirty Roger was master of a fast freight boat between Oswego and Duluth, and on his last trip he had taken with him his cousin, Pete Hull, who had proven himself an inefficient dry-goods clerk, and then a dunce in a doctor's office. Something must be made out of Pete for his mother's sake, for her fortune was lost in Western mortgages, and she had been compelled to move from her comfortable home to a cheap house on the flats, the poor quarter of South Smyrna Corners.

Axemia prepared to set forth on her errand of mercy to Auntie Hull, alone and on foot; but if Mr. Van Allen was subject to what his wife called "spells," he also had plenty of sympathy, and coming from attendance upon the roan colt just in time to intercept her, he insisted on taking her in the buggy, "for," said he, unconscious that he was destroying the generous look of the offer, "I want to go to Oswego and learn if there is any news of the 'General.' I kinder looked for Roger last night. He was due the eighteenth."

"It's terrible weather for them who go down to the sea in ships," gasped Mrs. Hull, who was in a paroxysm of asthma. "I cannot help remembering how my Uncle Tom was lost in a fog."

"Oh that was way out at sea," interposed Mr. Van Allen quickly, but the words stung into him as he went over the hills, his mare Peggy compelled to take slowly the gummy red clay. News of the "General" there were none. But two boats had met with disaster somewhere in Lake Huron, and the old hangers-on about the docks assured him there hadn't been such weather for shipping, "since the year one." As Peggy nipped homeward and the drip of the mist chilled her owner to the marrow, and the hoarse notes of the boat whistles croaked landward, as of scared creatures in peril, memory stirred in Nicholas Van Allen, and recalled the time when Mrs. Hull was young and pretty with eight children about her knees. She was not only the sister of Roger's mother, but a cousin of his second wife. If now she was a mournful woman, inclined to look upon the dark side, was it wonderful? And how was she to get on alone in her poor home on the Flats among all sorts of people different from herself? She had never asked any favors, or seemed to need help, but she was certainly lone and lorn, and if, in spite of himself the thought would word itself, if anything should happen to Roger, and the twins, and their mother, and Axemia, how would he himself be? Why should he expect to be more fortunate than his sister-in-law?

The Van Allen house was large. There was the south room in which his father's sister, Ruth, had lived as long as he could remember. Her father had willed her the room, and it stood just as she had left it, furnished with quaint old things, pretty and comfortable. He had thought vaguely that perhaps when the twins were grown and were married, he and his wife might retreat to that room. But the twins were only seven, and he was fifty-seven. It would only cost the coal. But coal was seven dollars a ton. He was glad when he reached the Flats to find a neighbor had volunteered to spend the night with Mrs. Hull, and that she seemed easier.

In the morning it was foggier than ever, and the roan colt's lameness was no better. He told his wife he would get old Jabez Debs to come and see the beast, but he put off going until almost noon, and then hurried off saying he did not feel like dinner. Not finding Debs at home he went on to the Flats. Mrs. Hull was laboriously wheezing over a smudging fire, and the picture of her desolation went with her visitor all the way over the bleak road to the city. Still no news. It was, Mr. Van Allen told himself, of a piece with the rest of the summer. Two days went by, for in spite of fog the minutes go. The "General's" owners had grown very anxious, and it seemed to Nicholas Van Allen he had lost the power to sleep, so full was he of a dull misery of expectation. But a man who spends his life in the fields has too much healthy blood in him to be worried out of rest completely, and he was in a slumber so profound not even Blink's sharp yelps of joy roused him, when very early on Thanksgiving a rattling of the door was followed by the cheery call of, "Here we are, safe and hearty!"

"We run aground in Lake Erie, sir," Roger exclaimed, sitting on the edge of the bed and holding his father's hand. "You see there's danger when the land is too handy, and we didn't get off sooner on account of the fog, and that we did in time to make home to-day is due to cousin Pete's cleverness. He's found his berth at last, sir. Pete's born for the water."

Elder Beebe couldn't believe his eyes, and rubbed his spectacles carefully and looked again. Yes, there it was plain, $50—"For plentious mercies," and signed, "Nicholas Van Allen and family." "It must ha' been a dreadful good year fur mercies his way," commented Deacon Peabody reflectively, rubbing his stubby beard up toward his nose. "His roan colt is dead, an' he didn't git a good price fur his hay; but aside frum this he's been an got old Marm Hull into that south room fixed fur the winter, an' I guess to stay. I s'pose he knows what he can afford."

"He knows his mercies evidently," said the minister briefly.

OUR COUNTRY IN DANGER.

BY W. JENNINGS DEMOREST.

It ought to be known, and recognized as a self-evident fact, that the liquor traffic is the great source and cause of our present labor and financial troubles. This, its culminating atrocity, should rouse all right-thinking men and women to determined action. This traffic in alcoholic poisons certainly has become a terrible gorgon of evil to the entire world, and covers our whole civilization with a black cloud of business uncertainty, crime, and misery, blighting the community with a paralysis which blocks the wheels of trade, interrupts and crushes progress among artisans, laborers, farmers, and prostrates all mercantile pursuits, producing stagnation and distrust, mournful uncertainty, and almost despair.

UNIVERSAL DEPRESSION.

And this terrible depression is not confined to a few isolated cases; it includes every vocation, every class, and every trade. In fact, all the business interests of the country are suffering from enforced idleness; mills, foundries, and work-shops are closed, mining operations suspended, merchants, banks, and institutions of trust and responsibility,—all are suffering from great loss and depression.

DESPOTIC POWER IN THE WAY.

Besides all this, a powerful despotism, operating through these liquor dealers, unparalleled for its awful duplicity, now rules the land for the protection of this monster curse; and although comprising but a small fraction of the people, this cabal of liquor dealers, through its chosen mercenary leaders, now controls the two dominant political parties, and governs the people with a rod of iron. It is this injurious and despicable class-legislation which is responsible for this panic of financial distress.

CRIMINAL TENDENCIES.

Most of the fearful amount of crime, unrest, and depression can be very easily traced to the criminal tendencies of this traffic; and the enormous consumption of the wages of labor, resulting in poverty and the exhaustion of the resources of the people that this traffic occasions, is not less than one thousand millions of dollars! A safe and recent estimate gives this as the amount spent directly for alcoholic liquors, and another thousand millions is expended to take care of its awful consequences.

RELIEF MUST COME.

To secure any permanent relief, a practical and speedy suppression of this terrible incubus on labor and capital must be the demand of an exasperated and injured people; and just as soon as it becomes known that voters are aroused and determined in their efforts to suppress and destroy this monster—the liquor traffic—almost instantaneously shall we see manifested a revival of trade everywhere.

A REVIVAL IN BUSINESS.

A consciousness among the people that the two thousand millions now spent by them, to their loss and injury, would be thrown into the regular and productive channels of trade would make such a boom in our industries as to startle the world with its magnitude and cause the other interests of the country, however important, to sink into insignificance when compared with it. These results are not dependent or based upon mere chimerical or problematic conjecture, but are the natural results of natural causes, just as certain and inevitable as cause and effect in science and philosophy.

A BOOM IN TRADE.

With this enormous amount of money left in the hands of the people to be distributed for their benefit, and thereby relieve them from the burden of loss that the liquor traffic occasions, a more hopeful feeling would immediately take possession of our business relations, reviving confidence and commercial prosperity, setting the wheels of industry revolving with renewed activity, and the whole country, with its labor, capital, machinery and enterprise would be actively engaged in a healthy rivalry to supply the demands and wants of a successful, joyous and prosperous community.

These two thousand millions spent for legitimate purposes would also stimulate activity on all other popular and important questions bearing on the material interests of the country, to find their solution in a just, healthy and speedy adjudication.

THE REASON AND THE REMEDY.

No intelligent observer can fail to see that the liquor traffic acts as a treacherous and a tremendous barrier to prosperity, and a terrible incubus on all healthy enterprise. A wholesome competition is the most effective motive power for awakening enterprise, and enterprise is the life-blood, bone and sinew of all active and successful business; but the devitalizing gangrene of this poison of alcohol now permeates and injures every department of society, its enormous drain and injury depresses enterprise, producing a terrible burden of loss, criminal tendencies, and a widespread insecurity in all business relations.

STRINGENT MEASURES REQUIRED.

The direful results of this nefarious business of liquor selling, therefore, must be looked upon and treated as a condition, not a theory; and this condition can only be met with the most radical and stringent measures for its destruction.

We must have a moral cyclone of determined energy to overcome apathy and secure practical morality in politics, as the most essential feature of this revolution.

We must have an integrity of purpose that will overcome all obstacles of a diabolical and purely selfish nature, like the liquor traffic, and we can only succeed in proportion as we adhere to the inexorable decrees of moral ethics applied to all our business relations. This is especially true where we can make influence and action most effective at the ballot-box.

This just and logical argument against the lawless nature of this legalized oppression, the liquor traffic, is to be the inspiration for our political opposition, the basis of a determined political war on this concentrated essence of crime and idleness.

LAW AND JUSTICE.

Since the rights of labor, the claims of humanity, our homes, our industries, and all our moral, material, and religious interests are demanding immediate relief from this criminal business, our contention for law and justice, and our moral and political warfare on this terrible crime of liquor selling, must be based on a conviction of its cruel and crushing effects on enterprise, its depressing effects on labor and capital, and a full realization of its injurious, immoral, crime-producing tendency generally.

WILLIAM STEAD'S "MIXED" DOCTRINE.

BY H. B. KELLS.

"Good morning, Mr. Stead. It is very kind of you to allow THE UNION SIGNAL to interrupt your breakfast."

William Stead, the great editor and reformer, sat flicking off small bits of toast in the Auditorium Annex Café about half-past nine o'clock. At one side of the table sat Wm. C. Jaxon, the Indian; "been waiting on me since eight o'clock," said Mr. Stead. On his right hand was a representative of the World's Fair, wanting "views," and beyond him was a callow youth, with very light hair and eyes, very English in appearance, whose office seemed to be to smile with great gusto as the most sensational man in two continents, on November 13, sky-rocketed colossal inconsistencies between his mouthfuls of toast. Mr. Stead reached out a hand that grasped mine warmly; drawing up a chair for me close to him, he said: "Now, you want to ask me about what I said yesterday?"

"Certainly I do; it was very startling."

"Well, it was reported about right in the papers, but you know I'm a friend to your cause. I'm a total abstainer; have been all my life. I don't believe, though, it is a mortal sin to take a glass of wine or beer. You Prohibitionists do. I've often talked it over with Miss Willard, and she knows I don't agree with her on that point. I think this; however, personally, I am a non-patron of the saloon and the theatre, they are here, and will remain here till long after you and I are dead. The only corporation fitted to regulate them and use them for Christ is the church. I believe the church should assume control of them, for it will take a mighty lot more of grace than is easily found to do anything with them. You'll have to bring the saloon-keeper into the council. I talked with one of them yesterday—a good man—yes, a good man. He talked sense. He said: 'It is true there's a great deal of wrong goes on in the saloons of Chicago; there are too many of them in the first place; they should be reduced from six thousand to two thousand five hundred, then they could be kept orderly and under decent regulations. I would insure that no man drank too much, that the saloon was not the doorway for a brothel upstairs and for a gambling room on one side; there should be no prostitution or gambling connected with it, and the law that it should be closed at midnight and on Sunday should be rigidly enforced.' Now, I think with that man, and the church should see to it that this is done; but you Prohibitionists won't have it."

"You don't think, Mr. Stead, that the saloon is a promoter of religion?"

"No; but the saloon is here and you Prohibitionists won't let anything be done with it; you are the strongest ally of the saloon—and brothel—because in your efforts to abolish it you band together against you all its friends, and what laws you have caused to be made are not enforced."

"We must make also the enforcer of the law?"

"Ah! when?"

"Don't you believe, Mr. Stead, in the power and possibility of education; that the church can be educated to create the enforcer of law?"

"Yes; but in the meantime you must band together the church and the saloon to do the best that can be done to improve it now. For every saloon the church must offset ten places for harmless social gathering of men and women; they must have innocently what the saloon supplies wickedly."

"What do you think is the present status of the temperance cause in America?"

"I cannot tell; have seen too little of this country to form an opinion. But I do think of all the idiots the world has ever seen the political temperance man of England is the most idiotic."

"What force seems to be moving most powerfully for our cause here?"

He smiled shrewdly, as if to say, "She thinks I'm going to say the W. C. T. U.," and then replied thoughtfully: "The education of the child at its mother's knee; yes, after all it's the woman," and his eyes sought mine gently and kindly as a mother's. "You know how I feel about woman?"

"Yes, I know you are the strongest champion of her cause in the world," remembering what he had said a few hours before:

"There is another feature which, perhaps, will surprise you. I do not intend to employ a single man on my paper in any post, from the highest to the lowest, unless I have previously satisfied myself that I cannot find a woman who will do the job. My reason for doing that is that nearly every newspaper office in the country is run upon an exactly opposite principle, and I think that so far as I can in my little way I shall try to redress this injustice so as to do as much as one man can do to make the balance even. Of course I am well aware that for many duties in a newspaper press I shall have to employ men. Women are not trained to them, and one must have experience as well as other good qualities; but I shall follow that principle out unflinchingly. If I could I would not only have my paper written by women, but composed by women and printed by women. I would have my women driving the news-carts that distribute the papers to the various news agencies. Women can do very nearly everything that men can do, and a good many things that men cannot do; there is nothing that I should enjoy starting the paper more for than in order to give woman a fair chance to see what she can do. At the same time let me say that I absolutely and entirely disapprove of any one-legged show, as I call it, and I detest any institution, whether it be a club, or a legislature, or a public meeting, or a newspaper office, that is run exclusively by persons of one sex. The human race is composed of both sexes, and every institution which endeavors to represent that race ought to give equal representation to each of the sexes."

He continued: "Now don't think I am not in sympathy with your cause. I am a temperance man and total abstainer, but I don't like your methods. I want you to know I'm a friend and to believe it," and he gave me an eager, sweet smile and a hand-clasp that I knew were equally for the woman and the "temperance fanatic." So I left him with a feeling of brotherliness, not often stirred in a heart by a few minutes' conversation, but saying to myself: "Is it possible that great-souled man, with the humane in every intonation of his sympathetic voice, with his wonderful capacities and intentions for serving the suffering world has become a little 'off' in his upper story!" and the pyramidal Pelion-on-Ossa inconsistencies and antagonisms of his opinions and self-sacrificing daily life left this woman as empty of a desire for discussion with him as for argument with Mt. Blanc or the Sphynx.

All the world knows Mr. Stead's stupendous labors, persecution and imprisonment which resulted in the repeal of the infamous C. D. acts for the British empire by the English parliament. Yet, after exposing the brothel, as no other one man on earth has done, knowing that prostitution is absolutely dependent on alcohol for its continuance, that the saloon and the brothel are inseparable, he would "regulate" the traffic that supports the infamy which he was and is willing to lay down his life to exterminate.

With Cyclopean blows and thunder he fights the battle for justice to women and the obliteration of the sex-line in human institutions. Yet, he would perpetuate by Christian (?) "regulation" the institution which of all others on earth is most brutal to woman and child, which is most insulting and ribald toward her, which beats and starves and outrages her and her children, and destroys off the face of the earth everything sacred to her well-being.

To build up the church he would take into its councils the very adversary it is organized to destroy. Did two opposing armies ever thus confer? The "shalt not" of the Decalogue; there can be "no fellowship with the works of darkness"; the only formula for the extinction of evil—the substitution of good—seem to have escaped Mr. Stead's observation. If the saloon-keeper he would have the church take counsel of is "good," his business is as anarchistic and life-destroying in the social order as the deadly bomb, and conducted on the purely selfish motive of greed. "A ring for Christ" formed of the church and the saloon brings chaos back in the very thought.

His attempt to call together in Chicago the forces that make for righteousness and those whose "feet take hold on death," the oppressor and the oppressed, the "bloated bondholder" and the "cellar rat," the employer and the unemployed, the Christian "homesteader" and the tramp, labor and capital, the anarchist and the law, was no doubt well-meant but ill-advised and dangerous, judging from the demagogical, anarchistic and erratic utterances for which his meetings at Central Music Hall on Sunday, November 12, were responsible.

That the kingdom of Christ was advanced is so remotely possible the church will doubtless have forgotten the eccentric and unholy alliance Mr. Stead proposes for it before the least dust of good from this gathering of incongruities is thrown off the wheels of progress.

Fewer hours for work, a sharing of labor in the dividends it produces, death to the saloon, should be the slogan of the church; then would it have less vice to conquer and those helped would have time and heart to love the church, to see the Christ it upholds, and whom Mr. Stead is honestly trying to uplift to the world.

It will probably take Chicago a long time to realize the help Mr. Stead meant by his visit. He is too well known to need such wild sensationalism as an advertisement for the great historical newspaper he hopes to establish. He has been the synonym for strength in the American mind. Hereafter he will stand for the inconsistent, the meteor that flashes and explodes and brings up—God knows where.

But the keenest surprise and disappointment is to the American temperance people who have loved him as a friend, yet find themselves obliged to defend their lives from the liquor traffic's weapons in his irresponsible hands. His visit would be an irreparable evil were it not that his revolutionary incoherencies have destroyed his influence in America as a practical reformer.

COLORADO'S NEW CITIZENS.

BY MARY JEWETT TELFORD.

The sun of Colorado looks down this morning upon one hundred and sixty-six thousand "females" promoted from impersonal "idiots, criminals, etc." to the dignity of enfranchised citizens. From snow-draped mountain ranges and warm valleys, from beautiful city, rough mining camp and isolated ranch goes up a devout jubilate. What hath God wrought?

So strong was the pressure brought to bear upon the framers of our state constitution in 1875-6, that although the majority opposed dropping the word "male" out of that document, it was thought wise to leave it optional with any coming legislature to submit the question to a mere majority vote. Those were historic days. The minority report sent in to that constitutional convention contained all the logic there was, of course, since even Rocky Mountain lawyers have never been able to find any logic on the other side—only expediency.

Grand Lucy Stone came to us then, and at Denver polling places on election day shared the contumely heaped by a raving few upon some of the best women any new or old state ever knew. Dear Lucy Stone! Her mother-face let the calm, assured soul shine right through it. What mattered misrepresentation since right was right? Our own Mary F. Shields went through our state then for the first time—the only resident woman who knew she had a voice. She plainly, pointedly, gave the reasons of the hope that was in her upon woman's political equality. When, three years later, she was elected as Colorado's W. C. T. U. first president, she never lost sight of the duty of every state to free all its citizens, and much of the sentiment here upon this topic is due to her and a few other white-ribbon early workers.

Through this fall's campaign, as a member of both organizations, I have found very little difference of either method or result between W. C. T. U. and Equal Suffrage workers. Both have been indefatigable. In the main, both have been tolerant. Both have talked and written upon the pure merits of the case. Beginning in late August, a few speakers from the outside have been brought in, notably Mrs. Carrie Lane Chapman, whose fairness, calmness, judgment and good sense have everywhere made converts of the undecided and harmonious workers—all possessed of the one idea. Mrs. Jenkins, of Wyoming, Mrs. Marble of New Mexico, and Mrs. Barry-Lake, of St. Louis, added their weight, and Mrs. Fessenden, of Massachusetts, did only good in the little time she was here.

Professional men have the credit of being conservative in all such movements. For five months our ministers, doctors and lawyers have seemed almost a unit in our favor. In the four months I was out in the state, only one minister with whom I came in contact was opposed to the measure, and he, dear man, after praying with due caution for me and the general work I represented, considerately packed his valise and went back visiting to New England. In one week, in northern Colorado, I remember pastors of six different denominations taking animated part in our meetings.

If this were true of the first three professions, what shall I say of the journalists? Counting out all party bias, the reputable journals of the entire state opened their columns for the best that could be written or reported. No petty sneers, at least not one later than September first, in any newspaper laying claim to decency. This fact was brought out in bold relief, when the Brewers' Association put in their "best licks" at the last. Earlier, there was a canvass of the saloons of the state, and even here, we are told, the vote was not a unanimous "no." But the week before election the state of the enemy became desperate. They came out in an unsigned circular, hailing from no printing house, and frankly saying that "the attitude of the press leaves those not in favor no other way of reaching the people except by a general distribution of these circulars." The document frantically warned all men who loved their homes, families and personal liberties against such "female agitators" as Mesdames Lease, Gouger, Anthony and Willard. It further enlarged upon the disaster of municipal suffrage in Kansas, wailed over its results in Utah, and avowed that in Wyoming it had only engaged "women in packing caucuses, primaries and conventions—in lowering women to the depths of all that low politics implies."

At the last, not half a dozen counties in the state voted against the measure. These were largely peopled by Mexicans, many of whom are not certain whether they live in Colorado or old Spain, and who could not be expected to believe in woman's capability to govern herself.

At the polls, on November 7, there was no concerted action among the women. In very few places were women seen. Where it was deemed wise, a line of chairs kept up the skirmish line, and printed reasons were handed voters at the one hundred feet limit from the polling places. Generally there was little electioneering. The work was done before.

And now great is the joy of all the people. Let Kansas and New York take courage and come on! There is reason to be both glad of the result and proud of the men who voted it in. They have risen above prejudice and petty jealousy into the clear regions of fairness and honor. They have shown true wisdom, too. The political, social and financial conditions here are quite as unsettled as in the East, and the introduction of this better element into politics, at least, will be for the universal good. This is surely another long stride towards the general enfranchisement of the unrepresented sex, and the dawn when humanity, as one, shall "advance on chaos and the dark."

SPRINGS OF ENERGY.

BY LILIAN WHITING.

"Omit the negative propositions. Nerve us with incessant affirmatives."—Emerson.

[It is related of Miss Lilian Whiting, that coming some years ago to a large city, and desiring to enter active journalism, she was received at a daily newspaper office after this fashion. The proprietor assured her that he had tried half a dozen women and had not liked any of them—and didn't want a woman 'round his office, anyway.

"Yes, but you have not tried me," said Miss Whiting. This dash of audacity seemed to arouse the man's respect, for she went to work, and in two weeks was a regular editorial staff member, which place she filled with successive promotions until she resigned it for another nine years after.

This experience must have inspired Lilian Whiting's wonderfully uplifting article, given with so much power, beauty and good sense in Worthington's Magazine, as follows:—EDS.]

"Because one's predecessor, or a thousand predecessors have failed, is no argument at all that he will continue the record. It is worse than idle to assure young people that it is useless for them to undertake a given enterprise, as so many persons have already undertaken the same work and have not succeeded, for what does this prove, indeed, save that the right person had not yet arrived? The hour and the hero had not met. The magic combination was still to be effected. A human being is not a machine whose precise working mechanism can be predicted. The very elements that make one's possibilities of achievement beyond the pale of exact prediction, are the elements that make possible all greatness of expectation and all confidence in the new creation to be evolved. All logic is false that does not take into account the element of the unknown. We live by faiths and not by exact knowledge. We live not by what we are, but by that which we long to be, and he who allows himself to be discouraged by the preceding failures of other people, lacks fidelity to his own ideal and is disobedient unto the heavenly vision. In mechanism, precedent may rule; in human life, it is individuality which determines success or failure. A thousand may fall by thee and ten thousand at thy right hand, but the pestilence shall not come nigh thee. Nine persons may utterly fail in a given project, while the tenth shall bring with him the power to unite such conditions as make a triumphant and joyful success. Neither the precedence of defeat or of triumph is an augury of the continuance of either, with a series of persons who take up the same work. For life is not automatic, and therefore cannot repeat the results under the new conditions generated by each person.

"The truth is, that each person who undertakes any enterprise sets in motion a train of activities and influences that are his alone by virtue of his own temperament and individuality. Except in the most mechanical industries, no one ever finds a place—one makes a place. The opportunity for making it he must seek—but the place itself he must make. He creates it out of the invisible forces on the other side of life; by faith, and hope, and belief, and aspiration, and love. The actual doing of the specific work, per se, is but one of the causes that unite to build up success. It is certainly essential that the bookkeeper shall understand his work, shall keep his accounts correctly, that his books shall accurately represent the financial condition of the house. Yet this is not all. Beyond the limits of the actual and the visible work there is the vast and potent kingdom of invisible influences whose character is all-determining on his outward work. Accordingly, as he allies himself with that train of spiritual forces which make for the upward or the downward—is his work eventually fated to succeed, or fated to fail. Mr. Lowell suggests this profound truth of spiritual philosophy in the lines:

"'We see but half the causes of our deeds,
Seeking them wholly in the outward life,
And heedless of the encircling spirit world
Which, though unseen, is felt; and sows in us
All germs of pure and world-wide purposes."

It is the habitual mental atmosphere in which one lives, then, that predetermines all that peace, progress and prosperity that we name success. If one wishes to succeed in the market-place to-morrow, let him lay the sure and lasting foundations of that success this evening, alone in his own room, by coming into sympathetic relations with the higher forces; by getting into the current of spiritual magnetism; by entering into the World Beautiful. Let him forgive; not hold malice, or even hold the remembrance of evil; let him love and not hate, nor even be amicably indifferent, for love is the one great motor, the positive, all-dominating force that moves the world. Let him gain that mental attitude that shall say: "I desire not only nor merely remunerative employment and pleasant conditions for my own life; I desire to be a link in the chain of these conditions to carry them out and extend them in the lives of others; I desire to carry about with me the atmosphere of cheerfulness, and worthy aspiration, and gladness; to add what I may of greatness and glow to the lives of those with whom I come in contact." In mental states such as this lie the germs which spring up and blossom as successful endeavor. In these lie the springs of energy.

"'Show me the woman who does not believe she has any mission, and I will show you a candidate for Bedlam,' said Harriet Martineau, in reply to a question as to whether she believed in women who claimed such responsibilities. And she was quite right. A human being without a purpose is as hopeless an object as a ship without a rudder. When Dante, meeting Virgil, in the shades, was told of his high mission and disclaimed it, Virgil replied: 'Thy soul is afflicted with vileness.' The words stand eternally true. Any soul that does not hold that it was sent into this world to engage in high purposes is 'afflicted with vileness.'

"It is a great stronghold of power for an individual to believe in himself; to hold fast to his convictions and not to be discouraged by the conclusions of experience more extended than his own. This is much easier in early youth than in later years. As we live on we inevitably acquire new standards of measurement, and testing ourselves by these, seeing about us those whose original gifts are finer than our own; to whom better circumstances and opportunity have perhaps been given, one cannot retain that belief in his own powers that he holds easily in a more limited knowledge of life. But this is of less than no importance if he but transmute the faith in his own powers to faith in a high destiny, and thus redeem it from the personal to the universal.

"Just here, however, one curious little paradox reveals itself—that much fairly acceptable work in the world is done by people of whom one might say that they do not know enough not to do it. That is to say, they have no measuring standard that enables them to realize how much better it has been done before, or how much better it might be done by other people. As Henry James said of his heroine, Miriam, in "The Tragic Muse," that "she had nothing to do but to succeed." She was so isolated from the social world, so unknown, so unknowing, that she was hampered by no traditions, fettered by no invisible ties.

"There is certainly something finer in one's putting forth what energies he has, even if not very impressive in quantity or quality, than there is in standing afar and making no effort. Because one cannot sing like Patti, or play like Paderewski, shall we therefore have no music? It is the souls pauperized by inaction that we may dread, whether our own or other people's; not those that are gaining the expansion and the education of development through worthy effort. The critical fastidiousness whose only logical sequence is inertia, because, indeed, its standard is too high, its conception too lofty to be attained, is far less valuable to the world than less criticism and more conviction. It is the positive effort that wrests from the spiritual forces the springs of renewed energy. The active worker is far more valuable than the dilettante.

"Yet fed from the springs of energy, this higher taste, this more cultivated standard, had produced the nobler work. But the soul that holds not this fidelity to purpose, this consciousness of individual responsibility, is "afflicted with vileness." Purpose is more important than performance, for purpose is the Ideal of life and performance only the effort to realize in outward form that Ideal, and must thus, by its very nature, be liable to crudeness and imperfection.

"Never should the fact that one person has failed deter another from entering on the same work. The Greek poet, Theocritus, embodies this truth in the subtle significance of these lines:

"'A shipwrecked sailor, buried on this coast,
Bids you set sail;
Full many a gallant ship when we were lost
Weathered the gale.'

"In the World Beautiful are all the springs of resistless energy. Here lie the infinite resources of life. All real achievement is accomplished in the silent and solitary hours. It is the modeling in thought in the realm of ideas, as the sculptor models in clay; and as his image is afterward chiseled out of marble, or cast in bronze, but his real work done in the silent hours,—so with all the plans and projects of life. Moulded in the Ideal, they are cast in the Actual.

"The working capital of life is energy, and energy in its supremest form is love. So much good-will, so much force. So much positive sweetness and generous purpose, so much power to work. So much love, so much energy.

"It is love that nerves us with incessant affirmations. The moment we admit into our minds the carping, the fretful, the uncharitable moods, that moment we disintegrate our force. We unnerve ourselves. Sidney Smith wisely said that if he wanted to punish an enemy, he would fasten on him the trouble of perpetually hating somebody. All of us who have had moods or moments of hatred realize how it is its own punishment. Envy, malice, or uncharitableness, each creates its own Hades, and shatters all efficient working energy. The spring of performance, the motor for all achievement, lies in the love and joy and peace that is the atmosphere gained from dwelling in direct relation with the Holy Spirit."

KEEP TO THE W. C. T. U. NON-SECTARIAN CREED.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—It was with deep regret that I read in THE UNION SIGNAL of October 26, an editorial paragraph treating of the overflow meeting in the Hall of Columbus, in which it is stated that "an unusual, but beautiful, feature of the exercises was the baptism of the two little daughters of a white-ribboner by Dr. Anna Shaw. Their mother had set her heart on their being baptized by a white-ribbon woman, and seized the auspicious opportunity. They were named Frances Anna and Mary."

I want to ask, through THE UNION SIGNAL, if it is in keeping with the non-sectarian attitude of the W. C. T. U. to perform in its meetings a church ordinance concerning which there is diversity of opinion among various Christian denominations. Should some sister desire immersion of a white-ribboner would our National Convention be the place for its administration? How do you suppose this would affect those of our number who belong to the sect of "Friends"?

Baptism is a church ordinance, and I feel sure that Miss Willard would not let enthusiasm run away with judgment by yielding to a request begotten by the former unregulated by the latter. In Australia we had a similar case, but never repeated. It was also suggested at one of the conventions that it should close with the Lord's Supper. This was soon shown to be not in harmony with our non-sectarian principles, and the ill advice was not adopted.

Thanking you, in anticipation, for the publication of this letter, I am yours for the old landmarks,

MARY M. LOVE.

TO THE RESCUE OF IOWA.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—The vote cast on the 7th of November by the Republican and Democratic parties in Iowa is already claimed by the saloon oligarchy as an almost unanimous demand of the people for the repeal of the prohibitory law. If that assumption is not challenged and rebuked in the most emphatic manner, the repeal of the law by the legislature, which meets early in January, may be confidently predicted.

We positively assert that tens of thousands of men cast their ballots for Jackson or for Boise solely on account of so-called national issues, who would now gladly sign a protest against the repeal of the law; these, if enumerated with the Prohibition and Populist party voters, would comprise a majority of the citizens of the state, who should manfully sustain the weak Prohibition majority in one branch of the legislature. Would not the Prohibition party of Iowa, which has just made a gallant fight and splendid gains, prove recreant to duty if it failed to step to the front and champion the cause of the people as against the saloon forces, who are now glorying over their apparently overwhelming victory?

Iowa Prohibitionists will not falter in this perilous hour—but we dare not hope for success without the aid of our friends abroad. Repeal Prohibition in Iowa and the cause in every state is weakened and the enemy strengthened, and shouts of ribald victory will go up from every saloon and its supporters in the country.

Our purpose is to place several speakers in the state at large and one or more workers in each of our ninety-nine counties, to hold meeting in every village and school district to arouse the Christian and public conscience, to solicit every voter to sign a protest against repeal, to distribute literature, showing the fallacy of local option, license or mulct as a restrictive measure and a step toward prohibition in a prohibition state, of which many of our citizens are not well informed. A few speakers are already engaged, and will begin work at once. Many more efficient and consecrated workers are needed.

To meet the great expense of this undertaking we look for help from Prohibitionists in all the states. The perils of delay cannot be written or spoken. Will you not rally to our help and partake with us of the joys of victory? Remittances made to the treasurer of the state committee, R. M. Dihel, Washington, Ia., will be promptly acknowledged and the funds honestly and judiciously applied. The press friendly to this movement will please solicit and receive funds for our urgent needs.

Hopefuly yours,

ISAAC T. GIBSON, State Chairman.

ANOTHER "PROMOTED" COMRADE.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—Upon November 1, after a simple yet impressive service held in her lovely home at Longmont, Col., amid the rich fragrance of beautiful floral offerings and tears of loving remembrance for "the dear, bright face which we shall see no more," Mrs. C. D. H. Thompson was laid at rest.

Although the tidings of her lingering illness had become known, a fatal termination was not anticipated. Thus the sorrowful event become a doubly crushing one to her devoted husband, her idolized son and a wide circle of affectionate friends and co-workers.

In company with her husband, John B. Thompson, she came to Longmont with the Chicago colony in 1871. Since that time she has been prominently identified with every movement inaugurated for the uplifting and betterment of humanity. When the Congregational church of that place was founded she became one of its charter members, and has devoted much time to every branch of Christian work.

Being endowed with exceptionally fine executive ability, and progressive and enthusiastic upon the subject of temperance, it was but natural that the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union should select Mrs. Thompson as their vice-president from Colorado. She served in that capacity for the two years preceding a state organization, and in the spring of 1880 issued the call for the first W. C. T. U. convention held in this state. In response the women met April 2 and 3, at Longmont. At that time Miss Frances E. Willard wrote of it: "Yours is the first state to organize without outside help."

Mrs. Thompson faithfully discharged the duties of the corresponding secretary until elected president in 1887, and for three years thereafter filled that office with great efficiency.

At one time Mrs. Thompson was associate editor of the National organ of the W. C. T. U., Our Union, which was afterwards merged with THE UNION SIGNAL. As a writer of both prose and poetry she displayed marked literary talent, and the productions of her facile pen, which have been published from time to time in your columns and other papers or magazines, have received the highest encomiums.

Her earthly life was a lovely exemplification of the sweet, cheerful and patient helpfulness only to be found in the most perfect type of womanliness.

"The loving angels call her sister now,
Lilies of peace gleam on her breast and brow,
And in the home of her immortal birth
She clasps the sweet forget-me-nots of earth."

BROKEN THREADS RETIED.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—The recent letter in your columns from Mr. C. H. Adam van Scheltema interested me so very, very much that I must write a line to tell you about it.

The Miss de Ranitz she speaks of was an old schoolfellow of mine, in a dear German Moravian gemeine near Utrecht in Holland. I recall so vividly her warm enthusiasm for people and things, her large, kindling grey eyes and her great industry over her studies. We corresponded for some time, and I remember her saying in one of her letters that life had no interest for her; she wished she could sleep away all her time. I could not understand it at all; but then I was one of a family of fourteen, and had as many and more interests.

Some years afterwards I heard from a mutual friend that Leutje de Ranitz had given herself heart and soul to evangelistic work, through the reading of Mrs. Wightman's "Haste to the Rescue," and I thought to myself, Leutje does not want to sleep away her time any more. I have never heard of her since—about thirty years—so you understand my interest.

The Miss Marsh mentioned in the same letter used to live in our village (ten miles from London), and I remember the beginnings of her public speaking, which grew to be such a power in the neighborhood. She began by having cottage readings in the village for the "navvies" who were working on the new London, Chatham & Dover railway. The room was so tiny you could not cram more than about twenty persons in it. I remember secreting myself with one of my sisters in an adjoining little room, where we could hear and not be seen. To hear a woman speak with such a power of pathos and persuasive eloquence was a revelation to me, and I can never forget it.

The villagers who heard "on the sly" wanted to come openly, but she said: "No, I must have my men with their 'smock-frocks' around me, and there will be no room." So one of the villagers fitted up his barn with whitewash and benches, and she was persuaded to hold her meetings there. This was about the year 1855.

Corvallis, Ore. L. A. NASH.

BY MATILDA B. CARSE.

"If then God so clothe the grass, which is t day in the field, and to-morrow is cast into tl oven; how much more will he clothe you, O y of little faith?" Luke 12: 28.

Only five weeks remain in which to secure the offer made last week which, if all would accept, would sweep into our treasury a large sum, given in such small amounts no one would feel it a hardship to contribute. Let us state the offer again—All persons who will send fifty cents before January 1, 1894, will receive a beautiful little photogravure of the Temple. All persons who send us one dollar by the first of January, will receive the lovely Columbian souvenir made of aluminum, with a superb cut of the Temple on one side and the profile of our great leader, Miss Willard, on the other. This exquisite medallion is enclosed in a dainty box lined with silk. Mrs. Fannie N. Preston, N. Yarmouth, Me., has the following to say in regard to the medallion: "I was delighted with the souvenir and I own it gives me a continual feast, for there is something about it that holds my attention. I am never tired of looking at the two grand faces. The Temple is more plainly seen in this than in any other picture of it. I feel that my home will be happier and better for having such a treasure."

Last week a call in the form of a circular letter was sent out by the board of Temple trustees, asking every union from the Atlantic to the Pacific (which had not already done so) to pledge $100 to be paid by January 1, 1896; and those unions that cannot afford to pay this amount were asked to pledge a smaller sum payable by January 1, 1895. Thus an opportunity is given our own white-ribboners to pay for the "House Beautiful" before outsiders are asked to contribute. The trustees have determined to have the building paid for in two years. It will be rather mortifying if, out of our almost ten thousand unions, only a few hundred are enrolled on the tablets of Willard Hall; only two hundred and seven have a place there now. There remain but two years more for the unions who desire this honor to secure it. Let there be a generous emulation among our societies to have their names recorded among those who have contributed to the erection of the Temple, and by this means also secure to their respective states a perpetual income with which to prosecute temperance work. We trust an immediate answer will be sent in by all unions, stating what amount they will pledge towards our great undertaking.

Mrs. Rebecca Fenneman, Hamilton, O., writes as follows: "I want to tell you that Willard Hall was really the only place in all Chicago where I went with genuine satisfaction. Even at the National W. C. T. U. Convention there were so many things to make me tired that I needed just such a sweet home of rest as that hall with its services afforded. I believe if there is a spot in Chicago where the Holy Spirit dwells it is there, and it is because that entire ground and beautiful structure is a monument of the prayers and consecration of womanhood. For this reason I would like to see my good old-fashioned name on its walls, so as to give all the credit we can to woman. My prayer is that you may succeed in your unprecedented undertaking, and I promise to do all I can to help answer my own prayers." So far Mrs. Fenneman has answered her prayers by sending $100, and "the good old-fashioned name" of Rebecca Fenneman is to be found on the Ohio state tablet in Willard Hall. Dear sisters, we hope you will all daily pray for the success of the great task the Temple trustees have set themselves to accomplish (to pay off the entire indebtedness of the Temple in two years), and answer your own prayers by sending what you can afford—if not more than fifty cents. Mrs. M. E. McKee, Clarinda, Ia., sends a check for $100 to have her name placed on the Iowa tablet. Beside this Mrs. McKee has sent many smaller gifts to the Temple. Mrs. Galbreath, treasurer of the Greenfield, O., W. C. T. U., writes: "Miss Mary Ghormly, a member of our union, has been to Chicago, and has seen the Temple Beautiful. When she came home she handed me $5, and said: 'I want to do something for the Temple,'" since this twenty dollars have been received for the Kolloch tablet from Mrs. Monroe, Englewood, Ill. Mrs. R. F. Moore, De Funiak Springs, Fla., writes: "How I would like to attend the National Convention, but I will do the next best thing—send my mark. Please find enclosed $12 from friends of the cause of temperance for the Jane E. Weeden tablet."

With the exception of Jane Weeden, there is not a woman in the country has worked as hard to raise money for the Temple as the noble president of the Newark, O., W. C. T. U., Mrs. Evelyn Graham. She has now begun to raise the seventh $100, and has just made her first payment, $25 on her last $100. Only $125 of the above amount has been secured in Ohio. What has been accomplished by this brave little woman goes to show how much may be done when animated by a high and holy purpose. Mrs. Kate B. Northup, the faithful superintendent of Temple work in Nebraska, sends $9 for the Woodward tablet, and $5 for the Ferguson tablet. Two who gave toward the Woodward tablet were Carl Hartley, aged ten years, and Grace R. Powell, aged four, both from Lincoln, Neb. They each had gathered in their mite-box $3.65. Dr. N. H. Blosser, Logan, O., sends $40, which completes the payment of $100 for tablet in memory of his wife, Austiss O. Blosser, who was a faithful member of Logan Union.

Below will be found the names of unions in Missouri, as carved on the state panel in the Willard corridors in the Temple: Kansas City Union; Central Union, St. Louis; Harrisonville Union; Stockton Union; Brookfield Union; Fayette Union.

THANKSGIVING.

BY MRS. MCVEAN-ADAMS.

God might have given us all the treasure
Of autumn fruitage and harvest sheaves
Without the beauty that gives such pleasure
In purple grapes and in scarlet leaves.

Then let us out of our full hearts render
A glad thanksgiving for fruit and flowers,
The gold of wheat and the aster's splendor
Royally robing this land of ours.

Out in the orchards, ripe and mellow,
Like heaps of rubies and emeralds fair,
Lie apples, crimson and green and yellow,
Filling with fragrance the autumn air.

Let us with praise and thanks make mention
Of wayside daisy and golden-rod,
Pure white aster and blue fringed gentian—
All are the gifts of a loving God.

SOPHRONIA DEVINS' THANKSGIVING.

BY AUNT JULIA.

"I dunno what's come over S'frony Devins, Mis' Spencer; she's singin' gay as a lark this mornin'! I never heerd her sing before, long's I've lived next door neighbor to her; and the old man in his grave only a fortnight come Sunday! I say it's onseemly!"

The speaker, a tall, thin woman, with a worn but not uncomely face, paused on her neighbor's doorstep, flicking a fly away from the tumbler of molasses she had run over to borrow. Mrs. Spencer, a plump, grey-haired woman with a fair, sweet face looked up from her basket of darning which she had carried into the wide, cool hall.

"Well, Mis' White, I'm glad the poor thing can sing, and I don't know's it's strange if she don't pine much for her pa! Old man Devins was powerful hard to get along with, you know, and I do think poor S'frony's had a hard lot of it. She's always worked like a slave, and never a cent of her own to spend; why, the old man even bought her stockings himself! Caroline says she don't blame her none for sprucing up a bit and looking happier since he's gone, and I don't know as any one can!"

"P'rhaps you're right, Mis' Spencer; you always do have a good word to say for everyone, if there's any show for it; I'm sure I wish S'frony well. Howsomever I hope she won't squander her means now she has the money her pa left. Of course 'taint to be expected she'd know how to use it careful like those as have always had the spendin' of money! Well, I must be goin', Mis' Spencer, I'll send Tim right over with the molasses soon's it comes. Good-bye, girls!" she called into the wide, airy kitchen where the Spencer girls chatted over their work.

A few rods away, in the high, yellow house with peaked roof, and dormer windows, the "S'frony" of the above conversation is standing in the spare room, lost in thought; a small, neatly built woman, of about thirty, with little of beauty save abundant, wavy, brown hair, and a pair of wistful brown eyes. She has been working busily all the morning, putting the house in spotless order, doing the Saturday's baking as conscientiously as though the comfort of a family depended on her labors. And no one but herself to enjoy it all! Just now as she had been "redding" up the prim, "spare room," her eyes had chanced to light on the bright calendar against the wall.

"I declare," she said, "next Thursday's Thanksgiving day!" Then, with a sigh: "I've never had a real one in my life! not like those other folks have, I mean. I wonder if I couldn't have one this year. Perhaps pa wouldn't mind now, if he could know."

Sophronia Devins had lived a narrow, hard life, in the little Western town where she was born and raised. Left motherless at an early age she had assumed household cares when other girls were playing with dolls.

Mr. Devins had meant to be a good father to the little girl, and had kept his "eye on her" so closely that she always had a nervous feeling of having done wrong. But he had never understood her nature and needs; had never realized that she had grown from girl to woman; but had treated her as a child, requiring the implicit obedience of one, never allowing her the pocket money Sophronia was too proud to ask for. Too shy and restricted to make friends among the young people of the village, her affectionate nature found vent in caring for stray cats, and the ducks and chickens placed in her care.

So the years had gone by until at thirty years of age she found herself suddenly fatherless. Mr. Devins failed to come down to breakfast one morning, and his daughter had gone to his room, only to see that he would never more need earthly food. The homestead and ten thousand dollars in cash were hers. What a fortune it seemed to one who had never owned a dollar before?

"Thanksgiving so near! and no one to help me celebrate it! If I knew any poor folks I'd do as folks in stories do," she thought; "but nobody's poor here but Abe Spindler, and he's so shiftless like, I do' know as I ought to give pa's money to him. Pa was always dreadful sot about lazy folks."

The thoughts of the morning followed her all day. And on the Sabbath as she sat alone in her pew, surrounded by the people she had seen all her life but hardly known, a greater sense of her loneliness came over her. As she sat at her Sunday meal, trying to find appetite for the well prepared food before her, a thought came to her. She had read in the Weekly Advocate, the only periodical her father had taken, of the Fresh Air Fund. She had had it in her heart, and almost on her lips, to suggest to her father that they should open their house to one or more of the little strangers. Her habitual reserve and a nervous dread of his refusal had prevented. "But now," she said, her face full of resolve, "yes, now I will do it."

Her dinner forgotten, she took the Advocates from the rack, and sat down to look into the matter. The dishes stood unwashed on the table for hours for the first time in years, save on that one sad morning two short weeks ago. As the red light of sunset streamed into the room, she arose, put away the papers and returned to her work. A happier look was in her eyes. The little yellow house should have such a Thanksgiving as it had never known before!

Wash-tubs were neglected that Monday morning in Boggsville. Sophronia Devins had been seen to pass down the one long street toward the depot. What could it mean? Her best clothes and a small hand-satchel proclaimed a journey, but where could she be going? She had never been known to go away before! Something must surely have happened. More than one matron found it necessary to run over to Mrs. White's that morning. Such a returning of borrowed articles, or, "I just wanted the loan of your tomato pickle recipe, Mis' White," or, "Could you let me see the last fashion paper, Mis' White? I know your sister sends it regular from the city." But sooner or later Sophronia's name was introduced and her strange conduct commented on. Mrs. White, however, could not throw much light on the doings of her neighbor.

"All I know about it, Miss Prior, is that S'frony called to me from the back porch, where I was emptyin' my dish-pan, and asked if I would kindly see that little Ned Brown didn't leave her gate open, for the cows might get in and eat her pun'kins; and she says, would I see that her Tabby cat and the hens was fed if she didn't get back by night, 'and I'll do as much for you, Mis' White,' she says.

"Of course I was glad to help her out, but I did say, 'I hope you're not goin' fur, S'frony,' for I felt some one ought to give the poor girl a word of advice, and her so ignorant of the world and its wickedness! Why she ain't never been on the railway cars before in her life! Some way I felt it in my bones she was goin' to the city, and sure 'nuff I was right, for she says, smilin' sweet, but sort of pale lookin': 'Only to the city, Mis' White, I'll tell you all the news when I get back!' She was off, out o' the gate before I could say another word! I was so sort o' dazed like I just went in and set the dish-pan in a chair, and stood lookin' at it for a spell!"

With this explanation Boggsville had to be content. But you may be sure when the evening train from the city arrived many eyes looked expectantly from windows and doorways. But no trim little figure in black did they spy that night. The next evening, however, did not leave them unrewarded. Not only was Sophronia among the few passengers who alighted at Boggsville, but with her, clinging shyly to her dress, were two little girls, one about eight, and the other a flaxen-haired tot of four or five years.

"What on airth does it mean!" was Mrs. White's exclamation as the trio passed into the little yellow house, only pausing to stroke Tabby's humped up back in the doorway. Suppose we let Sophronia tell her own story, as she told it to sympathetic Mrs. Spencer the next day.

"You may think it strange, Mis' Spencer, but I've been so sort of queer and lonely like all my life, I never even had a doll to love like other girls; and Thanksgiving coming, and me with plenty to do with, and no one to help me enjoy it! So, thinks I, 'if there are poor folks in the city that would be thankful for a good dinner, I'm just going to find some of 'em!' But I never so much as had to hunt for 'em! It does seem as if the good Lord set 'em right down there crying on the sidewalk on purpose, poor little dears! I went up and gave them a cookey out of my lunch-bag, and they told me all about themselves and didn't seem a mite afraid of me. Their mother died last spring, and their father had been good to 'em at first, but he lost his place in the mill, and in his discouragement took to drink, and things must have gone pretty bad with them, for they were so ragged and starved looking! It made my heart ache, Mis' Spencer. At last they came to begging for a living, but the night before they had gone to the miserable room they had called home, only to find the door locked. They crawled into a wagon for the night, and you know how sharp the frosts have been lately; no wonder I found 'em crying. I took 'em into a restaurant and filled 'em up with the best breakfast I could find.

"I had the address of the Fresh Air Fund managers in my reticule, so I took 'em there after they had eaten all they wanted. The managers were so kind. They looked it up for me; found their father had shot himself in a saloon, that there was no one else belonging to them, and the short of it is, Mis' Spencer, I can keep 'em as long as I like. They do seem so cute and knowinglike! I don't know as I can ever bear to part with 'em. Why Janey—that's the least one's name, and Martha's the other—Janey could find her way all about that dreadful city, and she wasn't a mite afraid on the railway cars, when, to tell you the truth, Mis' Spencer, I trembled all the time, for fear we were going to run off the track or something!"

Thanksgiving day dawned clear and bright. The last sharp frosts had changed the trees from green to red and gold. The world seemed very beautiful to the two little waifs who looked out of the dormer windows that morning. "Aunt S'frony," as they had already learned to call her, seemed more than ever like an angel to them as she bustled into their cozy room, her arms full of warm, new clothing for them, her face wreathed in pleasant smiles.

How prim and neat they looked as Miss Sophronia led them to the village church. The bright plaid dresses and snug little hoods from which Martha's tightly braided locks and little Janey's blonde tresses peeped out, were vastly becoming. The Spindlers, too, for once, were all at church. So it was quite a little procession that marched into the door of the yellow house that day.

"Oh, don't it smell good!" cried Tommy Spindler, as the odors of the dinner greeted them, and all the children sniffed hungrily in spite of their mother's warning finger. Such a dinner as they sat down to! Such appetites as the frosty air had developed!

Janey and Tommy Spindler set them all laughing with their funny remarks. Anna Spindler and Martha forgot to be shy, and were soon joking merrily over the wish-bone Anna discovered on her plate. Baby Spindler laughed and crowed merrily, a big red apple on her plate, and a "drumstick" in her hand. Even Tabby came in for her share of the turkey! No doubt they all agreed with Tommy, who whispered to his mother at the end, "I thought I never could get enough, mamma, when I began, and now I can't even eat pie!"

No more lonely days for Miss Sophronia! No more cold and hunger for Martha and Janey! So well did they fit into Miss Sophronia's heart and life that the little yellow house spread its sheltering roof over all—a real home to them!

"HIS BOTTLE."

BY JOHN G. WOOLLEY.

William Greene, of Moorlands, Bickley, Kent, generous, rich, strong, and a Christian man with a wide influence, a beautiful family—and a cellar full of rare wines. God spoke to him one day and he was troubled about his wine and banished it from his board, and there it lay in the cobwebs and must of the cellar under safe lock and key. And day after day God said to him, "What have you done with your wine?" And he answered once, "I have locked it fast and safe in the cellar and so it shall be to the end."

"What end?" said the voice.

"Aye, what end. I am on old man. I shall die some day and what will become of my wine? . . . . And this is the gospel of wine cellars according to William Greene. Satan said, "Sell it"; and then the voice said, "To whom?" "Or give it to a hospital and be a benefactor and get your name in the paper;" and the voice said, "Wine is a mocker." "Or get the dealer to buy it back; the price is a little fortune." But the voice said, "It is yours, and your word is the infinite law for that wine; wherever it goes it will carry a message from you." "Give the money away;" and the voice said, "No blessing of money can commute for the peril or woe of wine; no matter how wisely or kindly you plan, or how long you postpone the denouement, at last like a serpent it biteth and like an adder it stings."

And this is the way William Greene met the question: He emptied the cellar at Highgate and into the sewer broke twenty-five hundred bottles of wine, and writes in his letter: "Send me five thousand copies of "Thy Bottle!"

GRANDMOTHER THANKSGIVING'S PARTY.

BY LOUISE SNOW.

YES, she made a party, did dear, kind old Grandmother Thanksgiving, and invited all the Holidays, young and old, to it. You see, she had such a great big, generous, loving heart she didn't want to leave anyone out, so she sent invitations to all of the Holidays.

And here is what she said about it:

"Well, the President has decreed I shall celebrate the day which he has set apart as one for acknowledgment for the blessings of the year at my dear old manor-house, away out on the very verge of November.

"I would like to invite all the world, and I will, by degrees; but this time I am afraid that all I can attend to will be the Holiday family, with kith and kin."

So she sat down at her desk—a big mince pie, supported by four large market squashes.

The invitations were written on memory leaves, in sunlight, with the pen of Love, and were sent out on the wings of the carrier-dove of Thought.

"Let's see," said Grandmother Thanksgiving, "I think I will begin with the order of the year and months; those shall be first that are farthest away.

"The first, then, would be the little New Year, as he lives in January, on First street.

"Then comes Saint Valentine, who dwells on Fourteenth street, in February.

"Also, in the same town-month abides Washington's Birthday, on the corner of Twenty-second street and First President avenue.

"Saint Patrick's Day is found blithely sojourning in the morning on Seventeenth street of March, near Shamrock Green.

EASTER

"And Easter stops part of the time in March, and part in April, and doesn't keep house, but only visits about.

"But there's April Fool, who is always found on First street in Fourth month.

"Next are sweet May Day on First avenue, and Memorial Day on Thirtieth street, both in Fifth month.

"Independence Day flourishes on Fourth street and Parade avenue, in July.

"Picnic Day feasts at Park place, Pleasant avenue, near the fountain in August.

"Labor Day needs a rest, and will be sure to come—he is always so busy—on Fourth street, in September.

"Harvest Time lives in October, just as you enter; and Hallow E'en at the farther extremity of the town.

"Not so very far from where my own home is," soliloquized Grandmother Thanksgiving, "and but just south of where Christmas lives, in cold December.

"And last, but not least, I must ask dear Temperance Day, who is a near neighbor of Christmas, and they can come together. To please her I have given up liquors and wine sauces, and my mince pies are free from brandy or cider flavors."

It would take much too long a time to tell how they all came, what they wore, and how they looked, what they said and did and ate, and all about it all.

But April Fool made everyone laugh at his antics.

Saint Valentine was very devoted to all the shy visitors.

Independence Day strutted about with flags, and a sword, and fire-crackers and torpedoes.

Gentle Easter smiled on every one, carried a bouquet of lilies, and wore a lovely bonnet.

May Day had pink and white flowers in her hair, and Temperance Day carried herself with dignity and earnestness.

Washington's Birthday had on a suit of continentals with epaulets, and was very grand.

Harvest had a boutonnière of grains, and brought a basket of rare fruits for dear grandmother.

Memorial Day, with a grave, sweet face, spoke softly and tenderly of the "nation's brave ones," who gave their lives for their country.

Picnic Day brought a great jar of pickles, which were "left over," she said.

You ought to have seen that dinner table! The only wonder, beside itself, was that it did not break down under its great load of delicacies!

A merry time they all had finding their places at the table, but after a while all were seated—Christmas next to grandmother.

CHRISTMAS.

After Harvest had offered thanks, grandmother, smiling, said, "Now I've a surprise in store for some of you, I think."

Instead of ringing a bell she waved a wand, when in came a troupe of lovely fairies, who served at the table. Grandmother just smiled again at the looks of wonder on her guests' faces, and only said, "You see, my dears, that I believe in fairies."

You can imagine how they enjoyed it all.

Christmas was called upon for a song, and responded with a beautiful carol. Independence made a short, but thrilling and telling speech.

Before the pudding and pies were brought in grandmother said, "I've lately joined the temperance union, so there is no brandy in my pies, and none to burn around my pudding. But instead there is holly, and hearty good-will and happiness."

TEMPERANCE.

At this there was loud applause, and bright Temperance Day waved her standard, "Saloons must go," then all joined her in singing the cheerful refrain.

At its close Temperance Day, with grandmother's permission, left the table and presently returned with little Children's Day, and both made a deep courtesy to the hostess.

Then Temperance Day said, "Dear grandmother, please permit me to present to you your youngest grandchild."

Grandmother Thanksgiving looked, took off her spectacles, put them on the top of her head, then back on her eyes, and looked again.

Grandmother, that dear, stately old lady, was flustered. She thought she knew all her family without any introduction. You may be sure no one but Temperance Day would have dared this venturesome innovation.

But the dear old lady was soon herself again, and replied briskly, "To be sure; certainly, my dear!"

Then, oh so sweetly, Temperance Day said, "Dearest Grandmother Thanksgiving, this is dear little Children's Day. Don't you remember her?"

Grandmother took the little one right up in her arms and kissed her heartily. Then she said, "Why, bless us, how did I ever forget her! I didn't suppose she was big enough to come so far, though."

INDEPENDENCE.

Temperance Day answered that she came with her, and was so tired out that she went to sleep directly after their arrival. But now she was rested and bright, and had a pretty piece to recite, if acceptable. Which it was, and very well she acquitted herself, too.

The pudding and pies, everyone said, were perfect, and the very best ever eaten, and all declared this the merriest celebration that Grandmother Thanksgiving had ever given.

"HELP one another," a penny said,
To another penny, round and red,
"Nobody cares for me alone,
Nobody'll care when I am gone.
But we'll stick together,
And we'll grow in time
To a nickel, or even a silver dime."

DEAR BOYS AND GIRLS:—Thanksgiving! That means giving thanks. To whom, Elizabeth? Yes, to our dear Heavenly Father, who sent the great gift of His Son, and who provides us with all that we have to enjoy. For what are we thankful, I mean, especially thankful, this year? What say you, Fred? and Sidney? and Anne? For your good home. For clothes and food. For a dear teacher. For having been to the World's Fair. For joining the L. T. L. Dear me, how long the list would grow!

Did you ever think to take a pen and paper and write a list of all you have to be thankful for? Just try it when you finish reading the children's page this week and see how many things you can count. I wonder if any will reach a hundred. I would like, too, to see some of the lists you make. Would you not like to see mine?

I know you will all like Grandmother Thanksgiving's Party on our page this week. I think it would make a pretty entertainment, don't you?

A happy Thanksgiving to you all!

NEPHEWS AND NIECES.

I wish you would ask all the Cozy Cornerers and the W. C. T. U. ladies if they have any old temperance papers that would be suitable to distribute in a Loyal Temperance Legion. I am secretary of a Legion and please send them to me. LEONORA B. PERRINE.

1925 W. Baltimore St., Baltimore, Md.

Many of our left-over temperance papers will surely find their way to this active Loyal Temperance Legion.

I am secretary of the L. T. L. and mamma is superintendent. We meet every Friday and have ninety-eight pledged members. Mamma takes THE UNION SIGNAL and I like the Cozy Corner very much. Papa is a Prohibitionist and an honorary member of the W. C. T. U.

Fairfield, Neb. MABEL PALMER.

A true, working temperance family. You are welcomed to our Corner, Mabel.

Isn't my turn ever going to come to have my letter printed? I wrote to you some time ago, and said that I wanted to join the Cozy Corner, and in one of THE UNION SIGNALS I saw my name, but never have seen my letter. Please put it in if you can.

P. S. My real name is Margaret, but they call me Daisy at home. DAISY GRANT.

Oakland, Md.

Many of our Cozy Cornerers feel just as Margaret does, and think it is a long time before their letters are printed. But, dear Cornerers, unless your letters contain some news or information of immediate importance, they must wait their turn. Remember Aunt Jane sees and enjoys them all.

I am a temperance girl, thirteen years old. I like to read the Cozy Corner, and have done so for some time back, but I do not notice many letters from Pennsylvania. I don't think that there are any temperance boys and girls here. I have seen that some of the readers would like to have some of the other readers write them, and I should like to have some of the readers write to me.

Duke Center, Pa. FLORENCE IRVINE.

Pennsylvania boys and girls are wanted in our Corner! A warm welcome, Florence.

Let us come before his presence with thanksgiving, and make a joyful noise unto him with psalms.—Ps. 95:2.

Now let us thank the Eternal Power; convinced
That Heaven but tries our virtue by affliction,—
That oft the cloud which wraps the present hour
Serves but to brighten all our future days.

GIVE THANKS.

The name of God may not appear in the Constitution of these United States, but the nation, once a year at least, proclaims most emphatically, and in the most public manner possible, its recognition of the Divine Ruler.

Thanksgiving Day, besides being an expression of national homage and a tribute of praise to the Giver of all good, serves to remind us that the foundations of this new mighty nation were laid, not in the shifting sands of political ambition or martial conquest, but in the bed-rock of religious faith and aspiration. No matter how much of bigotry or superstition may have mingled with the stern theology of the pilgrim fathers, a wholesome fear and reverence for an all-ruling Providence was the impelling motive in all their sturdy blows for religious freedom. No matter how they may have blundered in its application, a deep-seated veneration for divine law entered into all their civil and social affairs.

It would be well indeed if, as the official proclamation suggests, "the American people should every day remember by praise and thanksgiving the divine goodness and mercy." Our land has truly been wonderfully blest ever since the banner of the cross was first planted upon its shores, but if we, as a nation, cultivated more than we do the spirit of thankfulness we should find that our blessings would increase tenfold.

A student of God's word cannot fail to be impressed with the frequency with which the inspired writers enjoin the giving of thanks, and, knowing that every command of the Father is given not arbitrarily, but with a view to man's greater happiness here and hereafter, his more perfect development as a child of God, the inquiring mind naturally seeks a reason for the oft-repeated injunction. And as seeking for the treasures of the Kingdom means finding, he discovers that to "give thanks always for all things," to recognize and attribute to the proper source the good gifts we already enjoy, is to multiply those gifts and to render the enjoyment of them more intense. We must not forget, however, that the human mind with its limited vision is not always competent to judge what constitutes "goodness and mercy."

"If one should give me a dish of sand," says Oliver Wendell Holmes, "and tell me there were particles of iron in it, I might look for them with my eyes and search for them with my clumsy fingers, and be unable to detect them; but let me take a magnet and sweep through it, and how it would draw to itself the almost invisible particles by the mere power of attraction! The unthankful heart, like my finger in the sand, discovers no mercies; but let the thankful heart sweep through the day, and as the magnet finds the iron, so it will find in every hour some heavenly blessing—only the iron in God's sand is gold."

An enumeration of the Lord's wonderful works to the children of men, partial though it must be, is, as David found, helpful to the most optimistic among us. Amid the clash and din of conflict we are prone to emphasize the evils of life and to forget its benefits as the great educator and trainer of man. In recounting the mercies vouchsafed to us as a nation we find that the evils, so-called, dwindle into insignificance, nay, that "there is some soul of goodness in things evil would men observingly distill it out."

We are led to discover a cause for thanksgiving in the very unrest and disorder which pervades our national life at the present time. In these days when every man, from the statesman to the disappointed office-seeker, from the millionaire to the tramp, is doing his own thinking and doing it vigorously, the result is naturally disturbing. But the Christian philosopher, finding good in everything, sees in these tumultuous conditions indications of a more rapid growth, a swifter evolution; he sees a noble discontent which prophesies of "nobler modes of life, sweeter manners and purer laws."

A natural consequence of the remembrance of divine favors so bounteously bestowed is a desire upon the part of the recipient to become also a benefactor. Hence Thanksgiving Day has developed into a day of general alms-giving. We are urged by the President to "let generous gifts of charity for the relief of the poor and needy prove the sincerity of our thanksgiving." We believe in alms-giving, but we believe there is a still more excellent way of relieving the poor and needy.

The true and the wise benefactor will seek to benefit his fellow-man after the same manner that the Heavenly Father seeks to benefit all His children, viz., by helping them to help themselves. God directs human affairs by operating through human beings. He puts the nation or the individual in the way of self-development, of self-help, and in proportion as national or personal effort accords with His plan (as far as unfolded), just in the same degree is it crowned with success.

Why not prove the sincerity of our thanksgiving this Columbian year by setting on foot some systematic plan for the help of the poor which shall be at once permanent and uplifting? How much more acceptable and effective would be our sacrifice of praise if in addition to extending temporary relief to the unemployed, we made a united movement toward furnishing opportunity for them to help themselves! The vast army of the unemployed, from being simply an unfortunate are rapidly developing into a dangerous class. By providing work for the men and women willing and eager to engage in any honest labor, however humble, future charity of the bread and soup order would become unnecessary, and the incentive to anarchy and riot reduced to a minimum.

Utopian, you say? Perhaps; yet not impossible so long as this land of ours has such abundant resources and this nation is one of the richest in the world. The brain of man is equal to the task; it only requires the coöperation of his will to make this ideal and real charity the actual. The old maxim. "God helps them that help themselves," gives place in these latter and better days to the newer and truer rendering, "God helps them that help others." Once let the people realize the solidarity of human interests and the consequent laws of reciprocity which underlie every phase of life, and they will, from motives of self-preservation if nothing else, hasten to right the wrongs under which so many of their kind are groaning.

Let this thanksgiving season, when the reunion of kindred and the patching up of family feuds is part of the order of the day, remind every worshiper of his own individual responsibility in bringing about the reunion of the greater family to which he belongs. So far as we work for the union of each with the other, and of all with the Father, we are co-laborers with God. By seeking to further His plans and purposes in man and for man we shall demonstrate in the most conclusive manner the sincerity of our daily or annual thanksgiving, and the richest blessings of Jehovah will attend us.

GOOD-LOOKING MEN AND WOMEN.

Women who would win their cause must do their utmost to reduce to a minimum their defects of personal appearance and manner, and to conserve and increase every advantage with which nature and culture have endowed them. But they must ever carefully maintain the difference between charm and fascination. For these two are wide apart as saintliness and sin. The good woman charms; the bad one fascinates. The first lives on Mount Gerizim, the second on Mount Ebal; the first blesses, the last banes; one has the evil eye and the deceiver's blandishment, the other has the unstrained quality of mercy, and her glance falls "like sunshine in a shady place."

But this is an aside.

In the past year it has fallen to our lot to meet many of the most "progressive women" of England, and they were gowned and decked in what we are sure the press and people deemed attractive style, while as to their native good looks, they were fully "up to key," and their faces and manner had the new charm, among women, of radiant and irradiant interest in the intellectual, no less than the moral, aspect of great movements. The reception given to the National Women's Liberal Council by the Countess of Aberdeen and to the National British Women's Temperance Association by Lady Henry Somerset afforded abundant proof of the declarations we have made. It becomes us, as loyal patriots, to say what nobody will dispute, that American women of the progressive (who would wish, by the way, to belong to the retrogressive?) school are no whit behind their sisters here. Whatever may have been true a generation back, it is certain that to-day the æsthetic side of life is strongly emphasized by the intellectual, philanthropic and reformatory women of our country.

But there is another equally important side to this question of maintaining such a personal appearance as shall prove to be the outward and visible sign of inward and spiritual grace. A well known loyal champion of women's rights emphasizes the duty of (women) reformers to "look as nice and be as pretty as they know how." We quite agree with him, but must insist that it is equally the duty of men, whether reformers or not, and that they must look to their ways in this thing, if they would be acceptable to the woman that is coming fast; for the love of beauty and charm is, if possible, more deeply seated in the nature of woman than in that of man, and the only reason why she has put up with men who were her inferiors in these choice gifts is that she had it to do, or do worse.

Her subjection has depended chiefly on her financial dependence, and her assertion of individual right will increase in exact proportion to her ability of self-support. This being true, the willingness of beautiful women to marry unbeautiful men has never been because such women doated upon ugliness per se, but because such men were in the majority, and had taken to themselves many of this world's good things that served as a compensation for their lack of good looks. It is all very well for men writers and their women imitators to set forth the "rugged strength," the "Mirabeau-like massiveness" and the balmy bald-headedness of men as a natural off-set to the refinement of feature and form that are characteristic of women. The fact remains that no woman of sense ever yet, in her head or heart, preferred a plain looking man because he was plain. Human nature is not built that way; we all like the best; the finest and most complete type possible in every class is what alone meets our desire. If all men were Apollos in beauty, we should like it just as well as they would if all of us were Junos. Because this must always, in the nature of the case, be true, women will soon have much to say about what they expect and require, on the æsthetic plane, from men.

Indeed, the best result of woman's enfranchisement and full participation in the great world-life will be the growing greatness, goodness and good looks of men. Our brothers have done admirably already, deprived, as they have been, of those magnificent motors that have so largely developed the qualities they most admire in women—that is to say, virtue, gentleness and beauty. For those motors men themselves have largely supplied. They would not tolerate unchastity, severity and ugliness in women, and, happily, the time is coming—nay, is at the door—when women will have attained so much of power that they will no longer tolerate these things in men. And then we shall have a cleaner, kinder and better looking world. Let every man take heed to his doings and his looks, for women are on the war-path to gain the strength, courage and mental vigor that have long been the glory of men, and to help develop the equally important qualities in man that have been woman's glory.

In personal appearance we are bound to admit that Englishmen, as a class, "beat the world." They are the wholesomest, best dressed, best looking set of creation anywhere to be found among men. No other country can show so large a proportion of ruddy-cheeked specimens of the genus homo, in immaculate linen, with hands faultlessly gloved, feet tastefully shod, and a rose in the button-hole.

But, alas! the bald-headed, the untrimmed-bearded, the slack-twisted, the rumple-collared, the shiny-coated, the sodden-shod we have always with us, in this and every land. Men and brethren! be up and doing, and make yourselves as handsome as you can; for in this particular, be ye well advised and advertised, that American women, and all other women, expect every man who pretends to be a gentleman to do his duty. Nay, more, we shall soon lay it down as the law that the present sheet-iron fashionable costume of men give place to one conformable to the taste and reason. Upon the Helvetian heights, in the summer just past, we have beheld with solid satisfaction many a well-knit figure of youth and man in soft felt hat, tennis shirt, with flowing collar and tie, knickerbockers, stockings, and low shoes, and said in our heart, "Thank the benignant powers! That's what creation's king is coming to!"

Beside this pleasing figure we have sometimes seen another, rationally clad and not less winsome, in her artistico-hygienic garments, and from the serene heights of life's meridian we have sent an elder sister's blessing after them both, and felt that they were forerunners of the better time, and beginners of the new fashion that shall not pass away.

A HOLIDAY HOMILY FOR OUR YOUNG FOLKS.

The growing individualism of this age finds few more pathetic illustrations than in the carelessness of young people about writing to their kindred and acquaintance after they have left home. As a matter of course this oversight results from selfishness of which our young people are not perhaps aware, and nothing illustrates the truth of this statement more indubitably than their constancy in writing when they have something to gain by so doing; in this particular they give themselves away like the ostrich who, with her head in the sand, supposes her impressive dimensions to be altogether concealed.

We knew a young man of genial nature, but inexact habits, who went to college and was away from home five years or more, during which time he was not known to have written to his father except to ask for money. This young man had remarkable facility of expression, and five minutes a week invested in a few rememberful and glowing words would have made the attitude of paterfamilias toward him altogether different; but he did as he did and reaped the consequences. It became a family proverb when a letter arrived bearing a superscription in his dashing hand, "Well, Ned is out of money," and every member felt as sure of this before reading the brief communication as afterward. He never wrote about the affectionate thoughts of home and kindred which he doubtless cherished; he did not even tell of his good times or his hardships, but spread out a few words on a large sheet and enclosed a bill! In this he did himself a grave injustice, for he was really very fond of home and kindred, but he thought they would take all that for granted, wherein he made a sad mistake.

How many tendrils of attractive memory, tender sentiment and living loyalty, that the shuttle of kind letters back and forth between the home and college in these years would have woven into a soft and beautiful fabric, were missed in that manly life, and how much of enrichment they lost who knew so little of his passing years, and were, by implication, counted out and not in; yet they were those bound to him by ties of kindred and affection, his basis of operations and supplies, his "strong staff and beautiful rod." Without their steadfast loyalty and good-will he could not have gone to college at all. They missed his cheery presence at the old home hearth, and by his thoughtlessness he deprived himself and them of a growing factor of sympathy and devotion through the long years. Perhaps he never knew it, but this action told upon his future, cheapened his life, and to some extent lowered the temperature of the heart's thermometer to the last hour of his earthly career with some, at least, of his home circle. There is nothing more indicative of the reality of character than the small, sweet courtesies of life, the minute tokens of considerateness, so that to say one is more and more "rememberful" as his years multiply is to say in other words, "he is refining, he is mellowing, he is ripening for the great home-gathering in Heaven."

We write these words in sorrow—not in anger, to represent what we believe goes on unsaid in many hearts. The holiday season is approaching, the home-coming of the widely scattered ones; a greater tenderness stirs every breast because of memories long hallowed, and we would utilize these golden hours for the purpose of pressing home with loving good-will upon the attention of our young people, the boys and girls, lads and lassies, the young men and maidens, that it should be their pleasure and their duty—for in the last analysis the two are one—to brighten up the home life when they are away by frequent reminders—the postal card, the letter, the paper with an article marked in which they have been interested—thus testifying by practical tokens, frequent and beneficent, that the heart is anchored in the home, which is its surest, safest fortress amid the cross currents and relentless billows of this earthly life.

"Evil is wrought for want of thought
More than for want of heart."

THERE are now six prohibition districts within the limits of St. Paul. The first and largest includes Hamline, the seat of the Methodist State University, Macalester, the seat of Macalester College, Presbyterian, Merriam Park and St. Anthony Park. The prohibitory proviso is a part of the state law by which this territory was added to the city. The people of the midway district insisted upon its insertion as a condition of their support of the proposition. Another proposition of the kind is now before the assembly, and when it passes, as it doubtless will, about one-half of the area of the city will be under prohibition.

THE labor leaders of England have come out in a strong manifesto urging the adoption of the Local Veto bill, and saying: "The opponents of this bill profess to be intensely interested in the protection of the liberties of the working classes; it is a fraudulent profession; the liberty which most of them really desire to maintain is the liberty of privileged monopolists to exploit the working classes. The liberty of the people! Could any cry be more absurd? When the bill becomes law it will remain a dead letter until two-thirds of those who vote on the question demand that it be brought into operation, and as at least six-sevenths of all who are entitled to vote belong to what are called the 'poorer classes' it is sheer mockery and insult to tell them that the measure will enable the rich to tyrannize over them." One hundred and forty official names are signed to this declaration, among which, besides several names of women, are the following, probably the most famous names of labor leaders that any list in the world can show: John Burns, M. P.; J. H. Wilson, M. P.; Joseph Arch, M. P.; Keir Hardie, M. P.; Tom Mann, Secretary of the London Council, and Alderman Ben Tillett.

A WRITER in a Leipsig paper claims that a most valuable discovery has been made which throws light on the cholera poison. The discovery involves the answer to the all-important question, as to how the comma bacillus does its work, and the discoverer is a Professor Emmerich. For a time the failure to detect a poison of sufficient quantity, or of the quality in the comma bacillus to produce the effects of the disease, led some to doubt whether after all the little germ discovered by Koch was the destructive cholera agent or not. Professor Emmerich believed that it was, and conducted his investigations on this hypothesis. He claims now to have fully proved that the fatal effects of the comma bacillus comes from the power which it possesses, in a degree exceeding that of any other known bacteria, of converting innocuous nitrates into poisonous nitrites. The discovery is confirmed by the well-known fact, that in the case of both animals and men, food rich in nitrates increases the disease in times of cholera epidemics. The next step is to find some means to neutralize the action of the bacillus by the reconversion of the nitrites to nitrates. "From all appearances," says the writer, "we stand on the eve of important discoveries."

BY AN inadvertence we failed to call especial attention to the unique description, on page 5 of last week's paper, of the recent service held in London in memory of Mrs. Booth, "Mother of the Salvation Army." Probably this is the most impressive illustration we have yet had of the incalculable value of the screen and calcium light in carrying through the eye to the heart the truth of God. All who have read the recent annual address of our president know how earnestly she has emphasized the wish that provision for spreading the use of this method throughout our local unions might be made at national headquarters. She also suggests that any local union could prepare for a temperance evening with the magic lantern by writing out texts, hymns, quotations from our chief speakers and writers, with such pictures as seemed helpful, all of which the local photographer could reproduce on glass. There is scarcely a village or town that has not now a magic lantern or cannot easily obtain one. We think the "Temple success meeting" proposed in that same annual address might easily be made a much greater success by following a similar method. The Temple itself, Willard Hall, with its embellishments, the various rooms in which our work is carried forward at headquarters, with many other slides illustrative of the Temple enterprise and of the temperance movement, could be thus brought before an audience, giving them such a realizing sense as they would never otherwise obtain of the attractiveness of our great undertaking. We believe that before long the usual Sunday evening service in our churches will be frequently replaced by object lessons of "Christianity applied," that will help to solve the problem how to induce the masses to attend church.

"Despise not thou small things;
The soul that longs for wings
To soar to some great height of sacrifice, too oft
Forgets the daily round,
Where little cares abound,
And shakes off little duties while she looks aloft."

The King of Uganda sentenced an offender to pay as a fine so many cattle and sheep and two women. A Christian chief at once interfered, and said that Christians do not give men and women. The king changed the sentence, and a new principle of jurisprudence has been established in the dark continent.

On Duty's readers will appreciate these verses by J. P. Trowbridge:

"What would become of this world of ours,
So sorely in need of our highest powers,
And waiting the stroke of millennial hours,
If women should smoke?

"What could atone for the loss crept in
To the baby's kiss and the cradle hymn,
And the coarser life that would soon begin,
If women should smoke?

"Where would the noblest sentiments hide,
Where would the purest of fancies abide,
For mother, and sister, and sweetheart and bride,
If women should smoke?

"Just as we find on a frost-bitten farm
Odorless flowers that have ceased to charm,
So would a blight fill the earth's best balm
If women should smoke."

Miss Mary A. Lathbury, whose gifts of pen and pencil have made her known to a wide circle of cultivated people, wrote from her summer home among the Hudson River highlands to a friend, who passes along the paragraph to me, as follows, thinking that it may help to brighten some winter night for On Duty's readers:

"I wish I could tell you all about the 'fagot party,' or 'story telling,' around our hearth, here in our sylvan summer home. A few choice friends were asked in for an evening, the card of invitation bearing a bunch of fagots tied with ribbon (in water colors) in one corner and this couplet in the other:

'Bring a fagot, tell a tale—
Till the fagot fire shall fail.'

"A score of congenial spirits made the circle that began at one side of our fire and ended at the other, the fireplace with the fagots on the hearth brought by each guest completing the circle. We had only firelight and candlelight. All the guests but two were here when the Dutch door opened and let in a young woman—an artist—from Squirrel Inn near by, and a young man who contributes to the Century. They carried their fagot between them, and it was a section of a young hemlock tree, nearly six feet long and eighteen or twenty inches in circumference, with a knot of broad green ribbon tied round it. There was a shout, of course, and then we settled down to business. It was an evening that none of us can forget. Several of the stories were so perfect in form and quality that they might have been given to a first-class magazine verbatim, for they were a clear case of good literature. Among the best was the Century contributor's account of the "Kangaroo Court" in the Rome (New York) jail, where he was a prisoner (for literature's sake) for thirty days that he might study tramp life. Another was a folk-lore story, given as the teller (a bright girl from Bryn Mawr College) heard it from the lips of a colored nurse. A third was an Eastern legend by a well-known New York publisher, and a fourth was a stage story of Henry Irving by the publisher's beautiful daughter. Besides this, we had a story of a pet bird, which must have had reason and conscience, and the last was a tale of law and love by our guest, a Presbyterian minister; this was a wonderful story, with a 'spiritual sense,' and I hope to see it published. Indeed, we had everything except a ghost story. I should have said that I set this ball rolling by describing a 'story telling' that I once attended with Edward Everett Hale, when he and Charles Barnard were the tellers of never-to-be-forgotten tales."

ON DUTY.

Superintendents' Reports.

[According to our promise, we begin in this number the publication of the National superintendents' reports, which were unread at the Convention. We will publish as many of them in each issue as space will permit, until they are all printed, observing the order on the Convention program, and again invite those superintendents, who have not already done so, to send us their reports. It is impossible to publish the long reports in full.—EDS.]

ALMSHOUSE WORK.

Reports have been received from only eleven states, including Michigan. We are unwilling to think that this indicates any falling off in care or labor, especially as all who have reported speak decidedly of growing interest, and their records show no diminution in work. The year has been an unusual one in its great distraction, the World's Fair. Doubtless many things of seemingly more importance than almshouse reports have been forgotten or set aside for a later and more convenient season. All the more are we grateful to those who have remembered us and sent such full and gratifying accounts of their labors during the past year.

ARKANSAS.—Mrs. Wallace tells of what she has done, adding, "We hope to do more; oh, for more time!" In answer to question No. 28 on the annual report paper, she says: "Wherever prohibition is enforced crime and poverty are almost unknown." Miss Pew, of Pennsylvania, answers the same question: "We have not enough prohibition to make it very evident."

ILLINOIS.—Mrs. Mason reports a gradual increase in interest and work, notwithstanding the fact that the year has been a peculiarly trying one.

INDIANA.—Mrs. Cadwalader, in the midst of much personal affliction, has found time for some work for those still more grievously afflicted, but has not been able to get together her regular report.

KENTUCKY.—Mrs. Munnell reports monthly services in nearly all the almshouses, the observance of Christmas and pleasant gift-giving at other times among the poor inmates.

MAINE.—Mrs. Minard has received reports from all the sixteen counties of the state. Good work has been done and she "feels greatly encouraged."

MICHIGAN.—Circulars regarding the objects of this department have been sent to all the districts of this state. The replies from the almshouses in which the work has been carried on are very satisfactory. We are indebted to the officials of the institutions for their courtesy and aid. Wayne county (including the city of Detroit) has had regular services every Sabbath during the year, and has been well supplied through the kindness of friends with reading material. The interest taken in our work by the general public is visibly increasing and encourages every "worker in the cause."

NEW HAMPSHIRE.—Mrs. Kidder sends a most delightful letter full of items of interest, which we wish we could give entire. "Only one county house in the state where religious services are not held, and this break is of recent occurrence." Seven of the counties have regularly salaried chaplains.

OHIO.—Mrs. Perkins sees much that needs improvement in the condition of their almshouses, but says: "Much more interest has been taken during the past year.

PENNSYLVANIA.—Miss Pew says: "Some of our unions do splendid work, but owing to the fact that many of our almshouses are in the country it is often difficult for ladies to reach them for regular visitations." (A very common difficulty everywhere.)

RHODE ISLAND.—Miss French tells of visits to the almshouses and distribution of religious and temperance literature.

WASHINGTON.—Mrs. Butler reports that though all the local superintendents have not reported, good work is being done, especially in Seattle and Tacoma, where regular services have been held and literature distributed.

All speak of a decided quickening of interest in this department; all mention the observance of flower day; nearly all mention large quantities of books and papers distributed. How much these little attentions and gifts, that cost us so little, have served to brighten the lives of these poor dependents we may never know. He who takes account of the "cup of cold water" will not overlook one kind deed or loving word. "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto the least of these, my brethren, ye have done it unto Me."

PURITY IN LITERATURE AND ART.

Your superintendent has not abated in her efforts to secure amendments to postal laws, nor will she, until our prayers are answered for purer United States mail service, to so amend the law as to reach the criminal, illustrated papers, daily and family papers that advertise drugs and nostrums for vicious purposes. Your petitions from all over this land to the chairman of the committee on post-offices and post roads, and to members of Congress, have been a grand protest against the unclean United States mail service. February, 1893, your superintendent sent out seven thousand responsive readings, giving a complete synopsis of the entire work of this department. These responsive readings went into every state and territory. Four thousand copies of the Christian Statesman, containing an article on this department, were mailed to various parts of the United States. Nearly one thousand letters have been written, thousands of pages of circulars, leaflets and articles in newspapers have been sent out in the past year.

My thanks are due the state presidents and superintendents for their earnest coöperation in every endeavor to establish and promote the work of this department. To my valued counselor, Anthony Comstock, I am greatly indebted. I take pleasure in saying this work has been carried on without one dollar of expense to the National W. C. T. U., and as far as has come to my knowledge with little or no expense to the states.

LaFetra has done the good work at the national capitol for this department. CALIFORNIA

MEETS IN CONVENTION.

The fourteenth annual convention of the California W. C. T. U. met at Stockton, October 3–7, opening with an evening session filled with addresses of welcome, responses and music. They came in like grace before meat, the actual work beginning next morning.

The official reports show

to be in excellent condition, though there is an apparent falling off in numbers. The falling off is only apparent, not real, for the whole rank and file are in better working order than ever before, and are in a position to throw more force into their movements. An unusual number of unions have taken up special lines of work with gratifying success. The spirit of the convention was excellent throughout. Its work was done with all eyes forward.

County presidents, whose jurisdictions are usually larger than the districts of eastern states, were given ten minutes each and superintendents of departments five, to report. Great interest has been taken this year in scientific temperance instruction, to which Mrs. Eyster's lectures in the schools have contributed largely. Eight counties are reported working for No-license, while a high license wave is sweeping others. The president's annual address was as usual reviewing the past and outlining the future, impressing all who heard it with the loss sustained by those less fortunate. Another strikingly thoughtful address was that of Mrs. S. C. Sanford, in which woman's capacity to deal with the money question and the relation of the liquor traffic to the same were clearly portrayed.

The election next morning resulted in the choice of president, Mrs. B. Sturtevant Peet; recording secretary, Mrs. Dorcas J. Spencer; corresponding secretary, Mrs. H. E. Brown; treasurer, Mrs. Emily Hoppin; auditor, Mrs. S. C. Sanford. Reports of departments filled the day, and in the evening Miss Severance gave a most effective and somewhat satirical address on "Metis and Pallas Athene," making these classical myths typical of men and women of to-day, followed by a strong presentation of the questions of the hour by Mrs. E. G. Greene, from the text, "Let my people go."

Thursday morning contained the reports.

THE MEMORIAL SERVICE

in the afternoon, conducted by Mrs. S. J. Churchill, ex-president of the state, was tender and beautiful. Memories of Mary Allen West were brought in as precious offerings, while mention was made of our own dear departed, gone from service here to the reward of higher service beyond.

Thursday evening's program required the Music Hall for the accommodation of the audience who came to see the

"EXTRA SESSION OF THE CALIFORNIA LEGISLATURE."

It must be seen to be appreciated and ought to be seen everywhere there are people to be instructed in the principles of equal suffrage. It represents a legislature of women, before whom a bill to give school suffrage to men is brought. Though it appeared to many to be a burlesque, every argument adduced had been actually used by the real legislature of the state, when the bill for school suffrage for women was before them; but reversed, nothing could exceed the humor of the situation. The fun and logic of it were equally irresistible, and the old familiar, time-worn arguments appeared too ridiculous ever to have had the serious consideration of intelligent minds. The author, Miss S. M. Severance, has changed her address from Gilroy to College Park, Cal. This entertainment may be given profitably to the cause and the funds anywhere. It has netted seventy-five dollars at each representation, at this convention and at the school of methods. It may be abbreviated to suit a smaller number of participants.

Friday evening was occupied with the contestants representing each a different county and some of them traveling in this state of magnificent distances hundreds of miles to take part. It was poetic justice that the medal should be awarded to the boy whose journey had been longest, by land and sea, nearly 400 miles—but acknowledged merit justly won. The convention gave due credit to the state paper, The Pacific Ensign, now completing its third year. It has been from the beginning a widow's cruse enterprise; it has been carried as a work of faith—not faith without works, and by dint of unexampled devotion and untiring effort is kept out of debt, and a strong factor in the state work.

While the convention is the burden of this letter, it by no means represents all that should be recorded here. New evidence is continually brought before the court of public opinion to show the advance of temperance sentiment. My last letter was written during

THE LADIES' ENTRANCE AGITATION.

Our appeal to the city authorities of San Francisco, to withhold license from any saloon having a ladies' entrance, was deferred and postponed by all the usual devices of procrastination, but meanwhile the measure became so popular that something must be done; even its opponents recognized and feared the clamor for it, until, in self-defense, the German saloon-keepers' union itself petitioned for an ordinance closing the ladies' entrances. The petition was heard and the ordinance granted, which while relieving our streets of the public disgrace of these signs, does not satisfy the temperance people. It is the traditional half loaf.

The excessively high license of Mercer county has been declared by the courts unconstitutional, because it is practically prohibition; but it has served as a high license measure, and always will, to obstruct better methods and hinder the cause.

The Pacific

which is doing a most excellent work for fallen girls, has honored itself and done an act of justice by taking the name of its benefactor, and will hereafter be known as the "Florence Crittenton Rescue House." Mr. Crittenton having long since been its chief support, it has now taken the name of his little daughter, to whose memory such benefactions are the noblest monument.

The women of San Francisco are now up to their eyes in a MOVEMENT TO INFLUENCE THE PRESS

of the city in the right direction—the following petition explains itself:

TO THE NEWSPAPERS OF THE CITY OF SAN FRANCISCO:

We, the women of California, present you this petition, which we believe represents the convictions of many times the number of those whose names are subscribed. We recognize that the newspaper is indispensable in our homes, and as the guardians of family purity we make this appeal.

We approve of our papers in their energy and enterprise, but we believe the time has come for them to take a higher stand on the question of public morals. We deplore in them "sensationalism," not the exposure of crime. We deplore "personalities," not the public announcement of personal acts. We believe that it is a minority of your readers who demand sensational, personal or immoral details, rather than the clean statement of facts and truth. There is too often a minuteness of detail in the reports given of crime, wickedness and sensuality, which can gratify only prurient and vulgar curiosity, or awaken such curiosity in innocent and inexperienced minds. We feel that spreading broadcast vicious and debasing news in our homes and among our children, and the consequent knowledge and easy familiarity with crime in all its forms, has a tendency to lower the tone of thought among the best of our people, and to strengthen the worst instincts among the morally lower classes.

We therefore most earnestly and respectfully petition the press at this time to make a concerted effort to elevate the moral tone of their columns, and to give us newspapers free from the evils we deplore, feeling confident that the majority of the public will encourage such an effort, and promising you our heartfelt co-operation and support.

Women of every degree are signing it and it is quite edifying to see such unanimity of purpose. The unions throughout the state are aiding in the work. If every woman assisting will further pledge herself to admit no newspapers but the cleanest to her home, much good will be done.

The W. C. T. U. of California memorialized the National Editorial Association to the same end last year, and has passed similar resolutions upon all occasions. The general interest in this action is gratifying.

Preparations for the mid-winter fair have begun, and next to consider are the congresses, which it is hoped to make a distinguishing feature of the occasion.

A woman's board has been appointed and the W. C. T. U. will not fail to be there.

MASSACHUSETTS.

ECHOES AND RE-ECHOES.

It would doubtless be far better for the just reporting of Massachusett's doings if her state reporter were not so fully in the center of these doings as to leave no time for their chronicling. The space between letters seems growing longer and longer, and I am beginning to feel that some one with larger leisure would better occupy this post.

The silence, this time, however it may have appeared to those from without, has been a most eloquent silence—eloquent with deeds—to those of us who have viewed it from the inner charmed circle of Massachusetts white-ribbonhood.

July and August were here, as elsewhere, very largely observed as vacation months by our busy workers. From the seashore, from the mountains, from quiet country nooks and from the splendor of the great Columbian Exposition, our workers came crowding back to take up gladly the duties of a new month and a new year.

THE COUNTY CONVENTIONS, were of necessity compressed within the limits of the month of September, since our state convention had been set for October 3, 4 and 5, in order to make way for the early occurrence of the National and World's Conventions. The convention of Essex county led the van and occurred August 30, in the good old town of Marblehead. Franklin county followed September 6, at Shelburne; Dukes and Nantucket captured Cottage City, September 7. Hampshire county met at Enfield, September 8; Barnstable at Orleans, September 12 and 13. Worcester North and Hampden each claimed September 15, the former meeting at Hampden and the latter at Indian Orchard. Worchester South followed at Uxbridge, September 16; Norfolk county at Holbrook, September 20; Suffolk at Chelsea and Plymouth at Hull on the 21st; Bristol at Somerset on the 22d, and Middlesex at Woburn on the 28th. This closes the list, with the exception of Berkshire county, which was postponed till after the state convention and will occur November 7, in the beautiful town of West Stockbridge.

The attendance upon these conventions has been large, the enthusiasm full and contagious, and the exercises of so practical a nature as to leave no one in doubt that the prime motive of such gatherings is to fit our workers for more and better service.

It was manifestly impossible for our state president to be in attendance upon each one of these conventions. She met with the larger number, but several were obliged to content themselves with lesser lights.

In a state so well stocked with speakers as is Massachusetts, there need never be an absolute lack of some one from outside the county to bring to it fresh cheer. Five of the entertaining unions have been organized within the past two years; three within the year. A very pleasant feature of Hampden county's convention was the presentation by the president, Mrs. M. L. Kneil, of a china cake plate, beautifully painted by herself, to the union making the largest pro rata gain in membership for the year. It was received by the Hamilton union of Springfield, which is the only union of colored women within the bounds of the state, and their gain had been one hundred per cent.

From the inspiration and cheer of these lesser gatherings we came up with new strength to at Springfield, October 3, 4 and 5. It was, indeed, a feast which awaited us. Everything seemed to conspire to make those days for us a glorious impulse and a precious memory. The weather was ideal, and beautiful Springfield was at just that perfect point of beauty when the foliage is beginning to catch the glory from the other side of its own river of death—fit type of that which should fill our lives as we, too, near the stream. The details of work were all admirably planned and executed; the white-ribbon seemed the magic sesame which threw open to us the doors of the most charming homes and made us the recipients of a hospitality as dainty as it was lavish. The mayor, the clergy and the citizens as a whole came forward with both words and deeds of cheer; while our own women, bless them! were there as everywhere else "instant in season and out of season" in promoting the welfare of their guests and the interests of our cause.

The executive board had resolved last year that, if possible, its own duties should be rendered less arduous by the holding of ante-executive meetings. Therefore, that august body proceeded to the rendezvous on Monday, October 2, holding sessions that afternoon and evening in the vestry of Trinity M. E. Church, and thereby so greatly facilitating matters that but three other sessions were necessary before the close of the convention, whereas, in other years each moment of release from convention duties has meant the rushing to executive meetings.

The convention itself was held in State street Baptist church, very centrally located and admirably planned for such a gathering. The session of Tuesday opened at 11 a. m., and consisted in the appointment of committees, the reading of reports, a devotional service conducted by Miss Louise Manning Hodgkins, for fourteen years professor of English literature at Wellesley college, and the usual miscellaneous business. In the afternoon Miss Hodgkins reported the last meeting of the B. W. T. A., of which she was an eye-witness; the vice-presidents were introduced, making brief and bright remarks; the president gave her masterly address, and the corresponding secretary and treasurer their annual reports. usually full program, occupied the time till an unusually late hour.

In the evening came addresses of welcome from Mrs. Penfield and Mrs. Merrill for the Springfield unions; from the pastor of the church, Rev. Mr. Hahn, and from Mayor Kendrick, on behalf of the city. The responses were by Mrs. Abby F. Rolfe, and Mrs. Myra L. Higgins for the Y branch.

Then came Mrs. Livermore's address on "The New Aristocracy," which can only be fittingly described by the adjective, magnificent. It seemed to those who heard as if the weight of her seventy-two years could in no true sense be counted as years of age, but as years of constantly deepening, growing, glad, perpetual youth. The audience which listened to her was an immense one, hardly an available inch of standing room being left in the large church, and we are sure such seed-sowing could not have been lost.

Wednesday morning was crowded to the brim with reports of superintendents, election of officers and all the routine business of our busy days. The old board of officers was elected with a cheerful unanimity of thought which augurs well for the work of the coming year. The devotional hour of that day was led by Mrs. Mead, president of Mt. Holyoke College.

The afternoon was given up wholly to the Y's, under the able leadership of Mrs. Higgins. It is difficult to conceive of a more enjoyable afternoon. Mrs. Higgins reported the year's work, which showed both a deepening of purpose and progress along all lines. The Somerset Y was represented by the president of the senior class of Wellesley College. Our own Ida Clothier, who was unexpectedly with us, spoke upon the relation between the Y. P. S. C. E. and Y. W. C. T. U.

A paper by Miss Penfield, of Springfield, was read upon "Temperance Work Abroad," and then came a unique feature evolved by the combined genius of Mrs. Higgins and Miss Mabel Gifford, of Abington, and called "The Lament—five discouraged workers."

The power of Anna Shaw is too well known to the readers of THE UNION SIGNAL to render any attempt at description necessary. When I say that she spoke that evening upon "The Fate of Republics," I have said all that need be said to insure an audience exhausted with laughter, while at the same time convinced by relentless logic.

Thursday was filled to the brim with appointments of delegates to the National; report of resolutions committee, and the thousand and one things which, in spite of one's best efforts, are crowded into the last day. The chairman of the resolutions committee was Mrs. E. Trask Hill, editor of The Woman's Voice, and the unflinching champion of our public school interest. As might have been expected with such a chairman the resolutions were clear, strong and fearless, and although they were received with the usual bustle and sharpening of wits which marks that hour as one of the brightest and most pleasant in the convention, they were finally adopted with but few alterations, save verbal ones, and taken together form a grand platform upon which to stand for the coming year.

The devotional exercise of Thursday was led by Mrs. Emily L. McLaughlin. In the afternoon came the memorial service, which was unusually impressive. The roll of promoted ones was a long one, and there were many tear-filled eyes all over the church as the corresponding secretary read the names. Mrs. Cheney spoke feelingly of Mrs. M. E. F. Waitt, secretary of Suffolk county and superintendent of press work for the state; Miss Caswell, of Jennie Casseday; Mrs. Stevenson, of Mary Allen West; Mrs. Fessenden, of Captain Phillips, an honorary member devoted to our cause, and father of Mrs. I. L. Montgomery, president of Bristol county.

A vesper service had been announced for the last evening, but, owing to the fact that our prima donna, Mrs. Alice J. Harris, was already in Chicago preparing for the musical direction of the National and World's Conventions, it was given up, and our twentieth annual convention closed with the memorial service.

It is impossible in so hurried a review to touch upon all the delightful happenings. It was especially pleasant to have with us Mrs. Forbes, president of the Connecticut union, and to listen to her words of cheer. It was good to send greetings to the oldest member of our state union, Mrs. Swan, of Lee, Berkshire county, who will be 101 next January, through her granddaughter—an active and interested member of the convention. It was good to look upon our new state banner with its inspiring motto: "We ourselves must pilgrims be—launch our Mayflower." It was good to hear the record of fifty new unions organized during the year with at least half that number of towns awaiting the visit of an organizer. It was best of all to see the spirit of love and the oneness of purpose which prevailed from first to last, and to realize that this love comes down from the divine love and life, in whom we have been planning, striving and living for the year just closed. That grace, that love, that life are sufficient for all that lies before us in the untried year. "In the name of our God we will set up our banners."

Already there are deeds to chronicle. On the Sunday following the convention Mrs. Fessenden spoke in Dedham and secured thirty-one names for a union which she is to organize immediately upon her return from the National. On the same Sunday Mrs. Mary T. Howes went way up into the hill-country of Franklin country and organized unions at Heath and Charlemont.

Mrs. M. E. A. Gleason spent three days of that week in Taunton, visiting the schools and addressing them upon the subject of tobacco and narcotics. She made twenty half-hour addresses in the three days. One of the twenty addresses was given in Taunton Music Hall, where 1200 children from six grammar schools assembled. They listened with such interest, and so won Mrs. Gleason's heart, that she promised them the account of that meeting should be sent all over the world. How else shall such an end be accomplished save through the columns of THE UNION SIGNAL? These meetings were gotten up by the Taunton W. C. T. U.—but the superintendent of schools, Mr. Boyden, gave such valuable assistance that too much cannot be said by way of thanks and praise. To have Mrs. Gleason visit the public schools with her valuable addresses is becoming quite "the thing" in W. C. T. U. circles throughout New England. We wish it might be the world over, for such a visitation can but be rich in results.

The corresponding secretary spent Sunday, the fifteenth, at West Boylston, at the annual meeting of the Y organized there by herself a year previous. On Monday she went to the beautiful old town of Lancaster. The little union there has existed for about five years with only four members, and somehow it seemed as if no more could be secured. But the faith of one or two took hold on something better, and on Monday a parlor meeting and five o'clock tea was held at the house of the secretary and the union straightway increased 150 per cent. Beginning with four members it closed with ten. Those ten mean to take hold for ten more before next state convention.

IDAHO'S YEARLY GATHERING.

Idaho's seventh annual convention was held at Pocatello, September 22–25. The convention opened Friday evening, September 22, in the Baptist church, with President Mrs. Black in the chair.

THE DECORATIONS

of the church made every white-ribboner feel proud indeed to be a wearer of the pure emblem. I think we all felt that the sweet face of our National president, as she looked upon us from her prominent place upon the wall, was an inspiration, and the picture of the beautiful Temple upon the easel was a constant reminder of the indomitable spirit of Mrs. Carse. We were pleased, too, to see two L. T. L. banners confronting us, one, the National, which we bore away with pride last year to keep at least for one year, and the other the state banner, while the numerous mottoes and abundant decorations with the stars and stripes made us feel that patriotism was one order of the day.

After the usual opening exercises of music by the choir, to which much credit is due, Scripture reading was given by Mrs. Talbot, superintendent of evangelistic work, followed by prayer.

ADDRESSES OF WELCOME

were given by Mrs. Lyon and Revs. Luck and Smith; in the absence of Mrs. Turner, of Hailey, Mrs. R. Mitchell, of Idaho Falls, responded with a short address. Telegrams of greeting were received and read from Virginia and Colorado state conventions; we then had the pleasure of listening to the reading of which was a manifestation of her thorough understanding of the great need of this broad work for humanity, "Free coinage of silver" being the paramount question among the voting population of the west, she aptly writes, "Why not turn the $1,000,000,000 which is yearly spent for liquor into legitimate lines of trade, thus increasing the amount per capita at least $15" which would help solve the financial problem.

The appointments of the committees by the president was then read.

The session was opened at 9:30 Saturday morning, with a consecration meeting. In the absence of the recording secretary, Mrs. Jeannette L. Ogden, of Shoshone, was elected recording secretary pro tem.

REPORTS.

The report of the corresponding secretary, Mrs. Mary E. McGee, of Nampa, was read. It is a matter of regret that only thirteen out of twenty-five unions in the state responded to this call to send report of work done. We work under many difficulties in Idaho, difficulty in traveling being one of the great drawbacks; and the long distances between unions with expensive railroad rates, all tend to impede the progress of our work, and we do not have the number of live workers to enthuse us that we need. We cannot report an altogether progressive year.

The treasurer's report was read by Mrs. S. E. Crow, state treasurer of Idaho Falls. She reported eleven unions only as having paid state dues; after the yearly expenses are deducted the treasury is low, not sufficient to pay for the printing of our state minutes.

Mrs. R. Mitchell, state organizer, state superintendent of legislative work, and state superintendent of L. T. L. work, said: "Traveling in Idaho is expensive, dangerous and difficult. To know it as it is one must go over it in like capacity, bearing the banner of the white cross: The peace on earth and good-will toward men." This faithful worker is not a young woman, nor yet a middle-aged woman, but is in the even time of life when the shadows grow long, the hair whitens, and the form bends, yet for the convention year, 1893, she has held thirty-one women's meetings, thirty children's meetings, eighty one public meetings and traveled 3,285 miles in Idaho, organizing some new unions.

Her report of legislative work is as follows: "We secured the raising of the age of consent for the protection of our girls from ten to fourteen years, tried to get it to eighteen, but could not get it above fourteen; secured the passage of a bill in both houses giving married women better property rights, but the governor vetoed it; secured the passage of a bill prohibiting craps gambling; secured the presentation of a bill asking for an amendment to the state constitution which would give women equal suffrage rights, to be submitted to the people at our next general election, but it was lost in the house, where it originated, by only two votes; secured the introduction of a bill asking for an appropriation to found a state industrial home for homeless and orphan children, where they might be trained for useful occupations, that they might be able to earn an honest living. The bill was utterly lost, with the apology 'No money for such purposes.' The teaching of scientific temperance is compulsory in our public schools."

CONVENTION EVENTS.

Memorial services were held for two of the white-ribbon band, members of the Idaho Falls union.

Saturday evening the exercises consisted of a Demorest medal contest, by the state L. T. L.; the medal was awarded to Maggie Forest, of Pocatello.

Sabbath morning temperance sermons were preached by the pastors in their respective churches. On Sabbath afternoon was held a children's mass meeting, conducted by Mrs. R. Mitchell; the prize banner was awarded the Shoshone L. T. L.

Sabbath evening a union meeting was held, conducted by Mrs. Holbrook, of Blackfoot, Mrs. Black being unable by illness to be present. "Sabbath Observance" was the subject treated by the three pastors and Mrs. Mitchell. At the close of the services a solo was beautifully rendered by Mrs. Hilton, of Pocatello.

On Monday morning the business consisted principally of the election of officers for the year, which resulted as follows: For president, Mrs. R. Mitchell, of Idaho Falls; vice-president, Mrs. Eva Barton, Caldwell; corresponding secretary, Mrs. Mary E. McGee, Nampa; recording secretary, Mrs. Jeannette L. Ogden, Shoshone; treasurer, Mrs. Sarah E. Crow, Idaho Falls, after which followed the election of the superintendents of departments.

It is with regret that we learn that Mrs. Black, who has been our president for three years, is soon to leave Idaho.

A very enjoyable feature of the occasion was a reception given the delegates, the local union and ministers and their wives at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Shoemaker on Monday night, where the "good-byes" were said. Too much cannot be said of the kind hospitality of the people of Pocatello, who so generously opened their hearts and homes to the white-ribboners.

State Recording Secretary.

MRS. SARAH H. BLACK, former president of Idaho W. C. T. U., has removed to Johnson, Washington, where her husband has been called to take charge of the Presbyterian church.

MRS. E. B. INGALLS, National superintendent of narcotics, has been quite ill since Convention. Her correspondents will know that this is the cause of the delay in her replies to their letters.

MRS. JUDITH ANDREWS, of Boston, a devoted friend of Pundita Ramabai, sailed November 18 for Europe, expecting to reach Poona, India, at Christmas. She bears with her many messages of encouragement and tokens of affection to the brave worker in far India.

MRS. M. J. BORDEN, president New Mexico W. C. T. U., has for the past two weeks been speaking very acceptably for the Prohibitionists in the Iowa campaign. She will speak under the auspices of the W. C. T. U. for two weeks in Nebraska and Colorado before returning to her own field.

MISS LOTTA G. CHENEY gave the address for the Monroe county W. C. T. U. convention at Rochester, N. Y., November 15. During the months of January and February she will respond to calls in the state of Iowa. Any W. C. T. U. desiring to engage her can do so by addressing Mrs. Louise C. Holmes, Apalachin, Tioga county, N. Y.

IT gives regret to learn that Mrs. J. C. Bateham, superintendent of Sabbath observance, has been ill since Convention. She writes November 8 that she is now better, and hopes to have her annual report, containing also plans for the new year, ready by the twentieth. It can be ordered (two cents each), as all other Sabbath literature, of Mrs. J. C. Bateham, Williamsburg, Ky.

IT IS pleasant news to the many friends Miss Frances E. Griffin made in the West last year that she has located in Chicago at 69 Maple street. No audience that has listened to Miss Griffin ever found the hour of her address dull. There is no woman in the W. C. T. U. lecture field with her peculiar combination of wit and gravity, of sense and non-sense. Associations within a day's journey would do well to secure Miss Griffin's services before she goes further west after the new year.

MOTHER DOWNS, of New Jersey, has a worthy successor in her daughter, Mrs. Louise Downs Quigley. The local union in Orange, of which she is president, has "won its widening way" in the past year; it has now seventy-five new members, and has expended $1,500 in local work. One minister out of twenty-four is favorable to its work! New Jersey prejudice against the work of women, and New York and New Jersey politics and whisky combined, are not encouraging features of the work. Mrs. Corbin, a sister of General Grant, is treasurer of the society, and one of its most level-headed members. Her comrades say she "is a woman with brains enough and business ability enough for National treasurer."

ATTENTION, WHITE-RIBBONERS.

DEAR SISTERS:—While feeling greatly honored that a majority of the delegates of the last Convention expressed their confidence in me by electing me to serve you as treasurer for the coming year, it is with great reluctance that I assume its duties. Many circumstances will make it a difficult position. First, it is not only an empty treasury, but a debt of eleven hundred dollars must be lifted. Again, I find that the yearly receipts for the last five years have not met the expenses, but the treasurer has been compelled to draw about one thousand a year from the five thousand dollar bonds, that we had hoped to keep as a nest egg. This fund has all been exhausted and we have no reserve fund to fall back upon. I mention this to show the women the great need in which we stand to-day. The dues are usually not paid until the last of the year, but the expenses must be met each month. This can easily be done if we have a reserve fund to draw upon, but very difficult if the treasury is empty. I find by looking over Miss Pugh's report that nearly every state paid less dues into the treasury last year than the year before. The financial panic will account for this, perhaps, and though but a small amount in each case, it makes a great difference in the aggregate and is keenly felt at headquarters. Cutting down of appropriations became a necessity and the committee were wise in recommending it, yet we know our faithful superintendents will be greatly embarrassed thereby. This we exceedingly regret.

Allow me to urge our state presidents to have sent, as early as possible, a portion of the dues, and not wait until next summer or fall, thus necessitating a loan with heavy interest. The report of last year shows a large amount of interest paid on borrowed money. This may be necessary to some extent, but should be kept at a minimum, and as soon as possible be avoided. Now, my sisters, may I ask every one of you to help; send dues, send contributions, if possible, and above all pray the Lord of the harvest to move upon the heart of some good friend of our cause to come to the rescue of our depleted treasury. I see all our churches are mourning over a great falling off in missionary funds, so ours is not the only cause suffering. An heroic united effort will bring us out all right and our work must not suffer. Trusting you will one and all realize the great need for diligence, and that I may hear from you very soon, I am,

Yours for earnest work,
HELEN M. BARKER,
Treasurer Nat'l W. C. T. U.

MR. HOBBS AGAIN.

From time to time Mr. J. B. Hobbs rushes into print with statements about the W. C. T. U. that cannot be corroborated. Some of these statements have been sent broadcast to almost every union in the land.

Query.—Has any one, man or woman, come into possession of the mailing list that belongs exclusively to the W. C. T. U. publishing house?

Several times, in these newspaper articles given as interviews or otherwise, Mr. Hobbs has expressed or implied very serious charges against Miss Willard, the trusted and beloved leader of the World's and National Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

In a recent open letter, Mr. Hobbs accuses Miss Willard with issuing an "edict," that "all women opposed to the Temple scheme must be put out, and those who favor it put in." This statement is like many the gentleman has made.

The Temple was first proposed to the National union in 1887, at Nashville, Tenn., the merest outline of the plan being given. At that Convention were state presidents east and west who favored a change in the office of corresponding secretary. Many votes were then cast for other candidates.

The main reason why a change was favored in 1887 and in 1893 was because perfect harmony did not exist between the National president and the secretary.

At Atlanta, Ga., in 1890, the lack of harmony and coöperation was so apparent that the matter came before the executive committee for adjustment. Here almost a hundred votes favored a change.

Are such conditions so unusual in organizations as to cause comment? When changes are made, must unworthy and ulterior motives be ascribed? All this had no more connection with the Temple than with the moon, but the gentleman evidently has "Temple-on-the-brain," and to his diseased condition all things seem to revolve around that one point. The present incumbent has never been an enthusiast for the Temple, as all white-ribboners know, yet she was handsomely elected. Why? because she would work in harmony with the head and the majority of the organization, and not officially oppose any affiliated interest of the W. C. T. U. Simply that, and nothing more!

For changes made in other offices, the reasons were equally potent and justifiable even though not published.

Mr. Hobbs claims that Mrs. Carse manipulated all elections in the interest of the "Temple ring." Astonishing wisdom! Mrs. Carse had no more to do with changes in the National union than Mr. Hobbs himself. He is certainly convinced by this time that neither he, nor those in collusion with him, had much influence in our National Convention.

We advise the good brother to let the W. C. T. U. and all its enterprises alone for a season. Such paternal solicitude becomes wearisome when children are well matured.

CLARA C. HOFFMAN.

WORK AMONG FOREIGNERS.

SUGGESTIONS.

DEAR SISTERS:—As the departments were many of them unreported at the Convention for lack of time, I think it best to attempt to supplement this with a word of greeting and a few suggestions about the work. I cannot think that I am alone in feeling that this is a time of peculiar difficulty; and I would say of discouragement, if one who is doing the Lord's work had any right to feel discouraged. But we must not even use that word. I know, too, that many of you feel that this is a hard department to work in, but there I believe you to be entirely mistaken. If you were to go to India, Africa, or China, you would think you were doing excellently if you made one convert a month, even if you gave your whole time and strength. Now sit down and calculate closely how much time or strength or money do you really give to this missionary work at home? How many of our foreign-speaking people do you try to interest in temperance or in gospel truths by personal speaking or by the personal distribution of leaflets that would have an influence on them? After you have calculated this will you feel discouraged that your efforts have not borne more fruit? Will you not rather be surprised that as much is accomplished as there is when you have done so little? God can only work through human agencies and He will convert these people to right views if you will sow the seed and speak the word. Every community must work according to the kinds of people living in it. Some are miners, some lumbermen, some farmers, some laborers on railroads or in other occupations; but all these people have human hearts and immortal souls; all can and will be touched by kindly deeds and pleasant words. Nearly all will gladly receive leaflets in their own language given with a smile or a good word. The ministers among our foreign friends exert a greater influence on them than ours do on us, and it is of the greatest importance to secure their good-will and to interest them in the work. I have never known them to refuse to distribute our leaflets among their people after reading them; if approached right, they can be made our friends and allies.

I have heard of a plan which a Chicago union is trying, which I hope will prove an excellent one. That is, to adopt a saloon. If each union would adopt a saloon as that union has, or in states where the open saloon does not exist, but the club-house or joint does, it might work a great good. They let the saloon-keeper know that they are praying for him and for the men that frequent the saloon. Then they ask politely if they may keep his saloon supplied with good reading matter, sending both English and German and Bohemian tracts, a constant supply, changing the kinds so as to give a variety. I have not heard of the result as they only began two months ago, but I recommend it as seeming to be a most practical plan for good. I know in one place in Wisconsin a saloon-keeper asked for foreign tracts, for he said the people were so pleased to see anything in their own language. Try it. The saloon-keeper may not be as glad after awhile.

I am glad to note that our women are sending for tracts on very many subjects pertaining to our various departments, glad because it denotes that they are awakening to the fact that our foreign friends need cultivating along all these lines. But it is impossible for me to keep such a very great variety, unless there is a still greater demand for them. Every separate leaflet costs me from fifteen to thirty dollars, and I will probably not sell enough of that one kind in two years to pay the cost. I now have about one hundred and thirty-five different kinds, and so many of each that they take up a great deal of room in my house. Yet if I could only sell them I would be glad to meet any demand possible to be made for every department.

I have published this year ten new tracts. In Norwegian and Danish these are "Unfermented Wine," by Rev. Ostergren, and "Relation of Intemperance to Labor." In German,—"Should Alcohol be Used at the Lord's Table," by Mary Allen West; "Is the American Sabbath in Danger," "Workingmen and Liquor," and "Objections to Woman's Suffrage Answered," by Rev. D. Lowther. In English—"Reasons Why Women Should Have the Ballot," by Rev. D. Lowther, and "Our Alien Voters," by Mrs. Grubb. In Swedish—"Unfermented Wine," by Rev. Ostergren. In Spanish—"Temperance," a new edition of an old tract. I have attempted to get out two other Spanish tracts, but have failed to hear from our translator, Professor Rodrignez, of Vanderbilt University. Besides these I have had many new editions of those on hand printed.

The value of the missionary work at Ellis Island cannot be overestimated; more and more we see that its establishment was inspired by heavenly wisdom. Miss Lindahl is doing an excellent work. Greatly to our regret the order which we secured three years ago, prohibiting the sale of liquor at our ports of entry, has been rescinded by the present administration. I have written to Secretary Carlisle protesting against this action, and to others in authority, so far without avail. The selling of beer to the immigrants changes the whole order of things. Our very teaching in the tracts we send out in the various languages is invalidated, and our government becomes a partner in the crime of liquor selling.

I wrote to Senator Chandler asking him to use his influence to stop the sale of liquor at the port. I received a kind reply to this and a few days ago the following from him containing a reply to a communication he had made to the superintendent. It seems they don't class beer as liquor, while we know that it is among the most deleterious of intoxicants.

"I have to inform you that no spirituous liquors are permitted to be sold on Ellis Island. On July 7, 1893, the privilege-holder at Ellis Island was authorized to sell lager beer in connection with his restaurant privilege, said privilege being subject to such rules and regulations as may be prescribed from time to time by the commissioner of immigration at Ellis Island, with the additional proviso that this right and privilege may at any time be abridged, modified, or canceled at the option of the superintendent or said commissioner of immigration. It was also conditioned that the following words be added to rules three and six—'in such quantity and no more than is actually consumed at each meal.'"

Let us work on sowing the good seed, praying for God's blessing upon it; holding meetings among the people where it is possible and believing that we will get what we work for.

Organizers' Corner.

STATUS OF ORGANIZERS.

The mistaken idea prevails in many portions of the country that a National organizer is fitted only to organize new unions, whereas she must be a public speaker as well, especially prepared to enthuse and instruct the masses in regard to the distinctive features of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. She must be a woman of tact, consecration and knowledge of our many departments, willing to enter difficult fields, enlist new workers, strengthen and enlarge unions already formed as well as organize new ones, and instruct in regard to our special methods. Our National organizers are carefully selected by our National executive committee, and elected by the Convention.

By the coöperation and concerted action of the state and county officers, the stronger unions may help the weaker, and greatly benefit their own work by employing the National organizers while going to and from their distant fields of labor, thereby reducing their traveling expenses, which will enable them to give lower rates at each point.

The following is the list of National organizers for the present year, and whether W's or Y's they are all accredited public speakers and fully prepared to organize W's, Y's, L. T. L's, or speak to the general public and add to the membership of unions, having been long in the work.

For terms and dates address as below:

Mrs. Helen L. Bullock, Elmira, N. Y.

Mrs. L. H. Washington, Port Jervis, N. Y.

Miss Frances E. Griffin, Montgomery, Ala.

Mrs. Mary Byuon Reese, Chautauqua, Wash.

Mrs. Emily Pitt Stevens, 1907 Bush street, San Francisco, Cal.

Mrs. E. A. Blair, 936 Cottage Place, Los Angeles, Cal.

Mrs. Maude L. Green, Manitou Springs, Col.

Mrs. E. Norine Law, Baraga, Mich.

Miss Belle Kearney, Flora, Miss.

Mrs. Delle H. Cox, Newberg, Ore.

Miss Ida Clothier, Manitou Springs, Col.

Mrs. Henrietta Skelton, 132 McAlister street, San Francisco, Cal.

Miss S. C. Harris, Franklin, Va.

Mrs. F. E. W. Harper, Bainbridge street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Miss Clara Parrish, Paris, Ill.

Miss Carrie Lee Carter, Dexter, Mo.

Miss Frances Ensign, Madison, O.

Mrs. E. A. Kenyon, Townshend, Vt.

This "Corner" may be obliged to try several positions before it finds just the niche it can best fill, but it is the desire of the editors of THE UNION SIGNAL, and of the chairman of the board of organizers, that the list of names be kept standing in the paper, and that each organizer feel free to insert an itineracy of her engagements.

Each one is hereby invited to send such material as will help in making out a complete calendar of engagements from time to time.

Below are the reports of the organizers which were prepared for the National Convention, but not read for lack of time. If the other organizers will send in their reports they will be published in this Corner.

MRS. H. SKELTON, California:

On my return from Denver last fall, I did not let the grass grow under my feet, but started right off for one of our far off northern counties as yet unorganized, and got one of our large and important counties wheeled into line in our work. There is railroad only part of the way. The rest has to be traveled by stage at the cost of twelve cents per mile. It takes grit and grace and gumption to go over these steep grades, yet it must be done, so I did it, and we have ten good unions there now with a membership of three hundred and seventy-nine. I have organized just now the very farthest northern county in our state, Del Norte; came from San Francisco, by steamer, seven hundred miles to reach it, taking stage the remainder of the way. I traveled a long distance by trail on horseback to organize a union twenty-five miles away from any station; held during the year seven county conventions, organized sixteen new unions with a membership of five hundred and forty-four, all of which have paid their state dues; added ninety-seven new members to organized unions; also organized fourteen Loyal Legions with a membership of three hundred and seventy-one; traveled during the year two thousand five hundred miles by rail; by stage, one hundred and ninety-seven miles; by steamer, nine hundred and fifty miles. I have been in Oregon right on the border line. It has been a hard year financially. People have given less to our work this year than any year before, so it has been a hard struggle to make even expenses.

NEW BOOKS.

QUESTS. By William H. Seymour. A collection of prohibition poetry suitable for recitation.

Published by the author, Acme Pub. Co., Seattle, Wash.

Sarah Orne Jewett's writings need no introduction to the reading world. Her name under the title of story is an assurance of enjoyment to follow. A NATIVE OF WINBY AND OTHER TALES contains nine of her spicy, quaint, humorous short stories, making an appropriate holiday gift.

Houghton, Mifflin & Company, Boston and New York.

ROYAL HELPS FOR LOYAL LIVING, compiled by Martha Wallace Richardson. This little book is arranged on the usual plan for daily readings—a scripture text, poetical and prose selections, one page devoted to each day in the year. The selections are made with care and are appropriate and helpful.

Thomas Whittaker, 2 and 3 Bible House, New York City.

THE TREASURES IN THE MARSHES, by Charlotte M. Young. Published by Thomas Whittaker, 2 and 3 Bible House, New York City.

Quite an interesting tale founded on the old truth, "The love of money is the root of all evil." The characters are English and the scenes are English. This author is quite well known for previous publications.

THE TEMPERANCE MIRROR for 1893 is a bright publication, issued by the National Temperance League Publication Depot, 33 Paternoster Row, London.

Its pages are filled with temperance stories, poems, dialogues, quotations from noted writers and speakers, recitations for children, reports of work and meetings, etc., etc. It is the bound volume of a monthly magazine, each of whose numbers contains twenty-four pages of good temperance material.

RACHEL STANWOOD. By Lucy Gibbons Morse. A story of the middle of the nineteenth century. The characters about which the most interest of the story centers are the gentle Quakers and the slaves whom they endeavor to free. It is peculiarly interesting, also, to read of the winning over to the side of anti-slavery some whose whole education and prejudices ranked them against the movement for the liberation of the colored people. There is a good deal of detail in the narrative that will prove slightly tedious to some readers, but on the whole the interest is well maintained.

Houghton, Mifflin & Company, Boston and New York.

NO HEROES is the title of a story by Blanche Willis Howard that must claim wide attention. It is a story that can be read in an hour, but it is rare in its originality of style and its most perfect appreciation and depiction of boy-character. A touching, laughable, thoroughly natural, helpful story, that cannot fail in its mission of good.

Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston and New York.

THE ADVENTURES OF A BROWNIE, by Miss Mulock, the author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," is of the nature of a fairy-tale, but so full of wholesome suggestions and sound morals that no young reader can be harmed, but rather benefited by it. It is exquisitely illustrated, and a book that children will hug up in their arms as a dear treasure for snow-bound days and long winter evenings when "mother reads aloud to us."

Thomas Y. Crowell & Co., New York and Boston.

STEPHEN MITCHELL'S JOURNEY is from the pen of "Pansy," whose books have done an incalculable service in moulding the thought of their hosts of young readers. All of Pansy's books are based on the solid rock of gospel verities, and her plots are not woven out of unhealthful and startling unrealities, but of the commonplaces of life which often make tales far "stranger than fiction." The volume in question deals with the development of a young man from something akin to the "clodhopper" pattern into a wide-awake, self-possessed, earnest Christian.

D. Lothrop Company, Boston, Mass.

CHILHOWEE BOYS, by Sarah E. Morrison, has enough of adventure and romance in it to capture the heart of every boy reader, and girl reader, too, for that matter. It narrates the history of "Parson Craig," his wife, five sons and baby daughter, with friends, making in all a party of about twenty, as they journeyed four hundred miles from North Carolina into Tennessee—not by rail, but in wagons, on horseback and on foot. It all took place over eighty years ago and has such a flavor of "old-times" about it as never fails to captivate.

Thomas Y. Crowell & Co., Boston and New York.

ATHEISM AND ARITHMETIC, or MATHEMATICAL LAW IN NATURE, by H. L. Hastings. This is a very strong little publication in answer to questions raised by those who try to doubt the existence of a God. Bound within the same covers is NUMBER IN NATURE, AN EVIDENCE OF CREATIVE INTELLIGENCE, a lecture delivered at New College, London, by Edward White. Each of these is full of fascination for a mathematical mind, and cannot fail of performing their mission in refuting the arguments of infidels.

47 Cornhill, Boston, Mass.

SLEEP AND DREAMS: A Scientific Popular Dissertation. From the German of Dr. Friedrich Scholz, director of the Bremen Insane Asylum. By H. M. Jewett. Also THE ANALOGY OF INSANITY TO SLEEP AND DREAMS, by Milo A. Jewett, M. D.

This is a book easy to read and not difficult to digest. It is written for popular use. While it makes no large demands upon the knowledge of the laity, it will not be an unwelcome contribution to the science of the mind. Sleep, its Cause and its Phenomena, Dreams, Sleeplessness and its Prevention, and the Analogy of Insanity to Sleep and Dreams, are the subjects treated.

Funk & Wagnalls Company, 18 and 20 Astor Place, New York City.

FAMOUS VOYAGERS AND EXPLORERS. By Mrs Sarah K. Bolton. The events of the "Columbian year" have turned people's attention as never before to the great work done by the famous explorers. Mrs. Bolton, who has a decided genius for giving the salient points of history and biography in simple, unaffected and sympathetic style, has chosen for her latest volume the lives of several explorers who were concerned in the discovery of this continent, or whose explorations had a bearing more or less direct upon it. Columbus, Marco Polo, Magellan and Raleigh are the famous commanders whose lives, more fascinating than any romance, she gives with considerable detail. Livingstone and Stanley are chosen as representatives of the heroic attempts to discover the sources of the Nile and at the same time to put an end to the slave trade. The search for the north pole has long resolved itself into successive relief-expeditions to rescue those who have gone to the relief of their predecessors. The annals of discovery nowhere contain such thrilling accounts of perseverance, gallantry, endurance and agonizing sufferings as those which are immortalized by the names of Franklin, Kane, Gilder, Schwatka and Melville. Some of Mrs. Bolton's best work is done in recounting these tremendous enterprises. A quite different scene of adventure is introduced in her story of Perry's visits to Japan, There is great variety in the book which will appeal to all classes of readers. It is illustrated with fine portraits.

T. Y. Crowell & Co., New York and Boston.

The innumerable family of Palmer Cox, the Brownies, make thousands of children rejoice by their good-natured and funny pranks at living like "mortals." The latest Brownie book is entitled THE BROWNIES AT HOME, containing a history of their pranks through twelve months—sleigh-riding, making and distributing valentines, visiting the national capital in March, spring-time frolics in April, helping housewives move and "settle" in May, upon Brooklyn Bridge in June, a July visit to the Old State Home in Philadelphia, a Mississippi boat-ride in August, Chicago in September, a helping hand in the World's Fair, hiding away fruit and vegetables from Jack Frost in October, a grand Thanksgiving feast in November, and poor children made happy by a Christmas Tree in December.

"Do only what is right And keep your heart light," is their farewell motto, and two jubilant mites make their last bow, saying:

"Here ends the series, so we'll say
Good-bye until a later day."

Published by The Century Co., New York City.

Instead of Wasting your time over a steamy, sloppy wash-tub, rubbing away with soap, why don't you use Pearline? In the time that you'd save by it, you might be reading, writing, sewing, playing, visiting, resting, or doing anything else that's pleasant and profitable.

Besides, you won't have that tired feeling that comes of the hard-working, old-fashioned way.

That makes everything that you do, even the resting, uncomfortable. This slow, back-breaking, wearing way of washing with soap is a thing of the past. You'll wonder tnat you stood it so long, when you once see the easiness of Pearline. But beware of all sorts of washing powders—poor imitations of Pearline. They save some work, possibly, but think of the damage they may do. Pearline is the first and only washing compound. The women who have used it from the start will tell you that it's absolutely safe. And never so many women were using it as just now. 408

RELIGIONS OF THE ORIENT.

They were All Represented by their Best Men at the World's Parliament of Religions.

The name of Buddhists ("the enlightened") is applied to the followers of Gavtama Siddhartha, the Sakya Muni, generally called Buddha, a prince of Central India. Founded about 500 B. C., Buddhism is now the chief religion in India beyond the Ganges, China, Japan and Ceylon. Its followers number tens and even hundreds of millions; but, though they and their creed have been the theme for libraries and prose and verse, never until this year was their religion authentically stated in this country by accredited leaders. This occurred at the World's Parliament of Religions, lately held at Chicago, where the most eminent Buddhists of India, China and Japan attended, and from the common rostrum, which was for the time free to all religions, expounded their faith and stated its claim on the consideration of humanity.

The same privilege was accorded to eminent exponents of the Christian faith, in all its manifold denominations, to Mohammedans, Parsees, Shintoists, Hindoos, Brahmins, and indeed to the representatives of every considerable religion on earth. The result was a grand parliament of which Sir Edwin Arnold, Max Müller, Rev. Josiah Strong, Hon. John Wanamaker and many others, lay and clerical, have spoken in the highest terms. The gifted John Ireland, archbishop of St. Paul, said: "The conception of such a religious assembly seems almost like an inspiration."

Although the Parliament of Religions has adjourned and passed into history, a complete and authentic record of the proceedings has been kept and collected into a neat and handsome form which ought to be in the library of every thinking person. We call the attention of our readers to the notice in another column to this volume, which is happily obtainable at a nominal price.

It is an Old English Custom

For pastors, Sunday-school superintendents and teachers to select a motto for the new year, and present a copy of such motto to each of their members.

We think the custom should be a universal one, and are confident that our friends will be glad to avail themselves of this opportunity of securing these mottoes. Placed where they can be seen daily or hourly they will serve as a reminder of the text adopted for the year.

Below we give a list of illustrated texts, in rich coloring, on cards of fine quality:

"Put on the whole armour of God."
"Fear thou not, for I am with thee."
"My grace is sufficient for thee."
"Blessed be the Lord who daily beareth our burdens."
"Cause me to know the way wherein I walk."

THE CROSS AND GRAIL. By Lucy Larcom.

The tradition of the removal into Britain by Joseph of Arimathea, of the cup from which our Lord drank at the Last Supper, and the search for it by the Knights of the Round Table is the familiar story out of which the poem grew.

The frontispiece (see cut) represents the knight of old on his quest. The delicate colors seem to harmonize with the words:

"Sometimes, tinged with radiance strange,
Would the beaker seem to change
To the outline of a cross—
Emblem of life's gain in loss:
Glimpsing, fading like a cloud,
As he stood with forehead bowed."

The book contains other poems by Shakespeare, Longfellow, Whittier, Phœbe and Alice Cary. Illustrated by Dora Wheeler.

GREATER THAN THE FAIR ITSELF

WAS THE

GRAND PARLIAMENT OF RELIGIONS

It is practically impossible to estimate the value to the world of the recent Congress of Religions held in Chicago, under the auspices of the World's Columbian Exposition.

THE WORLD'S FAIR WAS A TRIUMPH OF THINGS MATERIAL.

THIS CONGRESS WAS A SYMPOSIUM OF ALL THINGS SPIRITUAL.

Science, Agriculture, Finance, Health, even Education and Temperance, which were discussed by their ablest representatives, pale into unimportance beside the momentous issues debated by the leaders of religion.

We have been fortunate in obtaining a full and complete Report of this important Congress.

We have all the speeches and debates delivered by the supporters of the various creeds, and we have also secured the portraits of the prominent representatives from all the far-away lands, who were present.

We have made an admirable arrangement for "the people," whereby they can easily obtain these reports.

On receipt of ten cents we will send you Part One of the Report of the proceedings of the "Parliament of Religions" (to be completed in 11 weekly parts.) If you are a subscriber, or become such, we will accept One Dollar ($1.00), in full payment, if remitted at once, for the entire series, and will send you the parts as issued weekly, thus saving you the labor and additional expense of remitting for each number separately.

Cut or copy this coupon and send to THE UNION SIGNAL, The Temple, Chicago,

I hereby inclose ten cents for Part One of the report of the Proceedings of the "World's Parliament of Religions."

Parts 1, 2, 3, 4 and 5 Are Now Ready.

THE PUBLISHERS OF THE UNION SIGNAL

Beg to announce that they have concluded arrangements to furnish their readers with the December number of CURRENT TOPICS. For variety of contents, value of its articles and the distinguished names among its contributors, this magazine has seldom been equaled. The December number should find its way into every intelligent home, and THE UNION SIGNAL brings the opportunity.

FEATURE I.

An Article by PROF. HENRY DRUMMOND, of Glasgow, Scotland. Professor Drummond is one of the most sought after, and certainly one of the most entertaining and instructive writers living. His books, "The Greatest Thing in the World," "Pax Vobiscum," etc., have sold into the hundreds of thousands. His subject in Current Topics is "Three Things in Life."

FEATURE II.

A Symposium Upon the Famous Parliament of Religions.—Specially written articles by the most prominent living representatives of all denominations and shades of religious belief will appear in Current Topics for December. Catholic and Protestant, Jew and Gentile, will all be voiced by recognized leaders. A remarkable candor pervades the articles, and the discussion will doubtless be startling to some and to some even shocking. The ultimate good, however, cannot be denied. Public interest will be kept up as long as the leading thinkers are fighting for opinions which differ so widely that one calls the Parliament "a masterpiece of Satanic ingenuity," and another considers it the greatest missionary movement of the century. The following will contribute to this symposium:

DR. JOHN HENRY BARROWS, Chairman of the Parliament.
REV. JOSEPH COOK.
DR. H. W. THOMAS.
REV. CLINTON LOCKE.
ARCHBISHOP JOHN J. KEANE.
REV. O P. GIFFORD.
REV. FLOYD TOMPKINS.
PROF. N. J. MORRISON.
DR. L. W. BACON.
PROF. MILTON W. TERRY.
DR. WILLIAM ELLIOTT GRIFFIN.
DR. GEORGE DANA BOARDMANS.
RABBI EMIL G. HIRSCH.
PROF. GEORGE S. GOODSPEED.
DR. LYMAN ABBOTT.
HON. CHARLES C. BONNEY.

FEATURE III.

A Memorial of the Late Carter H. Harrison.—This will be accompanied by a fine photogravure of the murdered mayor.

FEATURE IV.

Is the Murderer of Mayor Harrison Responsible?—An article by Hon. A. S. Trude, Chicago's famous criminal lawyer.

FEATURE V.

Assassination a Factor in Politics. By Charles Robinson. Mr. Robinson's active part in the Reform Club of New York has made him well known to the reading public.

FEATURE VI.

Problems for Congress: Silver Tariff and the Geary Law.—These papers are respectively from the pens of the eminently competent writers: Dr. A. S. Core, John M. Stahl and "Meg Merrilies." "Meg Merrilies" is the non de plume of a Californian whose utterances upon the Geary Law should find wide reading.

FEATURE VII.

The Workingman's Need and W. T. Stead's Suggestion.—By "Tommy" Morgan, the famous labor leader.

We have named but seven of the fifteen numbers which make up the magazine for December. Besides the articles upon timely topics it contains well-selected poetry and fiction of a high order. Two Stories in the December number.

By our arrangement with the publishers we can furnish you this number at 10c. Send us five 2c. stamps or 10c. in silver, with coupon attached. No one can afford to miss this offer. We must have your order early. Send TO-DAY. This remarkable December number for 10c. Address

A DEFENSE OF THE JERICHO ROBBERS.

This booklet, by W. W. Satterlee, is a bright bit of irony under the guise of a lawyer's plea for the robbers mentioned in the parable of the good Samaritan. Its application to the arguments urged in favor of licensing the liquor traffic will not need to be pointed out to any one that reads it.

The death of Dr. Satterlee, the author of Jericho robbers, gives a sad interest to this pamphlet. One near to him writes: "I am certain that he was the noblest and purest man that I have ever learned to respect. There is no encomium to great and good men that would be unfitting to his great soul."

The "Defense of the Jericho Robbers" is published by the W. T. P. A. Price 20 cents.

CHRIST always sails in the ship of prayer; He steers safely; He sees the hidden rocks and secret shelves, and needs no star nor compass. He fills the sails of the Church's ship with prosperous gales, to bring her into safety. He turns calm into storms, to obey His church's cry; and raises the waves of the sea, so that saints are glad because of a storm to bring them to a calm haven. Oh, happy storms that drive a saint to heaven! Oh, happy heaven that enjoys a perpetual and everlasting calm.—Lee.

The census returns of England and Wales show an increase in the population as a whole, but a decrease in the agricultural districts, indicating the drift of the rural population to the large cities.

The association of women for raising the moral tone of society in the Netherlands has over four thousand members in the one hundred and ninety-seven places where it is represented. Refuges for young women are maintained very generally.

A contractor and builder in Cambridgeport, Mass., in speaking of the working of local option, says that he notices a great difference for the better in the quantity of work done by his men; also that the decreased cost of supporting drunkards and paupers more than offsets the loss of revenue to the city from licenses.

More than eleven per cent of the medical men trained in that school are "distinct alcoholics."

The Salvation Army gave recently some facts and figures in regard to darkest Glasgow which are appalling. Within an hour on one evening two thousand three hundred and eight men and three hundred and sixty-five women entered eight public houses. Upwards of sixty-seven thousand women were dragged before the courts in one year on the charge of drunkenness or disorderly conduct.

Musical culture among working people has been tried successfully by Charlotte Mulligan in Philadelphia. Beginning with a Sunday-school class of bootblacks, she has had twelve thousand working men in the twenty-eight years. She uses the class for temperance by saying to a man, "You enjoy singing, I see, by the way in which you sing. If you will stop drinking I will teach you to sing."

The Indian Industrial School, located at Carlisle, Pa., had six hundred and sixty-six scholars during the year ending August 31, 1893. Fifty tribes were represented, the largest number coming from the Apache tribe. The resident physician, who is appointed by the government, is Dr. Montezuma, a full-blooded Apache. Taken from the lowest condition of Indian life, his twenty-two years in the Eastern states have made him to-day as cultivated a gentleman as one often meets. The saving system furnishes an opportunity to give all students lessons in economy, thrift and the keeping of accounts. Over twenty-four thousand dollars was earned last year.

FOURTH PRIZE.

Many men of many minds,
Many soaps of many kinds:
Some are better, some are worse,
Some a blessing, some a curse;
Some exist without excuse;
Others for some special use;
But very rarely do we find
All virtues in one soap combined.
Such is the case, though, with the brand
That is now foremost in the land
For Ivory Soap no rival knows
In any quality that goes
To give a special virtue to
A soap that some one thing will do.
The Ivory is itself possessed
Of all the merits of the best;
And now the truth is widely known,
It beats the best on grounds their own.

PATENTS.

NOTICE TO INVENTORS.

There was never a time in the history of our country when the demand for inventions and improvements in the arts and sciences generally was so great as now. The conveniences of mankind in the factory and workshop, the household, on the farm, and in official life, require continual accessions to the appurtenances and implements of each in order to save labor, time and expense. The political change in the administration of government does not affect the progress of the American inventor, who, being on the alert and ready to perceive the existing deficiencies, does not permit the affairs of government to deter him from quickly conceiving the remedy to overcome existing discrepancies. Too great care cannot be exercised in choosing a competent and skillful attorney to prepare and prosecute an application for patent. Valuable interests have been lost and destroyed in innumerable instances by the employment of incompetent counsel, and especially is this advice applicable to those who adopt the "No patent, no pay" system. Inventors who entrust their business to this class of attorneys do so at imminent risk, as the breadth and strength of the patent is never considered in view of a quick endeavor to get an allowance and obtain the fee then due. THE PRESS CLAIMS COMPANY, John Wedderburn, General Manager, 618 F street, N. W., Washington, D. C., representing a large number of important daily and weekly papers, as well as general periodicals of the country, was instituted to protect its patrons from the unsafe methods heretofore employed in this line of business. The said Company is prepared to take charge of all patent business entrusted to it for reasonable fees, and prepares and prosecutes applications generally, including mechanical inventions, design patents, trade-marks, labels, copyrights, interferences, infringements, validity reports, and gives especial attention to rejected cases. It is also prepared to enter into competition with any firm in securing foreign patents.

MEDALS FOR THE RELIABLE.

The Reliable Incubator & Brooder Co., of Quincy, Ill., have been awarded highest honors, medal and diploma on their incubator and brooder combined, and a medal for hot water brooder. This is a very gratifying award, as there were exhibited a large number of incubators. Singularly enough however, the Reliable was the only incubator from the incubator city of Quincy that competed for the prize. We congratulate them on their success.

To write successful Sea Stories one has to be a sailor by experience. W. Clark Russell thus knew all the moods of the ocean and the rig and ways of a ship before he began to write. In this region he is unrivaled. For next year he contributes three sea romances to The Youth's Company.

OUR CRUSADE THANK-OFFERING.

Reigate, England.
Nov 15. 1893

My beloved Comrade:

You would give me ten cents gladly if I told you I was in need and that amount would keep my credit good and help me to success in work to which my hand was set and my heart true. By the same token I do not believe you will deny my plea when I now ask that you (and each one of our white ribbon women) send ten cents to help "make the wheels go round" ~~day~~ in the white ribbon ship of which your love and faith have continued me as captain for 1894. The sea of reform is tempestuous in these days; we have just weathered a strong gale in National finance; the silver wheels are worn to well nigh half their size, the gold are hard to get. Therefore I ask you for that 10 cents by means of which alone we shall be able to pull through the coming year and present ourselves at Cleveland next Autumn to celebrate our 21st birthday without the humiliation of being in debt the year we come of age.

The salaries, appropriations for the Superintendents, running expenses of the headquarters and fund for pioneer work in organizing, require this small gift at once for there is no money to set no going for the new year. But if this letter from your elder (by) sister only serves to deepen the arrest of thought the needed money will come in ten cent instalments and all will be well with us.

Can I etch it with this pen on some specially sensitive convolution of your brain for the heart is all right I feel sure, Send 10 cents to Mrs. Helen M. Barker, Treasurer, National W.C.T.U. Care Women's Temple, Chicago

"Do it and be done with it"!

That last was my blessed Mother's motto in the paying of debts. But is not this a debt, beloved Comrade, to the sacred Crusade memories; a debt to those who languish in the prison house of homes haunted by the drink delusion; a debt to the chubby faced children soon to go forth into the tempting streets; a debt to poor bewildered Humanity; a debt to Christ and the loving-hearted Gospel whose sweet bells sound throughout the world their plaintive but inspiring words: "Not willing that any should perish." (for you will not forget it then!)

Please put this letter in your Bible at the Crusade Psalm (146th) and send your gift as a sacred Thank offering before the 20th Anniversary, Dec. 23d

And may God bless you and yours in the happy Christmas time is the prayer of

Frances E. Willard

A CRUSADE RALLYING CALL.

How changed life has been since those eventful Crusade days! How precious above all utterance, beyond all conception, is every portion in the Spirit light then poured upon the "Daughters of the King!" How anything God has given—health, sickness, youth, age—any power of pleasing or influencing others, every relationship of life, every moment of time, are stamped with the seal of God, and things once dust and dross, now linked with God and eternity, are sacred and priceless.

Who can tell of that baptismal season? As well might one attempt to describe that moment when, led from darkness into light, the soul could say, "My Father and my God."

Then, women who had sat for years at Jesus' feet and learned of him realized for the first time the power of an indwelling Christ. Then was heard a call to special service, in tones as clear as was the voice of the Master to Mary on the resurrection morning, and, following, they were able to join with Bryant in his ecstatic song: "We have had our turn, have been lifted from the darkness of the clod, and for one glorious moment have seen the brightness of the skirts of God."

Such women were renewed, re-created, and went forth obedient to the will and the word of their Lord. The Spirit led on from shore to shore, until there is not a state or territory where the voice is not heard. From shore to shore, until England and Scotland, Ireland and Wales, the continents of Europe, of Asia and of Africa, with the islands of the sea, are bound together with the white ribbon in the name of the Lord.

The Woman's Christian Temperance Union of the World is the lineal descendant of the Crusade. We have more or less observed the anniversary from year to year, but two decades will have passed when it shall come again. We shall be within a single year of our majority—twenty years of mercy and blessing from our Lord. Ofttimes we have grieved Him. "The mistakes of our life have been many, the sins of our life have been more," but He has not cast us off! He bids us come again to the fountain, and receive a fresh enduement of His Spirit for the service of the last year of our minority, that coming to the fullness of our responsibility we may be found "reaching forth unto those things which are before," as we "press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling in Christ Jesus."

Surely not a woman will be unmindful of such proffered blessing! Does some one say, "It will be so near the holidays!" No Christmas was ever so joyous as that on which women celebrated not alone the birth of Christ to the world, but the birth of Christ to power of service in their own souls; when added to gifts bestowed on loved ones of earth, the gift of self was made to Him. Glad should we be that the joy of the one anniversary may illume the other, and will not cease when the New Year shall come, but will be a continual possession, for then "our life shall be hid with Christ in God."

Yours in Crusade bonds,

Mary A. Woodbridge.

THE BROTHERHOOD OF MAN.

BY MARY HUMPHREY.

"We had better not discuss it, dear, since it is one of the comparatively few questions upon which we are not likely ever to agree," and with a very patient, superior sort of a smile the Rev. Arthur Hallam stretched his slippered feet upon the warm hearth, and took another sip of his smoking toddy.

"I know you can take it or let it alone," pursued his wife, "and as long as you do not offer it to our boy I shall not complain. But oh, I should like to see it banished from the table of the Lord!—it is 'the cup of devils' to me, and it cannot be right to use it at that sacred feast."

"That is not for you or me to judge," he returned, loftily. "We must observe the holy ordinance according to its institution. We have sufficient evidence in the Epistles to the Corinthians to show that the wine made use of by them was calculated to intoxicate if taken to excess."

"But that is a question upon which there is so much difference of opinion, how can anyone be sure? I have been told by Mrs. Jacobs, who for so many years, before her conversion to Christianity, kept the Jewish Passover in her father's house, that all fermented liquors, as well as leavened breads, were banished from the Feast. How then could the cup used by our blessed Lord at the Passover Supper have contained anything of an intoxicating character?"

"That is a debatable point, and one upon which the Jews themselves disagree."

"Well, then, let me plead this verse, Arthur," and, her white hands guiding the fluttering leaves, Mrs. Hallam turned to the twenty-first verse of the fourteenth chapter of Romans, and read, with a tremor of intense feeling in her quiet voice: "It is good neither to eat flesh, nor to drink wine, nor anything whereby thy brother stumbleth, or is offended, or is made weak."

"Well," he said, removing his cigar for a moment, and puffing a tiny wreath of smoke upon the perfumed air—for the reverend gentleman was a moderate smoker, too,—smoking and drinking, it is said, go hand in hand.

"What can be clearer?" said his wife, raising her anxious eyes to his calm, immovable face. "Let us have the pure juice of the grape and be on the safe side."

"I invite no stumblers to join me at my fireside, nor do I desire to see them at the Holy Table."

"But, Arthur, there are Christian men to whom the smell and taste of liquor is a terrible temptation."

"Pshaw! Such namby-pamby Christianity as that had better die out and be done with it."

Mrs. Hallam bent low above her sewing, to hide the tears of disappointment gathering in her full, blue eyes. So swiftly down her cheeks they coursed, however, that she rose and folded her work, and stole softly up the staircase, thinking sorrowfully as she went of the "weak brother for whom Christ died."

"What came over you, Mary, to stir up that old total abstinence question again?" Mr. Hallam asked, lightly, as they prepared for rest some three or four hours later.

"O, just a little talk I had with Mrs. Sorley. She says her John is quite himself again—hasn't tasted liquor for four weeks, and she is so happy over it."

"Yes, yes; that's all right for a fellow like him who can't taste a drop without wanting a hogshead."

"But Arthur, he's going to the communion table to-morrow."

"The miserable sot! He is not fit."

"But he is truly penitent."

"Then let him show his penitence by his life."

"As sure as he smells or tastes the wine he will be gone again, and his wife's heart will be broken."

"Mary, you are a perfect fanatic. Please say no more, my dear, or I shall be exceedingly annoyed with you."

And the patient wife was still.

Not many blocks away the object of her anxiety knelt with his wife and children in family prayer, pouring out his heart to God for help to lead a new and a better life.

"I have never presumed to think of kneeling at the blessed table again," he said; "but I feel, somehow, as if God had forgiven me, and as if I might dare to go."

"'He that cometh unto Me I will in no wise cast out,'" quoted Susan Sorley, "and O John, dear John, to think that we shall go there together once more. I am so happy!"

They broke into singing, together:

"Praise to God, immortal praise,
For the love that crowns our days";

and the four walls of their lowly abode gladly gave back the echo, and the children, unreproved, began a joyous shouting, and sunshine fell again upon an all-but-shattered home.

Morning service saw them all in their places, poorly clad, but neat and whole.

How Mrs. Hallam longed to send the tempted man and his wife home with their children when the general congregation dispersed, and the communicants gathered together in the sacred memorial service.

In due time John and Susan Sorley passed up the aisle, and close behind them, her sympathetic heart wrung in an agony of prayer, moved the pastor's wife.

Alas! she was right. John Sorley tasted, and drained the cup to its dregs. Mr. Hallam's face took on a look of infinite disgust; his wife thrust her soft hand into that of the inebriate, with a gentle, sympathetic pressure; Susan Sorley bowed her head upon the altar rails with an exceeding bitter cry; John, afire through every particle of his alcoholized body, rose from his knees and strode like a madman from the church.

The children, scattered through the churchyard, awaited the conclusion of the service. Sorley rushed home, alone, through the house to the top-most story, where, locking himself into an empty room, he flung the key into the branches of an elm forty feet away.

In sore distress, all day and through the long, long night, his wife and friends sought him. With a shudder he heard them plan to drag the pond. So still was he that his hiding-place was not suspected; none dreamed of his refuge in the unused attic. All day he lay, face downward, upon the bare boards, fighting out his desperate battle alone with God.

. . . . . .

"My toddy, Mary, please," said Mr. Hallam, "I have had a most trying day. It is very sad about that poor wretch, of course, but really he is scarcely worth all the worry he has cost. Certainly his wife and family would be better without him."

But the "poor wretch" conquered, by the grace of God, and in the still morning, while the little birds called to their mates, he spoke his wife's name. The ear of love is keen; she was outside his door immediately. "Susan," he said, "I am safe, I am here."

"Thank God," she said, and sank upon the floor, weeping.

Then the wind arose, with timely violence, and the faithful old elm delivered up the key of her master's prison, and husband and wife clung together with a grip as strong as their enduring love.

"Oh John, such a night of agony!"

"Forgive me, long-suffering wife, but I dared not stir. I have been lying still in the hand of God, and He has kept me safe till the demon passed."

Neither of them ever bowed again at the Table of their Lord, and if, at times, their disregard of the command: "This do in remembrance of Me," caused them some unhappiness, they could but humbly plead, "Lord, thou knowest all things," and leave the case with Him.

The day came when the Rev. Arthur Hallam distributed the elements with a shaking hand; when, instead of one glass of toddy, he needed two, and three, and four; then he realized, in his own bitter experience, the brotherhood of man.

THE PRESENT STATUS OF THE TEMPERANCE CAUSE.

BY H. A. SCOMP.

When the Son of Man cometh, shall He find the saloon on the earth? If not, why not? What agency now at work will remove it? Under license, local option and such like measures the saloon flourishes, and the aggregate of sales is yearly growing. These restrictive laws prevail in forty odd states and territories; indeed, in all save the few under state prohibition, yet their presence is not felt in lessening the sum totals of liquors manufactured and consumed. So much for home.

What of the outside world? Beyond the seas we see American liquor and English opium in active rivalry in the work of damning the heathen, a hundred debauchees to one even nominal Christian—and so the work goes on. How long must we proceed on present lines to win?

Most men profess to believe in a regenerated earth at some vague time in the future. Are we tending thitherward now? Will we reach the morning by forever setting our faces toward the night? Such seems to be the logic (?) of most of the Christian world to-day. Men profess to long for the coming of the kingdom of light, yet work and vote for the kingdom of darkness. Do these men suppose that the Lord will suddenly interpose by some miraculous agency to cleanse the earth and purify the hearts of men? Divine interpositions in destroying national evils are of frequent occurrence, but they come as cataclysms to punish and destroy, not to reform. The Almighty arm reaches out at last, not to bless, but to chastise, and who shall abide the day of His coming?

But how are present methods abating or removing the evil? Most men pronounce the saloon a curse; none desire it for a neighbor. All believe that the tiger should in some way be held in by law. Perverted as popular conscience and judgment may be, they have not yet sunk so low as to hold the saloon for a blessing. This popular conscience in regard to the saloon is the basic rock on which our reform is built. When we arraign the saloon for its iniquities, popular conscience pronounces the indictment just and true in every particular. Moreover, no intelligent man expects ever to see a reformed saloon, or to see it other than it now is. Thus far we have a general consensus of opinion. The saloon, moreover, will continue to furnish the most damning arguments against itself. Should all of us die, or desert the cause, the next generation would see an army as vigorous as the present, and far more numerous, facing the saloon and its legions. Parties may come and parties may go, but this antagonism goes on forever.

It is in the matter of methods of dealing with the liquor traffic that our trouble comes. To date we have tried on the negative side personal abstinence in societies whose members abstain from liquors; we have tried pledge circulating and moral suasion in every possible form; we have used press, platform, pulpit, and personal appeal. Millions have pledged themselves to abstinence; thousands have been reclaimed or restrained. Yet the saloon lives on.

Of positive methods: We have tried by legal suasion to eliminate distilled liquors, keeping wine and beer on the "free list"; then we cut off all; we have experimented with prohibition around churches, school-houses, and other public institutions, in school and militia districts, in incorporated towns, in counties, and even in states; we have laid license on the traffic with both light and heavy exactions of revenue; we have shut it up to well-defined areas; we have prescribed to it hours and days and places; we have set police to guard its place of sale, and watchers to guard its stills; we have prohibited it from minors, women, negroes and Indians; we have sealed it and bonded it; we have stamped it and taxed it; inebriate asylums and Keeley institutes are at work; yet with all these elements of antagonism the traffic grows year by year.

Singularly enough, none of these opposing forces has attempted to seal up the fountain of evil—the manufacture of liquor. Under government control (?) the production has increased several fold. Taxation only makes the traffic stronger, and it has been itself recently calling upon Congress to increase its tax, perhaps the only industry (?) since time began which has ever made such a petition. Its syndicates have monopolized all the commercial parts of the business, from the stave and barrel factories of Wisconsin, and the growing grain of the West, to the saloon on the street corner. We have not another business so complete in its every detail, and so compact and thorough in its organization. Its political organization is no less complete than its economic. Its well-trained lobbies besiege, threaten, bribe, or cajole Congress and the state legislatures. Great political parties have been brought to their knees before this traffic; courts of justice are defiantly overridden; the Sabbath has been outlawed; the statutes of the nation and of the several states are contemptuously set aside; police officials have been bribed or bullied into connivance; the daily press has been bought outright; the murder of ministers and temperance champions brave enough to stand for the right is condoned, while the reputation of those who effectively oppose the wicked traffic has been blackened to the full limit of defamation. Suborned witnesses and jurors, bribed attorneys and press correspondents have helped on the hellish work. Dynamite, poison, arson, the pistol and the knife have been brought into requisition. Great churches have been intimidated and their ministry practically silenced. All this and more.

How has all this fearful ascendency been acquired by the liquor power? Unhesitatingly we answer: By money. How can the trade elect a president? By its money. How can it decide congressional and legislative elections? By its money. How can it defy courts and officers of the law? By its money. How does it control the press, the politicians, and the political parties? By money. How does it intimiate churches and render their deliverances of none effet? Through its plethoric purse. And why are the relilious press and the ministry so oblivious to the God-deying debauchery around them, yet so willing to take upind trumpet to the world the bar-room slanders of the me and women who for God, and conscience-sake, are doingall they can to arrest the destroyer? Trace the cause bak through all the winding, deep-lying channels of persnal, political, commercial influences and self-interest and in almost every instance we arrive, it may be by devous ways, at the same source—the till of the liquor mone power. There is a general consciousness that active opposition to the lordly liquor power means loss of psrsonal popularity and of all prospect for political preerment and of success in the ordinary business life. "How ould you do without me," the traffic cries triumphartly. And alas! multitudes take up the cry and accept the fallacy as the very decree of fate.

Isn't it plain that any effective attack upon the liquor traffic must be aimed at its money power? Who ever heard of great liquor lobbies in Congress, controlling legislation, political parties, and the press, until the internal revenue and its first-born child, HIGH LICENSE, came to the traffic's aid and made it a Crœsus and lord over the nation? In quick succession were born distillers and brewers and liquor dealers' associations—national and state. The seven vials full of the last plagues were poured out upon the earth; every hound of the pit was unleashed and the horrid carnival in the bodies and souls of men began.

Let us not deceive ourselves. Until we break its money power—the spinal column of the traffic—our task is only begun. The annual distilled liquor product untaxed would be worth at the still hardly more than $15,000,000. Distribute this manufacture through the forty odd states and territories which have not yet prohibited distillation, and leave it to the thousands of little fence-corner distilleries which would spring up here and there, as in the ante-bellum, and liquor's money power is broken; the days of its great lobbies and associations are numbered.

The abolition of the federal taxation upon liquor is the first and greatest step toward real prohibition. With this accomplished the high-license system falls of itself; for no single state, county, or town can maintain such a tariff. Very low license, or none at all; very cheap liquor; very little capital invested in the business, and that in many hands; no extensive combination of liquor men possible for any object—political or economic—and our work then becomes "plain sailing."

Let us not be turned away from this pole-star of our efforts, nor waste our strength upon mere restrictive measures, as to days and hours of sale, nor in tape-lining a few yards around churches and school-houses, nor in dallying with dispensaries, nor in playing with the toy guns of local option. Such prohibition always perishes with the using, or almost before the using.

But how can national legislation be secured for a principle which has not a representative in Congress to champion it? Moreover, the party now in power will probably soon increase the internal revenue tax upon liquor to meet the treasury deficit. From the parties which established this tax, and still maintain it, we shall probably gain little. But the canker is at work upon these parties. Meanwhile the murmurs of a discontented people have been swelling loud and yet more loud. The tempest is gathering. Be it ours in the wreckage of parties to maintain our national aim and engraft our principle upon the new political organization to emerge from this chaos. Those then will bear who now forbear; for then the political shackles will be loosed from many who even now would be as we are but for these bonds.

The late elections but emphasize the fact of popular discontent. The coming session of Congress will only increase this feeling. Strange things are coming to pass. Should one or two more states enact universal suffrage it would not be at all surprising to see the principle endorsed in all the party platforms of 1896. Electoral votes will be in demand about that time. The prohibition triumph must be won at the ballot-box. Total abstinence for the individual is but a step in the right direction. It alone can never overthrow the license system nor bring about a better environment; it is negative and individual, while license is political and holds its life from the ballot. Luckily for us no mere politician will train with us; the reward is too remote. His ilk ruins every cause he espouses.

"Then conquer we must, for our cause it is just,
And this be our motto, in God is our trust."

THE soul spreads its own hue over everything; the shroud or wedding garment of nature is woven in the loom of our own feelings. Be noble-minded, and all nature replies, I am divine, the child of God—be thou, too, His child, and noble. Be mean, and all nature dwindles into a contemptible smallness.—F. W. Robertson.

CRUSADE MEMBERSHIP DAY.

BY HARRIET B. KELLS.

George Eliot says: "The highest lot is to have definite beliefs about which you feel that necessity is laid upon you to declare them as something better, which you are bound to try and to tell to those who have the worse." It is much to have come face to face with a great truth, and it is more to have become one with it, and henceforth to have no life apart from it. Here is the white ribbon text for Crusade Day.

This is an anniversary, not for retrospection and reverential memory. There will be many who re-tread the twenty years' march with song and story. However dear the starting point, it is forgotten in the hot race for the goal; and the fittest celebration of this jubilee year of the W. C. T. U. should be the making a record that out-distances all that is behind it. How can this be done? "When I have the law on my side," said a shrewd lawyer, "I magnify the law; when I have the facts on my side I magnify the facts; but when I have neither law nor facts in my favor, I abuse the opposing counsel and witnesses, and do everything in creation to obscure the minds of the jury as to the real issue." The liquor traffic and the politicians are doing the latter with might and main; but having "the facts" on your side, having "come face to face with a great truth," and having "definite beliefs," which you are bound to declare, blessed white-ribboners, what is in the way of your making this twentieth year from the first Crusade the great Crusade by adding one more for each paid member in the constituency? One hundred and fifty thousand new W. C. T. U. members in one week would be such a "bee in the bonnet" of the liquor traffic as would, at least, make it "powerful onres'less."

Nothing is in the way of sending such a current of reform force through this nation, of making this irresistible display of healthy life, but an impenetrable inactivity. Apathy is Satan; it is destruction. Such powers of death have not seized our women. They are ready to endure anything but defeat, and every woman of us is ready to go out and make such a declaration of the faith that is in her as shall constrain another to come into our blessed bonds. The unremitting work of every W. C. T. U. woman should be to win over every woman in the church from the ungodly position of being a neutral in this war for the home. When all the women have been lured out of their hiding-places, no man in the church will stay entrenched behind his subterfuges.

The method of this new Crusade is short and summary. 1. Let every woman so stir her own nest that she shall stop thinking of her "belongings" and give one great, soul-throbbing day to humanity. 2. Capture her woman and bring her in. 3. Collect her dues, send the same with the name it represents to the local treasurer, and the new name to the state corresponding secretary.

"How can I ever do this in my little dark corner?" somebody cries. By shining, beloved. Let all the world know that your little corner is not dark, because, thank God, you are in it. Keep ever before you the fact that you represent a great truth which the world needs, and that you have the right to spread as much as if you were governor or president. But pick out three women you would like to have in, fasten to them like a cockle-burr during all Crusade week, link yourself to the Divine Power by prayer, and take your new member—you'll be sure to get one—to the meetings on Crusade Day, December 23.

Beforehand, let every union, in preparation for this great day, have worked up the town for an audience as if the last chance to work for God and humanity had come. Who knows but it may be? Read the program for this day's services till saturated with the spirit of it. Have prepared slips with the pledge and amount of membership dues printed at the top under the words, "Constitutional Requirements." A blank line should come below for the name. Let these slips be scattered in every seat in the house, ready for the call for new members, honorary as well as regular. They will come by dozens if the same tact and effort are used to make the day a success as our women give to church entertainments.

Do not look at the work as if it were a great trial, but face it as a grand opportunity. Thus every endeavor may become a sacred joy. Life is one grand struggle, a beating the air with firm, strong wing in the glorious flights Son-ward. The sign of the cross is on your foreheads for conquest, not for crucifixion.

A quiet boldness, a holy firmness, a steady aggressiveness with gentleness will give the victory to every woman who nerves herself to this deed of love and loyalty for the cause she has been baptized into. Our absent leader counts on every woman to bring in another. Give her this proof of your faith.

Remember what Mary T. Lathrap has said: "We need a higher faith and a more prophetic vision than the Crusade women ever knew. Divine power was not exhausted in 1873. God's to-morrows are ever greater than His yesterdays. Greater than any past must be the future before the victory is won."

PROGRAM FOR A TEMPERANCE CAMP-FIRE.

Twentieth Anniversary of the Crusade.

BY ELIZABETH W. GREENWOOD.

[Superintendent Evangelistic Department.]

THE CALL.

Twenty years have passed since upon the women of the Crusade fell the divine fire. As of old, the beacon lights of Christianity flashed from Jerusalem to Antioch, and thence to Ephesus, Troas and Corinth, until they were kindled in the palace at Rome, so this heaven-born enthusiasm, which started in a few hearts and localities, has flashed from heart to heart, city to city, state to state, and nation to nation.

It is fitting, therefore, that upon this twentieth anniversary we pause to rekindle our altar fires; draw near to God for a fresh anointing of the Spirit; review the past, confess our failures and mistakes, and consecrate ourselves for the future. By request of the general officers of the World's and National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and as the evangelistic superintendent of these organizations, I hereby call upon the white-ribbon army of the world to observe SATURDAY, DECEMBER 23, 1893, as the anniversary of the Crusade which began at Hillsboro, Ohio, December 23, 1873.

WHAT SIX YEARS OF WORK HAVE DONE FOR FREDERICK A. ATKINS.

BY FRANCES E. WILLARD.

A young man born and bred in London found himself, at the age of twenty-three, with faith, fifty pounds, and "the kite-like quality of rising higher the more the wind blew against him." He was connected with the Young Men's Christian Association, and had "views" concerning the best method of conducting that well-known institution. Like St. Paul, he was free-born, and "the next thing" did not frighten him a bit; he rather liked it and felt sure that it would be better than the last. His was not an electrotype nature, but one which could say with our own Whittier:

"The windows of my soul I throw Wide open to the sun."

He thought that a magazine for young men and another for young women would meet what is technically called a "felt want"; so he started in with his enterprise, first bringing out the magazine for the young man, on the principle, I suppose, that "Adam was first formed, then Eve." The date of this venture was January, 1887. It is a small, sixteen-page paper, with four pages of advertisements not over-well printed, nor on paper with the finest nap. Seven of the twelve pages of copy were furnished by his own pen, which is keen, kind and ready. The young folks liked his magazine and the articles he wrote in many of the leading London papers. He also brought out two books entitled respectively, "Moral Muscle," a regular gymnasium in itself, and "First Battles," a trumpet call to high ideals.

Besides all this he founded the National Anti-Gambling League, which has circulated some thousands of publications and held important meetings in almost every large town in England. He next started The Home Magazine, a penny monthly for Sunday or any day reading; he employed the best writers, and within one year the circulation rose to one hundred thousand a month.

Then came The Young Woman, which I regard as the climax of Mr. Atkins' achievements up to date, and I hold this opinion for two reasons; first, because the magazine itself is so breezy, bright-minded and inspiring; and next, because of all beings in Great Britain the young woman needs just such a tonic to key her higher powers to concert pitch, for she is not accustomed to be much regarded; if she is a "good little girl," obedient to her parents, and willing to wait upon her brothers, she is likely to be praised as one who has not disdained to fill her natural sphere. But Mr. Atkins thinks the young woman first of all an individual, a daughter of God, and afterward a daughter of humanity; he believes she should lead a life as untrammeled as that of her brother so far as custom, education and law can help her so to do. He sets before her in his bright columns an open door, and proves that God's "thus far and no farther" is the only one for any human soul to heed.

In all this the young editor does not occupy himself with theories, but sticks to the facts, viz.: that it is for the greatest number's greatest good that every component part of the social organism should be an integer and not a fraction, least of all a cypher. Hence the magazine is stimulating to the brightened, and brightening to the least stimulating minds. Although so young and with strong odds against him in the conservatism of the average English home, his first edition had to be printed over and over again, until five editions were exhausted, and the circulation has risen rapidly toward one hundred thousand.

This year it occurred to Mr. Atkins to invite his patrons to Lucerne for a summer outing. Four hundred people took advantage of the "young people's fortnight" announced by him. Leading speakers among the men and women who contribute to the three magazines, founded and edited by Mr. Atkins, gave addresses to the young people; and delightful excursions were made into all the regions round about, than which lovelier do not exist.

The Christmas number of The Young Man and The Young Woman—for once equally yoked together—is now on the press, and the orders received prove that it will be the greatest success that Mr. Atkins has yet achieved.

It is not given to every young man—indeed, when was it to another—to see his ideal so nearly realized in a space so brief; but surely no youth and maiden can read the record of his work without a quickening heart-beat, and a deepened resolution to take for their motto that magic law "according to your power." It is not luck that has brought this man to the front as the most successful young editor in the foremost city of the globe, but his faith in God, faith in himself, faith in humanity have wrought the spell. They inspired him to begin; and honest, hard work conducted him straight to his goal. Whoever has this stock in trade, whether he digs potatoes or publishes poems, is as sure to make a success as a steam engine is sure to get over the ground if it does not run off the track. Faith forms one rail, work the other; the body is the engine, the soul the engineer; that breath of God, which we are wont to call the Spirit, furnishes the steam power. There you are! Now open the throttle-valve and "let her drive."

BITS OF MEMORIES FROM THE WHITE CITY.

BY ELIZABETH CUMINGS.

The mind has an odd way of setting up a sort of panorama before one's eyes, when the eyelids are closed. I have only to sit still to behold memory pictures which come after their own order. One I see oftenest is of a charming Japanese baby. About his round body is a black cord, which is tied to a block. Otherwise he looks as if he could creep swiftly out of his exquisite frame, for he is a painted baby from the Japanese room in the Woman's Building. Many Japanese pictures look to me delightfully like the work of Jack Frost, but the art that painted that baby belongs to no country. The baby breathes. There were screens in that Japanese room, all the work of women. Did ever human fingers picture snow more perfectly than the drifts upon the pine branches that decorate one? The air, too, is full of snow mist.

How peculiarly delightful is the work native to a country. When the South Sea Islander has beaten out a robe for herself of bark, soft as silk and thin as muslin, she dyes it old rose tints in a quaint pattern of over-lapping leaves. Her belt is of finely shredded bark, colored old-rose and ecru, and woven in intricate geometric patterns, or in the curious ascending lines with which the Alaskan woman loves to ornament her work, and which I fancy is the mountain line. The South American Indian has endless varieties of stitch for her hammocks. The Siamese woman makes a sofa pillow with old-rose tinted silks, and gold and silver thread that looks like an opening rose at dawn. The Turkish woman chooses the colors of the clouds, of morning glories and mountain mists, and perhaps, following the suggestive lines of the Arabic alphabet, invents designs past words to describe. The Navajo Indian, seeing the evening paint all her horizon flaming reds, greens and chromes, reproduces these tints upon her blankets. How tawdry in comparison is imitative work. The English embroidery on cambric in the Ceylonese exhibit in the Woman's Building was neatly done; so, too, was the satin stitch embroidery in the Liberia exhibit in the Agricultural Building, and the crocheting in the exhibit of the Indian schools in the building specially set apart for that purpose, and many other exhibits of imitative work could be mentioned. But I venture that no one lingered over it exclaiming, "How charming, how pretty!"

The California onyx has painted upon it shadows of the cloudy heights of snow mountains. No words or pencil could so recall the panorama I beheld as we mounted the slopes of the Cascades one afternoon in early June. We had left the banks of the Columbia embowered in roses, superb roses of the varieties we carefully shield in conservatories. But each new turn disclosed majestic peaks, dazzling snow white, with amethystine shadows that grew into misty serpentine, and deepest lake. As I recall that onyx exhibit I almost feel the chilly air of the Rockies upon my cheek. There was a beautiful grey stone in the California mining exhibition on which in deepest peach color old Dame Nature evidently made her first chrysanthemum studies. The man in charge said the stone "wasn't of much account." But I doubt if he knew the value of the sketch book.

There is a deep fascination about personal belongings. Three children paused just before me as I stopped to look at the bronze statue of Hans Andersen in the Liberal Arts Building. "He wrote 'em all, Ruthy, all the ones you like best," explained the boy who was the eldest, and who seemed to be taking good care of his two sisters as well as officiously ruling them as occasion offered. The smaller girl suddenly drew herself up, and swiftly rubbed her fingers on the story-teller's boots.

"Don't," interposed the boy. "I'll never take you anywhere again, if you meddle." "I wanted to touch him," retorted the little Ruth with much spirit, "It wasn't meddling. I love my Hans book of Andersen."

Then they went into the pavilion and lingered long over the high-shouldered, old brick-bat of a sofa, the rocking chair, the queer silk hat, and the stove, precious only because once they had belonged to Hans Anderson. They looked at nothing else in the section.

"Now we've seen him," said the boy as they went on, "we can begin to see the rest."

Not every visitor knew the full significance of quaint La Rabida. But each one had a deep interest in the old door, and the key that had once belonged to the house of Columbus, at Porta Santo. The bolt was eighteen inches or more long, and at least three-quarters of an inch in diameter. The key was huge, suggesting that the pocket of 1492 was capacious. As I lingered before it the lanky youth beside me, who had been expressing his appreciation of the relics by breathing loudly, exclaimed to himself: "Gosh! how I'd like to take hold of that key!"

"Why?" I ventured to ask.

"Because-er—because," he replied, and turning to me as if he felt sure I would understand him, he added with droll earnestness, "Why, the old feller himself must a used it, you know."

I toiled up the stairs of the Pennsylvania Building to look at the sword of doughty, "mad" Anthony Wayne, and hung around the colonial relics in the Government Building till I stood near the sword of Washington and could see the "quirly" tails he made on his capitals in writing, and I nearly had my spine broken by brown traveling bags trying to see the scarf of red, netted silk once worn by de Lafayette, and which bound up his wound, because, as a tired, sweet-faced old lady said to me before a brief note bearing the signature of Abraham Lincoln, "it made history so real."

Perhaps for this reason I found a crowd full of the most affectionate interest pressed up about the case full of the work of the "Pioneer mothers of Illinois" in the Illinois Building. It was simple, dainty work, of the sort hoarded in the older states. I saw two old ladies furtively wiping their eyes over it. They were strangers, but as the two, neat, black bonnets shyly turned toward each other, one old lady said: "I was raised in Ill'noy."

"So was I," was the hearty response, and then the two had to wipe their eyes again.

I know a little boy who shrieked with terror the first time he saw a jack-a-lantern. I came upon a grotesque mask in the Liberia exhibit in the Agricultural Building. It was no doubt intended to be terrible. At the back a monkey skin was arranged to cover the head of the wearer. In the Government Building was a large collection of masks used by the Alaskan medicine men; big noses, protruding tongues and goggle eyes, set out with vivid pigments, made them presumably fearsome. Possibly these masks are intended to frighten the people, just as Tommy Banks intended his jack-a-lantern should frighten my little friend. Possibly they are intended to frighten evil spirits. But in the one case I am tormented to know why the people remain in fear after once seeing the masks, and in the other I am vexed by the question: "What kind of an opinion of evil spirits has an Alaskan anyhow?"

An Alaskan seems to be a brother as well as a man. In the fac simile of the Alaskan village of Skidegate, given in the Ethnological Building, one house had a white man sitting on either side of the gable, which was decorated with a bear claw. The explanation said that the claw indicated high rank in the clan, and that the two white men were put there in revenge. One was the late judge of Victoria, the other was the town clerk, and the house-owner had set them up in this manner for at one time causing him to be locked up as "drunk and disorderly."

He loves rum as well as revenge, does the native of our present "Northwest Territory." The government exhibited smelt nets, made of finely split whalebone, and in shape like a bag with a round bottom. The three were the work of one man for eight weeks, and were bought for a bottle of molasses, out of which the Alaskan had discovered he could make the coveted rum. "This Saki is armant and noble," said the labels on one row of bottles in the Japanese exhibit in the Agricultural Building. Probably by noble was meant unadulterated. The Alaskan's rum may or may not have been noble, but there's no doubt it was "armant."

HOW TO PREPARE FOR CRUSADE DAY.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—I have been requested to publish for the great white-ribbon constituency of THE UNION SIGNAL the same article, in substance, as that already given the W. C. T. U. of Missouri, concerning the observance of Crusade Day, December 23.

You will observe that December 23 falls on Saturday. Every union in the nation should give this day to prayer, to confession, to humiliation and petition to God.

Arrange for the day with care and thought.

Our National evangelist, Miss Greenwood, has already prepared a most excellent program for the day. This will serve as guide and suggestion.

If unions will begin in time, each one will find in its own community pastors and Christian people, men and women, who having known before, and having time for preparation, will make this day's meeting one of interest, profit and instruction; nor will the whole day be too much. Such a meeting cannot be arranged in one, or two, or three days before the date given.

Begin now, and carefully arrange every detail for the day. Secure your leaders for each hour, or half-hour, as you may elect, and furnish each leader with a copy of the program prepared by Miss Greenwood, which will be given in this number of THE UNION SIGNAL on page 3.

The last issue of THE UNION SIGNAL prior to Crusade Day will be prepared especially for distribution on that day. Thousands of copies should be distributed; orders being sent in at once.

No union should feel that it cannot hold an all-day meeting of prayer. By such meetings in the past our organization received its baptism of power.

Dear sisters, let us come together in all our unions. Let us bring every misunderstanding, every division, every heart-burning to the foot of the Cross. The burdens of life have grown so heavy that we have faltered under them. We have met obstacles that seemed unsurmountable; we have been wounded in the house of our friends, and we have spoken in anger—not love—until our hearts have been hard and bitter.

We have sometimes forgotten that we are set apart for service—have forgotten that the servant cannot be greater than his Master, that he must be even as his Master. Let us give ourselves to prayer on this day set apart. Let us make our confessions to God, and to one another. Let us humiliate ourselves before the Master as unprofitable servants. Let us pour out our petitions from full and willing hearts. Then will God forgive and restore; then will He give His Spirit with abundance; then will He reveal to us the "hidings of His power." Then will He turn to us the hearts of all Christian people, and prosper His word in our hands.

After the meeting of Saturday, will come with appropriateness and power the union mass-meeting for Sunday afternoon, or night, as may seem expedient in each community. In this meeting several short addresses may be given by pastors and others; short papers by white-ribbon women on the Crusade, or some of the many departments of our work, that will arouse interest and thought, and, if well read, will be both entertaining and instructive.

Thousands of people do not attend our meetings, do not read our papers, and do not know the least of these things. The chief duty of the W. C. T. U. is to educate the public along our lines. Oh, that we might do this work of education faithfully!

Secure the best music obtainable—not necessarily solos and anthems, poorly rendered—but chorus and congregational singing with "spirit and understanding" that shall stir the heart to its depths and fill the eyes with happy tears.

Ask earnestly and kindly for a voluntary gift from the audience—a generous gift to the great work that has been presented, to the National union struggling under its burden of debt. Do not send children nor ushers to collect this offering. Surely members of the union will do this quickly and quietly and thoroughly. If the union cannot give all, surely it can give half of this collection to the National W. C. T. U. in its time of need with its debt, and its leader sick across the seas.

Let a sweet, earnest plea be made for new members. If membership cards have been laid in each seat, these cards can be collected at close of meeting, or white-ribboners can pass through the audience for these signatures.

Let us arrange every detail. Let us do all our part, and we shall receive a blessing. "Bring ye all the tithes into the storehouse, that there may be meat in mine house, and prove me now herewith, saith the Lord of Hosts, if I will not open you the windows of heaven, and pour you out a blessing, that there shall not be room enough to receive it."

LETTER FROM ENGLAND.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—Recent events in the temperance world of this country would suggest that the women's movement is the most active of the forces that make for temperance progress at the present hour. There is everywhere in England a cry for some fresh impetus in the work, and there are not wanting signs to those who will see them that such a new factor may be found in the "wider outlook" which the British Women's Temperance Association, under Lady Henry Somerset's leading, now takes. Some justification for this view may be found in some facts and figures which I think will prove to be of interest.

Since the "revolution" of last May (which, so Miss Willard has it in her annual address, resulted in the indorsement of the "do-everything policy" and the reëlection of Lady Henry Somerset and officers who are in agreement with her progressive plans) great progress has marked the efforts made to carry on the work by entering open doors on every hand. In the course of four months, sixty-five new branches were formed, giving an added membership of five thousand. Probably twenty more have since been established, and the hands of a number of organizers are also quite full, while appeals for help accumulate on every side.

The evangelistic department has made arrangements for conducting during the winter months over seventy gospel missions in as many different centers, east, west, north and south, each of eight or ten days' duration. The first of these missions, at a town near London, proved to be a great success, and the happiest augury for future efforts. Many pledges were signed, Christian people who before held aloof were brought into line with temperance work, and a great and general "arousement" was brought about—greatly to the advantage of the place and the encouragement of the workers.

Another new departure, which is likely to have lasting effects for good, is the "Speakers' Bureau" of the B. W. T. A. This organization already has between sixty and seventy speakers of ability on its lists, and finds no lack of calls for their services. That the forward movement among women temperance reformers here does not fail to receive the indorsement of many of the best men who have so long labored in the cause had a striking illustration in a speech delivered at a great meeting held in Cardiff, South Wales, to welcome the B. W. T. A. delegates to their autumnal meetings. The speaker was Mr. John Cory, M. P., one of the best known, wealthiest, and most influential temperance men in this country. Having referred to Lady Henry Somerset as "truly one of the most brilliant and accomplished lady reformers of our time," he paid a very graceful tribute to Miss Willard, and expressed pleasure at the fact that the late difficulties in the association have not in any way checked its activities. Mr. Cory went on to say: "A great deal of controversy has waged round the broad and progressive policy which the esteemed president had been led to pursue, and which has found such universal approval"; and quoted the interesting opinion of the popular American Christian lecturer and writer, Rev. Joseph Cook, on the progressive policy of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

"Mr. Cook," said Mr. Cory, says: "Having noticed in various English journals several unfair and misleading criticisms of the broad and progressive policy of the Woman's Temperance Union of the United States, I venture to respond to an urgent request from England to send to yourself my view of the facts which justify that policy. If England were at war with Russia, and the latter were to have several allies, it would obviously be necessary for your government to attack the allies as well as the principal enemy. Not to do this would be foolishness, and might be suicide. In the conflict with the liquor traffic, the policy of the Woman's Temperance Union is to attack not only the chief foe, but also its notorious and open allies. This is the course dictated not only by common sense, but by absolute necessity. If the home is to be protected, not only must the dramshop be made an outlaw, but its allies, the gambling hells, the houses of unreputable infamy, the ignorance of the general population as to alcoholics and other narcotics, the timidity of trade, the venality of positions of the press, and especially the subserviency of political parties to the liquor traffic must be assailed as confederates of the chief enemy of the home."

"These sentiments, Mr. Cory proceeded, the temperance party in Cardiff heartily indorse, and we are glad this broad and progressive policy has been adopted by the association represented here this evening, and we rejoice that the two ladies—the English and the American—have joined hand in hand in pursuing these lines as leaders of the great National temperance reform. We must fight the great foe of our nation's peace and prosperity on all sides—at the ballot-box as well as on the platform, at the Brewster sessions as well as at our temperance meetings.

The enemy is gathering its forces, the brewers are organizing on a large scale; they have become a great political factor, and we must fight them accordingly. We must be associated for progress, and look with far-seeing eyes along the winding way that lies ahead, contented to adopt new methods when we feel the exigencies of the time demand a fresh line of action, and resolve that the conflict in which we are engaged is so desperate that we need a union of all the forces we can command, and a Catholic spirit that enables us to see the absolute necessity of permeating existing Christian and philanthropic agencies with the principles of the cause which we believe to be the foundation of all moral and social reform."

London, Eng. HENRY J. OSBORN.

BY MATILDA B. CARSE.

What shall I more say? for the time would fail me to tell of Gideon, and of Barak, and of Sampson and of Jephthah; of David also, and Samuel and of the prophets, who through faith subdued kingdoms, wrought righteousness, obtained promises, stopped the mouths of lions. . . . . out of weakness were made strong, waxed valiant in fight, turned to flight the armies of the aliens. Heb. 11: 32-34.

When Nehemiah built the walls of Jerusalem, his enemies, Sanballat and Tobiah, at first mocked and laughed him to scorn, as he succeeded their anger increased, and they plotted to overthrow his work, until at last Nehemiah and those engaged with him had to work on the walls with one hand and hold in the other a sword to defend them from their enemies. It has now come to about the same pass with the work for the Temple; everything is hindered because we have to be constantly on the defensive.

Mr. J. B. Hobbs is out again in a virulant attack upon the Temple. It is in the form of a printed circular letter, which he is sending out to the members of the W. C. T. U. Extracts from it have crept into some of the Chicago papers, causing the gentleman to become the laughing-stock of the community. The Chicago Evening Post comes out in a most scathing editorial, which should give Mr. Hobbs sufficient matter for thought for some time to come. We do not propose ever again to answer this gentleman's untruthful attacks. We answered him once for all last spring. If any one desires a copy of this answer, they can procure it by sending to me. We beg our tried and true white-ribboners to stand STEADY and not let this latest malicious attack of the enemy stampede our forces in the least. Do your part, my sisters, and my word for it, with God's help, the entire indebtedness of the Temple will be provided for in two years, no matter what jealous, unscrupulous persons may say to the contrary. Christ said: "Blessed are the peacemakers, for they shall be called the children of God." I wonder what He would pronounce upon those who, while pretending to be the friend of a great and holy cause, use every endeavor to disrupt and ruin it?

Christmas will soon be here; only three weeks left in which to procure little gifts for loved ones. The small photogravure of the Temple (which we forward to all who send us fifty cents for the building fund before January 1, 1894,) can be framed for a small sum, and will make a pretty little gift, delighting the heart of many a white-ribboner who has not been able to come to Chicago to see the original. But still more beautiful is the Columbian souvenir in aluminum (enclosed in its dainty silk-lined box), which outrivals silver itself in finish, with an exquisite cut of the Temple on one side and on the reverse the head of our beloved Miss Willard, with suitable inscription. This beautiful medallion will be a thousand times more valuable a quarter of a century hence than it is to-day, and just as beautiful, as the metal does not tarnish. Any person sending one dollar before January 1, 1894, will receive one of these lovely souvenirs in return. We want our friends to understand that the above are sent as prizes to stimulate giving to the Temple, and the amount persons send is credited to them on our books as a gift to the Temple. When we sell these things outright, the price of the little photogravure is only ten cents, and the Columbian souvenir is fifty cents. We still have left a few of the silver-plated models of the Temple; in order to close them out, we are offering them at $1 each, the former price being $2.25.

We are glad to state that dear, quaint old Nantucket has its name carved on the state tablet of Massachusetts. Several weeks ago the president of the Nantucket union, Mrs. Mary W. Valentine, sent $25, which completed its $100 gift. The Amboy, Ill., W. C. T. U. has sent $9.50, which completes a $100 pledge. Mrs. H. P. Mackey, treasurer of Summit county, Ohio, W. C. T. U., sends $18 on the county pledge of $100. Mrs. E. V. Everett sends $20, ten of which are from the Varick W. C. T. U., and ten from the Varick Y's, all to be credited to a tablet for Seneca county, N. Y. Mrs. Nettie Wilson sends $10.84, making $27.50 the Nicholson, Pa., W. C. T. U. has paid on its pledge. Mrs. Pauline Moore sends $13 from the Montrose W. C. T. U. towards a tablet for Wright county, Minn., W. C. T. U. Twenty-five dollars come from the St. James, Minn., W. C. T. U., the second payment on a pledge of $100. Mrs. M. B. Willard, Amherst, Mass., sends $42, the first payment on a pledge of $100 by the Amherst W. C. T. U. The South Perinton, N. Y., W. C. T. U. sends $22, which completed a $100 pledge. Too much credit cannot be given this noble little union, which consists of only twelve members, for raising its full quota of a hundred dollars, even if it has taken them several years to accomplish it.

Below will be found the names of unions in Massacuhsetts as carved on the state panel in the Willard corridor, which have paid $100 to the Temple: Malden, Dorchester, Leominster, Cambridgeport, Boston, Bristol county, Jamaica Plains, Adams, North Adams, Brookline, Upham's Corner, Wallaston, Armory Hill, Fall River, Worcester, Nantucket, Fall River Y, Dorchester Y, Charlestown Y.

A two-cent stamp sent to Mrs. Matilda B. Carse, The Temple, Chicago, will secure a mite-box. Remember, any one placing in the box $2.50 from May 1, 1893, to May 1, 1894, will receive the lovely Columbian souvenir made of aluminum, with a cut of the Temple on one side and on the reverse the face of Miss Willard with suitable inscriptions. All money orders should be made out in the name of the treasurer, William D. Preston, and sent to our financial secretary, Miss Sara G. Johnson, The Temple, Chicago, Ill.

FAILURE.

BY LOUISE HOUGHTON.

As some great bird,
Whose hurt wing answers not her will,
Still beats the air in useless striving,
And dying—with strong talons holding yet
Her hard-won prey,
While wide, hungry beaks, her far-off young
Wait, vainly calling;
Or a spent swimmer
Breasting angry waves to save a life,
With dying eyes fixed on the rescuing boat,
And knowing it is all too late,
Makes still his strokes, grown feebler
With each laboring breath—yields not
The life he gives his own to save—
This is not failure;
Nor bird, nor swimmer gives up PURPOSE.
Long, long centuries
Agone, One walked the earth, His life
A seeming failure;
Dying, He gave the world a gift
That will outlast eternities.

AN UNFASHIONABLE CALL.

BY EVELYN P. BURCH.

The visitor was a bright, sweet-voiced little woman and a favorite of her motherly hostess, whose manner cooled perceptibly, however, when Mrs. Roberts, who was an enthusiastic W. C. T. U. worker, began to speak of recent efforts of the local union.

"My dear," she said, "I do not know whether you are aware that I am not in sympathy with the W. C. T. U. I have strong temperance principles, nevertheless, and never use wine or allow it on my table, and none of my family are addicted to the use of alcoholics, which is more than all W. C. T. U. women can say."

"True, unfortunately," replied her visitor; "but are we always responsible for our entire family? And since you have mentioned it, Mrs. Saltonstall, do you mind telling me why you object to the W. C. T. U.? Wherein have we sinned? You need have no fear of wounding my feelings, for in this matter, at least, sentiment is buried so far under principle as to be practically out of reach."

"Since you ask me so frankly," said Mrs. Saltonstall, "I will tell you. You know I am an old woman, and have old-fashioned ideas. And one of them is that a woman's kingdom is her home. I cannot see why she should want to go around lecturing, or want to vote, or any of those things that used to be considered man's work. And then, as your union did last week, put it in the paper for everyone to read and pass coarse remarks upon. A true woman does not seek public notice."

Mrs. Roberts' fair face flushed a little, but she asked quietly: "Do you refer to the account of our special meeting published in the News?"

"Yes, and I know that article has caused much comment. I have heard several 'well-informed persons,'" naming them, "speak of it, and I do not think the local W. C. T. U. ever before attracted so much attention."

"Good!" exclaimed Mrs. Roberts, laughing and blushing more deeply, while the elder lady looked at her in surprised displeasure. "These ladies you have mentioned are hardly capable of making coarse remarks. May I explain a little?"

Mrs. Saltonstall assenting, she continued: "At our annual meeting, our union decided to take up the department of Press Work, and one lady, who had seen some of my silly little poems, that I never dared to offer for publication, suggested my name as superintendent. I was thoroughly frightened, and tried to tell them I had no experience; but Mrs. Bagsley said, then I ought to have, and somebody else said something pleasant, and I was elected. I! I went home and cried. Then I talked it over with John, who was very comforting, and at prayers that night he asked our Father that wisdom might be given me for my new duties; and I thought of that passage in James about lacking wisdom, and an amen welled up from the very depth of my heart. Afterward it occurred to me that God must have a purpose in giving me such unexpected work, and I prayed a great deal over it. Am I making my explanation too long?"

"Not at all," said Mrs. Saltonstall, "I am much interested. Go on, dear."

"As a result of praying and thinking," continued Mrs. Roberts, "I wrote the article you refer to. I was going to send it by mail, but that seemed too cowardly, so I put on my prettiest hat and sallied forth, manuscript in hand, but a much heavier weight in my heart.

"I found Mr. Graves in and made two discoveries. Editors are human beings, and this particular one is not nearly so appalling as his name indicates. One look into his kind face gave me a little courage and I made known my errand, asking him if he could use occasional W. C. T. U. items.

"'Certainly,' he responded, and thereupon I presented my manuscript, which he read, and most kindly gave me a few hints on brevity, etc., which will be valuable to me in future. As I had understood that all articles accepted are rewritten in the office I told him that if he would condense it I should be glad, and would endeavor to make future articles as pointed and concise as possible. I guess they don't want anything except reports and such things, but I think that is quite a concession for a Democratic paper, don't you?"

"Yes, indeed, and maybe the reports will pave the way for those 'silly' poems of yours, some of which you may be surprised to learn I have read, and I may add that in my opinion they possess real merit."

"Thank you. And you tell me that article attracted attention, which will cause people to think of the W. C. T. U. who have not done so hitherto. Thought will induce consideration of our work and study of our methods, which, in nine cases out of ten, will result in sympathy and coöperation."

"Perhaps you are right, and I must commend your wisdom in seeking to have your articles published in a secular paper. We expect to see those things in religious and Prohibition papers, but a Democratic paper is read by a different class."

"If any man lack wisdom, let him ask of God," repeated Mrs. Roberts, softly.

"You have given me quite a vision into W. C. T. U. work, and I confess I am surprised and interested. Tell me more about it."

"I am afraid I have not time to-day. John will be at home, and I am not less a home-maker, I trust, for being a W. C. T. U. woman. But come to our meetings, and you will learn enough. Will you come?"

"Maybe, dear, though I'll not promise. When will your next meeting be?"

"Thursday afternoon, at three o'clock, and we have a gospel meeting on Sunday at four. I will call for you if you like. I know how embarrassing it is to go alone at first."

"Thank you; I shall be glad to have you do so, but remember this does not mean that I am to be converted to your way of thinking and join your union."

"The work itself will do the rest," said Mrs. Roberts to herself, as she hurried on to John.

TYPICAL LESSONS FOR "LOYAL TEMPERANCE LEGION" TEACHERS.

BY MARY E. RUDD.

INTRODUCTORY.

How shall we teach the little children who come to us in our Loyal Legion Bands? I mean the very young children between the ages of four and six years. Children who as yet are sweet and innocent, knowing nothing of the sin of the great world around them. Children to whom we would not think of reading the newspaper with all its details of horror and crime. Children before whom we veil our conversation, avoiding any mention of wrong or scandal as something unsuited to their years.

And yet do we not too often gather these darlings into our temperance bands and shock their sensibilities by the recital of horrors of which they should be ignorant? Do we not wring their hearts with sympathy over the sorrows of the poor drunkard's child which they are helpless to avert? And do we not know that to arouse a child's sympathy, and give him no chance to manifest it, begins a hardening process which if continued to manhood will in all probability make him insensible to all calls for pity?

Let us beware how we tell pathetic stories which make the children weep; let us beware how we tell the harrowing tale of the drunken father striking his darling child—awful though the fact may be—lest we foster that spirit that delights in sensationalism and demands the dime novel. Let us keep to the true, the innocent, the pure, just as long as we can. Let us suggest the avoidance of the evil only when we must and the wrong has become so apparent to the child's mind that our words do not come as a shock.

But how are we to do this? What means are we to employ to teach children the great truths of temperance without speaking of the evils of intemperance? The answer comes something like this: A child's mind is a bundle of impressions. How they came there, what is their origin in most cases we cannot tell. A child will eat or will not eat certain things because he has an impression that he likes or does not like them. Even of things that he has never tasted he will say: "I don't like that." How does he know? He has an impression. Many a child six years of age will not look at an indecent picture or hear anything vile. Why? There is an impression in the child's mind that somehow such things are not right. If without having this impression for purity the child has merely been told not to look at such pictures he will probably look to satisfy his curiosity. But having it he may safely be trusted to himself. A pure-minded child will not give the second look to what seems to him impure.

It is the purpose of these lessons to outline a plan of work for producing right and true impressions upon the minds of little children in the direction of temperance. In order to do this we will begin with God's natural gifts to man and not the perversion of those gifts. A whole year may profitably be spent in considering the greatest of all the natural gifts—water. Water that fills the lakes, rivers and oceans, that bubbles all over the earth in wells and springs, that quenches our thirst and keeps the world fresh and green, the most abundant of all provision for life and the one that we feel most deeply the need of. The lessons will tend to idealize water. To put the child into living sympathy with brooks and rivers. To make him feel the need of water, not only for himself, but for all life. In fact, to make him appreciate it as he has never done before.

Having decided our theme, let the songs enforce the same thought.

Let us introduce little games, improvised or otherwise, not only that the child may be rested from sitting still too long, but because the deepest impressions are produced by play, and the game at the close of the lesson will mean more than your words. Rhythmical exercises will also have their place in our lesson hour, motions of any kind—though the more graceful the better—that may be made in time to music. Why? For many reasons. For rest, for recreation—for children love to take part in such exercises—but chiefly that we may develop a sense of rhythm in the mind. The child who has a strong sense of rhythm will find it easier to keep herself tidy in personal appearance. She will not feel comfortable if the room she sits in is in great disorder, and the smoothing out of tangles and setting things in order will be not drudgery but pleasure. Let us then have rhythmical exercises and do the child much good both mentally and physically.

Above all, let us have good order in the Loyal Temperance Legion. Let the motto be, Not license nor repression, but liberty. Liberty to do right. Liberty to respect the rights of others. Liberty to have pleasure in the right way. Let us make the exercises so pleasant that it is punishment enough for a naughty child to be deprived of a share in them.

You believe, do you not, that "whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap"? Then begin to enforce it here. Teach it not by word of mouth, but by actual fact. The child who persistently spoils the marching or the games must sit down and see the good time go on without him. I say persistently. Let us have mercy as long as we can, with a mercy that is not slackness, but when we can no longer spare then we must punish.

For the rest provide yourself with a few simple kindergarten materials if possible. If not, they are not an absolute necessity. According to the number of children you have provide yourself with quite a large quantity of what are called "second gift beads," consisting of small cubes, balls and cylinders. If you have thirty children one thousand will not be too many, costing about two dollars and a half, unless some liberal dealer will make a reduction for the sake of the temperance cause. Also buy an assortment of colored sticks which come in bunches, each bundle having the same length sticks. The lengths are one, two, three, four and five inches. You may need more than one bundle of the one and two inch sticks. The cost is very slight. Cardboard on which you may trace a pattern for the children to sew, the needles and worsted for sewing the same and a perforating needle complete the outfit for this part of the work.

For song books provide yourself with "Marching Songs for Young Crusaders," Nos. 1 and 2. "Ripples of Song," and if possible with "Finger Plays," by Emilie Paulson. You will find the last named a great bond of sympathy between yourself and the children.

As a last suggestion visit a kindergarten. Notice how the children play, how they imitate the flying of birds, the swimming of fishes, etc. Secure the coöperation of the kindergartner by telling her what you are doing and ask her to interpret anything in the lessons which seems dark to you, or to suggest something better. You will be greatly helped by pursuing this course.

THE SANTA CLAUS CHIMNEY.

A Christmas Festival.

BY MABEL GIFFORD.

SCENE.—A room having in it a number of antique chairs, sofa with gay robe thrown over it, and a good-sized fireplace. Floor carpeted with soft mats, so the children's feet will make no noise. From without singing.

[Enter a jolly crowd, laughing, talking, stamping, smiting their hands to warm them, each having a stocking under his arm.]

Company.—Such a jolly chimney for Santa Claus. We'll sit up and see him come down. How we'll surprise him!

Bright Eyes.—Yes, we'll s'prise him. [They all begin to hang up stockings.]

Norway.—Here's a hook just right for me.

Holland [standing on tiptoe and just able to reach].—And here's a hook just right for me.

Little Tot.—And here's one just right for me. [Takes a tiny stocking out of her pocket and hangs it up.]

The Boys.—O-ho! what's this? [pointing to stocking].

Little Tot.—Why, that's dolly's. I thought you knowed. [Standing up takes bundle from under her arm and begins to unroll it.]

The Boys.—O-ho! That is not fair. What is that?

Little Tot [quietly].—Baby Bell's. [Fastens a long stocking beside her own.] And here's a letter to Santa Claus. I was afraid he mightn't know. Sister writed it. I told her what to say.

Tot's Sister.—It is not near time for Santa. Let's tell stories.

Miss Norway.—Let's each tell a Christmas story.

[They throw off wraps and sit down on the floor.]

Tot's Sister.—I'm the oldest, I'll begin. [Smooths out her frock.] Once upon a time [looks at her audience impressively]. Once upon a time——

[Tatters creeps to the door, half frightened, and the boy, shorter, looks over her shoulder. Bright Eyes spies them, looks at Bob Eskimo.]

Bob Eskimo [throwing up his arms and running at Tatters].—Scat!

Tot's Sister [pulling him back].—Jesus loves ragged children.

[Bob looks blank, then goes with the other children, who jump up, run to the door, and pull in the ragged children.]

Prince E. [pompously].—Did you have an invite?

Tatters [shaking her head].—We heard the singing, and we looked in. What's Christmas?

Children.—Never heard of Christmas!

Little Tot [solemnly].—Christmas Jesus' burfday.

[Children sit, pulling ragged children down with them. Tot sits beside Tatters.]

Tot's Sister [smoothing her dress again].—Now we'll begin. Once upon a time——

Tot [with interest].—Where's your 'tockin', little girl?

[Tatters shakes her head, and pulls her frock over her feet.]

Holland.—You must have a stocking for Santa Claus to fill.

Tatters.—Who's Santa Claus?

Children [shocked, look at each other].—

Never had a Christmas,
O, dear me!
Never heard of Santa,
Nor the Christmas tree!

Little Tot.—You shall have half of my 'tockin'.

Bob [solemnly].—And half of mine.

All.—And half of mine.

Tennessee.—Now don't anybody be interruptious.

Tot's Sister [smoothing down her frock].—Once upon a time there wasn't any Christmas. They hadn't begun to keep Jesus' birthday then. By and by one day a great man wrote a letter to the people and said, "I think we ought to cel-e-brate Jesus' birthday." And what he told the people they had better do they always did, and so they had a Christ mass. Mass was singing. They rang the bells at midnight, and the folks went to church, which was all bright with candles, and sang carols all about when Christ was born. And they sang carols and played games all day, and it was the merriest day of all the days.

Norway.—Who will tell the next story

Bob Eskimo.—

I come from Ice-land.
I come from a land of ice and snow,
With tall blue icebergs all in a row,
Where the big white bear goes skating.

We live in houses of ice and snow,
We dress in furs from top to toe,
We furnish reindeer for Santa, you know,
Where the baby seals go bathing.

But Ice-land is No-Christmas-land, so I have come down here to see one.

Norway.—

Whenever there is a Christmas tree,
The birds have one as well as we, in my country.
Look in the picture books, you will see.

Children.—Our birds shall have a Christmas, to-morrow.

Tennessee.—

Christmas in Tennessee is what, you s'pose?
Mammy cleans up de cabin an' washes up de clo's.
We sings under mawser's winders, an' we gets treat,
An' we don't do no work for two whole week.

We fixes up in our bery bes',
With a gay necktie, fine as de res';
We go where we please
Without askin' leafe,
After a grand dinner of [fast] 'possum, squirrel ducks an' geese,
Plum pudding, pumpkin pie, chicken pie an' beef.

O, we dances an' we shouts, we sings an' we eats,
An' we don't do no work for two whole weeks.

O, we dance an' we shout, we sing an' we eat;
Tennessee Christmas's a bery great treat.

Holland.—

The Dutchman's land is Santa Claus land.
Santa first visited this country
When he sailed with us across the sea.

Germany.—If the Dutchman sent you the Christmas Santa, the German sent you the Christmas tree.

Princess E.—

England is famous for its pedigree,
And its coats-of-arms that all may see.
We are from England's royaltie,
And we keep Christmas merrilie.

Prince E.—

On Christmas Eve our homes are all bedight,
With mistletoe and holly,
And bright with candle-light;
With garlands of evergreens,
With ivy and with bay,
For the English Christmas is a merry, merry day.

Princess E.—

At midnight all the church bells ring.
Under our window at morn the little waits sing.
All day long there are songs and games,
And the young folks, the old folks,
The maids and the dames,
All join the children's play,
For England's Christmas is a merry, merry day.

Prince E.—

The old-time Christmas dinner was a great feast,
With the famous boar's head and tremendous joints of beef;
There was turkey, goose and kid, with a cunning roasted pig,
And a mammoth Christmas pie, all trimmed with leaves and sprigs.

Princess E.—

After the feast was wassail time,
When they drank good-will all round;
And quip and jest and mirth did abound.

Prince E.—

When the winter day grew dim,
They rolled the giant Yule-log in,
And o'er it fragrant fir cones tos't
To make the flames leap higher.

Then they told stories. Christmas in England to-day is much like Christmas in America.

Bob [to Tatters].—You have not said anything yet.

Tatters.—

Down in the dark back alleys are lots more children like me,
Who never heard of Jesus, nor Santa, nor a Christmas tree.

Children [shocked].—Where is your land?

[Tatters names the city the children live in or near].

Children [amazed].—All the ragged children shall have a Christmas next year.

[Enter a fairy all in white, bearing a white wand with a white ribbon bow on it.]

All the children.—Who is this? Who is this?

Fairy.—I am Lily-bell from Temperance town.

Children.—What town is that, do tell us!

Fairy.— It's no-alcohol town,
It's clean town,
It's happy town.

Children.—Oh! Ah!

Fairy.—It's a no-drunkard town, a no-poor-house town, a no-prison town, a no-vile-tenement town, a no-starvation town.

Children.—Oh! Ah!

Tatters.—That must be heaven.

Fairy.—Yes, it's heaven on earth. There are no crazy fathers and mothers to beat the children. No stupid drivers to run over them. Alcohol does not run the cars or turn the switches there, and there are no railroad wrecks. Captain Alcohol does not sail the ships from Temperance town, so there are no wrecks at sea. When we have picnics, Driver Alcohol does not hold the reins, so we are safe from broken bones. Doctor Alcohol is not our town physician. They do not make alcohol appetites for the children in the families of our town.

Children.—Where is Temperance town?

Fairy.—Temperance town is wherever you make it. It's clean town, it's white town, it's no-poison town, no-alcohol and no-narcotine town. Healthy body and healthy mind town.

Children.—Tell us how to make it.

Fairy [sings].—Be a loyal, royal, loyal, royal, loyal, royal legion.

Children.—How shall we be a legion?

Fairy.— Promise liquors not to drink.
Promise not to smoke or chew.
Promise ever to be clean.
Promise to be pure and true,
And sing ever [Sings]
Prohibition, prohibition, prohibition. [All join in.]

Little Tot [very sleepy; has been gaping and rubbing her eyes].—When will Santa Claus come?

Tot's Sister.—When we children are fast asleep.

Tennessee.—Let's hab a song, then we will go. We'll be asleep in a jiffy. Sing de bery bes' song you know.

SONG.

Children.—Now, we'll be asleep in a jiffy.

[Bright Eyes, Bob, the Prince and Princess take convenient places. Norway and Germany climb up in chairs. Tennessee sits up against the wall, the others liedown on the floor. All go to sleep. Bells and whip and "Whoa!" heard without. Santa Claus comes down chimney.]

Santa Claus.—Bless their hearts, they're sound asleep. [Drops toy on floor while staring in amazement at the stockings.]

[Children awake; stare, motion to each other, put hands over mouths to keep from laughing. Santa Claus looks around. Children close eyes.]

Santa Claus—Yes, bless their hearts, they are all sound asleep. [Fills stockings.]

[Children open their eyes and motion as before. Tennessee wants to sneeze. Children put their hands over his mouth.]

Santa Claus [listening].—Bless me! there must be fairies whispering in the street, for surely all the children are very sound asleep. [Spies stocking with note, reads, looks at stocking and laughs loud and long.]

Children [join in the laugh, jump up, take hands, dance around Santa, laughing and shouting].—Merry Christmas! Merry Christmas, Santa Claus!

SONG.

[Santa Claus takes brick from chimney and throws at children. Children run in affright. Santa Claus whisks up chimney.]

Children.—Oh, he's gone! Santa's gone! [Run to chimney.]

[Tot holds her handkerchief under her eyes and cries. Bob, seated on floor, solemnly examines brick. Finds it will open; finds something inside; samples it.]

Tennessee.—Chilluns, dis yere brick am good to eat. [Reaches out and jerks brick so contents fall out.]

[Children run to Bob and all sample the brick, then run to chimney.]

Children.—Let us all have one. [Each pulls out a brick; Prince and Princess with dignity, Tatters and her brother timidly, Tennessee recklessly, Tot delightedly, her face covered with smiles. Each samples brick.]

[Fairy tosses up her brick and the white ribbon bows fall about the children, who run to pick them up, and fasten them on their dresses, singing, "Prohibition, prohibition, prohibition. We'll all spend Christmas in Temperance town next year."]

Tennessee.—Chilluns, let's hab two bricks.

[They all agree, run to chimney, look up, leaning their hands against it, and down tumble bricks. Children start to run, but the falling bricks reveal the Christmas tree with Santa Claus and attendants.]

Children, [shouting and clapping their hands].—Merry Christmas! Merry Christmas!

[The Fairy unfurls a flag and leads a march. Each child takes a brick and a stocking in one hand, and a child's frock in the other, and march around tree, if there is room, if not, around the stage, singing.]

SONG: Solo by Tot's Sister.

[Tot walks anywhere, in line and out, dragging the long stocking under one arm, and holding the brick and her own and the doll's stocking under the other. The long stocking is troublesome and she puts it on the floor and marches on, holding up the doll's stocking admiringly.

At last verse of song they march out of sight on opposite sides of stage from tree, singing.]

"MEMBERSHIP DAY."

Of all red-letter days, December 23 is preëminent as "membership day." As the anniversary of the starting of that remarkable series of events which led to the birth of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, the celebration of Crusade Day should serve to revive as far as possible the old Crusade spirit; for that same spirit it is which, carried into the practical work of the W. C. T. U. movement, has achieved such wonderful results for temperance during the past twenty years, and which is destined to be prolific of still more wonderful results in the future.

As in the church the best preparation for the work of bringing the unconverted into the fold is a revival of religion among the members themselves, so we believe that in securing new members for the W. C. T. U. the first thing for local unions to do is to have a stirring up within their own ranks.

We would suggest that societies which have been in the habit of meeting monthly or bi-monthly should, during the ensuing three weeks, hold special meetings. Let the president send out rallying calls, urging especially the attendance of the "reserve force," of which every union is likely to have a supply, members who are more passive than active, who are uncertain in their attendance upon the regular meetings, but who can be relied upon in an emergency, and few white-ribboners there are who can not be.

In small unions it may be wise to appoint a calling committee to "drum up" these lagging members (if the president can do so in person, so much the better), letting it be known that the special meetings are for the purpose of arranging for Crusade Day observance and for strengthening the union generally.

We have found in our experience that the most judicious, and therefore the most successful, way to set about securing new members is through individual effort rather than through the work of a committee; that is, let each white-ribboner, after promising to exert herself in this matter, plan her own campaign. Every woman knows some other woman, or women, who would kindly receive, if she did not accept, a personal invitation from herself to join the union, some friend whose peculiarities she knows and to whom she could broach the subject of W. C. T. U. work and of signing the pledge without giving offense, while the same invitation from another just as tactful—perhaps more so in a general way—would be received in quite a different spirit.

Of course, at all regular and all public meetings of the W. C. T. U. opportunity should be given for "joining." It goes without saying that the husbands and fathers and brothers of all white-ribboners should be "honoraries," and if there are any who are still "without," may Crusade Day find them with many more singing with a will, "We all Belong," and may next election day find every man of them voting the way "them wimmen" want them to.

AN IMPORTANT ADJUNCT OF THE FAIR.

Among the many and diverse movements more or less directly connected with the Fair, there was one unique in its conception, unparalleled in its success, world-wide in its influence, and yet one concerning which the newspapers had comparatively little to say, and whose magnitude and significance is perhaps the least appreciated of any of the adjuncts of the Exposition. It is the movement which Mr. Torrey aptly calls "The World's Fair City Evangelization Campaign." By the side of this great, victorious, peaceful campaign of faith for the redemption of the world, the bloody campaigns of the Napoleons of earth pale into insignificance.

Narrating the origin of this movement, Mr. Torrey, one of the inner circle of Mr. Moody's friends, and at the head of Moody's Bible Institute in Chicago, says that Mr. Moody is so constituted by grace that he cannot see a great crowd without immediately desiring to preach the gospel to it. Accordingly, when he heard of the crowds from all parts of the earth which where expected in Chicago during the summer, he was seized with a consuming desire to go there and preach the gospel. For years he had been traveling all over the earth to preach the gospel to all the world; now the world was coming to him.

When he first communicated the project to others, almost everyone considered it a visionary scheme. It was urged that people would come to Chicago at great expense to see the Fair, it would be the one opportunity of a lifetime to avail themselves of its great educational advantages, and they would not turn from it to anything else. Similar efforts were made at the Centennial and at the Paris Exposition, but were failures. He investigated the theaters and found that theatrical troupes were afraid of Chicago, and, as it proved, with good reason, for, though some of the most noted actors were brought here, the theater business in Chicago last summer was a failure, and some of the troupes left before finishing their engagements.

Still Mr. Moody persisted. He engaged fifty noted preachers from all over the world, representing many different nationalities and speaking various languages. He also provided for the most effective singing of the gospel, and numbered among his helpers were the best singers of gospel hymns. With some misgivings, the Haymarket Theater, whose seating capacity is three thousand five hundred, was engaged. On the first Sunday Mr. Moody says more were turned away than could get in.

Other theaters were hired in quick succession, and yet never during the entire summer did they succeed in furnishing seating capacity sufficient for the crowds. Every Sunday, Haymarket and other theaters, up to the number of six, were filled within five minutes after the doors were opened by the crowds who, for an hour before the service began, blockaded the sidewalks. Nor was this all; Central Music Hall, the Model Sunday-school room, many other buildings, including police stations, jails and also tents, gospel wagons and the "open air" itself were pressed into requisition in the vain endeavor to accommodate the crowds who flocked to hear the Word of God. On one terribly hot day a meeting was held in Forepaugh's enormous circus tent, holding fifteen thousand people, and though the heat was so intense that the perspiration poured down the faces of those present, and Mr. Moody's companions greatly feared the effect of this fearful ordeal upon his health, the tent was filled to overflowing. Some meetings were held during the week, and the crowds at the week-day meetings equaled those on Sunday. It was thought very doubtful whether it was worth while to hold any meeting on "Chicago day," and the advisability of giving it up seriously considered. The meeting was held, however, and the speakers themselves had difficulty in getting through the crowd into the building.

What was the secret of this unexpected and phenomenal success? What went these crowds, not into the "wilderness," but to the city, away from the World's Fair, "for to see?" Let it be remembered Mr. Moody is not a new character who has recently achieved a meteoric notoriety. For many years he has been going up and down the earth preaching "the gospel of the Kingdom of God." Neither are the methods of Mr. Moody and his co-workers sensational. No one was drawn to the meetings from a morbid desire to witness unseemly physical, mental or spiritual gymnastics, for everyone knows that everything of this kind is tabooed in Mr. Moody's meeting. Nor did anyone expect any of the so-called camp-meeting excitement, popularly supposed to attract certain classes of people. Personal work with seekers was never in the great public meeting, but always in a quiet after meeting when the crowd had been dismissed. Nor were the crowds Chicago people who, having presumably plenty of opportunity to see the Fair, had leisure also for these meetings. This was said by some newspaper reporters who claimed that Mr. Moody was not reaching at all the people whom he set out to reach—the visitors to the Fair—but simply Chicago people whom he could reach as well at any other time. To ascertain whether or not this assertion was correct, the workers very frequently asked that all Chicago people in the audiences rise, and it was found that from seven-eighths to nine-tenths of those who attended these meetings were not Chicago people but visitors to the Fair.

What then did those people go to hear? Not "great swelling words of man's wisdom" or man's eloquence. Everyone who went, went knowing that he would hear nothing but the simple truths of the gospel of Christ, unadorned with rhetorical tinsel, but preached straight from hearts that had tested and proved its power, and it was this they went to hear. The crowds who attended these meetings in Chicago to hear the old, old gospel, the only power in the world that offers any hope of rescue from sin, are a striking testimony to the universal outcry of the human heart to be delivered from sin. There is no other attraction on this earth that will "draw" as the preaching of the gospel by men who, sharing the universal human experience of the bondage of sin, have also rejoiced "in the liberty wherewith Christ has made us free."

Scores were converted at every one of these meetings; one noticeable feature being the number of young men among the converts. Many professing Christians also entered into a deeper religious experience. This deepened experience, and the aroused activity of Christians themselves, Mr. Moody and his co-laborers count as the most important results of the summer's campaign, for these awakened Christians have gone forth over all the earth to carry with them the revival fires.

The expenses of this unparalleled work were, of course, enormous. How were they defrayed in this year of unprecedented financial depression and of the Columbian Exposition when the chief thought of the average American was how to obtain means with which to attend the Fair? Collections were taken at each meeting and the people always responded generously, but they were not urged to give, and the money raised from these contributions was but a drop in the bucket. Mr. Torrey tells us that the reliance of those who conducted the campaign was in Him alone of whom it is said that "the earth and the fullness thereof" are His. Often during the summer, when their needs were pressing, and there was no human being to whom they could turn, they asked help from God, and His help never failed them. One such time was early in August. Bills to the amount of $5,000 fell due the next week. Mr. Moody was obliged to go East and they knew not where any money was coming from. Mr. Moody called the inner circle of his co-workers to breakfast with him to consider what they should do. While they were at the table, before the subject had been broached, though each knew what was on the other's heart, a telegram was brought which Mr. Moody read and then passed silently down the table. This telegram said that Mr. Moody's friends in Northfield had made a thank-offering to the work in Chicago, of which $6,000 had been sent and more would soon follow. The $6,000 was received in time to meet their bills, and $4,000 more came later.

If any have mourned "as those without hope" over the Sunday opening of the Fair, the triumph of the liquor traffic in the White City, if they have supposed that sin held undisputed sway in the World's Fair City, and only demoralization has attended the great Exposition, let him take courage. We believe that the "World's Fair City Evangelization Campaign" wrought more effectively for the Kingdom of God than all the combined forces of evil were able to accomplish against it.

THE Constitution for November is a specially valuable number as a campaign sheet for distribution. It consists of eight short, strong, prohibition articles, especially adapted for circulation in Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Ohio, Virginia, Iowa and other states in which elections occurred this year. Scatter them widely. At the low rates of three dollars per thousand and fifty cents per hundred, postpaid, this paper is easily procurable. WHITE RIBBON CALENDAR.

December 18.—Peace Day, to be observed in the interests of national arbitration.

December 23.—Crusade Day, twentieth celebration of the Woman's Crusade, to be observed by a Jubilee Number of THE UNION SIGNAL, December 14, and as a membership Crusade day by the local unions.

ADVANCE CRUSADE NUMBER.

This issue of THE UNION SIGNAL may be called the "Advance Crusade Number," so full is it of suggestions and material for the observance of Crusade Day, December 23. First of all will be found the program on page 4, carefully prepared by Miss Elizabeth W. Greenwood, evangelistic superintendent. The call is so excellent that we reproduce it here by way of emphasis, confident that if each one of us takes it to heart and celebrates the day accordingly, great good will come to us individually and collectively, as white-ribboners:

THE CALL.

Twenty years have passed since upon the women of the Crusade fell the Divine fire. As of old the beacon lights of Christianity flashed from Jerusalem to Antioch, and thence to Ephesus, Troas and Corinth, until they were kindled in the palace at Rome, so this heaven-born enthusiasm, which started in a few hearts and localities, has flashed from heart to heart, city to city, state to state, and nation to nation.

It is fitting, therefore, that upon this twentieth anniversary we pause to rekindle our altar fires; draw near to God for a fresh anointing of the Spirit; review the past, confess our failures and mistakes, and consecrate ourselves for the future. By request of the general officers of the World's and National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and as the evangelistic superintendent of these organizations, I hereby call upon the White Ribbon Army of the world to observe SATURDAY, DECEMBER 23, 1893, as the anniversary of the Crusade, which began at Hillsboro, Ohio, December 23, 1873.

The excellent program provides for an all-day observance from ten in the morning until four in the afternoon; also for an evening service on Saturday, or Sunday, the 24th. The divisions into prayer, praise and testimony are so clearly made, and the subjects for each hour are so appropriately and definitely assigned, that there cannot be any misunderstanding on the part of the local unions who will celebrate the day. We recommend an earnest study of the program first, then an appointment of special committees and a decision to meet at least once a week until Crusade Day. These committees should not fail to interest the ministers and such Christians as feel that the W. C. T. U. has "left its first love"—gospel work. If Miss Greenwood's program is carried out in spirit, every critical friend of our objects and methods will be convinced that our "first love" is as strong as ever, and is the "rock of our foundation."

We considered this advance Crusade number so important to the workers that we have devoted the first page to the stirring letters of our National President and Corresponding Secretary. We trust all hearts will be touched to response by Miss Willard's earnest plea for ten cents a member, written in her own familiar "hieroglyphics," as she often laughingly styles her chirography (though we must admit that this specimen is unusually good, and a convincing proof of her restoration to health). Mrs. Hoffman's letter in the correspondence department is full of suggestive hints to local unions as well as inspiring in its call to personal confessions and thanksgivings.

The editor's contributions are given in the earnest hope that they may be truly helpful, as it is our great desire that this twentieth Crusade anniversary may be the greatest ever known in our history. The time is not too short if we all go to work with a WILL. Many of our greatest successes come from concentrated and contracted effort; because the time is short there is no opportunity for postponement. Begin at once, and with glad hearts remember that our Crusade and Christmas time are one and the same anniversary.

CHRISTIAN WORKERS' CONVENTION.

The ninth annual convention of Christian workers was held in Atlanta, November 9–15. The religious awakening which has always accompanied the sessions of this consecrated body of men and women was one of the most gratifying features of this convention. Many were converted, and many Christians entered into a deeper religious experience as the result of the work. It seems scarcely credible, and yet it is true that the convention excited some bitter opposition because it allowed women to speak. The one who led the opposition along this line was our sometime friend, Dr. J. B. Hawthorne, one of the leading Baptist divines of the South, and, we might almost say, the most uncompromising foe of the liquor traffic in Atlanta. Those who attended the National Convention of the W. C. T. U. in Atlanta three years ago will remember that Dr. Hawthorne was presented to the Convention and spoke enthusiastic words of cheer and approval. He also invited Mary T. Lathrap to preach in his pulpit, and afterward said that he felt as though he never wanted to try to preach again himself, as he considered that she could do it so much better. Since then, it seems, he was accused by some of his Baptist brethren of unscriptural conduct, acknowledged the error (?) of his ways, and has been trying ever since to make amends for his former sins. He wrote an article in an Atlanta paper, and afterward preached a sermon arraigning the Convention of Christian workers for its disobedience to scripture doctrine. Among the women who spoke were Mrs. Whittemore, a devoted, saintly woman, who, from a life given up to fashion, turned to devote all her energies to the service of God. She has founded several Doors of Hope for fallen women. The one over which she is superintendent is on a purely faith basis. She makes known its wants to God alone, and he supplies her every need. It was of this work that Mrs. Whittemore told on the platform of the Convention. Mrs. Prindle, matron of the Florence Crittenton Mission for fallen girls in New York, also gave thrilling testimony to the wonderful salvation of the girls who come to her through faith in Christ. Miss De Broen told of her marvelous work among the Paris Communists. Miss McDonald and Miss Bertha Wright, of Canada, and several others, completed the list of women who spoke. All of them are noble, modest, womanly women, and yet Dr. Hawthorne in his sermon referred to their participation in the exercises of the Convention as "the performances of some women." We feel ourselves carried back to fifty years ago as we hear of his utterances. They are valuable at least as proof that the world "do move," however much individuals or communities hold back. What is more, these same individuals and communities are being swept forward, even though it is at the extreme rear.

HOW TO DO IT.

Too late for insertion on any other page has come this excellent contribution from our National treasurer, Mrs. Helen M. Barker, and in order that it may reach the local unions in full time we present it here:

If each town could be districted, and two discreet, earnest women appointed as recruiting officers in each, who would call upon every woman in that district, and in a loving simple way tell them of our aims, our work, our successes, and perhaps of our sorrows, certainly of our needs —especially dwelling upon our pressing need for women— our membership could be doubled upon this Crusade anniversary day. What would that mean? It would mean encouragement to all our leaders, joy to our chieftain, strength to all our unions, money in our treasury, increase in appropriations for all our departments and a great advance all along the line. Some one says every new member means an additional dollar for our work, but we say every dollar in dues means the prayers, the influence, the labor of a loving, consecrated woman from now on until the end of the war for our blessed cause. Let this thought inspire us all to work for new members. We not only need these women, but they need us, and the benefits that will come to them in the work. Look back, my sisters, and think how much this work has done for you personally, and what a blessing it has brought into your own life, and then go forth to enlist your neighbor for similar work and like blessing. Thus will you greatly strengthen the local, state and National union, bring good to your sister and add a blessing to your own life. Do not wait until the 23d but begin Monday, the 18th, and devote the entire week to Crusade membership work. Visit every home (many are waiting to be invited), and if all will do this, Crusade day will surely be a red-letter day for the W. C. T. U. They that go forth in His name "shall come with rejoicing, bringing their sheaves with them."

ONE difficulty often met with by our women in their recruiting efforts is, alas! the membership fee. Unless a woman has reasons for becoming specially interested in the work, or is possessed of financial independence (which so many "home queens" are not), no matter how much she may desire to become a member of the W. C. T. U. she will hesitate before paying a dollar for the privilege, or duty, whichever she may consider it.

To some people this may seem a trivial obstacle, but experience proves its potency, and if in previous years it has been an obstacle, it is not unreasonable to expect that in this year of widespread financial depression it will loom up bigger than ever.

We hardly consider it our province here to suggest a proper mode of procedure under these circumstances. There are local unions which have managed to "get around" this difficulty with satisfaction to all concerned, and we would only urge that every society so adjust this financial wheel in its machinery that it will no longer interfere with the numerical work of the organization. We hope that in this, the twenty-first year of its history, the W. C. T. U. will demonstrate its power to rise above the one hundred and fifty thousand level which has been its mark for a longer period than is consistent with its development in other directions.

THE historic, though short-lived, halls of Columbus and Washington, which sheltered the Columbian Congresses, the last of which were our own World's and National Conventions, are no more, the demolition having been completed last week. The Art Palace itself, of course, remains, and will be ornamented next summer with many a fine piece of statuary and bas-relief.

ACROSS THE SEAS.

Our white-ribbon friends who crossed the seas to attend the World's Convention have nearly all returned to their homes and their work in distant countries. Lady Henry Somerset and Miss Alys Pearsall Smith were the first to return, leaving immediately at the close of the National Convention. Those who question the power of woman to achieve, should ponder the record Lady Henry made in the twenty-four days, during which she traveled eight thousand miles, presided over the World's Convention, and attended sixteen meetings, besides "doing" the World's Fair. The closing meeting of the W. C. T. U. which she addressed, convened the largest audience gathered to hear a single speaker during the entire series of Congresses, numbering one hundred and forty-five. Miss Jessie Ackermann went next and is now conducting large and successful meetings in England. Mrs. Andrew, Dr. Bushnell, Mrs. Emmett and Mrs. Muff sailed November 8, and word has just reached us of their safe arrival. Miss Anna Gordon sailed on the 22d, and is probably nearing port at this writing. Her sister, Elizabeth, who has been with Miss Willard as a guest of Lady Henry Somerset for two months, will soon return to Auburndale, Mass., to spend the winter with her mother. Another English friend, Mrs. E. S. Mathews, has decided to remain in this country for a few months, and would be pleased to make engagements for lectures and temperance missionary work at moderate terms. Mrs. Mathews is a National organizer for the British Women's Temperance Association, and is recommended as a good speaker. Her address is 102 Hammond street, Chicago, Ill.

THE result of the woman's suffrage campaign in Colorado is a prime illustration of the application of the popular vote to a leading question. By its means this greatest victory yet recorded for political equality has been won. The campaign in the Centennial state began in 1875 by Mrs. Margaret Campbell, and was continued by Lucy Stone and Susan B. Anthony in 1877. The measure just carried, by popular vote, is not the amendment submitted to the legislature at that time, but is a special act, conferring the right of suffrage upon the p ople regardless of sex. The majority in favor of the measure is 6,000. In 1877 the same cause was lost by a majority of 9,000. The headquarters of the opposition was just where we would expect to find it—in a brewery. Scurrilous leaflets also were mailed from a prominent liquor house. Helen M. Reynolds, corresponding secretary of the Colorado equal suffrage association, in a letter to the Woman's Journal, says that at first these leaflets were anonymous, but just before the election the cloven hoof was displayed by the advertisement of a brewery on the last batch. The discovery of the origin of the leaflets, she says, turned hundreds of votes to the side of the woman's suffrage. Why is the saloon thus opposed to woman's ballot? Well may it fear, for a potent weapon is hers against the destroyer of home and happiness. We turn our eyes hopefully toward the Rockies and look for the dawn of the new day from those majestic mountain slopes.

THE ways and means committee of the House of Representatives claims to have received over a thousand letters from "temperance societies," asking that the tax on whisky be raised. Among such letters one is produced from an unknown W. C. T. U. woman in a small village of the state of Illinois, and is paraded as the sentiment of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union at large. Any thinking person will see the absurdity of deducting such a conclusion, but we are glad that our watchful friend, Josiah W. Leeds, of Philadelphia, has sent to this congressional committee a protest to such a base use of our name and influence. Mr. Leeds says: "I feel quite safe in affirming that as a body the W. C. T. U. holds to the belief that the general government ought to wash its hands of all complicity in the death-dealing traffic, and that we are not likely to 'tax it out of existence' by the imposition of the high tax of one dollar and fifty cents per gallon."

THE crowds that marked the World's Fair season have considerably abated, but a call to hear the gospel never fails to attract men and women, consequently Willard Hall noon meetings have a daily attendance of interested listeners. A week ago Sunday afternoon ex-Governor St. John addressed an enthusiastic audience from the text, "Make a chain, for the land is full of bloody crimes, and the city is full of violence." A vivid portrayal of the lawlessness proceeding from saloon domination was drawn, and the call to Christians and patriots to stand for righteousness was like the peal of a trumpet. Miss Anna Downey, the state W. C. T. U. evangelist for Illinois, Mrs. Mary A. Woodbridge and Mrs. Mary H. Hull conducted meetings last week. The number of men in attendance at these gatherings is greater than that of women, and their earnest attention to the speakers is remarkable.

Superintendents' Reports.

[According to our promise, we begin in this number the publication of the National superintendents' reports, which were unread at the Convention. We will publish as many of them in each issue as space will permit, until they are all printed, observing the order on the Convention program, and again invite those superintendents, who have not already done so, to send us their reports. It is impossible to publish the long reports in full.—EDS.]

UNFERMENTED WINE AT THE SACRAMENT.

The very important work of this department has been much hindered during the past year by unforeseen Providential dispensations which have greatly interrupted the systematic work of your superintendent, newly-appointed at the last annual convention. The former National superintendent, Mrs. R. A. Esmond, in the many years of her earnest labors, has sown bountifully the precious seeds of truth, which, with the indefatigable labors of many very efficient state superintendents, have borne an abundant harvest. As the result, it is estimated that at least two-thirds of the churches of our country have put away alcoholic wine from the communion table—showing a readiness of mind to investigate the subject and a willingness of heart to follow the light as it has illumined the way.

The discussion of "Bible wines" has been one of deep interest during the past few years, and much that is valuable has been written; the most convincing and unanswerable arguments to prove that there are two essentially different kinds of wine mentioned in the Bible being given by Norman Kerr, M. D., F. L. S., of London, in his little volume entitled, "Wines, Scriptural and Ecclesiastical." Our own workers have given us some very useful helps in this department in brief leaflets, the National Leaflet by the late Mary Allen West, upon "Bible Wines," being a clear and strong presentation of the fact that more than one kind of wine is recognized in the Bible. Mrs. R. A. Esmond has written several helpful leaflets. Mrs. Mary E. Pengelly, state superintendent for Michigan, has sent out a fine presentation of the arguments in the form of a "Conversation on the Use of Unfermented Wine." Mrs. Frances J. Beyer, state superintendent for Pennsylvania, has given us a most excellent Bible reading upon "The Wine Which the Bible Commends." Mrs. S. F. Grubb, National superintendent of the department of foreign work, has come grandly to the help of this department in securing the translation into the German of a forceful leaflet of Mary Allen West, and has secured the promise from a scholarly Swedish minister of leaflets in Swedish, Norwegian and Danish. These in foreign languages promise to give us the assistance we need in throwing light upon the subject to many of our churches, where the gospel is preached in these various tongues, where the matter has never been considered.

We rejoice in all these contributions to our literature, and in all the agitation of the subject—for to us the arguments in favor of the use of unfermented wine at the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper are so overwhelmingly strong, that we feel an unbiased mind must be led to accept them, who thoughtfully considers the subject. And yet we find a large number of our leading churches and ministers still clinging tenaciously to the use of intoxicating wine at the sacred feast, with strange prejudice and blinded minds, arguing that thus they are honoring the Lord who, in that memorial supper, set apart the "fruit of the wine" to be an emblem of his precious, life-giving blood to be shed for the redemption of the world. It is with these who are thus prejudiced that the great burden of our future work lies, and we may well realize that it is "not by might nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord of Hosts."

In response to circular letter sent out in August to the superintendents of the various states, a number of most excellent reports have been sent, though, I grieve to say, a good many who I know have been working faithfully have thus far failed to send any account of their labors, thus making my report a meagre one compared with what it might be.

PENNSYLVANIA.—Mrs. Frances J. Beyer, superintendent, deservedly heads the list, as her report shows most systematic work done and greater gain than from any other state this year.

Sixty-two out of the sixty-seven counties of the state have superintendents. In one county every church uses the unfermented wine, in another all but two, while quite a number report all churches except Episcopal and Roman Catholic and German Lutheran. Thirty-eight counties report the work advancing. One county reports nine churches as abandoning the use of alcoholic wine during this year. Out of Pennsylvania's seven thousand churches reports indicate three-fourths are now on the right side. Much literature has been distributed, the state superintendent having sent out herself fifteen thousand pages. Would that all the states could come up to the record!

NEW YORK.—Phebe J. Adams, state superintendent, reports: Good work has been done in our state. Many encouraging signs and words come in the reports from counties. This department has been discussed at a good many conventions, and thereby superintendents and workers were secured where written messages had not been effective. Sixteen churches representing several denominations, among them a number of Episcopal churches, are reported as changing this year to the use of the unfermented wine. A good deal of literature has been distributed.

OKLAHOMA TERRITORY.—Mrs. C. P. Light, superintendent, reports: Earnest and energetic work done by herself, but, on account of the newness of the field, not so much of visible result, the great indifference of the clergy also proving a serious obstacle. However, in Oklahoma City, all of the churches use the unfermented wine. May the good lesson spread from that center throughout all the territory.

MICHIGAN.—Mrs. M. E. Pengelly, state superintendent, reports the subject receiving more than usual attention, though she does not give a detailed account of the work. The little leaflet prepared by this superintendent is being largely circulated through the state with blessed results.

CONNECTICUT.—Mrs. Josephine A. Sexton, superintendent, reports over two hundred churches in the state are reported as using unfermented wine, and doubtless many more not reported.

MINNESOTA.—Mrs. Martha Johnson Smith, state superintendent, reports some discouragement, because an appeal which she had printed and sent out in April had not received the attention from county superintendents which it demanded, showing that Minnesota, like many other states, is better at doing the work than reporting it.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.—Mrs. Emma E. Falconer, superintendent, reports, showing that she is a wide-awake superintendent, but lacks in hearty coöperation in the majority of the twenty-five unions composing the district. Report shows that with the exception of the colored churches, those who still use fermented wine are Presbyterians, Protestant Episcopal and Roman Catholics. The special work of the year has been among the colored churches, with very satisfactory results; the earnestness of the workers being shown in their providing themselves the unfermented wine used in several of the colored churches. A good deal of literature has been distributed. From the South we have several states reporting, showing the fields white for the harvest, and great need for an awakening upon the subject.

MARYLAND.—Mrs. T. R. Moore, superintendent, though new at the work sends in a carefully prepared report by counties, showing earnest, aggressive work being done and much progress made; in some counties nearly every church in their bounds having adopted the use of unfermented wine, while in others the old prejudice still holds sway.

GEORGIA.—Mrs. E. C. Witter, state superintendent, reports an eager desire among many Christian women of the state for the putting away of the alcoholic cup from the communion table, but great reluctance among many of the ministers. Much literature is being distributed, and much personal work being done, which will in time bring a gracious harvest.

TENNESSEE.—Mrs. Emma B. Karr, state superintendent, reports as a new-comer in the state, and in the work, difficulty in giving the exact status of the work. However, in her eager inquiries, she has found several towns in the state where all the churches have become enlightened on this subject. The churches of Knoxville are about equally divided upon this subject. One conference passed resolutions against the use of fermented wine, and the matter has been discussed by other religious bodies.

WASHINGTON.—Mrs. Mary W. Gilbert, state superintendent, reports from that far-distant portion of our country most encouragingly. She says: "There are now in East Washington about fifty local unions, and more than as many churches. Nearly all of our Protestant churches are using the unfermented wine." During the four years of her work in this department she has witnessed a steady growth of right sentiment.

Presenting thus but a brief synopsis of reports sent, and truly sorry that so many busy and successful workers have failed to get their reports in on time, and with longing desire that whoever may care for this branch of our great National work another year may have great grace given for the undertaking, and commending the precious seed-sowing to the Lord of the harvest, I remain, yours in service,

ELIZABETH G. HIBBEN,
National Supt.

SABBATH OBSERVANCE.

One year ago I congratulated you on the overwhelming victory for the Sabbath at the World's Fair, through the decisive vote of Congress and the ratification thereof by the Fair commissioners. Our arduous three years' campaign to this end I reviewed, with its endless petitions, letters, memorials and other efforts, especially among the legislatures, a work undertaken by no other organization, and which resulted in every state save one that was in session that winter in strong resolutions for Sunday closing or closed state exhibits.

We are ashamed that government has allowed its decision to be thus overruled, and the brightest rift in the dark cloud is Judge Stein's severe sentence upon the directors for contempt of court in closing the gates July 23, heedless of injunction. Not that we approved the injunction, but this action helped clear the air befogged by the lawlessness of directors, and showed that one court would maintain its own law even in high places, and the higher the offender the greater the mischief wrought. Such lessons are sorely needed all over our land, for lawlessness is the greatest danger that can confront a republic, and we have sowed the wind to reap perhaps the whirlwind.

Had the gates been kept closed by authority, some important lessons would have been lost. The miles of covered exhibits showed that exhibitors from all lands wanted a day of rest, the closed state and government buildings reveal a voluntary deference for God's day and the will of the people; the people themselves, forty millions of whom had already spoken to government about it, have most of them refused to attend on Sabbath; the working people evidently prefer a rest day and a chance to get their money's worth; and even the railroads saw Sunday Fair excursions would not pay.

America cherishes the Christian Sabbath as the best of all her institutions and intends to preserve it, and this conviction will in our own as well as other lands help to shape the sentiment of the future.

The work now is to deepen the awakened interest into principle and make it motive power for future victories. Let us this year make a specialty of State campaigns rather than a National one, and push local work more vigorously than ever, especially opening a relentless warfare against the Sunday saloon and the great triumvirate of Sabbath foes, the Sunday newspaper, which is doing more than aught else to undermine the sacredness of the day, the Sunday mail and the Sunday train.

Ohio reports twelve postoffices closed on Sabbath through petitions to the Postmaster General, who has promised me to give such petitions careful attention. Sunday travel and Sunday excursions we must not neglect, nor forget that employes especially in our cities are more and more losing their rest day.

A National Sunday Rest law is the great need of our country, one that shall give all Government employes a day of rest, and through postal service and interstate commerce shall everywhere protect the Lord's Day as the National rest day. In 1889 we presented to Congress a petition of ten millions asking for such a law, but the pressure was not sufficient to secure it. Now we propose in connection with other organizations to renew our efforts, and with the prestige of the strong vote given by Congress for Sunday closing at the Fair, and the increased interest throughout the country we hope with your hearty co-operation to succeed.

Much of the increased Sabbath sentiment is traceable doubtless to the work of our thirteen hundred Sabbath Superintendents and the praying unions back of them, much to the million pages we have sent out on this subject and which we must continue to use diligently. The department now furnishes forty leaflets by ten different writers, and a full yet concise manual (price 25 cts.) for superintendents and the home study of all white-ribboners since most of us need to study both the grounds of our belief and methods of work. For the year's work of the several states I refer you to my printed report.

FOREIGN WORK.

The question of foreign immigration is attracting universal attention because of the great power our alien class is exercising in municipal, state and national questions. The number of aliens coming to our shores averages a half million a year. The decade of 1880 and 1890 brought five million two hundred and fifty thousand persons, a large majority of whom were the peasantry of Europe, persons whose lives had been so burdened with poverty at home that they had given but little thought to government, except in hatred toward their oppressors. Moral issues these people scarcely consider at all. They come to this land lured by the promise of better opportunities for themselves and their children, and when they arrive our people pay but little attention to them. We ignore them, but the saloon welcomes them everywhere. This is the only place a hand of welcome is held out. It is the only place they hear the political issues discussed. It is the only school of politics America has for her foreign voters; and yet eighteen states permit them to vote on all the issues of the day when they have been here twelve months by filing their intention to become citizens. Men can vote within one year after coming into the states of Alabama, Arkansas, Indiana, Louisiana, Massachusetts, Missouri, N.Dakota, Oregon, Texas, West Virginia and Wisconsin. Kansas, Nebraska, S. Dakota, Michigan, Colorado and Wyoming give aliens the power to vote after a six months' residence, and Minnesota after four months, if they declare their intention immediately.

We must teach these foreigners the difference between the holy and the profane, and cause them to discern between the clean and the unclean, or we and our land and government are the chief sufferers. There is no choice about it. "My people are destroyed for lack of knowledge," and we have now arrived at a point where we must teach these millions of people in languages they know, or be destroyed by them. They are themselves largely controlled by the saloon power. Their inability to read our language prevents their access to our schooling influences.

40 YEARS THE STANDARD.

Add to this the fact that they are filling our country up so fast that they feel no need of learning the English language. Wisconsin is seventy-five per cent foreign. Minnesota not far behind. The Dakotas are sixty per cent, and as our unrestricted immigration pours its horde in every year; the other states are following fast on.

Christian America gives no help to make good citizens of those she is so liberal in creating. We complain about our foreigners being the backbone of the liquor traffic but give them no education that they may be informed toward better principles. The Woman's Christian Temperance Union is trying to do this through this department of Foreign work. We publish leaflets and tracts in seventeen different languages, and get out about fifty editions of 10,000 each a year under the name of "Friendly Talks." These are upon every subject that will inform our foreign citizen of our moral issues or that will induce him to become more law abiding. Warnings against the saloon, Sabbath observance, economic measures—etc., etc. Simple temperance stories and object lessons are first attempted with those people who know nothing of what we desire to teach them, but with the Scandinavians and Germans we give total abstinence and Prohibition arguments.

The value of the missionary work at Ellis Island cannot be overestimated; more and more we see that its establishment was inspired by heavenly wisdom. Miss Lindahl is doing an excellent work. Greatly to our regret the order which we secured three years ago, prohibiting the sale of liquor at our ports of entry, has been rescinded by the present administration. I have written to Secretary Carlisle protesting against this action and to others in authority, so far without avail. The selling of beer to the immigrants changes the whole order of things. Our very teaching in the tracts we send out in the various languages is invalidated, and our government becomes partner of the crimes of the saloon power. There is also far less order and good conduct prevailing. Miss Lindahl has sent a report of every day's work at the end of each month. She has distributed an average of 23,000 pages per month—in 9,000 tracts, some of which are four pages and some two. Immigration has been larger than we anticipated, as we expected that fear of cholera would decrease it.

News from the Field.

WISCONSIN.

"MANY A LITTLE MAKES A MICKLE."

The Columbian Exposition will be remembered by the people of the states contiguous to Illinois, not only for its wonderful exhibits, but also for the money stringency brought upon church, reform and philanthropic societies, as well as upon many kinds of business.

People have economized in every way possible that they might attend the Congresses, with the Fair thrown in, or vice versa, while those who are not obliged to economize closely have purchased largely, both on the Exposition grounds and in the stores of Chicago. In my own city half the inhabitants have visited the Fair, and many thousand dollars have been spent outside the city that otherwise would have been expended here. The larger cities must have exceeded this estimate, both in attendance and outlay.

Excepting in the northern part of the state, where men are thrown out of work by the closing of so many mines, it is difficult to realize that there are really any "hard times" but those brought on by too much World's Fair expenditure. Our W. C. T. U. has not escaped unscathed. District and county conventions have not been as well attended, our finances have suffered, and great efforts will be needed for the remainder of the year to hold our own. The white-ribboners of Wisconsin are capable of making this effort, without doubt, if they become aware of the individual necessity in time.

Twelve unions have been organized since the beginning of our W. C. T. U. year in June, Westfield union having forty-one members. The president of Monroe county organized three unions and one Y.

There is considerable falling off in the number of towns carrying no-license this year, as brewers and liquor men send money, to be used to the best (?) advantage, wherever there is, or seems to be, a chance that No-license will carry. Some of our best workers, however, are quite convinced that both the old parties are quite willing to have Prohibitionists expend energy, time and money in "their local option sop, as it causes as little detriment to the trade as could be expected from so many cranks and fanatics."

The departments favored most with us seem to be evangelistic, juvenile, mothers' meetings, scientific temperance instruction, medal contests, parlor meetings, lumber camp work and the Eau Claire home.

The New London union has appointed a lookout committee to look after members who are irregular in attendance. They also have a collection box, in which every one is expected to drop a penny at each meeting.

In Eureka "all the Sunday-school teachers are W. C. T. U. workers, consequently the children have a little temperance talk nearly every Sunday."

Bayfield union pays for four good weekly papers, two of which are placed in the depot racks, and two in the free reading room recently opened by the town, and are circulating a petition among the business men, urging the town officers to enforce the law in regard to closing saloons on Sunday.

The Baptist Home Missionary Society and the Black River Falls union, held their opening exercises together at a private house, then adjourned to separate parlors for the business session, after which supper was served.

Spirit Land union sends The Young Crusader to ten families.

Dallas W. C. T. U. held a town temperance picnic; they report "a good crowd, good speakers, good music and good dinner."

Angelo not having any church building the W. C. T. U. of the place have built a chapel 24x36, with a prayer room 16x20, where the union will also have its headquarters. Angelo union was organized by members from the Sparta union (two miles south) a little more than a year ago, and has already done much good, besides building the church.

Sparta union feels very thankful for her daughter, and are just now rejoicing in the renewed strength and courage given them by the words of Mrs. Clara Hoffman, whom the members were so fortunate as to have with them, not only for an evening lecture, but for an afternoon "council."

The members of Spring Brook union meet alternately in four school districts: they vote in school meetings and have one member, at least, on the school board.

Coleman union (La Crosse) has two thriving L. T. L's. Two of the young men are voters this year. Mrs. Myron Smith, superintendent of contest work for the union, conducted a gold medal contest with great success.

The Knights of Labor celebrated labor day at Ashland, and the union of that city served refreshments and distributed over one thousand temperance leaflets, besides presenting each Knight with a buttonhole bouquet with a verse of Scripture tied to it with the white ribbon.

Stevens' Point union has monthly medal contests.

Princeton, among other good works, distributes The Young Crusader supplement to the two English Sunday-schools, and a copy to every pastor.

The Brodhead union and the members of the local suffrage society united and held a fair and festival which netted them $110.

Mt. Horeb, a union organized last year, held a gospel temperance meeting, Sunday, October 1.

The agricultural board of Trempealeau county acceded to the request of Whitehall union for a W. C. T. U. day at the fair, and also contributed ten dollars towards a speaker. Mrs. Clara C. Hoffman was selected and lectured at the fair grounds in the afternoon and in the court-house in the evening, with great effect.

CONVENTIONS.

Since last July, three district and seven county conventions have been held, and one school of methods. The Loyal Temperance Legion has held a state convention which was well attended, although held in the extreme northern part of the state. Mrs. Amy Kellogg Morse, ex-president of our state W. C. T. U., gave the graduating address. Mrs. Vie H. Campbell, our president, and Miss Alice Guernsey, of Chicago, also attended. Through the influence of a paper written by Carlenton Boothby, a Loyal Legioner, on "The Indians of Wisconsin," it was decided to take up work for the Indian as one of the departments. Miss Florence Hoes, Superior, who won the prize for the best essay on the subject, "Tobacco and the Body," generously donated it to the Indian fund. Fifty-eight graduated this year. West Superior received the prize banner. One L. T. L. county convention has also been held.

NOTES.

Some agitation is being made in regard to giving up the district organization and depending upon the county organization.

The Prohibitionists are holding a series of institutes in the state for the purpose of discussing ways and means, that some definite and practical work may be intelligently brought before the next state convention. Local option was also discussed, and, judging by the remarks made, is not in very great repute among a number of the workers.

It seems as though more people have been stabbed or assaulted this month owing to liquor than usual.

The Wisconsin Democrats are shaken up over the recent Republican victories. They realize that it may mean for them, also, a packing of trunks in the near future.

WESTERN WASHINGTON.

TWO COUNTY CONVENTIONS.

The W. C. T. U. of Lewis county has taken on new courage of late, so writes their reporter. Mrs. M. L. T. Hidden, state organizer, made arrangements for a school of methods at Centralia, and as the matter of a county convention had been under consideration for some time, the county president at once determined to combine the two. It was arranged that Mrs. Hidden was to visit several towns along the line of the Northern Pacific Railroad and organize unions, but was prevented from doing so; and as it was necessary that the unions be formed previous to the convention, two ladies from Centralia union, Mrs. Mattie Graves, the wide-awake president of the local union, who is also state superintendent of Y's, and Mrs. C. D. Spencer, state superintendent of mothers' meetings, went in her stead. They were very kindly received and three new unions were organized and delegates appointed for the convention.

The M. E. church at Centralia was beautifully and tastefully decorated with growing plants and cut flowers, while small flags were put in every conceivable place. In the center, back of the pulpit, was a picture of Miss Willard, our beloved chieftain, draped with the national colors; below this was a fine scroll made by Rev. C. D. Spencer, on which was the state motto, "The Lord of Hosts is with us," while on either side were banners with the National motto, "For God and Home and Native Land."

The meeting was opened by Mrs. Eda L. Freed, county president, and prayer was offered by Rev. C. D. Spencer. On Mrs. Hidden's arrival she immediately began the work of organization and the election of officers for the year took place.

The evening session commenced with singing "All hail the power of Jesus' name," followed by prayer by the president and reading of the one hundred and forty-sixth Psalm. A recitation, "Five Cents a Glass," was given by Miss Watson. Welcome on behalf of the pastors of the city was extended by Rev. McKillup; on behalf of the local union by Mrs. C. D. Spencer, of Centralia, and the responses were by Mrs. H. Lamont, of Chehalis, and Mrs. Hidden, of Vancouver.

Wednesday morning the devotions were led by Mrs. Spencer, who spoke of the blessed work of the Holy Spirit as differing from the works of the flesh. Mrs. B. Steadman, of Nebraska, was brought to the platform and introduced. Her presence was a benediction on the convention. The question drawer produced a list of pertinent questions which were answered by Mrs. Hidden. The following unions reported: Napavine, Winlock, Bucoda, Newaukum, Chehalis and Centralia. The president gave her address which was well received. Mrs. Hidden gave an instructive talk to the new unions on the school of methods. The ladies then convened in the free reading room, a short distance from the church, where an ample repast was provided for all the delegates. This reading room is supported by the Centralia union. A prohibition prayer-meeting is also held every Sunday at five o'clock.

The afternoon session opened by singing the temperance doxology with Scripture reading. A practical paper on temperance literature, followed by a discussion of the subject, and an excellent paper on "The Union Signal" were read by Mrs. Loomis, of Bucoda.

Mrs. Hidden gave an instructive talk on legislation and petition. Mrs. Graves, state superintendent of purity, gave a very earnest talk on that most important subject, urging one standard of morals for men and women. Mothers' meetings was then presented by Mrs. C. D. Spencer, state superintendent of that department. She earnestly recommended that a superintendent be appointed by each union for that work, and that one meeting in each month be a mothers' meeting, also that Mrs. Henry's book, "Unanswered Prayer," be used in these meetings.

Mrs. Steadman, of Nebraska, gave a paper on equal suffrage, a most excellent production. She emphasized the necessity of women reading and knowing more of the laws of the state and county in which they live and by which they are governed. The convention voted to hold a semi-annual convention at Winlock in October.

At Wednesday evening's session the following questions were asked:

"Who gave women the ballot in Washington?" "Who took it from her?" "Did she use it when she had it?" "Is she qualified to use it?" The questions were answered by the following gentlemen: Mr. Wallace, Mr. Elmer Shields, Mr. Baker and Mr. Freed. Mrs. Hidden then made a telling address on "Equal suffrage" which was received with much applause.

The semi-annual convention of Pierce county was held in Edison, in the Presbyterian church. The walls were beautifully decorated with W. C. T. U. mottoes and banners, well interspersed with suffrage colors and mottoes. Golden-rod with white roses made tasteful floral decorations. A lovely silk banner, showing the states with whole or part suffrage for women, was an object lesson. Mrs. N. J. Croake, the new county president, left nothing undone that could be done to insure a good convention, and she succeeded. Her address was full of good suggestions, showing that she had carefully and prayerfully considered her work. Mrs. Croake has hardly been a year in the W. C. T. U., yet she managed this work with the skill of a veteran. Every hour was provided for, and fearing some disappointments she had engaged workers to be on hand to fill possible vacancies, so there was no talking to fill up time. We have scarcely ever attended a convention so well managed by the president and heartily coöperated in by the workers.

The Y's had one hour, and they crowded it full of good things. They are evidently workers that "need not to be ashamed." A large audience gathered in the evening to hear papers on suffrage from Mrs. Talmadge, of Puyallup, and Mrs. S. Lou Monroe, of Tacoma, and the evening's exercises closed with a Demorest contest by several young girls. Wednesday was crowded full of earnest work. Mr. A. L. Allen, chief grand templar, of Tacoma, brought greeting from the I. O. G. T., and made a speech full of encouragement to the convention. Rev. J. H. Reynard, pastor of the Presbyterian church of Edison, manifested hearty sympathy with our work. The ladies of Edison did all in their power for the comfort of their guests, and we left with the wish in our hearts that they would invite us again. Mrs. Spinning, of Puyallup, gave an able presentation of the suffrage question. We must mention Mrs. Garlick's "Press Symposium." She is an indefatigable press superintendent.

We do wish it were possible for the workers in the older Eastern states to realize the difficulties in the new Western states, yet we know it is impossible without experiencing them; then they would understand what it means to work up a successful convention out here, and we would be sure of their prayers. After indorsing "the party that knows no compromise with the saloon," the superintendents of evangelistic and flower mission work, mothers' meetings, etc., protested against the papers publishing the details of prize fights. Resolution sixth was: "That we cease not to protest against paying taxes and supporting a government which deprives its women of the right to representation through the ballot, and that we will use our influence with the next legislature in favor of a bill restoring suffrage to the women of Washington, or remove taxation from its unrepresented women."

The claims of THE UNION SIGNAL were not forgotten in the convention nor in the resolutions.

OOUNTY CONVENTION.

King county met in Seattle at the First Presbyterian church. Mrs. Etta Jones, county president, opened the session with devotional exercises. The morning was devoted to the discussion of such questions as municipal suffrage for women, Sunday closing of saloons, purity in literature and art, etc. At the afternoon session devotions were led by Mrs. Johnston, of Seattle, and the convention was entertained by the reading of an instructive paper on press work by Mrs. O. N. Garlick, of Tacoma, state superintendent of that department.

The president read her address, which was highly appreciated. Reports from local unions and heads of departments were excellent. Miss Bunnell, from Puyallup, then gave an interesting chalk-talk. The evening program was listened to by a large audience of appreciative listeners. Mrs. Gove, of Oakland, Cal., led the devotions. Rev. Mr. Smiley, of Philadelphia, addressed the meeting. His address was interesting, practical and struck at the root of the evil.

Miss Alice Augustine recited "Comforting the Sick" and won an encore. An instrumental duet by two little girls followed, and was warmly applauded. A fine address was delivered by Rev. Wallace Nutting, after which a marching song was sung by four little girls with banners inscribed with the letters W. C. T. U. A collection was taken to aid in our work. The singing of the temperance doxology closed the evening session.

Thursday morning Mrs. Shaffer conducted appropriate exercises in honor of Miss Frances Willard's birthday. Mme. Willard's favorite hymn, "Oh, the good we all may do," was sung. Mrs. H. E. Wright voiced the feelings of the convention in earnest prayer. Mrs. Franc Lee spoke briefly of Miss Willard's life and work, emphasizing that the most acceptable offering we could tender our chieftain on this her natal day would be an increased membership, and that we make special effort in this direction.

Mrs. Gove addressed the convention on prison and jail work. She told thrilling incidents connected with her work of wonderful good accomplished. The first hour of the afternoon session was devoted to business. Mrs. Spinning, of Puyallup, read an able and exhaustive paper on "Equal Suffrage." Mrs. Shaffer spoke of a plan being formed to start a state paper. The resolution committee handed in a number of good resolutions, which, if put in practice, will result in great benefit. We expect Mrs. Beavers, from Lynden, to travel through our county and work for the upbuilding of the cause. May she meet with abundant success.

NEWS IN A NUTSHELL.

CALIFORNIA has asked Major Scott to return to fill his engagements. He and Mrs. Scott, therefore, will go at once to the Pacific Coast, and on their way will take up some of the appointments made by Mrs. Mary A. Hitchcock, state president, beginning at Faremont, December 6.

THE Northern California state convention, held in October, instructed its secretary to express to Dr. R. H. McDonald, formerly of San Francisco, its loving sympathy and tender interest in his long illness and continued absence from home. The grateful white-ribboners of the Golden Gate state remember with affection, which strengthens as the years roll on, that Dr. McDonald has been, from the first, their kind and constant friend, and desired to convey to him a sense of their appreciation of that friendship. Tried and true they have found it, and do assure him that their best wishes and prayers are his, until he shall have passed on to the realm where prayer gives place to praise, and where the reward of the faithful servant will be his.

A VERY unusual and gratifying document has reached THE UNION SIGNAL office. It is a copy of the resolutions passed by the Hyde Park, Mass., Congregational church regarding the services in the scientific temperance field of Mrs. Mary H. Hunt, who has recently removed her membership to a Boston church, because of her change of residence. The resolutions state:

"That in the spirit of her consecration to this larger and broader field of Christian endeavor we recognize the call of Providence, and blend our best wishes and prayers with her hopeful anticipations that her efforts, heretofore so beneficent and blessed of God, may be but first fruits of a maturing harvest, which shall culminate in the extension of peace, righteousness and temperance to all nations.

"That this church will ever cherish the memory of her labors; and will count, as one of its honored historic incidents, the initiative in our midst of labors which demand universal recognition, wherever the gospel is carried, and the Kingdom of our Lord and Master, the Christ, advances toward its assured and universal dominion."

Verily a new era is dawning when the Christian church bestows such deserved recognition! Mrs. Hunt's new address in Boston is 23 Trull St.

RELATION OF TEMPERANCE TO LABOR AND CAPITAL.

In entering upon the duties of this department for the second time it is not without a deep sense of its significance, nor without a knowledge of the difficulties that must be overcome to make the department a success.

Although the work of last year was inefficient and to me most unsatisfactory, yet the responsibility is again assumed, with a full realization of its magnitude, and a full belief that no branch of our work presents greater opportunities for a rich and abundant harvest. Since labor constitutes the bone and sinew of our National fabric there is no department which, if judiciously pushed, can be made more far-reaching in its effects, and yet none that seems more difficult to set in successful operation.

For years it has been the earnest desire of our leader to make this department effective. Superintendents have at various times been appointed, and yet for some inexplicable cause the work has failed to keep pace with that of other departments. On assuming the responsibilities of this position one year ago, I corresponded personally with every state and territorial president regarding the status of the work within her jurisdiction. Replies were received from twenty-five presidents, nine of whom reported superintendents of the work, and three others have since been appointed. Early in the year my health became so greatly impaired that it was impossible for me to go forward with the work, and state superintendents, no doubt, lost much of their interest; two of them, however, wearied not in well doing—Ella A. Boole, of New York, and Mrs. A. Steele, of Colorado—whose reports, though received too late to be incorporated in my own, brought cheer and encouragement, and were received with grateful appreciation.

In accordance with the plan of last year it was my purpose to reach the unions through their state presidents. But this plan proved ineffective, as the state presidents could not appoint until the meeting of the executive, which in some instances did not occur until their annual convention, and as many conventions were not held until a few weeks prior to the National Convention it left us but little time to adopt active measures.

Seeing the failure of this plan of work it is now my purpose to appeal directly to every local, county, district and state union. I appeal especially to the local unions, not only because I believe the work can be more successfully begun there, but because they are already asking for literature, and making earnest inquiry regarding the methods to be adopted. We cannot wait for this department to go through the routine of handing appointments down through state, district and county unions; rather let us work up from the locals to these higher organizations. By awakening local unions on this subject a demand will at once be created for county, district, and state superintendents.

After earnest, careful and prayerful consideration of the two methods, I am fully decided on the latter and hereby appeal to all local unions to at once elect a superintendent of this department. Let the work begin at your next meeting. We want at least one hundred unions to report superintendents of this department before February 1. For the present, where there is no state superintendent, let the reports be made directly to your National superintendent, who will record them in the order in which they are received.

Whenever possible I would advise that persons connected with labor organizations be made superintendents of this department. In all cases the person appointed or elected should be in hearty sympathy with the laboring classes.

By way of instruction I would suggest, first, that a lesson be given on the effects of alcohol on the human system. If possible secure the service of some teacher or other person who has given special attention to "Scientific Temperance Instruction." The use of a manikin showing the effects of alcohol on the different organs of the body would add greatly to such a lesson. Second, show the effects of alcohol on the brain, its power to dethrone the intellect, pervert the moral nature, overthrow the will power, blunt the conscience and blight the soul. Show that the habitual drinker, though not a confirmed inebriate, is constantly under an alcoholic influence which renders him irresponsible and unreliable. Show the disadvantages, the insults and impositions to which the victims of drink are continually subjected. State instances where men have been made drunk in order that they might be victimized — notably the case of Gallagher in his testimony against Dempsey in the Homestead trial, where he says: "They got me drunk, prepared a confession for me and kept me supplied with whisky for forty-two days. They had me so badly frightened and kept me so drunk that I testified to anything they proposed."

Show that the saloon not only robs the laborer directly, but that he is pauperized through the competitive labor of convicts. Statistics show that more than seventy-five per cent of the crime of the country is the direct result of the liquor traffic. These crimes send men to prisons and penitentiaries, where they are let to contractors who pay the most menial wages, and yet this cheap contract labor is brought in direct competition with that of the honest, industrial classes.

Finally, show that the depressed condition from which labor is now suffering has been brought upon the country through unjust class legislation. Show that our legislators are largely addicted to the use of intoxicants, and that many of these laws have been enacted while a large per cent of the legislators were under its influence. Show that unscrupulous men have devised these laws, and by means of wine suppers and the pernicious custom of "treating"—perhaps more than through the influence of patronage and purse—they have succeeded in securing their enactment. Show that the

NATIONAL TEMPERANCE HOSPITAL.

[In lieu of the regular matter for the hospital column, we gladly publish Mrs. Hobbs' report, which was not read at the Convention for lack of time.—EDS.]

The importance of the work and principles, as demonstrated in the National Temperance Hospital and Sanitarium in advancing this great temperance reform, cannot be more strongly emphasized than by quoting the words of our honored and beloved president, Miss Willard, as expressed in the National Temperance Hospital Quarterly in 1887, when she says, "In all of our many-sided 'home protection' work we are nowhere laying foundations more substantial than by raising a standard against alcohol's most subtle falsehood, that it is needed in medicine, and alcohol's most insidious temptation, that of physicians' prescriptions and the druggist's supplies."

That "every disease can be better cured without alcohol than with it," was uttered by Dr. Benjamin Ward Richardson years ago, and to-day this statement is confirmed by many of our leading physicians. The two temperance hospitals, one in London, the other in Chicago, are great object lessons, showing what can be done without the use of alcohol.

We shall hail with joy the time when mothers, as well as physicians, shall have learned what remedies to use in place of liquors, that the "liquor appetite" may come to an end. The few, comparatively, have learned this important scientific fact, while the masses must be taught these truths by demonstration, and nowhere can this be so effectually done as in our Hospital and Sanitarium.

The six years of strict adherence to the principle of non-alcoholic treatment have made a wonderful revolution in public sentiment. This hospital from its small beginning has continued to advance through much adversity and opposition until it has become an established institution, co-extensive in its influence with that of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, commanding the confidence and respect of all who have become familiar with its management.

The location and surroundings of the hospital are beautiful and healthful, while the homelike interior is very inviting. The patients are under the care of trained and experienced nurses, and receive the best possible attention. The hospital staff has been largely increased by the addition of distinguished physicians from the two leading schools of medicine. I am happy to say that our hospital is becoming noted for its superior medical treatment—and especially for the difficult surgical operations successfully performed. The present class of nurses in training consists of eight conscientious Christian young ladies, who receive instruction from a well qualified superintending nurse, and members of the medical staff.

The annual reports of the past year show a gratifying advance in the various departments. In addition to the pay patients, we aim to make this a home for W. C. T. U. workers and others who need hospital treatment and are unable to provide it for themselves.

For this reason we plead with white-ribboners for contributions of money and hospital supplies in aid of this great work. We would also call attention to a building fund that has already been started as a nucleus for further donations. We believe that a sufficient fund could be speedily raised to purchase a permanent building, if the ladies would interest themselves to secure donations from those having large means, and who desire to apply it to charitable purposes. Dear sisters, this is the Master's work which we are called to do, and this high motive should inspire us to carry forward a hospital free from the poisoning effects of alcohol.

The number of patients treated in the hospital the past year were one hundred and seventy-eight, of which twenty-four were free patients, one hundred and twenty-seven females and fifty-one males. The number of diseases treated were two hundred and sixty-eight, and surgical operations, two hundred and twenty-four. The seeming discrepancy between the number of patients, diseases and surgical operations, arises from the fact that some patients had more than one disease, while others had more than one surgical operation. There were ten deaths; the increased number is accounted for by our having had a larger number of serious cases than in any previous year. Twenty states and thirteen nationalities were represented.

At present there are but two endowed beds; the Y's, however, have one partially endowed which has been a blessing to quite a number of our afflicted sisters. The expense of endowing a bed is only three hundred and fifty dollars a year. Will not states and individuals make this investment in the interest of afflicted humanity? Five thousand dollars secures a permanent endowment. Any one making either one of these contributions has the privilege of designating the occupant of the bed subject to the rules of the hospital. All cash donations should be sent to the treasurer, Mrs. C. E. Bigelow, 539 West Adams street, Chicago; and all hospital supplies to the matron, Mrs. Sarah M. Hornby, at the hospital, 1619 Diversey avenue, Chicago, Ill. The management heartily invite the members of the convention to visit the hospital, where visitors are always welcome.

We would not close this report without paying a tribute of affection and appreciation to the memory of our co-worker, Miss Mary Allen West. She was a trustee of the hospital in its early days, and for a considerable time its faithful secretary. This work was so in harmony with her "scientific temperance instruction" that it had a large place in her heart, and she thoroughly believed in the necessity of the hospital to demonstrate the principles taught by the W. C. T. U., as well as the caring for the afflicted. We hold her memory sacred. She "fought the good fight, kept the faith, and henceforth there is laid up for her a crown of life."

NEW BOOKS.

WORTH HAVING, a compilation of stories from The Pansy that are indeed "worth having." These stories are short, breezy, full of healthy moral and bristling with suggestions that can be made of real value to alert young readers.

D. Lothrop Company, Boston, Mass.

IMMORTELLES. In loving memory of England's Poet Laureate. Selections from the writings of Alfred, Lord Tennyson, selected and arranged by Rose Porter. Miss Porter is well known as one whose rare taste culls from the writings of our best authors those gems that are prized by the great majority of readers, and this book of IMMORTELLES is well-named, for it contains those words of the poet which have immortality in the love of the people.

D. Lothrop Company, Boston, Mass.

A beautiful holiday volume, issued by Houghton, Mifflin & Company, contains nine of Henry Wadsworth Longfellow's poems of the home, with exquisite illustrations. Among the poems are those held in such tender memory in the homes of this and other lands: THE HANGING OF THE CRANE, "The Children's Hour," "The Castle Builder" and "The Golden-Milestone." A few pages of notes give in brief the history of each poem. The book takes its name from the first one mentioned.

One of the best helps to primary lessons in spiritual truths is LITTLE CHILDREN IN THE CHURCH OF CHRIST, by Rev. Charles Roads, the president of the Pennsylvania Christian Endeavor Union. The book opens with a plea for a religious meeting for the little children—not to take the place of the Sunday-school, nor the church service, but a meeting where the little ones may receive just such help to growth in grace as older disciples receive in the prayer circles. There are here most valuable suggestions to the leader of such a juvenile meeting, and no less than sixty-two "Sketches of Sermons"—brief, pithy outlines of talks, with directions for use of blackboard and crayons, directions such as can be followed whether one "can draw" or not. The book fills a felt want, and merits a wide and lasting circulation.

D. Lothrop Company, Boston, Mass.

A HANDBOOK FOR SEWING SCHOOL TEACHERS. Published by Thomas Whittaker, 2 and 3 Bible House, New York City.

In less than one hundred and twenty-five pages there is comprehended all the directions needed for the details of hand sewing, from the holding of the needle and breaking thread from spool to a brief chapter on "flannel embroidery." Many a mother will be glad of the aid of this practical little book in her own home-teaching.

THE MILL AT SANDY CREEK, by Rev. Edward A. Rand, is one of the best stories from the pen of this writer, who has been mentioned favorably and not infrequently in these columns. The author calls this a story for girls, but he has made it broad enough and bright enough for boy readers as well. The story is evidently written to show the influence of a personality. Its ending is just a little too suddenly romantic to be quite probable, but this does not condemn the book.

Thomas Whittaker, 2 and 3 Bible House, New York City.

PUBLIC SCHOOL PHYSIOLOGY AND TEMPERANCE by William Nattress, M. D., is the book authorized by the education department of Ontario, Canada. Its arrangement is clear and simple, and its utterances on the use of alcoholics and narcotics are uncompromising. It contains chapters relative to the care of the sick and injured, how to prevent disease, physical exercise. In appendices are given the regulations of the education department respecting the study of physiology and temperance quotations from the license act with respect to minors, an act respecting the use of tobacco by minors as assented to in 1892.

Published by William Briggs, 29 Richmond street west, Toronto.

A rare treasure for the boy just entering young manhood, and emerging from the commonplaces of school-life to enter the ever-to-be desired doors of college, is WALTER CAMP'S BOOK OF COLLEGE SPORTS. It embraces the whole curriculum of college sports, describing their intricacies in detail, giving terms with their explanations, diagrams, illustrations from life, and somewhat of the history of the sports such as the "men" need to know to be intelligent participants in the contests. In the Appendix are given rules for foot-ball, base-ball, rowing and track athletics, with other valuable matter. The volume is printed in large type on heavy paper, and bound in durable, attractive style. No more fitting gift than this can be found for the holiday times.

THE CENTURY WORLD'S FAIR BOOK FOR BOYS AND GIRLS. By Tudor Jenks.

This is an account of the wonders of the great Fair put in the form of a capital story for young folks. Two boys, Harry Blake and Philip Rodman, bright young fellows, are sent to the Exposition by Harry's father, with their tutor, Mr. Douglass. Harry makes sketches and Philip takes photographs, and everything of importance is covered either in text or illustration. Those who went to the Fair will live again in this story the delights they experienced on the grounds. Those who did not go will find here one of the best accounts of it yet printed, with hundreds of interesting engravings, reproductions of photographs, and drawings. The author, Tudor Jenks, is well known to all readers of St. Nicholas, and they will thoroughly enjoy the vein of delightful humor which runs through this much-to-be desired book.

A JAPANESE INTERIOR. By Alice Mabel Bacon, author of "Japanese Girls and Women." This is a collection of letters written by Miss Bacon during a stay in Japan, which she terms "somewhat different from that of the average foreign resident in the East." She was teacher in a "school for noble girls, under the management of the Imperial Household Department," and as such was brought into intimate relations with the best class of Japanese women, and was enabled to study in detail the many undeniably beautiful characteristics of home life among Japan's upper class. Miss Bacon's home was in Tokyo, and the house she lived in part foreign and part purely Japanese. "My thought," says the author in her introduction, "throughout the work of editing these letters has been to preserve as far as possible, without violating confidence, or that sweet seclusion that is so characteristic a feature of Japanese home life, the little touches of nature that make the whole world kin, and bring into one human brotherhood all races under heaven." The book is delicately pure and sweet in its literary dress, and because of the personal experience behind its narrative is strong in its interest and real value in reliable information.

WHY THESE?

Yes, why take the publications of the W. T. P. A. in preference to those of other publishing houses?

1. Because, as loyal W. C. T. U. women, it is your duty to support your own publishing house.

2. Because its publications are prepared with special reference to our needs by experts who have made a study of W. C. T. U. work, and endorsed by officers of the National W. C. T. U. who form its advisory committee.

3. Because the very appearance of the pages prepossesses in their favor. "A clear, chaste page is a teacher of decency and cleanliness. Rank fence-corners and crooked furrows on the home-farm never helped to make a boy a first-class farmer." "Let the dime novel have the flimsy paper and poor printing."

4. A bit of a story, which we borrow from a denominational leaflet, will serve to point our moral:

There lived in the West a rich Methodist farmer, whose special line was the raising of blooded cattle. He was superintendent of the Sunday-school in his church, and, like some others who have not thought much about it, he advocated the use of certain cheaply-edited and poorly printed Sunday-school lessons and papers. He was in the habit of saying that they would do as well as any, and "cost less than our own." At last his pastor, whose arguments had been disregarded, asked him how he kept such fine stock on his farm. His reply was promptly made that he would have no other kind about him. He got the best grades, he said, and gave them the best care and the best food. "I wish you were as anxious to raise good Methodists in your Sunday-school," said the pastor, "as you are to have the best cattle on your farm." "What do you mean?" said the superintendent; "I have a good Sunday-school." "I'm glad you think so, brother; but you are feeding for scrub stock." "I see it," said the farmer-superintendent, "and that fodder goes out. I'll raise high-grade Methodists in that school, or quit!"

GOOD WORDS FOR THE UNION SIGNAL.

A gifted literary woman of Canada writes: "We are stanch W. C. T. U., and look upon THE UNION SIGNAL with pride and delight. It is wonderful."

There seems to be no limit to the capacity of THE UNION SIGNAL in providing intellectual treats for its readers. I feel deeply grateful for each number, and hasten to read it so I can loan it to others.

GRAND PARLIAMENT OF RELIGIONS

It is practically impossible to estimate the value to the world of the recent Congress of Religions held in Chicago, under the auspices of the World's Columbian Exposition.

THE WORLD'S FAIR WAS A TRIUMPH OF THINGS MATERIAL.

THIS CONGRESS WAS A SYMPOSIUM OF ALL THINGS SPIRITUAL.

Science, Agriculture, Finance, Health, even Education and Temperance, which were discussed by their ablest representatives, pale into unimportance beside the momentous issues debated by the leaders of religion.

We have been fortunate in obtaining a full and complete Report of this important Congress.

We have all the speeches and debates delivered by the supporters of the various creeds, and we have also secured the portraits of the prominent representatives from all the far-away lands, who were present.

We have made an admirable arrangement for "the people," whereby they can easily obtain these reports.

On receipt of ten cents we will send you Part One of the Report of the proceedings of the "Parliament of Religions" (to be completed in 11 weekly parts.) If you are a subscriber, or become such, we will accept One Dollar ($1.00), in full payment, if remitted at once, for the entire series, and will send you the parts as issued weekly, thus saving you the labor and additional expense of remitting for each number. separately.

Cut or copy this coupon and send to THE UNION SIGNAL, The Temple, Chicago,

Signal Notes.

THE average nightly attendance at the Army Shelters of the Salvation Army is 3,600 in London.

IN England, a Christian Endeavor Bicycle Club conducts open-air services in various places.

IT IS said that more women are employed by the English government than by any other country.

A FOREIGN journal states that there are not half a million Frenchmen living outside their own country.

IT is estimated that the Americans spend more than two hundred million dollars yearly for reading matter.

FOR three pence a week, the school board of London provides evening instruction for young men and women, girls and boys, in practical studies.

EX-CONGRESSMAN T. E. WATSON, now conducting a campaign for the People's party in Georgia, opens his meetings by prayer and singing of a hymn.

AN armless young Swiss woman, Mlle Aimie Rapm, has become quite a proficient portrait painter, using her feet. She carries on her work now in London.

AGRICULTURISTS say that the ground of the Farm Colony of the Salvation Army has never been so productive as now, proving that the soldiers work the fields as thoroughly as they do all other work.

ONE hundred and forty working-class leaders in England have signed a declaration which urges the passing of the Local Veto bill, as it is one which will confer great benefit on the workingman.

HALF the income of the Salvation Army is collected, chiefly in pence, from the poor. Dr. Barnardo's last report shows that of the income for the year, amounting to one hundred and thirty-three thousand pounds, two-thirds of the amount was given in small sums of one pound and less.

A NEW intellectual movement, under the name of New Islam, is on foot in India, which is raising its voice against polygamy and slavery. One of the leaders says: "The conviction is gradually forcing itself on all sides that polygamy is as much opposed to the teaching of Mohammed as it is to the general progress of civilized society."

DR. MENDEL, of Berlin, published a chemical study on coffee inebriety. His observations were made on the women of the working population in a small city. He found melancholia and hysteria resulting from the extreme use of coffee, and also states that many opium and alcoholic cases have as an early history the excessive use of it.

THE well-known fact that women live longer than men is illustrated as follows: The excess of women over men in England and Wales is about three and a half per cent, but when one begins to compare men over sixty with women over sixty, the majority becomes much greater, and when eighty-five is passed the per cent is very large. The women nonogenarians nearly double the men.

THE American Female Guardian society of New York is undenominational in its character, and during its fifty-nine years of existence, forty thousand children have been cared for in its Home for the Friendless, and many thousands have been placed in permanent homes. It has established twelve industrial schools in the tenement house districts. Cooking and sewing are taught and kindergartens are being introduced.

CONSUMPTION CURED.

An old physician, retired from practice, had placed in his hands by an East India missionary the formula of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure of Consumption, Bronchitis, Catarrh, Asthma and all Throat and Lung Affections, also a positive and radical cure for Nervous Debility and all Nervous Complaints. Having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, and desiring to relieve human suffering, I will send free of charge to all who wish it, this recipe, in German, French or English, with full directions for preparing and using. THE GREAT THROUGH CAR LINE.

It is a well established fact that the North-Western Line (Chicago & North-Western R'y) in its equipment and train service, its general facilities for the accommodation of all classes of travel, and its methods of looking after the comfort and welfare of its patrons, takes rank with the leading railways of the world.

Its through car lines extend from Chicago to St. Paul and Minneapolis, the "Twin Cities of the Northwest;" to Duluth, the Superiors, Ashland, Marquette, and the wonderful iron and copper regions of northern Wisconsin and Michigan; to Winona, Pierre, and the rich agricultural sections of Minnesota and the Dakotas; to Des Moines, Sioux City, Council Bluffs, Omaha, Lincoln, the prosperous and growing cities of Iowa and Nebraska; to Deadwood, the Dakota Hot Springs, and the famous mining districts of the Black Hills; to Denver, Salt Lake, and the health resorts of Colorado and Utah; to San Francisco, Cal.; Portland, Oregon, and Pacific Coast and Puget Sound points.

The perfectly equipped vestibuled trains of the North-Western Line convey the traveler comfortably, safely and quickly to nearly every part of the West and Northwest, and while one may travel surrounded by all of the luxuries afforded by an equipment of magnificent sleeping cars, buffet and library cars, compartment sleeping cars and superb dining cars, the comfort and convenience of passengers desiring to travel at small expense is promoted by the provision of accommodations for their use in Tourist Sleeping Cars, Free Reclining Chair Cars and commodious day coaches.

In a word, if you contemplate a trip to almost any portion of the West and Northwest your ticket should read via the North-Western Line. Maps, time tables and general information can be obtained of ticket agents in the United States and Canada, or by addressing W. A. Thrall, General Passenger and Ticket Agent. PATENTS.

NOTICE TO INVENTORS.

There was never a time in the history of our country when the demand for inventions and improvements in the arts and sciences generally was so great as now. The conveniences of mankind in the factory and workshop, the household, on the farm and in official life, require continual accessions to the appurtenances and implements of each in order to save labor, time and expense. The political change in the administration of government does not affect the progress of the American inventor, who, being on the alert and ready to perceive the existing deficiencies, does not permit the affairs of government to deter him from quickly conceiving the remedy to overcome existing discrepancies. Too great care cannot be exercised in choosing a competent and skillful attorney to prepare and prosecute an application for patent. Valuable interests have been lost and destroyed in innumerable instances by the employment of incompetent counsel, and especially is this advice applicable to those who adopt the "No patent, no pay" system. Inventors who entrust their business of this class of attorneys do so at imminent risk, as the breadth and strength of the patent is never considered in view of a quick endeavor to get an allowance and obtain the fee then due. THE PRESS CLAIMS COMPANY, John Wedderburn, General Manager, 618 F street, N. W., Washington, D. C., representing a large number of important daily and weekly papers, as well as general periodicals of the country, was instituted to protect its patrons from the unsafe methods heretofore employed in this line of business. The said Company is prepared to take charge of all patent business entrusted to it for reasonable fees and prepares and prosecutes applications generally, including mechanical inventions, design patents, trade-marks, labels, copyrights, interferences, infringements, validity reports, and gives especial attention to rejected cases. It is also prepared to enter into competition with any firm in securing foreign patents.

Write for instructions and advice.

A LADIES' DESK.

The Chautauqua Ladies' Desk is not only ornamental, but convenient, affording a safe place for keeping correspondence, etc. Its three roomy shelves are just the place to keep those choice books always in demand. This desk is offered free by the Larkin Soap Mfg. Co., of Buffalo, N. Y., whose advertisement is in another column, to any one who will buy, at once, a box of their "Sweet Home" Soap. Last year several thousand families received one of these desks, and were highly pleased. The Chautauqua Lamp made this company a good reputation (they can still be had), but the desk has eclipsed all. No other one article of household furnishing ever went into so many homes of this great and glorious land, and gave such universal satisfaction.

HOW MANY?

How many new members are you claiming for Crusade Day? "According to your faith be it unto you."

SINCE OUR LAST ISSUE.

Thanksgiving day was universally observed.

Bitterly cold weather prevailed in the Northwest last week.

The corner-stone of the new city library of Chicago was laid November 30.

The New York board of education is making strenuous efforts to put an end to cigarette smoking.

The trial of Prendergast, the assassin of Mayor Harrison, of Chicago, began Monday in the circuit court.

London was menaced last Sunday by a mob of anarchists who gathered, in defiance of the police, in and around Trafalgar Square.

The vote of the German Reichstag in favor of re-admitting the Jesuit fathers into Germany was the sensation of the Catholic world last week.

The first elections in New Zealand under the equal suffrage law, November 30, resulted favorably to the government. The women voted in large numbers.

The Japanese government has made the generous donation to the Columbian Museum of all its beautiful cases used in various buildings of the World's Fair.

Lord and Lady Aberdeen have refused to give their patronage to the opera, "The Mascotte," to be conducted in Ottawa, Canada, under church auspices. It is generally understood that they do not wish to encourage such entertainments in church work.

The state canvassing board of Colorado has completed its work, which shows a majority of 6,347 in favor of woman's suffrage. In accordance with the above, Governor Waite, on Saturday, issued a proclamation giving women the right to vote at all elections in the state.

The Afro-American convention closed its three days' session in Cincinnati, December 1. Considerable difference of opinion was expressed on the exodus of the colored people to Africa. A senatorial council, composed of two from each state, will conduct the business of the organization in the interim of conventions.

ONE very excellent method of securing names and fees for membership is to have the pledge printed upon envelopes with spaces below for name and address. Let these be scattered all over the house at public meetings or sent through the postoffice asking that the name be signed on the envelope, and the fee inclosed. It has worked admirably in some places.

OUR W. T. P. A. force believes that "charity begins at home," so the first thing it did when last week's UNION SIGNAL was out, was to circulate a paper for contributions to Miss Willard's ten cent Crusade Thankoffering. In a little while seventy-eight names were affixed and seventy-eight dimes were handed to the National treasurer. It is blessed to see the spirit of giving so practical this year.

DO NOT underestimate music as a factor in Crusade Day efforts. Miss Willard's suggestion of asking those who will join us to rise during the singing of some stirring hymn is an excellent one. But, in order to have it prove practical, the hymn must be stirring and it must be stirringly sung. Let us be careful not to make the mistake of planning carefully for all other parts of the day's service and leaving the music to run at its own sweet will. Make that, too, a part of the glorious ingathering of fruitage unto the Lord.

OUR double Crusade and Christmas number will be issued next week, December 14, instead of the 21st, as we first planned. The "good things" are coming in so fast that we are confident in announcing it the most attractive and instructive number we have yet issued. More than one hundred people will speak through its columns of the wonderful Crusade and the glorious Christmas tide. The unique and beautiful cover will be one of the attractions, being especially drawn by our own artist, Miss Zella Neill, who has furnished us many handsome designs. The original Crusaders will hail the Crusade band so faithfully and artistically pictured. For announcement see page 15.

WE are sure that our women do not often and earnestly enough ask others to join us. We have in thought a union which existed for years with but four members. It seemed as if no others could be found. By a little extra effort a meeting was called to invite in outsiders. It was a simple, informal affair, but six new members joined that day, and two or three of them said, "I never was asked before." Ask! "Ask largely!" Ask God, and then ask your neighbor. Beg, beseech, importune, coax, threaten (with the terrors of the liquor traffic); do everything but bribe, and bribery is permissible if it consists in emphasizing "the joy which is set before" those who give up their lives to this work. Let there be no woman in your community who shall not have a personal invitation, spoken or written, on or before Crusade Day. Let no one from henceforth be able to say, "I never was asked before."

THE changes upon the best methods for observing Crusade Day have been rung so many times that it seems impossible to suggest new plans. And yet there is one old, yet ever new method which cannot be too strongly emphasized, viz, prayer—prayer not in the abstract, for communities, but in the concrete, for individuals. Have you ever asked God to incline the heart of your neighbor, Mrs. — to join the W. C. T. U.? Ask Him each day from now till December 23, and see what the result will be. If the members of each union kept "prayer lists," we believe they would find constant reason to rejoice in the increase of membership. Let scoffers scoff if they will; there is still a chain of wonderful strength which binds you to the soul for whom you daily pray, and which, in turn, binds that soul to you. "Ask and ye shall receive."

THE heart of our National treasurer, Mrs. Helen M. Barker, is made glad these days by the hearty responses to Miss Willard's call for a Crusade Thankoffering. The first received was from a loyal brother-in-law in Milwaukee and it was accompanied by these words, "As my wife was reading Miss Willard's letter asking for ten cents, my reply was, I cannot send a check for so small a sum as that, I therefore enclose you a check for one hundred cents." The next response was from the secretary of the Inter-collegiate Prohibition Association as follows: "Enclosed please find a dime. You can depend upon the college boys and girls to stand by the W. C. T. U." A very touching letter came from one of our own National superintendents, and we venture to give a glimpse into it: "I enclose P. O. order for five dollars, bought with a gold piece found in the purse of our darling daughter when she left us last spring. This is as she would have wished, and is doubly precious as having been hers. The very first money she ever earned, she poured into my lap, from her little bank, saying, 'Here, mamma, is my dollar (all in pennies and nickels) for the foreign work.' So you see her interest in the W. C. T. U. work was inherent." Next week Mrs. Barker will open up a "Corner" in THE UNION SIGNAL in which she will embody the helpful sentiments from the letters accompanying these gifts. In the meantime let the good work go on!

THE first response received in the editorial office to Miss Willard's call for a Crusade Thankoffering was from Mother Wallace, who is spending the winter in Chicago. The letter that accompanied it is so excellent that we furnish it in part to our readers. She writes on Thanksgiving day, and says: "I do not know that I can better show my appreciation of the blessed privileges of this day than by sending you a line expressive of my love for all the white-ribbon workers. I have read THE UNION SIGNAL of this date, and my heart swells with gratitude to the Giver of all good for the comradeship of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. How I rejoice over the results of the woman's suffrage campaign in Colorado, not so much that the women have the suffrage as because the whole thing shows the progress and development of men quite as much as of women. Talk as much as we may of the progress of woman, the whole question resolves itself into this: That until men grow just, broad and grand, they will never deal righteously with us or themselves. Hence I feel that the attitude of the men in Colorado is the most hopeful feature. It is only the beginning of the end. Let us thank God and take courage. Humanity will, in time, reach its high destiny, and vindicate its claim to divine origin." We rejoice that Mother Wallace is living to see the partial triumph of the cause which she has so long and eloquently espoused.

So felicitous was a recent gathering in THE UNION SIGNAL office that we will be pardoned for giving our readers an account of it. The occasion was an "editorial luncheon" to the officials at Headquarters in honor of the three newcomers, Mrs. Mary A. Woodbridge, National corresponding secretary, Mrs. Helen M. Barker, National treasurer, and Mrs. Katharine L. Stevenson, editor of the Department of Books and Leaflets. The congenial company of twelve co-workers gathered about the "board," which was spread in the editorial reception room. The food for the material man was as befitted the occasion, but in much greater abundance and rarer quality was the feast of reason and wit that went on uninterruptedly. An artistic hand had been at work, and the favors beside each plate bore pen and ink sketches peculiarly adapted to the department of work each guest had in charge. Speeches in response to toasts were perhaps the most brilliant feature of the hour, and those who carried off the palm for touching eloquence and merry humor were the trio in whose honor the little feast was given. Mrs. Barker's utterances bore testimony to her own stanch loyalty to white-ribbon principles and to the blessed truth that dearer to her heart than any other public interest is the conflict for God and Home and Humanity. She also spoke brave words of prophecy for the financial outlook of the National. Mrs. Woodbridge's response had the "true ring" that characterized every word spoken by those present, and white-ribboners east and west, north and south, will find in her a "correspondent" whose rare tact, stanch loyalty and zealous ingenuity in making plans for the furtherance of National interests shall be a blessed "tie that binds" the hearts of all W. C. T. U. comrades in one grand army against the ills which beset humanity. Mrs. Stevenson, as a representative of the Bay State, spoke eloquent words of greeting, and testified most enthusiastically for Massachusetts women as "square" on W. C. T. U. principles. At the close of the bright hour Mrs. Carse led in prayer, the guests standing about what was in the truest sense a "round table." All hearts responded with fervent amens as she bore to the Leader of the temperance hosts their chiefest interests. Very tenderly were the names of comrades over the sea presented to the Father in Heaven, and none were forgotten by the great-minded, warm-hearted woman whose life is only lived to further the weal of humanity. The strong sweet bond of comradeship is, probably, the one most often experienced and most appreciated in our white-ribbon work.

KEEP THE PLOWS A-GOING.

BY LIDE MERIWETHER.

Our night is dark, you say; full well we know it,
  But darker nights our pioneers have known;
"After the dark the dawn," say seer and poet;
  "The morning cometh," lo! the night has flown.
The morning breaks, let each be up and doing,
  The field is vast, the promised harvest great,
No idle dream nor gentle slumber wooing,
  Learn we, like them, "to labor and to wait."
There comes no reaping, save by patient sowing,
So, "Trust in God, and keep the plows a-going."

Often you'll find your plow points bent and broken,
  By tough old roots of Prejudice, that hide
In soil conservative—the sign and token
  That old King Custom did the sowing guide.
Sharpen your point, and let your plow sink deeper,
  Lay bare the fibre, let Truth's sunlight strong
Shine in, then wait, and Time's slow, steady sweeper,
  Shall right all error and retrieve all wrong;
His ceaseless scythe the ranks of wrong are mowing,
So, "Trust in God, and keep the plows a-going."

Anon, your plow is halted, beaten, battered,
  By stones of Apathy in woman's heart,
Her cold indifference your hopes have scattered,
  Like sudden frost where spring's first blossoms start.
Let not your spirit yield to fruitless sorrow,
  Strong hand, and heart of oak, this work demands;
Plow on in faith to-day, and, lo! to-morrow,
  Where ONE stands idle and with folded hands,
Armed and equipped come TWO to do the hoeing,
So, "Trust in God, and keep the plows a-going."

Do briars sharp and thorns Ecclesiastic,
  In bristling phalanx hedge you round about?
With text unique, and argument fantastic,
  "Each sister let in keeps a brother out."
Brace up your courage, keep your pulses steady!
  No need to ruffle up your spirit sweet;
For that fort's stormed, the sister's in already,
  That gun was but the signal of defeat;
While toilers slept, that plant was up and growing,
So, "Trust in God, and keep the plows a-going."

Do burrowers under ground your labors trouble?
  Who, blind of purpose, won't the truth confess,
Whose only argument is sneer and quibble,
  That purblind mole, the great omniscient press!
Stand to your plows! Turn up the vast areas
  Of darkness—then turn on them shot and shell
From those strong forts whose "bullets are ideas,"
  THE UNION SIGNAL, Journal, Chronicle—
No place for moles when they their bombs are throwing,
So, "Trust in God, and keep the plows a-going."

There's no dry path by which to reach an island,
  Unless you bridge it where the eddies boil;
Never a road by which to gain Life's Highland,
  Unless you make it by the hand of toil.
"Ever the right comes uppermost" where hearts are faithful,
  Where souls are patient, "even justice done";
Fall into ranks, for labor, tireless, peaceful,
  In God's good time the guerdon shall be won;
In storm or sunshine, rain or hail or snowing,
First, last and always, "keep the plows a-going."

BUSINESS HONESTY VS. BIBLE HONESTY.

BY MARIE J. HESSE.

Mrs. Marlow had just driven her horse before Doctor Meuller's door and called him out.

"I want you to see Dolly's eye, Doctor. It looks so sore and inflamed."

After a series of pokings and pressings about the injured member, and lifting the eyelid to peer into it, interspersed with encouraging words and pats, for Dolly resented such familiarity, the doctor turned from his interesting investigation to the owner.

"Well, well, Mrs. Marlow, this is bad! Where did you get this animal?"

Without noticing his question she asked anxiously, "Why, Doctor, what is the matter; nothing serious, I trust? You don't mean Dolly will be blind?"

"Yes, madam, that's what I mean. It's like this, you see"—here the doctor went into details about a peculiar and insidious disease of the eye which was fatal, and always meant total blindness.

"Where did you get her," repeated the doctor.

"Why, from Deacon Dunton."

"Ah!" slowly ejaculated he. "This is the third case I have had from his farm."

"But Deacon Dunton didn't know of this, for he assured me Dolly was sound."

"Perhaps not," slowly assented the doctor. "But it was a mean trick to sell her to a woman," he quickly added.

Mrs. Marlow wondered, woman fashion, why any worse to sell a bad horse to a woman than to a man.

"I'll tell you what you can do, Mrs. Marlow, I'll treat her eye carefully, and then in six weeks, perhaps inside of a month, her eye will look as well as the other, and then is your time to sell her." The doctor looked profoundly satisfied with his advice.

"Sell her," hesitated Mrs. Marlow, "why no one will want her with this disease!"

"Oh, no one will suspect it after my treatment," exclaimed the doctor.

"But, Doctor," urged Mrs. Marlow, innocently, "when I tell what your decision is?"

"But you mus'n't tell," persisted he.

"I couldn't do that; why, that wouldn't be honest!" and Mrs. Marlow looked grieved that her friend should have misunderstood her so.

"Honest," blurted the doctor, "of course it's honest. Why, it's business." When he saw the look of genuine surprise on her face, he added: "Oh, of course, if you have any scruples you needn't sell her to a friend or a neighbor; but go down to Jake Mallery, the horse buyer, and he'll take her quick enough at your own figure. She is a fine animal!" and he patted Dolly's sleek sides and beamed at Mrs. Marlow, as though to dispel from her narrow horizon every cloud of doubt that would foolishly rise as a stumbling-block in the way of business.

Mrs. Marlow said no more. After assuring Dr. Meuller that she would come regularly for Dolly's treatment, she trotted off. On the way home she fell to thinking over the doctor's words. He was not given to jesting, but had given her his advice in earnest. He was one who stood high in his profession, and was respected by all who knew him as a man of good, sound judgment, and whose word was accepted everywhere. She could hardly make his advice accord with his life. She wondered if other men made so much difference between honesty in business and honesty pure and simple. Perhaps there was a difference and she had failed to grasp it. There might be a code of ethics in the business world which was so well understood by business men that a seemingly wrong act became honest and right under its influence. The desire grew upon her to make a test of her new discovery.

Through the following weeks she visited many prominent men—all men standing well in the respect of the community, some high in church relations. To each one she stated the case in confidence, and told the story of Dolly's eye.

The president of the First National bank said: "Why, yes; I should say Doc was right. Take her to Jake Mallery's; he'll buy her, I'll warrant."

"But if I tell him——"

"Tell him!" repeated Mr. Green, fairly taking the words from her mouth. "Certainly not! That isn't business!"

"Isn't it business to be honest?" innocently asked Mrs. Marlow.

Mr. Green was a little embarrassed, but recovered himself quickly, with a majestic wave of his hand. "You see, it's like this; if he should ask you whether Dolly was going blind, why, then, don't lie, but it isn't your business to tell him all you know. Jake won't buy the horse on your recommendation; he'll buy her on what he knows of the merit of a horse. See?"

Mrs. Marlow wasn't quite sure that she did see, for she said: "But Dolly will surely go blind."

"Oh, that's his lookout, not yours! I must say it was a shameless thing to sell a lady such a horse!"

She thanked him for his interest and added: "Mr. Green, what would be the difference between my act were I to follow your advice and the man's who sold me Dolly?"

"That's like women!" he blurted impatiently and ungallantly. "They never seem to understand business."

Mrs. Marlow smiled and nodded as she drove away, saying, "I'm afraid I don't."

He had taken refuge in a very rickety fortress when he allowed his impatience to rule, and he turned to his office cross and ill at ease.

Mrs. Marlow at first was amused, but grew more and more serious as she pursued her quest. One said: "It was all right to cheat Jake Mallery, he had cheated many a man!" Another urged "self-protection as the first law of duty." Another said: "You paid one hundred and fifty dollars for her and you have a right to get it back." At last in despair she turned to her pastor and told him the story. It was not without fear that he, too, would distinguish a difference between honesty and business honesty.

When she had finished he said quietly: "Mrs. Marlow, a clean conscience is worth more than the price of a hundred Dollys."

"Oh, Mr. Burton," she smiled through her tears, "you are the bit of leaven that shall leaven the whole!"

In the course of time Dr. Meuller declared triumphantly that he would defy any one to tell which eye he had treated, and urged Mrs. Marlow to sell.

One bright morning she asked her son to accompany her to the horse dealer's, and on her way called for Dr. Meuller.

"I am going now to sell Dolly, and I'd like you to go with us." He gladly got into the carriage, thinking she had come to her senses and taken his advice.

The horse buyer was soon looking Dolly over with critical eyes, peering into her mouth and eyes, stroking her slender legs and combing her silky mane.

"What will you give for her, Mr. Mallery?" asked Mrs. Marlow.

"How long have you had her?"

"Only about six months. I gave one hundred and fifty dollars for her, and thought I was getting a bargain."

"Well, I don't like to 'Jew' a lady on her price, but I don't mind telling you she is worth that any day, and I guess I'll take her," he gallantly concluded.

"Wait a moment, Mr. Mallery; Dr. Meuller says she will be stone blind inside of three months."

"What!" exclaimed the astonished man, hardly believing his ears.

"Yes," sweetly continued Mrs. Marlow with one of her bright smiles; "I brought Dr. Meuller to prove my statement."

"Is that so, Doc?" asked Jake, red and uncomfortable, for he thought of his offer.

"Yes," assented the doctor, equally red and uncomfortable, for he felt his work was in vain. What was the good in treating the eye till it looked all right if the whole labor were not to sell her for what she was worth.

"Well, madam, I never like to go back on my word, but she isn't worth more than fifty dollars, according to your statement."

"Is she worth that?" asked Mrs. Marlow.

"O yes, she will bring that easy enough."

Then something came over rough Jake Mallery. Thrusting both hands into his pockets he stood looking hard at Mrs. Marlow. At last he spoke slowly: "Why—did—you—do—that?"

"Why did I tell you the truth? Because I want to be an honest woman."

"Yes," said Jake, vaguely, "but it wasn't business."

"Perhaps not, Mr. Mallery, but I fail to see why business shouldn't be fair dealing."

"Seems like it is almost impossible to carry on business and go by the 'Golden Rule,'" said Jake. "I guess it's because we have all come to think so. Maybe the other way would be better after all."

The doctor went back to his office muttering about a "foolish woman"; but somehow Mrs. Marlow's act kept returning to his mind that day, and he, too, wished it were possible to change the existing order of things.

Mrs. Marlow's son had remained a quiet but interested listener. When they reached the house he helped his mother down, fairly carrying her to the steps; then to her surprise she saw a tender look come into his eyes: "Mother, you're a brick! That's the best preaching I ever heard. That's what I call a real live sermon and doxology!"

Chicago, Ill.

JUST AMONG OURSELVES.

BY LILIAN WHITING.

It was my privilege, in a little talk with an editor of THE UNION SIGNAL the other day, to find my own convictions regarding a matter especially concerning women to be in singular accord, a very reflection indeed, of her own, and this matter is that of work and women.

It is really an anachronism to take ourselves as phenomena. The world is helped, the cause of progress is served by what is being done, and not specifically by what women are doing. We are all, I fancy, growing impatient of press columns and pages that flaunt themselves as "Woman's" reading, whether it be served up to us as domestic details or phenomenal instances of feminine achievement. We should consider it ludicrous to place in one room of our homes all the pictures painted by women, so labeled, and relegate those painted by men to separate apartments; or to divide our library according to its masculine or feminine authors, yet we are constantly confronted with the information that Mrs. So-and-so has invented a tack-hammer, or driven a wild horse, or taken a degree in Sanscrit.

Why not? To admit that this information is anywise startling is to argue ourselves below the nominal standard of individual powers. There is no more reason why a woman should not take a degree in Sanscrit, or cover herself with glory as an inventor, or have the nerve and skill to subdue a spirited horse than that a man should do these things.

This spirit leads to the glorification of indifferent or mediocre work, because, indeed, it is done by a woman; and this retards that general progress of humanity which all thoughtful people hold so deeply at heart. The well-known London editor, Mr. W. T. Stead, who, alas, discounts much good and timely thought by mixing with it mere vagary, remarked to me recently that he wished to have his proposed new journal entirely carried on by women, as writers and as compositors, as workers in all the mechanical processes, and as drivers of the carts that carried the papers about. Now, if a woman can write an editorial, or set type, or drive a cart just as well or better than a man, by all means let her do so. It is purely a matter of private business between herself and the employer or proprietor. But no woman of self-respect would consent to do any one of these things as a mere phenomenon. She would then become, not a legitimate worker, but a mere spectacle, a show. There is no more dignity in doing any form of creative or mechanical work as a woman only, than there would be in jumping through a ring or performing any acrobatic feat. If THE UNION SIGNAL will lend a hand to educate public opinion out of this widely prevailing error, it will add one more to its already numerous good works.

And always we come back to the infinite richness of those words of Christ, that "he who loseth his life shall find it." To forget one's self in what one can do; to merge all personal consciousness in the larger ministry—is it not here that we touch the keynote of true life and true achievement? When a woman is a painter or poet; novelist, editor, physician, teacher, lawyer or lecturer, it is the art, the profession, the work itself that is of supreme importance, and not the personality behind it. Let the individual life be lost in the larger ministry and it shall be found of a thousand-fold value and power.

The moment, indeed, that women cease to make special pleaders of themselves, and live the rational life of individuals, that moment they assume a dignity foreign to the fanatic. A doctor, a journalist is valuable or worthless, not because of being a man or woman, but from the individual qualities. Whether an article is written, a patient restored to health by a man or a woman is not the question; but instead, whether the work in hand is done well or ill. The world was made for men and women together, and its resources are for both in their true relation as complementary, not antagonistic. A man can do many things better than a woman, and a woman many things better than a man. All depends.

But of all absurdities, none can exceed that of marking out special "departments" in the public press as being written by women, or about women, or for women. A woman's aim in reading is, we may take it, for general information and critical or special knowledge, the same as a man's; and whether this information or criticism is supplied by one or the other has nothing to do with it. The woman who comes into the world of affairs appeals to it solely by her work in and of itself. It is this which is to be tested by the unerring light of the public square, and stand or fall by its intrinsic merits. Not praise or blame, but truth is what the worker desires.

Another possible defect in women's outlook is the too great prevalence of the minor key. There is a fad of saying a great deal about "soothing sorrow" and much less about sharing joy. Why should there be so perpetual an assumption of infelicities? Why should not life be full of joy and gladness? "Surely goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life, and I shall dwell in the house of the Lord forever." And not in some vague future, but now. The "house of the Lord" is a spiritual condition. Let us dwell in the house of the Lord to-day. Let us be glad in Him and lift up our hearts.

Into human experience come, it is true, death, losses, limitations, privations. But not necessarily are these sorrows. There is really no sorrow but wrong-doing, but sin. Because our nearest and dearest go on into a higher and more beautiful life is not necessarily sorrow. Nor should one go sorrowing because he has lost money, or cannot live in a fine house, or must go plainly clad. To call such limitations sorrow is to degrade the spiritual life.

It is quite time we have the new dispensation of joy, and learn to dwell on the Mount of Transfiguration. Let us lay hold of truth and goodness and enlightenment, and thus acquire that inner power that shapes all outer surroundings. Let us believe in happiness and make room for it in our lives. We may well count that day lost on which we do not share another's joys, and thus multiply them for both. Life is in no sense a "vale of tears"; it is always the possible Mount of Transfiguration.

SIR ANDREW CLARK—A REMINISCENCE.

BY FRANCES E. WILLARD.

This chief among the great physicians of London has just passed away in the sixty-seventh year of his age. He was Tennyson's physician and Gladstone's; indeed, so great was his fame, that when, two weeks ago, he was stricken with paralysis, seven hundred messages of inquiry came to his family in a few hours. He was a small, slight man, of what we call the wiry type, and a remarkable illustration of what "mind cure" can do for a person who is determined to live whether or no. It is said that forty years ago, when he sought admission as a physician in one of the London hospitals the choice fell upon him in preference to a number of equally eager aspirants, on the basis that he was "a delicate little fellow and would not live long anyway." He was condemned to death in his youth by the verdict of physicians, but eluded the same by a novel process,—he flung himself into the hardest kind of work, paying no attention to his fears, but concentrated his forces altogether on his hopes.

When I went to see him he extended a hand white as a lady's and soft as velvet, and in a voice that matched the hand, went into a most careful diagnosis of my case; beginning with heredity and ending with the last morsel I had tasted that morning, he followed me through every lane of life, ancestral and individual; carefully examined my lungs and heart, saying (I think this was part of his mind cure process), "Beautiful lungs, beautiful heart, no organic difficulty, over-work, nervous exhaustion. What you need is rest, pure air, cheerful companions, simple diet and no end of out-doors."

His manner was most reassuring, and had in it a tender considerateness hardly to be expressed. When he asked to take the pulse or see the tongue, he prefaced the request with the words, "My dear patient." It was apparent that not only great skill and high character, but a most fortunate manner were the essentials of his success. He prescribed no medicine whatever, saying that he thought very little of it, and that old Mother Nature was the only true physician, and gave me some simple rules which seem to me so good that I have had them copied for the benefit of any who may care to profit by the wisdom of a man both great and good, and a physician of unrivaled fame.

At my request he wrote down three aphorisms that he had used during our interview: "Labor is the life of life;" "Ease is the way to disease;" "The highest life of an organ lies in the fullest discharge of its functions." Here follow what he called his "temporary general instructions":

"On first waking in the morning sip about half a pint of water cold or hot; on rising take a tepid sponge bath followed by a brisk, general toweling. Clothe warmly and loosely. Avoid chills, damp, and passive exposure to cold. Take three simple nourishing meals daily and nothing between them. Breakfast at eight to nine, plain or whole-meal bread, or toast and butter with eggs, or fresh fish or cold chicken or game or tongue, fresh, not preserved, and towards the close of meal about half a pint of tea not infused over five minutes, or of cocoatina, or of coffee and milk.

"Dinner from one to two o'clock—fresh, well-dressed meat, bread, potato, some well-boiled green vegetable, if it agrees, and either some simple farinaceous pudding or some simply cooked fruit. Towards the close of the meal drink water.

"High tea, five to six hours after dinner, whole-meal bread or toast and butter, with broiled fish or cutlets, or a chop, or cold meat, or cold chicken, and towards the close of meal about half a pint of black China tea not infused over five minutes; cocoatina or cocoanibs may be substituted for tea if it is preferred and if it agrees.

"Nothing after this meal except that on going to bed you may sip a tumblerful of water, hot or cold.

"Never take a sleeping draught.

A MESSAGE.

BY ELIZABETH M. CLARK.

"If you could persuade me that I have a soul, I should have to believe in Jesus Christ and the Bible and all that sort of thing."

"Why no, you wouldn't at all; that is utter nonsense. And you have a soul, as I can prove to you by the law of the conservation of energy."

Dinner was over at our little pension, but we were sitting around the table and having the after-dinner chat which is a matter of course in the Old World, where people seem to have so much more time than we restless Americans find at home. One by one the students went away, presumably to study, but the two who were discussing the question of the possession of souls were too interested to go, and I waited to hear their argument. I did not say much, partly because my command of the language was at a point better adapted for quiet listening than for conversation, and partly because the very attempt seemed so hopeless.

The argument ended, as so many arguments do, by being postponed sine die, and leaving the combatants just where they stood at first. The one was sure that he had no soul; the other was equally sure that he possessed one, but only because his studies in physics and mathematics had led him to believe that the law of the conservation of energy demanded some such cause as explanation of certain evident results. I doubt whether the discussion did either one of the young men any particular good, but it taught me a lesson, one which six months more of life in what is practically, though not geographically, a German university town has made even more clear and emphatic. It was a lesson of differences—differences which ought to be and which perhaps are not.

It is almost impossible for any one who has not lived upon the Continent to realize how unlike the life of students here is to that in America. This is noticeable not only in reference to work and examinations, but also and more especially in connection with religious teaching and influence. There simply is no such thing. Of course, there is a theological department in every university; but this does not necessarily involve much practical, helpful Christianity, and outside of this there is nothing to lead the students away from that combination of materialism and atheism which they claim to accept and which they look upon as a proof of their manhood, as well as of their interest in questions of the day.

In foreign universities, the American students, men and women, are not a numerically large proportion, and yet they are almost always respected and honored, partly because of their ability to study and partly because of their "independence"—a word which when translated into the ideas of the Germans, sometimes takes on most remarkable and impossible meanings. But the trouble is that we are apt to be inconsistent with this very independence of ours, to use it when we wish and to put it aside when it is more convenient to do so, when we say: "We want to be Germans while we are in Germany."

The students here are interested in our country, many of them are planning to go over there later on to work or teach, and they know that our life in America is in some respects very different from theirs,—and also from our own here. They know, for instance, that the Continental Sunday is most unlike the American, that the temperance movement is one of real interest across the sea, and that there are some young people peculiar enough not to attend the theatres. They do not approve of our point of view, it simply interests and amuses them, but even the theological student, over the glass of Sunday evening beer—that is to give him rest after the exertion of going to church in the morning and to the theatre in the afternoon—even he will take time occasionally to wonder, "if it isn't very stupid to live in a country where people are so narrow."

But we Americans, some of whom certainly know the meaning of that liberty with which Christ has made us free, usually say very little, and do still less to show that there is a difference, and that we know a better way. The German students, in common with most other young people, have a genuine respect for consistency as well as great keenness in seeing flaws. They do not object to our taking wine and beer with them, they do not see any reason why we should not go to the theatre, but they can grow perfectly eloquent in their scornful denunciations of those who do not do such things in America and yet indulge when they are on the Continent. The neglected opportunities for showing that our principles are something more than prejudice or force of habit, will certainly do at least as much harm on this side the Atlantic as at home, indeed, if we can measure such things, we should naturally think they would do more harm, because there are fewer of us who know the Lord Jesus, and more in proportion to criticise us.

This is not, as it might seem, a plea against wine and the theatre, dedicated especially to the young people who may be thinking of coming abroad to study music or philology or medicine; that is a separate and a different question. But every year there are more Americans that come over here to work in the universities, and among the number are always some to whom it has been given to help others through an interest in them that is born of an interest in the cause of Jesus Christ. To such I would say, and the message bears that emphasis which comes from recognized mistakes, know where you stand and do not imagine that geographical situation need have any effect upon positive principle. Paul, when he had his heart's desire and found himself in Rome, did not "do as the Romans do."

HINTS FOR THE BUSY.

BY M. E. G. URCH.

Last week I had occasion to look over some back numbers of THE UNION SIGNAL. Mine being lent I had in turn to borrow from a friend. The five numbers I wished were immediately handed to me, and being somewhat in a hurry I thanked her and left.

In the evening I took the papers intending to read the articles I wished, notably Lady Henry Somerset's sermon. Instead of doing so, however, I received a lesson in making all our reading count, especially THE UNION SIGNAL.

All through the paper special topics of special interest were marked with a large star. Parallel to the columns heavy vertical lines were drawn against sentences, all of which I found to contain some central thought of the article, here and there a phrase, a clause, and sometimes a whole sentence was underscored. Words were separated into their syllables by means of vertical lines, and were marked with their accent and diacritically. Above or near some of the words were synonyms, generally two, I noticed. The margins were covered with suggestive thoughts.

I did what I suppose almost any one else would have done under the circumstances. I gathered up those papers, put on a wrap, and started. "Mrs. C.," I exclaimed, as soon as we were seated in her cozy little sitting-room, "I am glad you are alone, for I have come to find out if these markings," and I opened one of the papers, "are merely accidental, or whether it is part of a system you are using. Please tell me."

"I do not know whether you would call it a system or not, but for three years I have pursued this plan," was the reply. "You see, I am very busy; my little ones take a great deal of my time, and I never felt I gained from my papers, especially THE UNION SIGNAL, what I ought. I tried all sorts of plans from clippings to making notes, but I found it took more time than I had to spare, and I sighed for more leisure. Do you know I made it a matter of prayer, I felt so strongly about it. One noon Mr. C— brought the paper from the mail, and while he was preparing for dinner I opened it. An editorial struck me and I exclaimed, 'Oh, Charlie, you must hear this; it is so good.'

"'Haven't time, little woman, now; mark it so that I can find it readily to-night,' he answered.

"'Mark it, mark it' was the refrain I heard all that afternoon. While I was getting baby to sleep I took up the paper to read a little and I marked. When I came to an article that I wished to read again I marked it. A beautiful or particularly strong sentence I marked. There were several words of whose pronunciation I was not quite sure; these I looked up then and there in a dictionary and marked.

"Then I thought it would be well to have a synonym at my command, and I wrote one above or near the word. I soon found I could remember in three's better than two's, so after that I generally took two synonyms. That led to other markings, making annotations, etc. Then I acquired the habit of taking a sheet of paper and writing the name of the article and date of paper and keeping these in a case. For instance, I have the articles written on the Temple, Prohibition, Crusades, etc., each subject in its own cover. I have found this very useful.

"Last week at our W. C. T. U. meeting I was asked to prepare a talk or paper on the Crusade movement for our public in December. If I had not known just where the material was for its preparation I could not with my numerous duties have promised to do so, for I have found from experience that it is not so much the doing of the work as the getting ready to do it that takes the time.

"I can now take my bibliography and turn directly to the articles I need. Many of these have bright thoughts that came to me at the first reading on their margins. Half of the work is done already, for the principal point of each article is marked."

"I can see that your plan for one who is very busy is very good. Apart from the benefits you have gained from it that you have already mentioned, are there any others?"

"Yes, I find I have a large increase in my working vocabulary. How much of the English language is as truly a dead language as Greek or Latin, found principally in books and not in everyday use."

"That is certainly true. In taking up any new study I find there are many terms peculiar to that one subject. This is so even in the temperance and what is commonly designated as the 'woman question,' I should think, although perhaps not so marked."

"I agree with you. What we women need is, first of all, ideas—and we have them in abundance—then to be able to state them calmly, logically, and in suitable words. This we can acquire if we, week by week, systematically do a little. Of course, I am not speaking for college students, but for busy mothers who have as little spare time as I, and who yet can find a few moments here and there through the day for a little intellectual refreshment."

"I do not know that it would not be an excellent plan for others beside 'busy mothers,'" I made answer. "I think I begin to see now why your answers to questions and conversations in general about the work are so pertinent. Your method of reading must put facts and arguments in such a clear, definite way before you that you are able to see them unconsciously, without any apparent efforts. Thank you very much for satisfying my curiosity. I think I can say that with THE UNION SIGNAL, at least, I will go and do likewise."

This is almost a verbatim report of a conversation which occurred Nov. 21, 1893.

Fayette, Ia.

A WORD OF GOOD-BYE.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—The brief glimpse of home and friends is over, including the two great conventions of the World's and National W. C. T. U., and we are off again to finish our round-the-world journey. Certain things stand out with peculiar vividness amid the crowded memories of the past two months spent in the home land.

Walking down Monroe street, Chicago, one September morning, two days after my arrival, suddenly I caught sight of the Temple, and the vision smote me so to the very center of my being that I stood still instantly, trembling, while the tears gathered involuntarily in my eyes. I have beheld the ineffable beauty of the Taj Mahal, bathed in the moonlight, or in the golden glory of the noontide, and realized all its exquisite charm; I have climbed to the top of the great pyramid, and have felt the tides of centuries of history pulse about me while I gazed across the sandy billows of the desert and into the eyes of the inscrutable sphinx at its foot; I have seen glorious cathedrals, palaces, shrines and tombs; but nothing ever moved me as did this building, looming up grand and stately before me, amid Chicago's busy turmoil.

When I left home three years ago, the very foundations were not yet laid; the workmen were just digging out the old ones preparatory to laying the new. Think what it was to have prayed about it, thought of it, talked of it all over those far-away countries, and then suddenly to see it, as one might say, step forward to meet me, with all its majesty of proportion and outline brought fully out against the background of that perfect September morning. What the Temple means to us as the realization of woman's faith and zeal, as a home and source of revenue for our great organization in all its many-sidedness, and as a center of eternal life and hope from Willard Hall—its pulsating heart—cannot yet be measured.

Next came the inspiring scenes of the World's and National Conventions, with all their refreshment to way-worn pilgrims; in these seemed to be gathered as in one mighty grasp the history of the twenty years of achievement since the Crusade fires were kindled. What a joy to see those veteran faces! And the newer ones also! And to greet dear Lady Henry Somerset, who had crossed the sea at such cost of suffering to be with us at this time; and that heroic band of delegates from foreign lands! Yes, and to remember the groups of women we had met in far-away countries, whose loyal hearts and prayers were with us, we knew, though their material presence could not be given.

One beloved and revered face was constantly missed and yearned for—that of our chief leader, Frances Willard, and day by day prayers were poured out on her behalf. "We are saved by hope," and we expect to welcome her joyfully, with renewed health and activities, a year hence at the National Convention. "Let the King hear us when we call."

I speak on behalf of both Dr. Bushnell and myself when I say how deeply we were touched by the hundreds of greetings and blessings received from our dear white-ribboners during these red-letter days. Their assurances of faith in us and our labors, and their pledges of continued love and prayer, we carry with us as our peculiar treasures. Do not forget us at the noontide hour, cherished hearts! We shall remember you.

Another experience of surpassing interest was that of standing in the beautiful Woman's Building at the World's Fair, and beholding, as in a mirror, the work of women the wide world over. Of course, the corner best beloved was that in the organization room, where our own W. C. T. U. exhibit was so finely placed. I need not say with what delight I lingered there. The very antipodes to this was that pathetic, yet dignified showing, in another part of the building, of "woman's work in savagery." I tarried long amid the evidences of what the deft fingers of our far-away sisters had wrought out into form and color that prove what they might become if the brain were given tutelage and the whole being allowed development and freedom. To bring this deliverance to them is a part of the heritage of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

Said a young Oxford man to me last summer, "The gulf between races is awful and impassable." I answered quickly: "A true white-ribbon woman has passed over that gulf so long ago that it is almost forgotten." Then I told him of our world-wide work and of our white-ribboners of so many different races, all bound up in one reality of sisterhood. I told him of our love for our poor little India women, whom we found "in the habitations of cruelty in the dark places of the earth," and that we realized that "in Christ Jesus" we were "all one." He then thoughtfully said: "I had not known of this. It gives me new hope for the world and for humanity."

But now I must be frank in giving my impressions of this home visit, and speak of a phase which gives me no pleasure in referring to it, and that is the immense contrast between the grand and noble achievements of the women of to-day on the one hand, and the present vulgar, flippant and deforming style of dress on the other—so repellent in its unnaturalness, and so devoid of grace that the vision wearies of beholding it. I do not forget the efforts that are being made, nor the accomplishment gained in the opposite direction; but the very knowledge of these heroic undertakings seemed to make the present condition the more disheartening as I gazed, during my visits to the Fair, on the throng of femininity, with watches emblazoned on the breast, flaunting hats, torrid colors, dresses or capes heaped high on the shoulders and about the throats, with layers upon layers of ruffles, till there was no longer a vestige left of the graceful, human form. The whirl of folly has not seemed so wild since the days of chignons and bustles. It was the same in the homes, on the thoroughfares, in all the public places where women were to be seen. I am not a pessimist, but I am unutterably sad that earnest women do not throw off this degrading thralldom to fashions that are devoid of health, beauty, grace, or convenience.

It is not fitting that those who are about the Master's business should disregard His own solemn words, reiterated over and over, as to His followers keeping themselves unspotted from the world, fathoming to its depths the subtle temptation. He says, in that last most sacred prayer for us to the Father: "I pray not that Thou shouldest take them out of the world, but that Thou shouldest keep them from the evil. They are not of the world, even as I am not of the world." Twice over does He repeat this last assertion. But why are we not to be counted as "of the world" if we adopt its most glaring follies and unnecessary equipage? And how can we pursue the great work set before us to the utmost advantage unless we have all things as suitable and convenient in our outward furnishings as possible.

I believe our white-ribboners are already convinced of the foolishness of these ephemeral mandates of fashion; but who is to make a stand against them, and to maintain in her own individual person the right to dress in that garb, both as to color and style, which she deems most comfortable and fitting to her surroundings and pursuits, paying no heed whatever to capricious and corrupt Parisian fashions?

Far be it from me to wish to act as a visible conscience to my sisters. I only desire to leave this little word. Mrs. Josephine Butler speaks of how often the leader of an orchestra is obliged to strike the key-note high and clear, as it is the tendency of some of the instruments to flat lower and lower down. It is so with our lives. The jarring, and often the syren notes of the world bring even our purest desires to a lower range. We must then listen in silence for the voice of Christ, who alone is able to strike the key-note of absolute truth, and waken the divine harmonies in our souls. "Whatsoever He saith unto you, do it." He gives guidance in all these everyday things if we wait for it and obey it.

We are nearing the end of our voyage over the restless Atlantic, and hope to be in Southampton harbor within a few hours. After a few days in England and a speedy transit across the Continent, visiting France and Italy, we pass on to Burmah, the Straits Settlements, China, Japan and the Hawaiian Islands. With prescient hearts we turn toward that colossal, mysterious East, over which brood so many distorted shapes of superstition and error, centuries old; among them stalk boldly forms of modern evil brought in by our Western civilization, of still darker mein and more deadly potency over those hapless Oriental races. "For we wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places." Pray that we may have "victory through our Lord Jesus Christ."

MRS. YOUMANS' CHEERING WORD.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—I have been reading with deep interest Miss Willard's grand annual address. She really does compass sea and land; certainly nothing was left out. When I came to her generous reference to my unworthy self I broke down; I could but wonder that she should expend thought on one so unworthy. Edward Everett Hale has said exactly the right word, as follows:

Rev. Edward Everett Hale, in the Boston Commonwealth, compares the annual address of Frances E. Willard to the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union with the annual message of the President of the United States to Congress. Dr. Hale says: "In every instance in which I have seen it it has been more important and more valuable than the contemporary message of the President. . . . . Really the man or the woman who does not read this address every year is not in quick touch with the important work of the time. Miss Willard has the wonderful power of making such a document as entertaining as it is important. Now, it is many years since any President of the United States, however important his message, has succeeded in making it entertaining."

The prospect of her restoration to health is truly cheering. Canada rejoices with you, for in the "World's Union" she is ours as well as yours. This is certainly to her a hard year, much more difficult to be idle than to work. I rejoice in Dr. Richardson's British persistency in compelling "our chieftain" to do as the Saviour once requested his disciples, "To rest a while"; but I am so glad that Miss Willard is not resting in a "desert-place," but "in green pastures by the side of still waters," with her dear, old-time friend, Hannah Whitall Smith, and now with her newly found sister, Lady Henry Somerset.

I have just read of the triumph of female suffrage in the British Parliament; am so glad that our Edward Blake, who has gone over for a time to help Ireland, voted on the right side. He is a grand man and Canada is justly proud of him. Can it be that "Old England," so slow to move, so conservative in all her ideas, will lead the younger country? Well, if the old British ship does get into port first, who will deny that the breezes from Eastnor Castle have helped largely to swell her sails. God bless the noble pair that stand so bravely at the helm and plead for suffering humanity the world over.

LETITIA YOUMANS.

CLEVELAND CORRESPONDENCE.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—The eyes of the whole nation seem to be at present turned upon Cleveland, O., and the W. C. T. U. here and elsewhere, and all good men and women are greatly stirred up over the action of our police director in registering fallen women under medical surveillance.

The "Council of Women," a federation of all the women's organizations of the city, first moved in the matter, the W. C. T. U. in that organization being very active, and hoping that the wide scope of the council would make its efforts most successful. Our clergy had discussed and condemned this unlawful license of vice (for such we think it will be), and many meetings had been held, with public protests and discussion in the daily press, when our state superintendent of social purity, Mrs. Dora Webb, of St. Clairsville, O., appeared on the scene to address our county convention at the East End. She also addressed other sections of the city, and aroused much interest, and a mass-meeting was called at the stone church on the square for a free discussion of the situation. This meeting was held November 13. Some of the clergymen present advocated petitioning the director, but the women speakers were in advance of the thought of petitioning an official who refused to enforce the laws he was sworn to execute.

The morning papers represented the meeting as coming to no conclusions on a line of action, and we suppose the director was comforted, but the report aroused the unquenchable Crusade spirit, and the Lord sent to the W. C. T. U. the next morning strong helpers, with financial backing, who said, "Go ahead, and count on us to help you along."

As a result, an all-day woman's conference on social purity is called at the city hall, in the Sorosis audience rooms. All the organizations of women in the city, as well as individuals, are invited to be present and take part, only women, however, are to be the speakers during the day services. We are expecting practical results from this meeting.

By resolution at the former mass-meeting all the ministers in the city are requested to preach on the subject before the holidays. We realize here if this action of our police director is not reversed, the effect of the example on the other cities of Ohio will be disastrous in the extreme, and you may count on the W. C. T. U. as among those who will "watch and fight and pray."

[Aaron M. Powell, of New York, says in a private letter of this odious compulsory registration scheme: "It is a dangerous precedent, not alone for Cleveland, but for all our American cities, and involves especially poor and dependent women and girls everywhere. The New York Committee for the Prevention of State Regulation of Vice further "deplores this action as, in effect, lending unwarranted official sanction to vice, which it is instead the business of the police to repress; as tending to encourage libertinism on the part of immoral men, by an illusory promise of immunity from disease; as a flagrant violation of personal liberty, and appeals earnestly to all good citizens of Cleveland, men and women to take prompt and effective action for the abolition of this unrighteous regulation scheme."—EDS.]

"THE TEMPERANCE TOWN COLLAPSED."

"Failure of a Prohibition Experiment."

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—So run some of the head-lines which unfriendly newspapers have printed within the past week. The reference is to Harriman. The occasion is a receivership for the East Tennessee Land Company. It is due to this town and to our cause that the facts be given your readers. Permit me briefly to state them.

Friendly receivers have been appointed for the Land Company, on the application of its largest bondholders and stockholders, to protect all interests from adverse action begun and threatened by a few unfriendly creditors.

This course was made necessary because the company could not collect large amounts of money due it. The panic made payments by many impossible. The continued hard times delayed negotiations that were pending for a considerable loan. Although the Land Company was on better financial footing than a year ago, it needed and could not soon enough secure additional ready cash. Receivership followed to conserve its values, as a bank suspends to avoid a run. The result is that there is time enough to realize upon assets, and pay out or resume to the best advantage. The same men control the company's affairs who controlled them before. The same great properties are back of its bonds and stock. The same large opportunities are before it, only discounted by the depression affecting North and South alike. The same policy of prohibition applies to the territory which the company owns, and to the town which it founded.

Prohibition does not suffer by a purely business course pursued by a great corporation for the common good. Too many hundred firms and companies have sought the protection of receivers, during the past nine months in this country, for any reasonable man to believe that one of these, and the latest taking this course, must mean a blow at prohibition's business effect, when all the others do not concern that at all.

It is the prohibition land enterprise in the South that longest withstood the hard times, and is now in the best condition to rehabilitate itself when better times come. Let those who hasten to rejoice over its alleged failure ponder over this fact.

The Prohibition town has not collapsed. Harriman is independent of the Land Company. If receivership meant entire failure for that company (which it does not) this need not seriously affect Harriman. More money is invested here by outside parties than by the Land Company. The town is not suffering so much from hard times as many a town of greater size and far greater age in the North. It is dull, but not dead. Even building has not ceased entirely this season. Several houses have been erected and one large factory. Another church is just commenced and other houses are to be built. More people are coming in and are making their homes here almost every week. The county is to-day voting bonds to aid in constructing two railroads, extending west and south that will reach and benefit Harriman.

Everybody here realizes why a receivership was best for the Land Company, and how it may help rather than hinder developments here and hereabouts. No one here considers it a blow at prohibition, or a discount upon the success of our prohibition policy. Any man away from here who would seek to make it appear so is either uninformed or maliciously desires to work harm. Harriman has gone past the experimental stage. Her policy is fixed and accepted. Her people believe in it and are proud of it. Her future is as reasonably sure as town growth anywhere. She hopes and expects, in a year's time, to see reared in her midst, as a monument through all her future, to the man who did so much to establish her policy, a noble structure known as Fisk Memorial Hall, in memory of General Clinton B. Fisk, the first permanent edifice of the American Temperance University, which will open its second term, December 5, with two hundred students.

The papers and the people who hate prohibition may be glad to make it appear that Harriman has failed, and prohibition with it. The papers and the people who love prohibition should be informed that this is not true, and should spread abroad such information in a spirit of patriotism and fraternity.

BY MATILDA B. CARSE.

Mine eyes shall be upon the faithful of the land, that they may dwell with me; he that walketh in a perfect way, he shall serve me. He that worketh deceit shall not dwell within my house; he that telleth lies shall not tarry in my sight.—Ps. 101:6, 7.

From all parts of the country come the accounts of the reception of the malicious letter sent out to the members of the W. C. T. U. by Mr. J. B. Hobbs. We are happy in the thought that God can make "the wrath of man to praise him," and the "remainder of wrath" He will "restrain." Do not be affrighted or discouraged, dear white-ribboners, in regard to the way this traducer piles up his figures in order to show that the Temple can never be paid for by the W. C. T. U. His showing is entirely wrong, and can only deceive those who are ignorant of such matters, or who are desirous to see the enterprise end as he has intimated. Until the building is entirely paid for it may be expected this man will keep up his persecution in one shape or another. It should not disturb us any more than the cackling of a hen.

The Interior, the leading Presbyterian paper of the west, has a very racy editorial on "Mr. Hobbs," in its issue of November 23, The following excerpts are taken from it: "Mr. James B. Hobbs, of Chicago, is in favor of woman's work, provided he be allowed the privilege of bossing them, and of controlling the proceeds of their labor. Not being permitted to control the ladies in regard to the Woman's Temple enterprise, he has not ceased to try to destroy the financial credit of the company, and to discourage those interested from persevering. This is a nice business for a person who calls himself a man, to be engaged in. Let us put petticoats on him, and crown him queen of She—baa. . . . . What is Mr. Hobbs' main point? It is that the Woman's Temple company are, by the terms of their lease, to pay to the owners of the fee eight million dollars for ground rent! Awful! $40,000 a year for 200 years equals $8,000,000. We do not know the figures of the present rental of the building, but he states it at $160,000 a year. At that rate these soulless, rapacious and avaricious Woman's Temple women will collect the enormous sum of $32,000,000 in the 200 years. Hobbs ought to get out a circular to all the renters of offices in the Temple, showing this appalling fact. They may be counted on to vamoose instanter, and build a row of shanties somewhere between this and the Mississippi river, so that their offices will only cost them a dollar a month for rent. He figures up the fixed expenses, ground rent, interest on bonds, and running the building at $133,000 a year. This from that shows that the women have a net income of $27,000 a year in cash, and yet he advises them to abandon the building, and let it be forfeited to the owner of the fee! A man would not recommend the throwing away of an interest worth $30,000 a year unless he knew where it would drop, and be there to pick it up. He figures up bankruptcy because he says the net income will not pay the ten year bonds at maturity. But they will do it if the income keeps up. But suppose they do not. Will there be any difficulty in renewing the balance? We think the rentals will drop off somewhat during the hard times. Suppose they do, and the $30,000 profit should not be gained, would it in that case be good business for the women to forfeit their interest? No business man in Chicago would think of it for a minute. He would hold over, sure of better times."

In the December number of The Motor, the Wisconsin W. C. T. U. state paper, in its report of the ninth district convention of the Wisconsin W. C. T. U., we find the following resolution passed by that body:

WHEREAS, A full and complete explanation of the financial condition of the Temple was made at the National W. C. T. U. Convention.

Resolved, That we hereby express our gratification that a satisfactory understanding has been reached.

The contributions to the fifty cent and dollar fund, recently called for in this column, are beginning to roll in actively. We knew our white-ribboners would "face anything except defeat," so it is no more than we expected to have such hearty response. Let every woman send at once, before she spends all she has for Christmas. Let it be the Christ-child offering for mercies in the past year.

The more the enemies persecute the more firmly should the friends of the enterprise stand by it. Remember to send in your fifty cent and dollar gifts before January 1, 1894, and receive in return the pretty souvenirs promised in last week's paper. By doing so you will help us at a time of great financial stringency.

Below will be found the names of unions in Wisconsin as carved on the state panel in the Willard corridor: Baraboo; Milwaukee; Waukesha; West Side; Eau Claire; Green Bay; Racine; Sharon; Lodi.

A two-cent stamp sent to Mrs. Matilda B. Carse, The Temple, Chicago, will secure a mite-box. Remember, any one placing in the box $2.50 from May 1, 1893, to May 1, 1894, will receive the lovely Columbian souvenir made of aluminum, with a cut of the Temple on one side and on the reverse the face of Miss Willard with suitable inscriptions. All money orders should be made out in the name of the treasurer, William D. Preston, and sent to our financial secretary, Miss Sara G. Johnson, The Temple, Chicago, Ill.

THE W. C. T. U.

BY T. BERRY SMITH.

Methinks the dear Lord has grown weary of waiting
For men to accomplish His work in the world,
And therefore his banner has lately by women
Among the wide nations been freely unfurled.

The Lord is their captain, they follow His banner,
They march at his bidding to do His command,
And surely they'll triumph—their watchword so fitting:
"For God and for Home and for dear Native Land."

O sisters, God speed you, till nations shall proudly
Put on the white ribbon and fall into line
Behind the white cross—fair Chastity's symbol—
And march to the gospel's alleluias divine.

Then Alcohol's reign on the earth will be ended,
Then mothers be happy and fathers be strong,
Then children be safe, and the tide of salvation
Flow deep as an ocean o'er the ruins of wrong.

"A LIVING WAGE."

BY SISTER MARY.

At ten o'clock one Friday night, Mr. Hughes walked into Katherine House and told us that the Sun newspaper was bringing forty or fifty miners' wives from Yorkshire to London the next day, to collect money for the women and children who were starving through the lockout.

I had no time to think about the strike; no time to weigh the merits of the case; no time to discuss the policy of bringing the women into London; I only had a vivid picture in my mind of forty simple-minded countrywomen turned out into the turmoil and bustle of this great city, without one familiar face into which they might look, or one tried friend to whom they might turn. And so I said I would do what I could, and by half-past nine the next morning I was round at the Sun office to see what was really going to happen, and what was to be my share in the matter.

I had only realized since how very simple-minded countrywomen are. One night, when we were in Piccadilly, they swarmed round a postman, rather to his dismay, and asked if he had any letters for them from Yorkshire!!

We have found it difficult, too, to arrange for them, because they are very slow, and soon get bewildered. One night we lost seven of them in the Inner Circle train, because not more than three had time to get out of one compartment at one station, and that night it took three stations to get all the party out of the train. How we laughed! But things got better, and before the end of their stay I succeeded in getting fifteen out at one station.

The whole of Saturday was devoted to finding rooms for them—no easy task at so short a notice—and I had only time, when the arrangements were completed, to call at Katherine House for a hurriedly packed bag, and to make my way to King's Cross, where I arrived just in time to be one of those who welcomed the women on their arrival. I shall never forget that meeting. In silence the women left the train, in silence they looked up into our faces, trying, perhaps, to learn what awaited them in the great, unknown city, and yet ready for anything that might bring help to those left behind. It was a kindly thought that provided tea for them at the station, and that sent a brass band to accompany them through the dreary streets to their hotel. We went past the Sun office, where all the men turned out to bid the women welcome. The time I have spent with these Yorkshire women, from that never-to-be-forgotten Saturday until now, will be a possession which I shall cherish all my life, because it has given me a deep insight into the lives of working folks, and has filled me with a still deeper love and reverence for their patience and their courage, and their wonderful self-control.

And this fortnight has given me an absolute assurance that the men are right in their stand against a reduction of wages. I have learnt a good deal about the lives of miners, their actual wages, the charges on those wages, the rent they pay to the landlords, who are often colliery proprietors, the risks they run, and the conditions under which they work, and again and again I have said to myself: "It is a living wage for which the men are fighting, and a living wage only." Many of the women have told me that they go out to work themselves, and this in itself is proof of something very wrong. Surely a man who works as a miner works should earn enough to prevent his wife, who has the house and children to look after, from being obliged to eke out his wages with her own! It is a living wage for which the men are fighting! And how they have suffered in the fight! Only as I have come closer to the women, and as they have got to know me better, have I realized what this lockout has meant in their homes. Children have died—one woman told us she had lost two during the lockout—slowly starved. They have been face to face with starvation week after week; many have parted with their wedding rings; many have despoiled their homes for food; all have suffered keenly and it is only for a living wage.

"My food fair chokes me, sister, when I think of the bairns with nowt." "T'owld man's done his best, he's baked and all, but I do think of 'em all." "Eh, sister, mony's the bairn I've kissed in the streets since I came to London; they seem so lonesome-like here." They have felt the degradation of begging keenly: "I'm no common beggar, sister, I'm a respectable woman," said one sturdy soul, and in spite of the kindness of most folks they have come in crying bitterly, again and again, at the jeers and insults they have had in the streets. On the Coal Exchange they were told they would be starved into submission to the reduction. But they held out, thinking of home, and cheered by the brave words of their husbands, and it was a living wage for which they begged!

When I was at school I learnt the political economist's definition of the regulating power of competition. It ran to this effect: "The continual tendency of competition is to force wages down to the lowest point at which the workman can exist and propagate his species." Surely this point is reached by now, as we in London, at any rate, know to our sorrow and our shame. Surely at last the time has come when a higher power than competition—the love of justice, the voice of the democracy—must step in and force the government to protect the worker against this iron fate, and by fixing a minimum rate of wage, and establishing a fair court of arbitration, insure a wage which, if it does not reach a standard of comfort, shall, at any rate, reach a standard of decency and health.

During the last few weeks there have been letters in the papers, throwing it in the teeth of the miners that they live in luxury, eat salmon for breakfast, and provide their wives with grand pianos.

I must confess that, if it were true, I see no earthly reason why they should not, nor why they should not fight to secure such a condition of things. Why should it be unseemly for a man who does hard physical work for ten hours a day, underground, to eat salmon, when a man who spends his time lounging about a West End club may eat every dainty, in season and out, every night in the week?

Why should it be wrong for a miner's wife to play the piano, after a hard day's work, while the coal owner's wife may dawdle through life doing nothing, if it please her? It is strange how blind privilege makes men! But, so far from playing pianos, the women can—many of them—neither read nor write!

It is a living wage for which we fight!

The elder women have stood the change to London, and the tramping about the streets, far better than the younger ones, and this means that long hours, bad conditions of work and shortness of food are doing their work, and the next generation will see no such specimens of womanhood as the old lady whom we call our "Champion," so plucky and so full of grit has she shown herself. But the old stock must not die out, nor degenerate. We must help them in their brave fight against monopoly and greed and gambling, and we must see that in the future the price of an honest day's work shall be a living wage.

KINDERGARTEN LESSONS FOR L. T. L'S.

I.

The Brook.

BY MARY E. RUDD.

Be in your place at least fifteen minutes before the appointed hour, and spend the time in pleasant talk with the little ones, looking after the wraps of the younger children and keeping all quiet and orderly, for much of the success of the meeting depends on the mood of the children. If they become uproarious during this interval only bad results may be expected.

Ask your assistant to be at the piano at least five minutes before the hour, and to play quiet, soothing melodies, and especially the melody of a new song that is to be learned. A pretty song to start with and one very appropriate is, "Merry, Laughing, Sparkling Water."—Ripples of Song, page 9.

1. Opening exercises, 15 minutes:—Have the children place their chairs as nearly in a circle as possible, that you may see all the eyes. Begin with a pleasant good morning, and teach the children to respond with the same greeting to you. Then have a soft melody played, tending to quiet the children and put them in the mental attitude for the prayer that is to follow. Make this very brief, and one which the children can repeat after you, a few words at a time. After the prayer sing a little hymn in which all may join. "Jesus Loves Me," or "Jewels," are familiar to most children, and will serve to help the timid find their voices and take some part in the exercises.

Follow this by the finger game, "Here's a ball for baby," by Emilie Poulson. Repeat a line at a time, making the appropriate motion, and have the children follow. Spend the remainder of the fifteen minutes in playing the new song and humming it.

2. Rhythmical exercises, 15 minutes:—These must be planned by the teacher, as directions can scarcely be given on paper, beyond a mere hint. Standing up together, sitting down together, clapping the hands in time to music may serve as a beginning. A song, entitled "Exercise Song," page 32, in "Marching Songs for Young Crusaders," is good to use for a part of these exercises. I would use only the first and second verses, and never the last, except as a real prayer.

3. Lesson, 30 minutes:—Begin with the story of Dot and Trot. Once there were two little boys named Dot and Trot, and they lived in the city where they only saw houses—no grass, no trees, except in the park, and they could not go there often. And so when the warm summer days came their papa said: "We must take Dot and Trot to the country, where they can run." So their mamma packed the trunks, and the carriage came and took them all to the steam cars, and the steam cars carried them away off to the country. It was almost dark when they got there, and Dot and Trot were so tired that their mamma tucked them into a clean little bed and in a few minutes they were fast asleep. (Have ready two news paper prints of children, and show them just here, in order to add personality and definiteness to your story—two great points in gaining the child's attention. Also, if possible, have the picture of a house, and, if necessary, point out the room where the twins slept. Save these for future use. You will have few lessons in which some child does not ask to see them.)

In the morning something looked in at their window and said: "Wake up, wake up, it's time to get up." What do you suppose it was? (Let the children guess and help them to think of the sun. Tell how the twins said "good morning" to the sunshine, and then to each other, and then to their mamma who had come to see if they were awake.) After breakfast their papa took them out for a walk, and what do you think they found? Dot and Trot didn't know they were coming to it, but I guess their papa did, for they went down into the woods and right among some great stones, with the trees and grass growing near, they saw something that looked very cool and pleasant to them. It bubbled right up from the earth and then ran away through the meadows, singing and dancing all the time. Can you think what it was? Yes, it was called a spring; and where it ran away off through the meadows it was called a brook.

When Dot and Trot saw the sparkling water they laughed and clapped their hands and said: "O papa, we are so thirsty. May we have a drink?" Then their papa took a bright, new tin cup out of his pocket and the two children climbed up on the rock and held the cup down and the water filled it, and when they drank it they thought they had never tasted anything half so good. (If it happens to be a very warm day, and the children show any signs of thirst, let them have a drink out of just such a cup as the twins drank out of. It will make the whole lesson more real.)

After they had had a nice drink they walked along the edge of the brook, and they saw that wherever the water came there the trees and grass were green, and everything looked fresh and bright. And the little stream seemed to be singing all the time as if it were very happy. They asked their papa what it said, and he sang this little song to them:

"Give, said the little stream,
Give, oh, give! give, oh, give!
Give, said the little stream,
As it hurried down the hill.
I'm small, I know, but wherever I go.
Give, oh, give! give, oh, give!
I'm small, I know, but wherever I go
The fields grow greener still."

(Sing the words to some lively melody, and impress the thought of the brook bringing life and gladness to all nature, and happy alone in giving out to something else and not taking all for itself.)

This little story is only a suggestion. It may be enlarged and embellished in many ways, and the children may be led to talk of their experiences with brooks and springs.

4. Marching, 15 minutes:—Let the children represent the stream by taking hold of hands and marching, singing as well as they can the brook's song as given above. Some may be rocks and some trees, and the stream may wind in and out among them.

5. Occupation:—Seat the children around a table, and let each have a small pile of 2d gift cubes to represent the rocks where the spring was found. Then show the course of the stream by one-inch sticks laid in a zigzag fashion.

6. Closing exercises:—Put away the work in an orderly manner; sing one verse of some little hymn and shake hands with each child, bidding him a pleasant "good-bye," and giving an invitation to come next time.

THE SPARROW IN THE SNOW.

BY HOWARD GLYNDON.

He hopped down cheerily into the snow,
Brave little barefoot Brownie—
As if snow were the warmest thing below,
And as cozy as it is downy!

And his brown little knowing, saucy head,
In a way that was cutely funny,
He jerked to one side, as though he said,
"I don't care if it isn't sunny."

"I don't care! I don't care! I don't care!" he said,
And he winked with his eyes so cheery,
"For somebody's left some crumbs of bread,
So my prospects are not all dreary."

"And what's a cold toe, when I've got a whole suit
Of the cunningest warm brown feathers?
I don't care if I haven't a shoe to my foot,
I'm the bird, sir, for all sorts of weathers.

"I don't fly away at the first touch of frost,
Like some of your fine tongued birdies;
I don't think everything's ruined and lost
When the wind mutters threatening wordies.

"I don't care!" he chirped; "I don't care! I don't care!
It might be a great deal colder;
But I'm a fellow that knows not fear—
Old Winter but makes me bolder!"

Ah, plain little hardy brown-coat bird!
Through life I'll try to remember
To meet its winters with cheerful word,
Like thee to brave my December.

"TOOTS."

Our Rest Cottage Cat.

BY ANNA A. GORDON.

"Toots" is really a remarkable cat, and well deserves an introduction to the Loyal Temperance Legioners of this and other countries. His mother was born in far-away Asia, and this pure white Angora cat, when he came to Rest Cottage, a baby kitten of seven weeks, looked just like a ball of cotton batting with big, bright eyes. He is now two years old, and at times is very dignified in his behavior.

He is devotedly fond of us all and sings for us the most beautiful "Kitty Songs," and while he does not enjoy petting as most cats do, he has his own way of showing affection. He has a most social disposition and loves to get as near his friends as he possibly can.

We are all very busy at Rest Cottage during the day and Toots seems to understand that we cannot pay him much attention; but he will curl himself down contentedly on our writing tables, or in the scrap basket, or in a desk drawer, should that chance to be open, occasionally giving us a glance of interest and sympathy, as much as to say, "How are you getting along now?"

He dearly loves a frolic, and his favorite fun is playing hide-and-seek, which he enters into with wonderful zest, finding it extremely hard to wait for the signal which allows him to begin the hunt.

His fondness for flowers is perhaps his most interesting trait, and the rich fragrance of violets, roses or carnations proves so strong a temptation for him that it is never safe to leave them within his reach. One evening when a bowl of fresh carnations had been placed upon the parlor table, "Mr. Toots," as our Swede Eda calls him, walked in, and immediately detected the exquisite perfume. Springing to the table he selected the choicest flowers from the bunch, a cluster of three pinks on one stem, and drawing them carefully from the dish, carried them in triumph to the floor.

I gently chided him for such selfishness, saying he should not have selected the largest and prettiest of them all, and taking them from him, replaced them in the bowl.

In an instant he was on the table again, and with a naughty toss of his head he jumped to the floor with the same flowers in his mouth.

A second time I took them from him and his eager eyes watched me as I placed them with the others. Then to make good his loss, I gave him a single short stemmed flower which I felt he ought to be contented with. Taking the pink in his paws the graceful creature played with it a few minutes when suddenly with a quick glance at me, he sprang on the table with the solitary posy in his mouth, and dropping the flower back on the vase he seized the coveted trio of blossoms with a saucy air that seemed to say, "There, you may have that poor little pink if you want it, but it is n't my choice by any means!"

His daily rambles are taken on the roof of Rest Cottage, and he will sit there by the hour, watching the passers by, or looking longingly at the doves whose cozy little "cote" is not far away.

Toots is always considered one of the family and is such a well behaved feline that he is allowed to have his own chair at the table where he sits most demurely, evidently appreciating the high honer so often denied the juvenile members of a household.

His keen intelligence, his beauty, and his cute, bright ways have won for Toots a host of friends, among whom he would like to number our L. T. L. boys and girls all over the world.

A copy of a letter which Toots has written for the Young Crusader will tell you how he means to help the temperance cause and especially the L. T. L. department of the World's W. C. T. U.

REST COTTAGE, EVANSTON, Ill., Nov. 8, 1893.

DEAR FRIENDS OF THE L. T. L.:—I am Miss Willard's cat "Toots," and I live at Rest Cottage. I have been a temperance cat always, and am the same color as the ribbon the W. C. T. U. ladies wear.

I heard Miss Gordon say the other day that she did not know what to do because it takes so much money to send books and papers to start L. T. L. work in foreign lands.

"TOOTS."

She wants all the boys and girls in every country to know the dreadful effects of strong drink, and longs to see them working for the temperance cause in the splendid way that you are doing. Perhaps you think a cat cannot help her very much, but wait until I tell you my plan, which I am most anxious should succeed.

You see I thought if I could have my photograph taken, you would buy them for twenty-five cents each (cabinet size) and Miss Gordon could use all the profits for the World's department of juvenile work. Many of you belong to the Band of Mercy, and we cats are very grateful to you for your kindness to us and to other animals and I for one feel that I must try to do something for you in return.

Oh! but I was frightened enough in the photographer's gallery, and could never have endured all I went through, except for my desire to be a temperance worker. Dear boys and girls, please do help me carry out my idea by sending twenty-five cents to Miss Anna Gordon, Evanston, Ill., for one of my pictures which everybody says are "perfectly lovely." Yours purringly,

Evanston, Ill. TOOTS WILLARD.

CHILDREN, grown-up children, now, will always remember with pleasure the first of the children's magazines published in this country. It was called The Little Corporal, and was edited by Mrs. Emily Huntington Miller, a well-known writer, now Dean of the woman's college in Evanston, Ill. The first story in the first number of this children's magazine, July, 1865, was a serial story by our great temperance leader, Miss Frances E. Willard, and this story was entitled, "Three Children, and How They Amused Themselves." Those of our children who have read Miss Willard's "Glimpses of Fifty Years" will know the names of those children and something about their good times.

A LITTLE Swedish girl was walking with her father one night under the starry sky, intently meditating on the glories of heaven. At last, looking up to the sky, she said, "Father, I have been thinking that if the wrong side of heaven is so beautiful, what will the right side be?"

DEAR BOYS AND GIRLS:—No doubt you noticed on our page a few weeks ago an account of "The Little Ones in New England," and your hearts burned at the so-called cruelty of the Puritan parents and their nick-named "Blue Laws."

Many readers of our page—"grown folks"—have written to tell us that the facts are not as stated in the item, and I am glad to be able to tell you that children were not so treated in the early days of our republic.

Such stories were "made up" by enemies of the Puritans, just as people connected with liquor interests misrepresent the temperance workers in these later days. Read the item over (it is in THE UNION SIGNAL of November 9) and be ready when you hear or read such statements about our stanch Puritan forefathers, to deny them.

Ask your L. T. L. leaders and Sunday-school superintendent to arrange for the pretty Christmas entertainment which filled our page last week.

Affectionately,

Aunt Jane

WINE VS. STRAWBERRIES.

The Rev. Dr. Pentecost is one of the very last persons we should expect to find posing as a defender of moderate drinking. Yet recent utterances of his only too clearly reveal him as such. The New York Witness, for which paper he has been accustomed to write a weekly commentary on the Sunday-school lesson, very properly expurgated a portion of his exegesis of the lesson October 29, on the subject, "Abstinence for the sake of others," because of its false teachings upon this point. He actually compares the use of wine to that of strawberries!

"Some people can't eat strawberries," he says, "without becoming victims to a peculiar kind of poisoning; does it follow on that account that we must all give up the use of strawberries?" We quite agree with the Witness in denouncing this argument as "worthy only of a saloon-keeper"; but coming from the source it does we deem it well to give it passing notice.

If it be a fact that some persons are poisoned by the use of strawberries, it is due not to injurious qualities of the fruit, but to physical abnormality of the eater, and the wise thing to do under these circumstances is not necessarily to give up strawberries, but to restore the "victim" to a normal and healthy condition. If strawberries were harmful because poison was one of the essential properties of the fruit it would, without question, be the duty of all to abstain from their use as a food even in a moderate degree. If, further, the use of strawberries tended to create an unnatural appetite, a morbid craving for the poison they contained; if the indulgence of this appetite not only worked physical and moral injury to the individual but brought untold misery to others; if the traffic in strawberries caused nine-tenths of the crime in the world and destroyed more people than war, pestilence and famine combined—if these things, we say, were true of strawberries, would it not be the bounden duty of every one of us to eat no strawberries while the world stood? Would not every humane person hasten to banish this fruit from his table, yes, and to prohibit by law if needs be, its cultivation? Only two classes of people would be likely to oppose prohibitory measures—those who were bent upon gratifying the appetite at any cost, and those who derived "revenue" from pandering to it.

Dr. Pentecost declares that "the question of conscience per se is not involved in the use of wine." We maintain that the use of any food or drink which works injury to the human organism is in itself a sin. "Know ye not that ye are the temple of God," and "if any man defile the temple of God him shall God destroy." In the light of scientific discovery, who will venture to deny the baneful influence of even the "temperate" use of intoxicants as a beverage? Note the words of the late Sir Andrew Clark, Gladstone's physician, upon this point as quoted in our president's last annual message, page 33. We would that, as she suggests, our W. C. T. U. women would give wide circulation to this dictum of science.

"The use of intoxicants is somewhat different from eating meat offered to idols." We agree with this statement of Dr. Pentecost but differ with him in the teaching deduced. The eating of meat which had previously been offered in sacrifice to heathen deities was to one who realized the nothingness of idols not a sin in itself; it did no harm to the "strong" physically or morally and only became a sin when causing a weak brother to stumble. The use of wine is wrong, first of all, because it injures the drinker; it differs from that of meat offered to idols in being a sin per se while the latter is not, though Dr. Pentecost reaches the opposite conclusion.

"The abuse of the habit," the reverend gentleman frankly admits, "is one of the worst evils of the times." Ah, there's the rub! But for the use the abuse would be impossible, and the fact that, speaking generally, the abuse is inseparable from the use, testifies to the per se-ness, if we may be allowed the term, of the sin of wine-drinking. One of the chief characteristics of alcohol is, as the Bible declares, deceptiveness. The insidious manner in which from being an obedient servant it becomes a tyrannical master demonstrates the inherent evil of intoxicants.

The question for consideration is, according to Dr. Pentecost, "whether the temperate and lawful use of wine is the example that makes for the intemperate and unlawful use of it." And he forthwith places himself on the negative side, by declaring that "drunkards do not become drunkards because other men are temperate."

Now we maintain, not as radical reformers or prejudiced Prohibitionists, but merely as fairly intelligent observers of facts, that the example of the moderate drinker is far more dangerous than that of the habitual drunkard—just as the "respectable" saloon is far more dangerous than the basement dive. What young man ever takes his first glass with the intention of becoming such as the reeling, degraded sot he passes in the street with disgust? Or like the pitiful wreck of humanity seeking to regain his lost manhood in an inebriate asylum? No, he intends to be like his friend, Mr. A., that pattern of morality and sobriety, a leader in business and social circles, a pillar in the church, a moderate drinker. "If Mr. A. can stop when he wants to so can I," argues some mother's boy, and—but we all know the old, old story only too well.

One of the fundamental principles of life is that "no man liveth unto himself." To "follow after the things wherewith one may edify another" is the gospel plan in a nutshell, and none are so strong that they "do not need caution," Dr. Pentecost to the contrary, notwithstanding.

The un-Christianlike assertion that "if men are strong there is no reason why they should be compelled to get under bonds by the weak" comes with striking inconsistency from the man who stood upon the platform of the religious parliament as the preëminently aggressive champion of Christian faith and practice. "To the weak became I as weak, that I might gain the weak." With this self-abnegating spirit of the apostle to the Gentiles, the Rev. Dr. Pentecost (judging from his position on the liquor question) has no sympathy.

"God will reveal to each one his duty" concludes this remarkable exposition of total abstinence principles. God has revealed to us our duty concerning the drink evil, and the coming of His kingdom would be wonderfully hastened if every minister of the gospel, every professed Christian, would talk and write and vote in the light of that revelation. We are encouraged to believe, from the shock with which Dr. Pentecost's inconsistent arguments have been received in the religious world, that such views are no longer tenable in pulpit or pew. On the whole we have much to thank the venerable Sunday-school expounder for, not alone for furnishing us an editorial text, but for causing Christians to see the absurdity of such a position.

UNANSWERED PRAYERS.

In speaking of the financial stress that is abroad in the land with its consequent misery, a godly man was heard to exclaim, not without reverence, "I do not see how the Lord stands it!" referring to the cry for help that has been going up from thousands upon thousands of suffering men and women. The greater wonder is, perhaps, how He endures the hard-heartedness and close-fistedness of those who might, if they would, be His emissaries, and themselves answer the despairing pleas for bread. It has required a large-eyed optimism to see much, if any, of the proverbial silver lining to the dark cloud of failure and want which has hung over the nation during these past months, yet who shall say that since it is ever more blessed to give than receive, there has not been a reflex action of heavenly benedictions and soul-enlargements because of the necessity which has opened purses and set hands and feet into charitable activity, "In His Name"? And may it not be equally, though too sadly true, that Pentecostal baptisms have been altogether missed, because some professing Christ and yet seeing their brother in need, have closed hearts and hands against his cry, or but niggardly responded to it?

In the Old Testament dispensation, ravens carried bread, water was made to gush from rocks, and manna fell from Heaven. God hears His children to-day as He heard them then, and He answers, but He desires that men should be bread-givers; He wants the pure "milk of human kindness" to flow for human woes, and for wilderness manna He would see the secret of right and left hand bestowing of alms in the night of adversity.

The blessed old fashion of Gospel days has been pitifully superseded and a revised version of the Gospels is more often put into practice than the original. "Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth," is supplanted by "Get all you can and keep all you get"; "Give to him that asketh of thee," is, in practice, "Never give without surety of commensurate gain"; instead of "Take therefore no thought for the morrow," brows are knit and hairs grow gray over the gathering of to-morrow's wealth, while to-day babes are starving and strong men grow weak for want of bread!

Making due allowance for improvidence and the all-devouring habits of vice, it is yet true that a large per cent of the poverty that makes city by-ways a horror is a direct result of somebody's unused wealth; and inversely, millions of dollars now locked in safety vaults, invested in idle lands and houses, are simply answers to prayer upon which the Almighty cannot put His hand because of man's inhumanity to man and robbery of God. One has but to sit before a large audience (perhaps nine-tenths so-called Christians) witness their emotion over pictures of want and distress, hear their eloquent prayers for the "other half" of the brotherhood of man, listen to the stirring plea from the speaker for funds to carry on relief work and finally take part as a collector of "free-will offerings," through the audience, to realize something of the meaning of the word which declares, "It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter the Kingdom of God."

It is not to be wondered at that many a rich person is filled with care when it is considered that most of the dollars weighting down purse and pocket are withheld answers to prayer.

Carry the thought further: Here are poverty-stricken souls; poor, starved, ragged things which know nothing of the unsearchable riches of the King with whom they ought to be co-heirs. Here are other souls, stockholders to some extent in the great possessions of eternity, but through indifference, through what may be called spiritual selfishness, through a thousand reasons that shall crumble as paper in the fire at the judgment of God, the wealth of the knowledge of the love of Christ is hidden away, the Bread of Life is not shared with the hungry brother. What then? Only another and yet graver instance of withheld answers. Some one was led to pray for that unconverted soul—perhaps a mother in a distant home. Some one else had, in his personal knowledge and experience, the message of life. It is not delivered. It may be the soul goes to meet its God unsaved. Who shall dare to say that at the bar of eternal justice full payment of those withheld treasures be not demanded? Shall one for whom Christ died be lost because of the unfaithfulness of another? "Am I my brother's keeper?" the selfish soul may cry, but the plea shall nothing avail. Ah, there are many interpretations of the old parable of the talents.

Happy is he who swings himself clear of the wisdom of the world out on to the solid rock of the gospel and goes up and down the marts of trade as an agent of the Almighty, answering prayers at His direction, satisfied to be poor so the children of the Kingdom are made rich, having food and raiment, being therewith content, and by investment of temporal and eternal riches based on New Testament economics lay up treasure in heaven which shall abide when all else is done away.

FROM THE ENEMY'S STANDPOINT.

Whenever the liquor papers desire to spur their constituency to more vigorous effort in sustaining the "personal liberty" organs they usually take occasion to tell some honest truths about the Prohibitionists. And so it happens that we often find them furnishing statements of the situation most encouraging to the anti-liquor forces.

The Wine and Spirit Gazette recently published editorially "A Word to the Trade," which as inspiration for prohibition workers might be fitly used as a temperance campaign document.

The editor evidently scans the prohibition papers with an eagle eye, and attaches no small weight to their utterances, for he takes as a text a quotation from the Chicago Lever, the substance of which is the mighty influence of the prohibition press. in building up the Prohibition party. Following this is a quotation from the New York Morning Advertiser, which denies any very perceptible encroachment of the Prohibitionists on intemperance. The Gazette proceeds to show that its opponent, the Lever, states an undeniable fact, and that its friend, the New York daily, doesn't know what it is talking about.

After calling attention to the "startling change" the last fifty years have made in the status of the liquor traffic, and attributing it to the power of the prohibition press, it continues: "To-day the traffic is absolutely outlawed in half a dozen states; local option excludes it from large portions of other states; high license curtails the profits it yields elsewhere; while wherever permitted—mark the word permitted—it is weighted down by exactions and restrictions of the most galling and oppressive character. Indeed, every effort is made to rob the business of any claim to respectability and to brand those following it as criminals, or at least, men of no standing in the community."

The Gazette goes on—after the manner of the most radical prohibition advocate—to compare the liquor dealers with the slaveholders of the South, prior to 1860, the Prohibitionists to the Abolitionists and the Republican party to the old Whig party. "Suppose," it says, "this party should dissolve, where would its members mostly flock?" A most alarming supposition, truly, and one which might well rouse "the trade" to the necessity of a more liberal support of that mighty weapon of defence, the Wine and Spirit Gazette. For it does the Republican party the honor to acknowledge that "the great majority of the church people of the country to-day are adherents of that party," and that "the extreme temperance element of it would at once array themselves with the Prohibitionists, thus making that party the chief competitor with the Democrats for political control."

Even the prophets of Baal sometimes prophesy truly and on this point the Gazette sees eye to eye with prohibition leaders. We believe that history will repeat itself; but we believe that not only the majority of Republicans, but the better elements of all parties, will join hands in forming a new organization—a reform party such as the Republican party was in the beginning—which, while pledged to prohibition will not necessarily bear that name.

The "friends of personal liberty" are urged to "wake up or their sacred rights will be taken from them by the cold water fanatics." The progress of prohibition has been so rapid, it is declared that a "semblance" of this liberty is all they can ever hope now to enjoy, and in order to preserve even that, more aggressive effort is imperative. "By earnest zeal and untiring activity it (the liquor interest) may still compel the opposition to permit it to live, otherwise the case is hopeless." This word "permit," is, as the Gazette suggests, very significant. To liquor men as to party Prohibitionists it means that if all who are counted as belonging to the "opposition" voted as they talked and prayed, the drink traffic would be even now, as the Gazette fears it will be at no distant day, "outlawed through all this broad land."

We may well inquire by what power the liquor interest is enabled to "compel" its so-called antagonists to "permit" it to live. What secures for it the ear and the co-operation of the politician? It is the money it represents. Despite the assertion of the Gazette that the strength of the rum power lies in "patronizing, encouraging and multiplying its press" as do the Prohibitionists, the liquor dealers know full well that it lies most of all in its political "pull." It is votes that count, after all, and the liquor press for obvious reasons can never hope to vie with the prohibition press as a vote-making influence.

The Gazette characterizes Prohibitionists as relentless aggressors upon a sacred cause, and the machinations of the liquor men as "feeble efforts of self-defense." This view of the case is decidedly refreshing after the would-be discouraging and derisive criticisms of old party organs, like the New York Morning Advertiser, which are in the habit of taking a great deal of pains to convince the public (especially after an election) of the lack of enthusiasm among Prohibitionists and to perpetrate many a stale joke at their expense. It inspires the temperance hosts with new zeal to know that, however much abuse may be heaped upon them by anti-prohibition papers, generally the leaders of the liquor forces from their vantage ground of observation testify to the effectiveness of our methods and bid their followers go and do likewise.

THE MINNEAPOLIS CRUSADE.

The Crusade now being carried on by the ministers of Minneapolis against the Sunday saloon is one of unique interest. The feature of the contest which makes it of unusual importance to municipalities throughout the country is the question of the official duty which it involves. The ministers ask that the law relating to Sunday closing be enforced, and failing to secure such enforcement they propose to institute proceedings of impeachment against the mayor for violation of his oath of office.

Ministers and mayor met in public debate recently and in a fair and friendly spirit discussed the matter pro and con. The clergy in candid and courteous manner demanded that the mayor enforce the statute and ordinance against open Sunday saloons. The mayor in a manner equally candid and courteous stated his intention of "continuing the present policy, believing that it is the best plan that can be carried out."

Mayor Eustis is of the opinion that in attempting to enforce the law prohibiting the sale of liquor to minors and habitual drunkards, he is doing as much as can be expected of him in ten months of administrative control. He considers this law of far greater importance than the one relating to Sunday closing, and, strange to say, gives as his reason that it is "a law of God." "I do not place the law against Sunday selling in the same category," he says, "hence have not seen the necessity of enforcing it technically yet." There may be differences of opinion as to what category the law preventing the selling of liquor to minors and drunkards properly belongs, but among people familiar with the Decalogue there can be but one voice as to the nature of the Sunday closing enactment. A law which prohibits Sabbath desecration, whether it relates to the liquor traffic or to any other business, is clearly of divine origin, and hence its enforcement is doubly imperative. But in whatever "category" the mayor of Minneapolis places any given law, his duty is to enforce it to the full extent of the power vested in him as chief executive officer.

"Personally," said Mr. Eustis to the ministers, "I appreciate the sentiment you seek to enforce; but officially I cannot recognize it, for I am compelled by law to carry out the laws without discrimination. The law makes the traffic in liquor legal, and I cannot look upon it as otherwise." Now every one knows that—to the shame and disgrace of our law-makers, be it said—the business of the saloon-keeper is perfectly legal; that under the law it has just as much right to exist as the business of the butcher or the baker—nay, more, for does it not pay a percentage of its earnings into the government treasury for the privilege of making the habitual drunkards, to whom with characteristic inconsistency the law denies the "sacred right" of "personal liberty" to drink what and when they please? Of course "the law makes the traffic in liquor legal," and neither the mayor, nor the ministers, nor the ultra-Prohibitionists "can look upon it as otherwise." But what is the sentiment which the temperance people of Minneapolis seek to enforce, and which the mayor personally appreciates, but officially cannot recognize? Not the abolition of the saloon in the city over which he rules, but, simply, obedience to a law already on the statute books, simply performance of his duty as laid down in the official oath. As the ministers distinctly state in the resolutions which were passed unanimously with a rising vote, "the executive of the city is neither the framer nor interpreter of law, but only the executive," hence it matters not what the mayor's opinion may be concerning the law, if it is the law, he has by virtue of his office already pledged himself to enforce it.

If "compelled to carry out the laws without discrimination," why discriminate between the law relating to minors and drunkards and that relating to Sunday closing? Why? Because the saloon-keepers and their following care very little about the former, and they do care very much about the latter. There are many ways to evade the one without fear of discovery, but to defy the other in the face of a law-abiding people and a faithful executive, is a risk the liquor-sellers, with a fine and a revocation of license in view, hardly care to take.

While censuring his "present policy" toward the Sunday saloon, the ministers did not forget to express their appreciation of "the position the mayor has assumed with regard to the question of selling to minors and to drunkards, and other reforms which he has accomplished." The "Crusaders" cheerfully give him due credit for duties done, but are nevertheless determined that he shall not leave others undone. The majority of the ministers preached against the mayor's inconsistent policy Sunday before last and their aggressive action has so alarmed the saloonkeepers that it is said they entered into a tacit agreement to close their places last Sunday—probably much to the relief of Mayor Eustis. May the good fight go on!

The time is past for telling women what they may not think and speak and do. They know this lesson thoroughly well; now tell them what they may do. What "the cause" wants is a strong will, not a strong won't.

"God-cure is better than gold-cure," is a maxim which G. Milton Hammell, of Cincinnati, O., suggests, and I say, "Amen."

The Rev. Dr. George Steele, a leading American divine, was attending a meeting of the Women's Foreign Missionary Society at which his wife was to speak. A clerical brother came along the aisle, took a seat beside him and whispered, satirically, "Well, I see your occupation is gone." Whereupon the big-brained, big-hearted, quick-witted doctor replied, "Oh, no, my brother; my occupation is not gone by any means; don't you see I am here to take care of my wife's wraps while she speaks to the people?" Moral: A little dog snaps and snarls; the Newfoundland or St. Bernard never.

A pupil in Mrs. Mary B. Willard's Berlin school has translated this bit of ironic pleasantry from a German paper; "The group of Cook's Islands in Polynesia must be a truly happy land, if one may judge from the message sent by the queen of the Islands to her parliament. After congratulating the members because they were for the first time assembled in a palace of their own, free from debt, she continued in the following manner: 'We have no elaborate proposition to submit to your examination. The federal government is still young, and we believe that the fewer laws it makes the greater force it will become. We beseech you only to decide how much money we may expend for the importation of insect-destroying birds, for this is a matter entirely under your control.' Oh, the sacred simplicity and innocence of the political customs in Polynesia! What an ornament to many another crown-speech would be an item concerning the importation of insect-destroying birds!"

There is food for reflection in the following lines from one of our former editors to another: "If you could only be willing to do absolutely nothing! For I cannot help thinking that your head is full of plans and thoughts and whirlings of all sorts. Do let everything go. I cannot bear to think of your not having years of happy, though I trust modified, work before you, but it must be bought and payment made in advance to the uttermost farthing. I would lend you the amount of it all gladly if the stern old auditor would accept my currency, for I know how hard it is for you."

The total attendance at the Columbian Exposition was 27,539,041, nearly three times that of the Centennial, and far exceeding any other exposition of the last twenty years, except the Paris Exposition of 1889. There the attendance exceeded the attendance at Chicago by 600,000. However, the rates of admission at the Paris fair were much lower. The receipts of the Columbian Exposition were much greater than those of the Paris. At the latter the net receipts from admissions were $6,000,000, while at the former they were $10,000,000.

A rarely helpful thought was expressed by Mrs. Shapleigh, of Massachusetts, in the memorial service of her friend, our promoted white-ribboner, Mrs. Amelia Thorpe. It was this: "The one thought which I would bring to-day from this past sacred experience is the power and beauty of a real affection between woman and woman, how union of sympathy gives a larger life to each; the helping hand to another strengthens our own side and sacrifice turns to bless the one who made it. There is safety and wisdom in joining hands for larger labor. The woman of to-day cannot afford to look to her own household alone. Her vision would be cleared and broadened by the outlook upon the interests of others. Her heart must gain its most effective force by the exercise of love for humanity. Her judgment must be balanced by the charity and patience bestowed upon children not her own; and then she will turn to her home duties and find that the difficult places have been made easy because of her wider reach and growth of power. While we here together consecrate this hour to our beloved promoted comrade, let us continue to associate her by inner touch and sight with all our service. Let us believe that our real bond with her is not broken or lessened by the outward change. Let the work which we have become stronger in our hands and more assured, because of her inspiration and help from higher vantage-ground."

ON DUTY.

Superintendents' Reports.

[According to our promise, we continue in this number the publication of the National superintendents' reports, which were unread at the Convention. We will publish as many of them in each issue as space will permit, until they are all printed, observing the order on the Convention program, and again invite those superintendents who have not already done so, to send us their reports. It is impossible to publish the long reports in full.—EDS.]

NARCOTICS.

Since our last convention fifty thousand persons have indorsed the petition to abolish the smoking compartment in the palace car. These petitions are from every state and territory in the United States. It was the intention to have them signed by women only, but men pleaded so earnestly to be allowed to sign them that their request was granted. Grand Master Workman Powderly said we had his best wishes in this work, as he had been made sick many times by the smoke in the sleeper. The petitions have been bound in book form and will be presented to Messrs. Webb and Pullman.

Much excellent work has been done in the past year. It is wonderful how much interest this question has aroused, not only in the North, but in the South, where I feared I could never get an opening. In foreign countries the workers are writing for helps and literature on tobacco.

For many years the women have been educating themselves on the opium question. They have given more time to the tobacco habit perhaps, because it is the most commonly used of all narcotics, but we have taken up the fight against opium in its many forms, also hasheesh, ether, chloroform, and that most dangerous drug, cocaine. It is said there are living within the central portion of San Francisco, over two thousand victims of cocaine. The habit has grown rapidly the last six years.

Six years ago it was worth eighty-five cents a grain, now it can be purchased for three cents a grain, and the habit grows, and grows, and grows. People are beginning to use this drug for every ache and pain.

We all gathered something from the great Columbian Exposition and I clipped this item from a paper: "The Kentucky souvenir spoon at the World's Fair is said to represent a woman clothed in tobacco leaves, standing on a whisky barrel, around which a thoroughbred horse is pictured as running a race." I protest against these things being associated with Kentucky women, and pray the time may soon come when that state will be noted for something besides its tobacco, whisky and race-horses.

The increase of leaf tobacco and other material in 1891 over the year 1890 was 27,309,367 pounds. There was a decrease in sugar and licorice, but an increase in other materials of 1,278,091 pounds. What are the other materials? Opium, Indian hemp, and kindred drugs. The American Trust Company (the tobacco trust) last year made a profit of $4,000,000 from cigarettes.

The Western Tobacco Journal publishes some interesting statistics of the output for August, 1893. It shows that the number of cigarettes made was 357,844,360, an increase over August, 1892, of 87,054,430. The total output of cigarettes for this year will approach 3,350,000,000.

What will be the profit of the American Trust Company this year? How many boys will they ruin?

Dr. Chas. R. Sanger, of Washington University, St. Louis, who analyzed headache medicines for me, reports: "I have made a careful examination of headache powders and find there are many alkaloids, and other organic products, used in the compounding of such medicines. It is safe to say such compounds should never be commonly used. Their use should always be condemned as extremely unwise." And yet we give these drugs to our best beloved. In many homes the headache powders have a prominent place in the medicine closet, and antipyrine and bromo caffeine are well known to every member of the family.

After a time the chewing gum becomes insipid, the headache medicine fails to cure, and something stronger must be taken. Often the children inherit from their parents some condition of brain and nerve defects, which favors or predisposes to the development of nervous diseases, and they take kindly to the opium in the drugs. Oh, that we might give more thought to brain and nerve nutrition and less to patent medicines. Many women, after taking headache medicines awhile, go directly to opium or morphia; these drugs can be bought in small quantities, as little as five cents worth.

Some one will ask why I say chewing gum, cigarettes and headache medicines contain opium. I say so, because learned men have said that this is true. I have had much trouble in having analyses made; hoping to have the work done without expense, I visited the city chemist of my own city; he referred me to the board of health. I appeared before that august body, told my tale of woe; they considered the question in executive session, and replied very politely that the chemist was too busy at present to do any analyzing. At some future time when he had leisure, they would gladly have it done. Nothing daunted, I carried my samples to the milk inspector, who had previously promised to do the work for me. He, too, was very busy, could not possibly take the time. To one after another of these gentlemen I went, only to hear the same story, "very busy," although I must confess I found many of them smoking cigars and chatting with men equally "busy." It reminded me of what Josiah Allen's wife said about Josiah helping to churn: "Josiah said he would have helped me churn, would have been glad to do it all himself, but unfortunately the old harness was broke, and he had to be out in the barn a'most all the morning a-mending it. It is a dreadful curious coincidence, but it most always happened so, that old harness always breaks down churnin' day." I fear I must churn my own drugs. I know every one of you who heard Miss Jessie Ackermann felt a great sympathy for those people in far-off India. I trembled as she talked, and I thought of the many women in our own country who are laying the foundation for the opium habit by using drugs containing opium.

Dear friends, do not deceive yourselves or allow your friends to be deceived. All medicines warranted to cure headache in a few minutes contain injurious ingredients. There is no doubt cigarettes contain opium. I beg you to sound the alarm and work against the use of narcotics.

RELATION OF TEMPERANCE TO LABOR AND CAPITAL.

The necessity of a better understanding between temperance and labor organizations must be apparent to every earnest worker, but it will be impossible to attain this desired object until prejudices are removed, and each is able to understand that the purpose of the other is as high and sacred as its own. Human nature is prone to condemn that of which it has but a partial understanding, consequently in this department, perhaps more than any other, we are called upon for the fullest measure of Christian charity. In entering upon the duties of this office my first work was a personal correspondence with all state and territorial presidents regarding the status of the work in their respective jurisdictions. Replies were received giving names of superintendents.

The president for New Jersey replied that this department in that state had been combined with the department of literature. The president for Kansas wrote that Mrs. Jennie Flenner had been superintendent, and that at the last convention the department had been placed in the hands of the general officers, but she believed that at the next convention, Mrs. Flenner would be again appointed, as Kansas realized the need of such work. The president for Florida replied that they had no superintendent, but would invite the Florida Alliance to send fraternal delegates to the next convention, and use other methods designed to interest labor organizations in the work of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. She also wrote that the Florida union had been given a tract of land, from which they hoped to receive profits sufficient to enable them to take up all departments of work. Letters were received from Illinois, Iowa, Maine, Minnesota, Missouri, Nebraska, New Mexico, North Dakota, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Texas and Virginia, that they had no superintendent of this department, many of the presidents of these states expressing a desire for work in this direction and promising to introduce the subject at their next annual or midwinter convention. Early in the year I appointed Mary D. Greene, of Albany, N. Y., as associate superintendent. She has greatly aided me by corresponding with labor societies and associations, but on account of failing health she too found it impossible to carry into execution the work planned for her.

There has been considerable call for literature pertaining to this department, and I would here suggest that all having literature pertaining to this work forward it to the superintendent for distribution. With the beginning of the new year I submitted a plan of work through the columns of THE UNION SIGNAL, in which it was recommended that local superintendents distribute suitable temperance literature among labor organizations, and that local unions set apart a day to discuss labor questions, inviting leaders of labor organizations to take part. Lectures on these questions should be a special feature of county and district conventions. Papers should be prepared for discussion, and employers and employed invited to take part. It is also important that fraternal delegates be sent to labor conventions whenever practicable, otherwise send fraternal greetings. It was also recommended that each state superintendent petition the legislature of her state to abstain from the use of intoxicants while engaged in the sacred duty of law-making. It is a conceded fact that a majority of those elected to represent the people in forming the laws are addicted to drink, thus unfitting themselves for this most important responsibility.

In accordance with this recommendation, at the opening of the special session of Congress, I prepared and sent in the following:

To the Honorable United States Senate and House of Representatives in Congress Assembled:

WHEREAS, Science proves that the use of alcohol destroys the moral nature, stupefies the intellect and overthrows the will-power;

WHEREAS, Our legislators, while under its influence, are often duped into the enactment of laws which, in their sober moments, they condemn;

WHEREAS, These laws have been destructive to the best interests of the people, and through their effects poverty, insanity and crime are increasing in a most appalling ratio, threatening the life of our nation and the overthrow of our free institutions; and

WHEREAS, You are now convened for the consideration of the most vital question ever brought before a civilized people; therefore

Resolved, That in behalf of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, we pray your honorable body to abstain from the use of intoxicants during this most important session.

This petition was committed to the care of Hon. John Davis, of Kansas, with the request that he bring the matter before Congress as early in the session as possible; I received the following reply from him:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, U. S.
WASHINGTON D. C., Aug. 16, '93.

DEAR MADAM: Your favor of the 4th instant, relating to petition against use of intoxicants in Congress, has been received and presented, and is referred to a committee. But it will probably receive no attention in this Congress. They are too busy destroying the country to be induced to try to save it.

Yours very truly, JOHN DAVIS.

In January I began the publication of a monthly paper, The Corner Stone, devoted to a correct understanding of the work of this department, and designed to show the correlation of all true reforms, and have reason to believe that the circulation of this paper has been instrumental in leading many persons to throw aside their prejudices, and to consider reasonably the great problems of this age, and their independent relations.

During the brief period in which I was able to engage in the lecture field, nothing gave me such courage and cheer as the earnestness with which W. C. T. U. audiences listened to the presentation of the labor question, and, on the other hand, I was equally cheered and encouraged by the appreciative spirit in which labor assemblies accepted temperance teachings, both organizations recognizing the fact that better conditions surrounding better homes must inevitably tend toward better, wiser and holier living.

STATE AND COUNTY FAIRS.

ARKANSAS.—Has distributed literature at fairs.

CONNECTICUT.—Miss Jane Sharpe, Supt., Brooklyn: More earnest workers than last year, greater interest shown by officers of agricultural societies. Ten towns out of twenty-nine at work.

CALIFORNIA.—Mrs. E. G. Snow, Supt.: Has no prohibitory laws for fairs, twenty-three are held in the state, W. C. T. U. has worked in eleven. Five new superintendents appointed this year. The banner county is Humboldt, which has cleared the debt on its building, and has $50 profit. No liquor sold on the grounds.

IOWA.—Mrs. Clara V. Weaver, Supt., DesMoines: Solicited a contribution from each union for its tabernacle, later asked for a half dollar from each member. The Ossian union responded for every member; two other unions responded. The wind storm injured the Tabernacle, we have only lumber, some money and a purpose to arise and rebuild.

ILLINOIS.—Mrs. Anna M. Phillips, superintendent, writes that the state and county fairs have suffered because of the "White City" in their midst. There are superintendents in fourteen out of twenty districts.

INDIANA.—Mrs. Gertrude Fulton, Supt., Portland: Has a law forbidding the sale of intoxicating liquors within one mile of the fair; seventy-five are held. Several women are on agricultural boards. Eight counties report having booths, medal contests and 7,000 pages of literature distributed. The board donated ground and put up a state cottage, where 10,000 pages of literature were given away and meals served.

KENTUCKY.—Mrs. Sallie D. Baker, Supt., Madisonville: Ten circulars and twenty letters have been sent. Madisonville union secured ground, built dining hall and kitchen, served meals at noon four days and cleared $45, decorated with banners, mottoes, Miss Willard's picture, the Temple on the walls. Gave away 100 UNION SIGNALS, 50 Young Crusaders, 50 Oak and Ivy Leaf, 400 "Signal Lights."

KANSAS.—Mrs. Hattie E. Hibbard, Supt., Topeka: Three headquarters in the state; 34,864 pages of literature, 1,050 temperance cards, 70 autograph cards, 30 pledge cards. Mr. Demorest donated 1,000 pages, Society of Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, 3,500, National Temperance Society, 4,460, individuals, 2,104. Chicago Lumber Company donated the floor for tent at state fair; plants were given by a florist.

MAINE.—Mrs. Susan French Supt., Portland: Auburn and Lewiston unions both had restaurants at state fair, which were more successful than usual, netting a good sum for the local treasuries; they served hot meals, and decorated with flags, Chinese lanterns, potted plants and cut flowers. All counties but one have superintendents; W. C. T. U. has been represented at twenty-three fairs; many have permanent headquarters; the officers admit their influence effects sobriety; in Somerset county they caused the removal of a cider peddler and a gambler from the grounds. In Androscoggin county every union contributes literature or pays money.

MARYLAND.—Mrs. H. M. Hollingsworth Supt., Wilna: Ten reports received, showing efforts to purify and make fairs what they should be. Harford county had ground donated by the directors, on which they have a "Rest Tent"; provide dinner there for the board and their friends; the last place where liquor has been served is now routed; it has taken some years to do this, protests against the fair having been issued by W. C. T. U. women because of its low tone, and petitions urging respectable people to stay away. This year the managers decided to allow no liquor selling nor gambling, asking the ladies to assist in a bazaar to make up deficiency, which was done. Talbot and Washington counties report gambling; no heart to do aught, save with literature. Frederick county circulated a petition to legislature to prohibit liquor selling on the grounds; three hundred and fifty signers.

MINNESOTA.—Mrs. Hannah E. Hazzard, Supt., Hamline: Reports show increased interest and thousands of pages of literature distributed.

MICHIGAN.—Margaret I. Taylor, Supt., Lapeer: More reports received this year than usual, more have secured permanent headquarters, more money has been raised and more literature given, thirty-four fairs held, $120 raised, 8,190 papers and 11,612 leaflets distributed.

MISSOURI.—Mrs. L. N. Guild, Supt., Sedalia: The unions are represented at the Fourth of July celebrations, G. A. R. encampments and Alliance meetings. A petition to the Fair association has been signed by pastors and leading citizens asking that gambling and the sale of intoxicating drinks be suppressed. During the forty days of the exposition at St. Louis, one night was given to the W. C. T. U. for an address by Rev. Anna Shaw.

NEW JERSEY.—Mrs. M. C. Campfield, Supt., Newark: Rest Cottage, the state headquarters, was visited by the cyclone and it cost us $200 for repairs.

Our beloved president, Mrs. Emma Bourne with a committee from two counties received those who came to rest, or to attend the gospel temperance meeting held daily at 3 p. m. The superintendent was in charge of the double lunch tent near by, where the Newark union served hot meals every day, receipts were $1,461.04; expenditures, $925, net $536.04.

NEW HAMPSHIRE.—Lizzie A. Young, Supt., Belmont: At the State Grange fair there were temperance speakers, the officials try to keep liquor away from the grounds.

NEBRASKA.—Mrs. M. J. Eldredge, Supt., Lincoln: The state fair has been held in Lincoln, UNION SIGNALS and our state papers were distributed, other work will be done later.

NEW YORK.—Mrs. H. R. Edgett, Supt., Fairport: Six hundred eighty-seven dollars and fourteen cents were reported in treasury as a nucleus for state buildings at Syracuse. Sixty fairs are held. Five women are on agricultural boards. Dinners are served at eighteen fairs, ice water and 350,300 pages literature provided, addresses made, profits this year $1,546.73. Duchess county is the banner.

NORTH CAROLINA.—Emma H. White Supt., Raleigh: Has twenty-three fairs, the W. C. T. U. is represented at state fair and Newbern fish and oyster fair. At the former liquor is forbidden within a mile, and games of chance are forbidden. Four thousand pages of literature were given, and charts furnished, showing effects of alcohol on the system. At Newbern there is no union, but ladies were allowed space to give out literature.

OREGON.—Mrs. Celinda E. Shipley, Supt., Corvallis: The state fair at Salem sells liquor on the race-track, not on the main grounds. A mass-meeting was held one evening addressed by the pastors. No booth could be secured. At Portland is held the industrial exhibition and at Jacksonville the South Oregon fair. 5,000 pages distribute.d

OHIO.—Annie Clark, Supt.: The law prohibits the sale of intoxicants on fair grounds. The W. C. T. U. have the two largest dining halls on the grounds of state fair, they served 3,000 hot meals and as many lunches. Several counties own headquarters, have check rooms, and gave away 7,000 pages of literature, are also at grange picnics, Fourth of July celebrations and memorial meetings. At one park, Uncle Sam and Aunt Columbia, George and Martha Washington were presented, the meeting was advertised by a few distinguished representatives being taken around in an open carriage, when the crowd gathered Dr. Bashford made an address, music by a brass band, a basket dinner was served, and there were few drunkards that holiday.

PENNSYLVANIA.—Mrs. H. H. Forrest, Supt., New Castle: The W. C. T. U. serve refreshments in a tent at Scranton, during state fair, also at West Chester, and at Doylestown for Bucks county fair. Butler county has literature given out.

RHODE ISLAND.—Mrs. A. W. Harrington, Supt., Centredale: State fair is held at Providence where W. C. T. U. have a booth, next year hope to have a Rest Tent. The Phenix union have a booth at the Kent county fair grounds, serve meals with profit, have a barrel of ice water outside free for all, also a literature table.

VERMONT.—Mrs. A. C. Ware, Supt., Brattleboro: The prohibition law is as well obeyed as any law. Four counties have work done at fairs, such as dispensing ice water and literature.

VIRGINIA.—Deborah R. Pretlow, Supt., Franklin: Twenty fairs are held. At Franklin and Suffolk no liquor is sold on the grounds. W. C. T. U. had a booth at the exposition in Richmond, also in Lynchburg and Franklin.

WEST VIRGINIA.—Mrs. Mary Cartwright, Supt.: Has no superintendent, but literature is given out at state fairs in Wheeling.

WISCONSIN.—Mrs. C. S. Langdell, Supt., Amy: Fifty fairs are held, at most of them intoxicants are excluded. W. C. T. U. serve meals and give out leaflets at half of these. Hope to have headquarters next year.

SUGGESTIONS.

1st. Let this coming year be the banner year for distributing literature at fairs and all holiday gatherings.

2d. As far as practicable, have permanent headquarters on all fair grounds.

3d. Arrange in time for mass-meetings, with good speakers, music and singing.

4th. Have medal contests and try every means to educate the people.

5th. Let this next year be the banner year for reporting work done, literature distributed and money raised.

DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH.

In olden times disease was often ascribed to the direct agency of demons. Christ healed a woman of an infirmity whom He said that Satan had bound for eighteen years. If we do not now have illness through actual possession of evil spirits, it certainly does come as the direct result of evil deeds, carelessness, greediness, self-indulgence and various kinds of intemperance.

But all other causes combined probably do not exceed the direct injury to health resulting from the use of alcoholic poisons; whole populations, according to Sir B. W. Richardson, M. D., are dying from diseases induced by their use, in small doses, without even suspecting the cause. One reason for this is that alcohol masks and perverts all painful symptoms by its paralyzing effects on the nerves, so that it is absolutely impossible for those who use the alcoholic drug, either in beverages or medicines, to judge correctly of their own conditions or needs.

It is, therefore, essential to the work of this department, that we study the physical results of the use of this drug, whether taken in beverages or medicines. To this end we promote the circulation of the Medical Pioneer, the organ of the British Medical Temperance Association and the exponent of the principles and practice followed in the London Temperance Hospital. We have, also, now a medical temperance quarterly published in this country for the American Medical Temperance Association, and edited by Drs. Davis, Kellogg and Crothers. We bespeak the best efforts of our workers in promoting the circulation of these periodicals.

Another point is to consider the main object of the medical profession. Should it enable us to preserve health, or merely to patch up the broken remains of that priceless possession? Our hope is that prevention may be preferred to cure in practice as well as in theory. For this reason we recommend the employment of health preceptors to give popular lectures and private teachings. We also present an outline of studies mostly prepared by our associate, Dr. Mary Wood Allen, the lecturer of this department. They are adapted to the use of unions in their regular meetings, or in special meetings, under the direction of the local superintendent.

SUGGESTIONS.

1. Provide improved varieties of bread and other hygienic dishes for lunches at conventions of all grades and at private entertainments to promote the study of health topics.

2. Solicit physicians to dispense with the use of alcohol and supply them with literature proving its practicability.

3. Secure talks, lectures and health topics from competent and influential persons on hygiene.

4. Encourage the school children in their studies of hygiene, by the distribution of suitable cards and leaflets.

5. Discourage the use of patent medicines. Show up their alcohol when present, as also in root beer and home-made wines.

6. Make all the work of the department contribute to the promotion of true temperance, that work given to us so graciously by our Lord and Master, and which this great, suffering world needs so sadly.

WHAT ONTARIO IS DOING.

Toronto has lately been the scene of one of the most important temperance conventions ever held in Canada. Representatives from other provinces and the United States were there, but it was essentially an Ontario gathering and for a provincial purpose. From far and near there came the veterans in temperance warfare, upheld and strengthened by hundreds of younger workers who are preparing with honest appreciation and energy to take up the lines as they fall from the feeble but experienced hands of those who must soon drop out of the ranks. Their purpose was to organize a plan of campaign for the prohibition plebiscite which is to be taken at the time of the municipal elections in the beginning of January.

The great central committee of organization contains in its membership representatives of every shade of prohibitionist opinion. The speeches were brilliant, earnest and stimulating, and though it was not in human nature to refrain from occasional hits at divergencies of opinion in the past, all were at one in urging on the assembled workers to make the majority for prohibition as large as possible. The pity of it is that even a very favorable vote may not result in the enactment of a provincial prohibition law. The right of provincial parliaments to pass such a law for their respective provinces is still in question, and the Dominion Government has decided on a reference to the supreme court to prove whether such power is vested solely in the Dominion, or whether local governments have also similar powers. Whatever the final decision may be, it cannot but be that such an upheaval of opinion must result in good.

QUEBEC'S TENTH ANNUAL PROVINCIAL GATHERING.

Danville, in the Province of Quebec, presented a scene of unusual activity last week when by every train and from every quarter there poured into that beautiful little town groups of white-ribboned women, who came to attend the tenth annual W. C. T. U. convention of the Province of Quebec. There seemed a special appropriateness in meeting in Danville, as it is situated in the heart of a prohibition county, and has been particularly active and successful in enforcing the law. Mrs. J. A. Gibson, in her hearty address of welcome to the convention, alluded to the time when only nine men were found brave enough to sign the original temperance draft, whereby the Dunkin Act became law in Richmond county.

It would be impossible to mention the names of all those who helped to make the convention a success, but space must be found to acknowledge the services of Mrs. Middleton, Mrs. Sanderson and Mrs. Foster, honorary, acting and vice-presidents of the provincial union of Quebec. County presidents and superintendents presented the results of a year's labor in their respective departments, and a good deal of solid work was done.

Special attention was directed to the desirability of women using the franchise as far as it has been extended to them, and explicit directions given how to do this to best advantage so as to secure good temperance men for local councils. Mrs. Putney, of East Hartley, made some good points on this subject, claiming that it is the sacred duty of every qualified woman to use the privilege extended to her two years ago, of voting in municipal and school affairs. She believed that all the objections to women voting would disappear like morning dew.

The secretary reported seventy-nine unions in the province, with a membership of 2,296. The officers of the union were all reëlected with the exception of the recording secretary, Miss Bliss, whose resignation was regretfully accepted. Miss Meiklejohn takes her place.

The committee presented twelve resolutions for the consideration of the convention, all of which, with some amendments, passed. An animated discussion took place over the anti-tobacco question and the defeat of Mr. Cook's Bill, the result being increased determination to continue to agitate until a stringent law is placed in the statute book. It was thought that perhaps the clause relating to the imprisonment of boys for infringement of the Act might have been prejudicial to its passing, and it was decided that in the W. C. T. U. petition that clause should be omitted.

Special attention was also called to the great harm done by the vile pamphlets and immoral advertisements of the "green goods" business, which came through the postoffices, addressed to boys and girls under the guise of friendship and secret confidences. The authorities are petitioned to suppress this evil as far as lies in their power. The canteen system of the volunteer camps was also protested against, as a dangerous source of evil to our young men. The review of work for the past year presented by county presidents and superintendents was both interesting and encouraging. There are many drawbacks in the Province of Quebec with which the other provinces have not to contend, but while these were alluded to, the prevailing feeling seemed to be that steady, progressive work was going on.

The county of Brome had another victory to record in the defeat of the attempt to repeal the Scott Act.

Miss Barber's report on social purity excited almost painful interest, and her warning to mothers whose daughters earn their living as typewriters, or in any such way, was listened to with heartfelt sympathy, and drew remarks from mothers present that proved how much still more earnest work in that line was needed.

The program of one evening was provided by the Y's and proved bright and instructive, but the crowning triumph was the last evening when the Town Hall, kindly offered by the mayor, was crowded to the door, people driving many miles to hear what the W. C. T. U. had to say.

The beautiful prize banner, kindly given by the Dominion president, Mrs. C. T. Williams, for the greatest increase in paid-up membership, hung above all others during the meetings, and was a silent reminder to all that they must work hard if it is to be kept in the province of Quebec next year.

On invitation of Miss McFadden, the convention will meet next year as guest of the W. C. T. U., Point St. Charles.

NOTES.

Manitoba is still feeling the impetus given to it by the Dominion convention, which was held in Winnipeg last June. A new union has been formed in the northern part of Winnipeg. The Central union of the same city kept Crusade Day in a very enjoyable and profitable way, adding fourteen names to its membership. The rooms were open from noon to seven p. m., and a series of hour meetings held, closing with a social. During the afternoon papers were read on "Temperance in the Home," "Crusade Day of the World's W. C. T. U.," and "Heredity and Intemperance."

In the northwest territory a new union has been organized at Moosejan, with fourteen members, also a Band of Hope with forty members.

IOWA.

THE ANNUAL CONVENTION.

The morning of October 3d saw Iowa W. C. T. U. convened for prayer and conference in the town of Oskaloosa, and within the sheltering walls of the First M. E. Church.

The consecration service in the morning, led by the veteran president of the "Eleventh," Mrs. Joanna Shesler, struck the key-note of the entire convention, which was one of peace and power throughout.

The call to order by President Dunham was followed by the roll-call, showing thirteen officers and superintendents in attendance. The necessary business of the session was put through with dispatch but not with haste. The corresponding secretary, Belle H. Mix, read a most interesting chapter from our continued "Story of the Year," while Treasurer Carhart gave us a statement of our financial standing in these times of stringency.

Superintendents and vice-presidents reported briefly, concisely, pointedly. It was the opinion of the convention that we could change our form of organism with advantage to the work. And the plan to discontinue counties, and divide the state in smaller districts with a view to the relative strength of the unions, and to railway facilities, will no doubt be in active operation at no very distant day.

The Bible expositions conducted by the state evangelist, Mrs. A. M. Palmer, were hours of profit to us all.

Our State and National organs, THE UNION SIGNAL and Iowa Signal, received due attention, the results of which are already being felt. Orders for one thousand extra copies of the November Iowa Signal were received.

The thankoffering and the memorial services were impressively and beautifully conducted, the former by Mrs. Rachel Marriage, and the latter by Mrs. L. D. Carhart.

The evening meetings were well attended by citizens and friends; the first evening being mainly occupied by welcomes and responses, and by the president's annual address. On the second evening six young women were contestants for the grand gold medal, it being won by Floy McCready, of Montezuma. Miss Jessie Ackermann gave the address of the last evening, speaking on the "W. C. T. U. of Other Lands." The songs of the Ladies' Cecilian Quartette and of the Gentlemen's O. Q. Club, of Oskaloosa, were a source of unwearying delight to all.

While the attendance at this convention was at least a third smaller than that of the preceding year, yet seemingly its potency increased in inverse ratio. Power begotten by harmony of thought and unity of purpose was everywhere apparent. When all members of the W. C. T. U. in Iowa are a unit as to the end to be attained, and to the means for its attainment, then may we expect the blessing promised in the significant telegram received from California: "And it shall come to pass that in all the land, saith the Lord, two parts thereof shall be cut off and die; but the third shall be left therein. And I will bring the third part through the fire, and will refine them as silver is refined, and will try them as gold is tried; they shall call on my name and I will hear them: I will say, It is my people, and they shall say, The Lord is my God."—Zech. 13:8, 9.

INDIANA.

CRYSTAL CONVENTION.

The twentieth annual state convention of the W. C. T. U. of Indiana was held October 6 to 10, inclusive, in Richmond, our beautiful Quaker City.

Nature assisted our hospitable friends by bestowing bright, sunny days during our stay. The convention met with all of our state officers present except our beloved president, Mrs. L. M. Beck. Mrs. Addie Fields, our vice-president, occupied the chair. Her just ruling, knowledge of parliamentary rules, and ability to keep order, delighted the convention. One hundred and ninety-one voting delegates and many visitors were present.

Indiana carried away the banner from the National Convention at Denver, last year, but I fear we shall have to relinquish it this year, as one of our organizers left our state in March last, and our executive board was not able to fill the vacancy. However, seventy-two new unions have been organized during the year. We now have 327 unions and a paid up membership of 5,706. Tardiness in collecting dues prevents recording the membership we are entitled to. We have forty-two Y unions, also 108 L. T. L's with a membership of 6,683.

Our president reported "seventeen schools of methods held during the year, outside of those held in counties, summer assemblies and other places."

OUR SUPERINTENDENTS REPORTED

good work done, and many had fine papers. Among them was that of Mrs. Rall, superintendent of the department of mercy. She gave the testimony of many noted physicians who assert that all that has been claimed for vivisection could have been learned by other methods. She asserted that vivisection in our schools should by all means be condemned, since it implants cruelty and hardness of heart in our children.

Mrs. Straw, superintendent of L. T. L., gave an excellent report. Space will not permit me even to name the thirty-five different departments of work of which reports were given.

A report of our

showed that $7,000 had been expended upon the building, which is under roof, and we hope will be completed within a few months.

A report was also given of our state fair cottage. By means of this cottage our ladies have added $100 annually to our state funds. Our convention was in a most liberal mood. Seventy-five dollars were collected, thus making the last payment on the furniture of the fair cottage, 150 subscriptions for our state paper, The Organizer, were obtained, also $505 in Organizer stock shares—all due to Miss Hay's pleasant, energetic way of soliciting.

THE Y CONFERENCES

Were ably and entertainingly conducted by Miss Clothier, of Manitou, Col., and Miss Dickson, our state superintendent of Y work.

We shall not soon forget the generous hospitality of Richmond, the systematic work of the entertainment committee, of which Mrs. M. R. Dennis was chairman, the words of welcome by the representative pastor, Rev. J. W. Knapp, and Pres. J. J. Mills, of Earlham, the Quaker college, nor of our sister Mrs. Hussey.

Two beautiful churches were thrown open for the use of our convention, Grace M. E. church, and the First Presbyterian church; choirs rendered beautiful music and the press was most generous and kind.

The following officers were elected: President, Mrs. L. M. Beck, of Bloomington; vice-president, Mrs. E. L. Calkins, of South Bend; corresponding secretary, Miss L. E. Reed, of Indianapolis; recording secretary, Mrs. M. Cammack, of Marion; treasurer, Mrs. L. T. McWhirter, of Indianapolis. Our former vice-president, Mrs. Fields, leaves us for the distant state of Vermont. May she prove to be the blessing to that state that she has been to us.

We were fortunate in having our National officers, Mrs. Woodbridge, Mrs. Hunt, Miss Clothier and Mrs. Pritchard, with us. Mrs. Pritchard's Bible readings seemed to have a holy influence over the convention. Miss Clothier's bright, graceful address, Mrs. Hunt's practical advice, Mrs. Woodbridge's soul-stirring sermons, filled our hearts with delight, and inspired us with courage in our battle for the right.

NEWS IN A NUTSHELL.

RESOLUTIONS in memoriam were passed by the Poughkeepsie, N. Y., W. C. T. U., Nov. 1, on the death of their faithful corresponding secretary, Mrs. R. A. Thurston.

THE success of the Scott meetings in Canada exceeded expectations. Major Scott spoke to 2,500 people in the Pavilion at Toronto, amid profound interest.

AT Missouri's state convention, a unique response to the address of welcome was given by Mrs. Antoinette A. Hawley, of Kansas City, in amusing and stirring poetical lines.

WILL the lady from Texas who kindly assisted in caring for a sick lady on Sunday, Oct. 21st, at the Memorial Art Palace in Chicago, please send her address to Ruth Ellis, care of UNION SIGNAL office?

REV. E. M. C. BOTTERILL, of Pennsylvania, an evangelist and Bible teacher, has recently given an uplifting and inspiring course of Bible readings in Peoria and Rockford, Ill., one of which, "The Sanctity of the Human Body," is especially suited to temperance work. Mr. Botterill is highly recommended by leading members of the Illinois W. C. T. U., who commend his services to other unions. Address him at Llanwellyn, Delaware county, Pa., for engagements in the East.

THE sad ending of a promising young life was the tragic death of Miss Mary Yeargin, who was drowned while rowing on the lake at Ithaca, N. Y., November 19. Miss Yeargin was a well-known Southern white-ribboner, who has been identified with the W. C. T. U. of South Carolina since its inception, and occupied the position of state Y superintendent before her departure for the North to take a two years' course of law and philosophy at Cornell University. Her characteristics, excellent sense, tact and fidelity to duty, were early developed, and her sudden taking-off is a sad loss to the young women's Christian temperance work of the nation.

MISS EMILY CONYBEARE, who was one of the English delegates to the World's Convention from the British Women's Temperance Association and from one of the English Anti-Vivisection Societies, spent some days at Bryn Mawr as the guest of Mrs. Lovell, and spoke very acceptably in Bryn Mawr College on the evening of Nov. 14th, on "English Politics or Social Reform" in England. She gave a graphic description of the advance made by English women in political influence, and it would seem that American women might take some lessons from the experience of their English sisters. The English women, like our own, are anxious to help in all reform and have discovered that they can only meet with partial success while the ballot is withheld from them. Among the leading reforms English women are working for, Miss Conybeare mentioned temperance, purity and anti-vivisection.

MRS. ALICE HARRIS, 116 Tremont St., Boston, musical director for the National W. C. T. U., has issued her Temperance vesper service, No. 2, which is specially designed for general use in conventions and other public meetings, and for the assistance of leaders who want an attractive and instructive program. It will be found especially helpful to those who wish to arrange and conduct public temperance meetings, but who are not themselves public speakers. The price is low; 5 cents for single copy; $1 per hundred: $8 per thousand with an additional charge of 16 cents for postage per hundred if sent by mail.

Witter, sends us the following concerning the local and district work in her state: "Owing to the illness of our corresponding secretary, we have no state reporter for our work. She wanted one of those fashionable capes with a triple collar, but the price was $10 and times were hard. She was telling Mrs. Handyman about it. "But why don't you buy a package of Diamond Dyes, and color that old drab circular of yours?" said Mrs. H. "That faded, shabby old——!" "No matter how old and shabby it is," interrupted Mrs. H., "Diamond Dyes will make it just like new." "But I don't know how." Mrs. H. laughed and said, "Why, it's the easiest thing in the world, if you use dent for this part of the state. She at once entered with interest on her work. A district convention was appointed to meet in Atlanta. We have only five unions in the district, but thirteen delegates responded to roll-call, and, though it was her first effort, our president filled her position well. Reports were excellent and showed our ladies were wide awake and at work. Jail work, railroad work, home mission work were well reported. Five L. T. L's and a Junior League (conducted on the same plan) were reported in fine working order. The next convention met in Conyers, September 5. This little city is about thirty miles from Atlanta. We were warmly received, and while we did not have so many delegates, we had an excellent meeting. Our good president was in the chair, and made a fine opening address. The good people of Conyers were out, and listened with interest. The next day business was dispatched as usual. Among the rest, the colored president was with us, and was called on for a report. Her union had sixty members, and she wished to have some of our ladies visit her people, so the arrangement was made for us to go that evening. After the addresses were over, the colored L. T. L. came out and sang a nice welcome for us. The next morning we had a delightful experience meeting. In the afternoon a pleasant little model union was held, and officers elected for the ensuing year for the Conyers union. Again in the evening a good audience gathered and our president wound up our convention with a most excellent address on woman suffrage. Mrs. McLendon in one of our union meetings, several years ago, proposed we make the effort to start an industrial school for girls in our state. We went to work, and aided by other friends, the plan was started. A fine school was the result, located in Milledgeville, the old state capital."

LUMBER CAMP WORK.

DEAR STATE SUPERINTENDENT CO-WORKERS:—As state superintendents you hardly need any advice from me, but naturally may ask why Wisconsin can afford a camp-missionary, while your state finds it so hard to secure a salary for one. In Wisconsin our women have adopted a financial plan, and we wonder why all the larger, richer states do not do likewise. At our yearly "State Mecca" we estimate how much it will cost to run our housekeeping for the year to come; for instance, the state secretary's salary, treasurer's salary, editor's salary, expenses necessary at headquarters, etc., demand something like $1,500, our home for unfortunate women at Eau Claire, $800, our lumber camp missionary, $400, and each department its postage and some little aid, making some $4,000 to keep house on. Then each district comes up to the state convention prepared to say how much their unions will donate, and thus far for three years past we have shown a credit surplus of some $400 in the treasury, and sometimes more.

If Wisconsin can do this, why can't some of the rest of the states do the same? Some of them could support a dozen missionaries, with the "sine qua non" always attending (as a qualification) of "In Rogers" memory. The manufacturers of lumber have generally come to our aid in the camp missionary's salary for six years past, and we have not had to call for but one-half our appropriation. Still "Nothing succeeds like success," and if it were not for the financial plan we could not ask so freely for aid.

Try this, please, and see if your state cannot afford a camp missionary. Meanwhile, endeavor by a circular letter to the manufacturers of lumber to secure a small sum from each to aid you in the missionary's salary, as you ask them for the post-office address of their camps. In selecting your literature send to Mrs. Grubb for an assortment of foreign tracts, to the Bible Society for Testaments, in German and Scandinavian, as well as English, to place with your well selected package.

Yours faithfully,

MRS. MARY C. UPHAM,

Nat. Supt. Camp Work, W. C. T. U., Marshfield, Wisconsin.

FRANCHISE.

The National W. C. T. U. Franchise department congratulates itself and its co-workers upon having had a part in the victory in Colorado. Let us also have a part in the campaign in Kansas for 1893–1894.

Superintendents, state, county, district and local, are reminded of the "Suggestions for Franchise Superintendents," a manual issued by the department. This may be had on application, (send postage) to 3 Park St., Boston, Mass., also a catalogue of suffrage literature.

The following is the list of lecturers in the National, but all W. C. T. U. workers are urged to include this very important subject.

LECTURERS.

Miss Frances E. Willard, the Temple, Chicago.

Mrs. Susan S. Fessenden, 171 Tremont Street, Boston.

Mrs. Mary E. Haggart, California, Pa.

Lady Henry Somerset, the Temple, Chicago.

Mrs. Clara C. Hoffman, 510 Rialto Building, Kansas City, Mo.

Miss E. U. Yates, Round Pond, Me.

Please note some special suggestions for the coming year:

1. Work to have a superintendent appointed in every county or district in your state.

2. Unite with other organizations in asking for municipal and school suffrage, as a first step.

3. Keep the subject before the people in your W. C. T. U. papers; ask the National to aid you in furnishing supplements.

4. Send items regarding your work monthly to 3 Park St., Boston.

5. Employ one of our lecturers, or state or local talent in the lecture field, and get the subject before the people in conferences, discussions, etc.

6. Get the Y and the L. T. L. to debate such subjects as "Equal Wages for Equal Work," "Municipal Affairs," "Legal Status of Woman."

7. Help Kansas just now in her Woman Suffrage Amendment Campaign, with your sympathies, contributions, efforts, prayers.

8. Signalize this year by holding Lucy Stone Memorial Meetings, and thus advance the cause to which her life was devoted. Material can be found in THE UNION SIGNAL, October 26, and in the Woman's Journal and the Woman's Column, Boston, October 21 and 28.

LOUISE C. PURINGTON, Nat'l Supt.
ALICE STONE BLACKWELL, Associate.

IMPORTANT REQUEST.

Will every woman who expects to conduct a school of methods, in whole or part, send me her name, with the place in which said school is to be held? State, too, whether in a Chautauqua Assembly, or any assembly, or whether entirely under our own auspices, at a convention or other meeting of the W. C. T. U. Let this be done at once, please.

Will every superintendent of parliamentary usage, state, district, county or local, send me her full name and address not later than January 1? I desire to send to all these a practical "plan of work."

A. S. BENJAMIN,

Nat. Supt. of Schools of Methods and Parliamentary Usage.
Portland, Mich.

Cor. Secy's Notes.

This department is established for the benefit of the workers, the entire two hundred thousand who make up the busy W. C. T. U. hive. It is hoped that the interchange of thought between the National corresponding secretary and the local, county, district or state officers, which here finds expression, may stimulate to renewed effort and lead to a closer bond of union. Extracts from letters will be given, questions answered and difficulties explained. It will be an "Open Parliament" to which all are welcome.

ITEMS.

Seventeen new unions in different states have been organized and reported to Headquarters since our annual Convention.

Mrs. Norinne Law writes that she has just returned from Manitoba, where she added six hundred members to their unions.

Mrs. Henrietta Skelton is a philosopher. She writes: "I was sorely disappointed that I could not attend the National Convention at Chicago, and thinking nothing could so satisfy as work, I went at it, and since the 10th of October have organized five unions with a membership of 130."

Miss E. W. Greenwood, evangelistic superintendent World's and National W. C. T. U., has by the request of Miss Willard compiled "A list of women preachers and evangelists" in the United States. It is arranged alphabetically as to denominations, and individual names—the ordained or licensed ministers and evangelists are noted, and all in all for brevity, arrangement, clearness and utility, we believe it has not its equal in this line. We are under great obligations to Miss Greenwood for her patient labor in the work, and think it should have its place among the archives of the Temple.

The superintendents are up and doing. Mrs. Mary C. Upham, superintendent of work among miners, is out with her first letter for the year. Read her admirable suggestions to state superintendents.

Georgia has (as South Carolina) a state union No. 2.—Mrs. Georgia Swift King, of Atlanta, president. Our colored sisters are alive to the interests of their race.

At the late National W. C. T. U. convention Miss Gertrude Ferguson, long the secretary of the Flower Mission department, was elected superintendent in place of her translated chieftain. She particularly desires that each state secretary will send her the full address of the Flower Mission superintendent of her state, that she may be able to communicate with each, opening the work of the year at as early a date as possible.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Many enlistments in the W. C. T. U. army are reported.

The Lecture Bureau is planning for great things the coming winter.

Mrs. Clara Holbrook Smith spoke at a mass-meeting the first Sabbath of December, after which she delivered six lectures to ladies only. These will be followed by other noted speakers, and a convocation is being planned for February. Congratulations to the Bureau that plans such work.

Editors of leading daily papers are freely using their columns in our interest, and Mrs. La Fetra who has been indefatigable in her labors has used her funds with noble generosity for years, though retired from the presidency of the District. Mrs. Mary E. Griffith, the new president, is entering into her labors rejoicing in the reaping of sheaves while the sowing still goes on.

Organizers' Corner.

STATUS OF ORGANIZERS.

The mistaken idea prevails in many portions of the country that a National organizer is fitted only to organize new unions, whereas she must be a public speaker as well, especially prepared to enthuse and instruct the masses in regard to the distinctive features of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. She must be a woman of tact, consecration and knowledge of our many departments, willing to enter difficult fields, enlist new workers, strengthen and enlarge unions already formed as well as organize new ones, and instruct in regard to our special methods. Our National organizers are carefully selected by our National executive committee, and elected by the Convention.

By the coöperation and concerted action of the state and county officers, the stronger unions may help the weaker, and greatly benefit their own work by employing the National organizers while going to and from their distant fields of labor, thereby reducing their traveling expenses, which will enable them to give lower rates at each point.

The following is the list of National organizers for the present year, and whether W's or Y's they are all accredited public speakers and fully prepared to organize W's, Y's, L. T. L's, or speak to the general public and add to the membership of unions, having been long in the work.

For terms and dates address as below:

Mrs. Helen L. Bullock, Elmira, N. Y.

Mrs. L. H. Washington, Port Jervis, N. Y.

Miss Frances E. Griffin, Montgomery, Ala.

Mrs. Mary Bynon Reese, Chautauqua, Wash.

Mrs. Emily Pitt Stevens, 1907 Bush street, San Francisco, Cal.

Mrs. E. A. Blair, 936 Cottage Place, Los Angeles, Cal.

Mrs. Maude L. Green, Manitou Springs, Col.

Mrs. E. Norinne Law, Baraga, Mich.

Miss Belle Kearney, Flora, Miss.

Mrs. Delle H. Cox, Newberg, Ore.

Miss Ida Clothier, Manitou Springs, Col.

Mrs. Henrietta Skelton, 132 McAlister street, San Francisco, Cal.

Miss S. C. Harris, Franklin, Va.

Mrs. F. E. W. Harper, Bainbridge street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Miss Clara Parrish, Paris, Ill.

Miss Carrie Lee Carter, Dexter, Mo.

Miss Frances Ensign, Madison, O.

Mrs. E. A. Kenyon, Townshend, Vt.

This "Corner" may be obliged to try several positions before it finds just the niche it can best fill, but it is the desire of the editors of THE UNION SIGNAL, and of the chairman of the board of organizers, that the list of names be kept standing in the paper, and that each organizer feel free to insert an itineracy of her engagements.

Only one organizer has sent in material for this Corner. Mrs. E. Norinne Law writes: "I am delighted with the Organizers' Corner. I was reëlected president of the 12th district of Michigan, Nov. 9, and have promised to work in the Upper Peninsula during the next six months. I am laying some new plans, which, if matured, will add great attraction to the work."

(Please let us hear from the others.)

ELI BROWN.

FREE.

The following remarkable statement, to which we direct special attention, is from a Tennessee farmer.

My age is 63. I suffered intensely from catarrh 10 years; dry scabs formed in nostrils, one or both sides stopped up continually, dryness and soreness of throat, hoarseness, intense headache, took cold easily, and had continual roaring, cracking, buzzing and singing in my ears. My hearing began to fail, and for three years I was almost entirely deaf, and continually grew worse. Everything I had tried, failed. In despair I commenced to use the Aerial Medication in 1888, and the effect of the first application was simply wonderful. In less than five minutes my hearing was fully restored, and has been perfect ever since, and in a few months was entirely cured of catarrh.

Signal Notes.

Of the four thousand and thirty convicted criminals in Canada last year, it is said that but one hundred and thirty-two were abstainers.

A great pork butcher of Cambridge, Mass., employing eight hundred men, affirms that he would not have the saloons licensed again in that city for ten thousand dollars a year.

It is considered an act of virtue to prevent the killing of a cow among the Hindoos, and it may yet bring the government of India into serious conflict with the natives.

"Vote for principle, vote for right and you need not fear the consequences. Those votes only are 'lost' which are given for men in violation of principle."—Chief Justice Chase.

The Sisters of the Poor, who work among the poor under the superintendence of Mrs. Hugh Price Hughes, now number thirty-four, although there were but three six years ago.

Primary education of a character to make children of both sexes moral and useful members of society has been made compulsory in the territory of Baroda, India, and will be carried on at the expense of the state.

The woman's branch of the Zurich social purity society in its fifth yearly report tells of the exhibition of an especially indecent picture in the Munich Art salon, against which they and the Men's Christian Association protested in vain.

Although it is not a new discovery, it is at the same time a hopeful sign of the times to give public utterance to such statements as Sir Evelyn Wood's in regard to the best beverage for men engaged in military operations. He found from actual experiment with cocoa, cold tea and beer, that the men marched much better without the beer.

At the meetings of the Evangelical Conference held recently in Glasgow, a motion which sought to secure approval of the conference to the government proposal for dealing with the liquor question was overruled by one which affirmed that nothing short of total prohibition would satisfy the members. This was passed by a large majority.

The Martha House for friendless girls under thirty years of age has been more than full the past year, a charge of twenty-five cents a day being paid. At railway stations an average of one hundred and fifty girls each month has been directed to safe quarters by the agent of the association. A school for servants in connection with their home for friendless girls will be opened next spring.

The National Association for the Education of Colored Youth in a recently published report, gives some hopeful statistics. There are not less than one million and a half colored children enjoying the advantages of the American public school. There are twenty-five colleges with nearly ten thousand pupils and professors, beside other schools, which indicate a growing appreciation on the part of the colored people for education.

The Jews do not, in their feasts, for several purposes, including the marriage feast, ever use any kind of fermented drinks. In their oblations and libations, both public and private, they employ the fruit of the vine—that is, fresh grapes—unfermented grape juice and raisins as the symbol of benediction. Fermentation is to them always a symbol of corruption, as in nature and in science it is in itself decay, rottenness.—Dr. S. M. Isaac.

A NEW CURE FOR ASTHMA.

Wheat has reached the lowest price in twenty-three years, fifty-two cents per bushel.

Many cities in the United States are making practical plans for the relief of their unemployed poor.

The National Baptist Conference closed its sessions at Augusta, Ga., December 7, by a discussion on the administration of baptism.

Only one-third of the World's Fair exhibits have been removed. The Ferris wheel alone remains intact upon the Midway Plaisance.

At a public meeting held by the Woman's Suffrage Association in the Old Town Hall, Vienna, December 10, it was resolved to petition Parliament for universal suffrage.

The Grand Lodge of Good Templars held its annual conclave at Richmond, Va., last week. Letters of greeting from Lady Henry Somerset and Miss Willard were read.

Over eighty people are reported as wounded by a dynamite bomb which was thrown in the Chamber of Deputies, Paris, during its session last Saturday. The bomb-thrower, an anarchist named Vaillant, has been arrested.

At the convention of the Michigan Federation of Labor last week it was voted that as the office of Secretary of Agriculture had broadened and dignified farming interests, that a similar Cabinet office, to be called the Secretary of Labor, be created.

A dispatch from London, December 7, announces that in reply to a deputation from the National Temperance Union, Mr. Gladstone declares that the local veto bill will be pushed to its final issue by the government at its earliest opportunity.

It is reported from London this week that in compliance with a request made by a delegation, headed by Dr. Norman Kerr, the government will introduce a bill providing for the enforced confinement of confirmed drunkards in an inebriate asylum.

The American Federation of Labor, Samuel Gompers, president, met in annual convention at Chicago, December 11. Among the leading questions under discussion were how to take care of the unemployed, the formation of an industrial political party and the enforcement of laws favorable to the masses.

FOR an account of the way in which the Crusade dimes are rolling in, see the Treasurer's Corner, on page 13.

THE National corresponding secretary gives valuable suggestions for working up a public meeting, in her column on page 13. Be sure to read it.

THE UNION SIGNAL has taken two methods of observing Crusade Day, both of which we believe will be appreciated by our readers. One is the issuing of this special Crusade Jubilee number which speaks for itself, and the other is our business manager's new offer on page 17. By this offer we virtually give the equivalent of twenty-five cents for every new member secured through the membership Crusade, which is to be one of the chief factors of the celebration. Be sure to read the offer.

EVERY special day in the white-ribbon calendar affords favorable opportunity to the local union for increasing its membership. But of all red-letter days December 23 is preëminent as "membership day."

"BEER and sandwich" meetings in saloons are characterized as a picturesque feature of the especial election campaign in Chicago last week, and such they are, as illustrative of the way in which the saloon is utilized in politics. The Republicans have the credit of leading in the movement, giving out beer to the crowds who collected in the saloons, and afterwards listened to an address by some ward leader. The Democrats followed the example so illustriously set and the saloons reaped the harvest. The voters thus instilled with political principles and beer, seeing "as through a glass darkly" are the tools which strengthen and fortify the saloon power.

ATTRACTIVE invitations have been issued by Mrs. Woodbridge to receptions at National Headquarters, the first and third Thursdays of each month, from two to four o'clock p. m. These invitations are general, and every one in the least wise interested in our work will be welcomed. It is hoped that this will afford many an opportunity to those who otherwise have hesitated to call, fearing an interruption of important office work. The first reception occurred last week and was a pleasant affair. Mr. Stead was among the callers, and evidently desirous of impressing us with the fact that we had misinterpreted his words and misjudged his motives. We truly hope this may be so, as we covet him for an ally, but do not feel encouraged by his more recent utterance, comment on which will be found elsewhere on this page.

THE Crusade Jubilee spirit began in earnest at National Headquarters last week. Saturday's mail brought to Mrs. Barker, our treasurer, a most acceptable letter from Mrs. Forbes, president of Connecticut W. C. T. U., which contained the following good news: "Mr. George P. Rogers, of New London, Conn., who recently died, bequeathed to the National W. C. T. U. three thousand dollars, and to Connecticut two thousand dollars. You will remember that Mr. Bartlett, of Guilford, Conn., gave five thousand dollars to the National a few years ago. I am informed that Connecticut is the only state which has thus remembered us." A rumor of this generous bequest had reached us, but the pleasure of having it officially confirmed was so great that a praise meeting was instantly called and for ten minutes impromptu expressions of gratitude and joyful thanksgiving, earnest words of prayer and praise and appropriate Scripture quotations fell from the lips of the handful of brave souls that guide the W. C. T. U. ship of state in these trying financial times.

MANY valued contributions for this Crusade Christmas number either arrived too late or were crowded out because of the inexorable limits of our columns. Among these is one from Rev. Joseph Cook, the opening sentence of which reads: "The straightforward, Christian aggressiveness which lighted the fires of the woman's temperance Crusade a score of years ago, ought to burn in all the forty departments of the work of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, national and international." Rev. Josiah Strong takes time in his busy life, as secretary of the Evangelical Alliance, to assure us that he wishes to be "counted among the firm friends of the W. C. T. U.," and adds, "God bless your noble organization." Dr. Lorimer sends cordial greeting from Tremont Temple, Boston, and several state presidents and other stanch friends have contributed excellent articles which will appear in subsequent issues of our paper. To each and every contributor we extend our grateful thanks, our only regret being that our pages could not have been more elastic, and have accommodated the entire wealth of material which has been so generously offered.

THE divine faith that there is a latent good in human nature ready to respond to every conception of something better than it knows practically, was the key-note of the Crusade. Nearly all the world has heard of this sublime faith of "Mother Thompson" and the other Crusaders, but for fear some are asking, Who is "Mother Thompson"? here is her history briefly outlined: On August 24, 1816, Eliza J. Thompson opened her eyes on the world in Hillsboro, Ohio, the only daughter in the home of her father, Allen Trimble, one of the early governors of the Buckeye State. Her mother was called an ideal character, and soon made her moulding hand felt on the young life entrusted to her keeping. The Methodist Episcopal was the church home of "Mother Thompson" through her girlhood, but she united with the Presbyterians in 1837, when she married James H. Thompson, a young lawyer of Harrodsburg, Ky., who has much distinguished the state of his adoption, as well as being highly honored by it in one of its prominent judgeships. A large family of gifted children blessed this home, of whom two sons and two daughters are yet living—a crown to the old age of their parents. In her seventy-eighth year, "Mother Thompson" is a most beloved leader in the town where she was born, in the church where she has worshiped nearly all her life,—but best of all, her faith in God and humanity brightens with each year, and she is literally blossoming into the Kingdom with a serenity and a peace that kindle the immortal hope of all whom her life touches.

ANOTHER novel meeting occurred in Central Music Hall, Chicago, last Sunday night, in which Wm. T. Stead, of London, was again a prominent actor. The meeting was apparently under the direction of Mrs. Helen M. Gougar, who had quickly seen the fallacy of Mr. Stead's arguments as to the best method of bettering the condition of the unemployed, and desired to answer them. A magnificent audience assembled, and listened with great respect to Mrs. Gougar's plea for Chicago's homeless poor, which resulted in a contribution of four hundred and seventy-six dollars, and for the total prohibition of the liquor traffic, which, more than all other causes combined, brought on these distressing conditions of poverty. Mrs. Gougar showed that with the sixty-five million dollars spent in Chicago's saloons last year she could furnish labor at a yearly salary of five hundred and fifteen dollars to the one hundred and twenty thousand unemployed, and have a handsome residue for charity. When Mr. Stead's time came for reply, he reiterated many of his utterances, previously quoted in these columns, but took pains to explain some of them, saying that he "meant" to say that "the temperance people do the most harm and the least good" in the way of improving the saloons! To this few "true blue" temperance people will take exceptions. He continued to make declarations which he did not take the pains to attempt to prove, such as, "temperance people hinder the raising of teetotal families" (!) and "you may continue voting prohibition until doomsday and never do one bit of good." He also asserted that while it would be as difficult a matter to prohibit Chicago's seven thousand saloons as to bring down the moon and stars from their lofty places, it would be a comparatively easy matter to close five thousand of them and so "improve" the remaining two thousand that drunkenness would be reduced to a minimum. If Mr. Stead knows how this can be done, we advise the city of Chicago to invest him with the necessary power, and we promise not to throw a feather's weight against the transaction. But mere assertions are not helpful or convincing. We admire Mr. Stead's pluck in returning to this city to prosecute what is doubtless an honest intention to "drive the devil out of Chicago," but we confess that we are no more hopeful in regard to the wisdom of his methods than we were upon his first visit. If his zeal were coupled with more discretion, we would have more faith in the outcome.

A Christmas Song of Crusades.

BY HENRY A. DELANO.

They saw His star,— so they said.
In the east, and came to inquire
Where the new was born;—the old was dead,
Dead as the Temple's fire.

Oh, wise were the men who dared,
The Sages of old, who came
Believing the Infinite God still cared
For poor, and blind, and lame.

The old was dead:
but the life
Of the dead leaf hides away
In the heart of things, and, after strife,
Blossoms, and blooms, some day.

'T was the star of Him, guiding them,
God's breath on the soul, to persuade,
Something better remained for men;
That star led the first crusade.

They followed, and followed, and found
"The place where the young child lay":
No pillow of king with gold fringe bound,
But a virgin, and bed of hay.

Rude shelter and stall so bleak,
Where the gentle kine doth low.
No flowers, perhaps—could history speak—
THORNS, IVY and MISTLETOE.

They found the King, in His beauty,
Himself, henceforth to lead
The mother-heart to its duty,
'Mid the world's profoundest need.

Oh, wise were the women who said:
"We follow and pray," as they kneeled,—
'Mid lowliest haunts, by the living dead,
When the Christ in her heart appealed.

And they sought from the lips of men,
To dash foul cups away,
To plant where the night had been
The hope of a better day.

That same old, glorious song
Of old, and the jubilant psalm,
"For God and home,"—O heart, be strong,
"Over every land" God's calm!

O nations, parties and clans,
To selfish and earth-paths wed,
The earth is God's—not man's;
Oh, follow His star, instead.

Follow the star we must,
To the manger of peace and love,
The way is long, but the cause is just,—
And the Child King reigns above.

MRS. GRAYSON'S CRUSADE.*

BY MRS. O. W. SCOTT.

"I wish you wouldn't, Mis' Grayson, I really wish you wouldn't. It won't look well for you to."

The speaker was Miss Pike, an elderly spinster with short, snow-white curls, and a curiously child-like expression on her soft, wrinkled face. She had stepped into Mrs. Grayson's kitchen in a neighborly way, and was wiping the dinner dishes while she talked.

Mrs. Grayson paused to take an apron from the closet and tie it around Miss Pike's rather indefinite waist. Then returning to her dishes and the subject, she replied: "I've got where I don't much care how it looks, Lucindy. I know I'm right, because it all opened to me when I was praying about—Prescott. You see that man Ryan had no business to come here. The laws of Maine don't allow it. Nobody wanted a saloon at the Four Corners, and if it hadn't been for the new mill it wouldn't have been worth while to have it. But just as soon as there's a little business, and more people, and more ready money, along comes Peter Ryan with his beer and whisky barrels. I tell you it's an abomination above ground!"

"I agree it's a shame! The men had ought to see about it," assented Miss Pike, and then, "You got a new pickle dish, didn't you? Pretty, too. I wondered what you bought with your rags the other day."

Mrs. Grayson's eyes rested on the pink, flowered pickle dish, but she did not appear to see it, and only continued more earnestly: "Lucindy, the men won't see about it. There's my own husband—he can drive a bargain, buying or selling, as well as any other man; but when it comes to the public welfare, he wilts. Men are extra modest when it comes to enforcing the law. And now, Prescott's begun to go there. I didn't suppose he could be hired to go in, but I suppose Rachel Beckwith's to blame. No, I won't say that, but they've had a falling out, and you never can tell what will happen in such a case. Lucindy, you may see lonely days, and feel as if you don't belong to anybody, but you won't have to lie awake nights over children's wrong-doings."

"Oh, now, Mis' Grayson," said Miss Pike, soothingly, "Prescott won't get any bad habits. I'd as soon think it of our minister, almost. They say the Super ain't any too strict, and Prescott bein' with him so much, maybe has been there, too; but I wouldn't worry."

"Yes, you would!" said Mrs. Grayson, almost fiercely. "Mothers have a right to. And they have a right to do more than that. That's why I'm going down to talk to Peter Ryan."

Miss Pike looked stealthily at her companion. Apparently she was the same quiet little woman she had always known. "He'll be sassy," she ventured.

"Now, Lucindy," said Mrs. Grayson, thoughtfully, "I wonder if I can make you understand just how I feel. I'm afraid I can't. I'm afraid you haven't read about the Crusaders and all they've been doing out West."

"Yes, I have. My niece sent me the papers last winter. Wasn't it dreadful, the way they went on?"

"Dreadful!" repeated Mrs. Grayson. "It was grand, Lucindy! God was in it. I was sure of that, for while I read my spirit fluttered its wings just as it does when I come to understand one of His great thoughts. Haven't you had that feeling, Lucindy? It's an uplifting that makes your body seem too small for your soul. Well, when I read how those women knelt in the snow and prayed, and sung 'Jesus, lover of my soul,' in the saloons amongst rude and wicked men, I couldn't keep still. I walked back and forth and cried, and said 'Amen!' That was all I could do, being so far away, but I was one of them, just the same. I couldn't understand why I was so exercised, and why I had to go with them in spirit till Peter Ryan came along. Then I knew it was to fit me up to deal with him."

Miss Pike's mental development was in a rudimentary state at best, and she but dimly comprehended her friend's mental and spiritual outlook, but she was wise enough to avoid an argument in which she was sure to be worsted, so she simply said: "Hm! Does your husband, and Prescott, like it?"

Mrs. Grayson's eyes twinkled as she hung up her dish-pan. She understood Miss Pike's mental processes. "Well, Lucindy," she replied, "John doesn't exactly want me to go, but he's resigned. Prescott don't know."

"I expect they'll want hot dinners just the same, though, and I'll come in and open your drafts and put on your potatoes every day, if you'll leave the key under the door-mat," said Miss Pike.

"Every day!" echoed Mrs. Grayson after her neighbor had thrown her shawl over her head and departed. "She talks as if she thought it was going to be a six days' march around my Jericho. I may as well march six days as to sit here at home and think and cry about Prescott. I suppose the Israelitish women sat in their tents and just waited while the men were marching. But if the men won't march—'By faith the walls of Jericho fell down'—'by faith,'" she murmured, "and women have more faith than men."

The next morning after Mrs. Grayson had finished her housework, she took her knitting—a newly begun blue yarn stocking for her husband—drew down the shades, locked the door, hid the key under the door-mat, and started down the garden path. Frost-bitten flower stalks on either side caught her dress as she passed, and she noticed how low one branch of the big maple hung over the gate. There was an empty robin's nest on it, and she found herself calculating how the branch could be trimmed and the nest left untouched. Four Corners was a small village, and off in one direction she could see the closely shorn fields, bare and brown in the December sunshine, and the shivering woods beyond. From Miss Pike's chimney the smoke rose straight upward—sure sign of a "cold spell"; and, as our friend glanced that way, she saw a hand rapidly rubbing the frost-work from a front window, and a gleam of red behind it assured her that Miss Pike, with a well-known little red shawl over her shoulders, was watching her departure. She smiled, and walked on more briskly, for it gave her a pleasant sense of companionship.

As she passed Rachel Beckwith's home she saw the young girl at a south window turning her plants toward the sun. The sight revived all her anxiety and fierce determination. "A girl will smile while a man goes to destruction. What does she care?" she asked herself bitterly; for, in Mrs. Grayson's opinion, Rachel was wholly to blame for the quarrel which had apparently affected Prescott so unhappily. A few minutes later she reached her destination, a low building whose front windows were daubed with white paint, that flimsy vail worn by America's Delilah. With a little prayer for strength and guidance, she went in. Peter Ryan, leaning over an account book, looked up as the door opened, and hastily arose with an expression of surprise.

"Good-morning, Mr. Ryan. I thought I would sit here awhile with my knitting," said Mrs. Grayson—meekest of Crusaders—as she drew an arm-chair forward and sat down. The rumseller recognized his visitor as one of the ladies he had seen going back and forth past his door, and he said with assumed cordiality: "All right, make yourself to home."

Then followed a long silence. He finished his sum in simple addition, washed his tumblers and his counter, drew beer for a small boy to take home in a tin pail, and did not conceal his disgust when two young carpenters came in and quickly retreated at sight of the little woman busily knitting beside the fire.

As the time approached for the noon whistle to release the mill operatives, Mr. Ryan's nervousness increased, and at last he inquired: "Did you have any business with me to-day?"

"Yes, but I was more anxious to see your customers," replied Mrs. Grayson. "You know it's against the law to keep a saloon in this state, and I wondered who you're getting to support you? There isn't much spare money here at Four Corners, and I suppose you know that wives and children go hungry when you take a man's wages for drink." Mrs. Grayson was seaming her husband's hose "two and one," but when she got to the end of a needle she paused and looked into Mr. Ryan's face. Her eyes were singularly clear,—even her husband had found them uncomfortably so just a few times—and Mr. Ryan was startled. It was as though a search-light had been suddenly turned upon his nebulous conscience. "O well! that ain't my lookout," he responded, "I don't oblige 'em to spend their money here."

"I know it," said Mrs. Grayson with a sigh, "but if you wasn't here they wouldn't be tempted."

The whistle blew at exactly twelve o'clock, and a few minutes later came the sound of many footsteps; then the door was thrown open and a dozen men entered. An instant later there was a hush, and several who knew Mrs. Grayson turned and went out with mutterings of surprise and wrath. But one who seemed to be a leader, advanced to the bar and called for drinks, while others gathered around him, their very backs wearing an expression of chagrin. "Havin' company, Peter?" "Started an Old Ladies' Home?" "Do you always hire your knittin' done by the job?" were some of the questions fired across the counter in low tones. Then came other voices less coarse and noisy; and, through the tears which suddenly filled Mrs. Grayson's eyes, she saw the tall, well-dressed man known as the "Super," and with him her boy, Prescott. He did not see her at first, for he was laughing and gesticulating as he told some comical story; but, in the sudden quiet which fell upon his companions, he heard the Super say sneeringly, "A little crusading, is it, Ryan?" Then he turned and saw her.

"Mother!" he came toward her, shocked and sobered. "Why, mother," said he, "you shouldn't be here. Come, I'm going home with you." She threw on her shawl and took his proffered arm, thankfully. He nodded gravely as he passed the men, and they followed him with questioning eyes.

"Have you felt very anxious about me, mother? I didn't know I was hurting you so," Prescott said, after they were half way home. "I've had some trials lately, and it was somebody else I wanted to hurt. It was foolish to act so. I see it now, but I haven't drank, myself, and I won't go in there again. I'll promise you that, mother."

Probably Mrs. Grayson will remember the joy of that hour when she gets home to heaven! To find, after all her doubts and fears that her boy was still worthy of her love and confidence—it was almost too much! She longed to be entirely alone that she might weep for joy. She controlled herself enough to tell him that she believed and trusted him again fully and they were conscious of a new bond of confidence as they walked up the garden path. Miss Pike, who had been having what she called an "upsettin' nervousness" all the forenoon, saw them and clasped her hands thankfully. "She's got him all right and now she'll be satisfied!" she exclaimed.

But Lucinda Pike was mistaken.

All was quiet and joyful through the afternoon and evening, but that night Mrs. Grayson could not sleep. Prescott was safe, O blessed fact! But was she to work only for her own? Was that the spirit of the Crusaders? The cold December winds whistling through the chimneys seemed to bear to her ears the complaining tones of old age, and the cries of little children. She heard, and understood that her work was not finished; but, with the element of personal interest removed—an element which unconsciously underlies much heroic effort—she shrank from its completion.

"And I thought I was with those brave women," she groaned. "Help me, O Lord, to suffer as they suffered for other women's sons! Make me like Him, who, 'for the joy that was set before Him, endured the cross and despised the shame.'"

Then, as she begged for special light and guidance, came the inspiration of her own birthday text in the "Woman's chapter" in Proverbs: "Open thy mouth for the dumb in the cause of all such as are appointed to destruction."

And that became her argument when, in the morning, Prescott and her husband opposed another visit to the saloon. "Ryan was mad yesterday, mother, and if you go to-day I don't know what he may do. Come now, it's no place for you," said Prescott, coaxingly.

"It isn't my choice," replied Mrs. Grayson, "but I shall come under great condemnation if I refuse to go. You know the women who suffer most from this drink business can't speak for themselves. They're dumb. That's why the women out West were called from their nice homes to sing and pray in the streets, I expect. They took the burdens of their sisters upon their shoulders. It's just a year ago since they begun, and I'm going to celebrate the anniversary by opening my 'mouth for the dumb.'"

There was a flushed face and tearful eyes to enforce these tremulous words, and Prescott could only say: "Well, of course I don't understand how you feel, but take care of yourself."

As for Mr. Grayson, he came of old-time Quaker ancestry, and although he did not follow in their footsteps, he had great regard for the "inner light," and dared not question his wife's decision.

That day Mrs. Grayson took her Bible and some newspaper clippings in her bag, and afterward confessed that she gave Peter Ryan "a course of reading." Some one who went to the saloon door but did not enter, said he heard her praying, and went away on tiptoe. The men who ventured in after mill hours began to see something mysterious in the calm-faced woman who sat there with her "everlastin' knittin'" as they said. They knew nothing of Dickens' weird woman in his "Tale of Two Cities," who was day after day knitting in fatal stitches the Commune victims, but they were disturbed, nevertheless, by the click of those innocent needles. Knitting-work in a saloon! The woman and all her belongings were manifestly out of place.

That day men and boys were at the window behind her, looking in. Several women, with anxious, beseeching eyes came and warmed their hands at the stove; and the air grew heavy with vague curiosity.

"Peter Ryan looks as if he'd been sick a week," said one of the men when, on the third morning, Mrs. Grayson entered the saloon.

*A true incident in Maine.

"It's terrible wearin', entertainin' comp'ny so long," said another. "My woman says for to put the law on Peter Ryan, so Mis' Grayson can go home," added a third.

But the Four Corners' men were very peculiar in that they looked upon law as a last resort, especially when a rumseller was under consideration! Hence this motion was not seconded.

That day seemed very long to the lone Crusader, for, although her spirit was still strong her body was weary, and Peter Ryan's restlessness was nerve-wearing. She was given no message to add to those of the previous day, so sat knitting and thinking, while outside the snow fell steadily. At dusk she finished the blue stocking, rolled it up and put it in her bag.

"Well, Peter Ryan," said she, "I am going home. To-morrow is Christmas, you know, and I shall not trouble you again until next week. The men will be out of the mill, and they'll probably come here to celebrate the day. But remember when you pour the beer and the whisky that it is the birthday of the Christ who came to save the world—to save you, Peter Ryan, if you'll let Him. And He'll be here—be sure of that—if I can't be. Good-night."

She heard no response, and, closing the door softly, she nade her way up the hill through the storm. The day's work was not yet over, however, for what Yankee housewife is ready for Christmas without pies in her larder? Mrs. Grayson's mince-meat had been prepared at "Thanksgiving time," and a stone jar of it was slowly thawing beside the kitchen fire, which John had brought to a fine baking heat according to previous arrangement. So, after tea, her work-dress was donned, and she mixed, rolled, spiced and tasted, briskly working and talking, while her husband sat with his chair tipped back and his thumbs crossed, enjoying the spicy odors which filled the kitchen as a child enjoys lunch "between meals." At nine o'clock he yawned and said: "You might's well give it up, Sarah; that saloon's stronger'n you be," then wound the clock and went to bed; and at ten, Prescott came in to find his mother preparing a fine turkey for the morrow's roasting.

"Mother," said he, shaking the snow from his overcoat, and turning a bright face toward her, "Rachel and I are good friends again. It was all a misunderstanding, and she's just found it out. She heard that I went to Ryan's with the Super to drink." There was a glad ring in his tones, and his laugh seemed to say: "How could she believe that?"

It was after midnight before Mrs. Grayson sought her pillow, and she was still talking to Peter Ryan, talking and knitting in her dreams, when she heard Prescott's voice as he rapped vigorously upon her door. "Mother, mother! Peter Ryan has cleared out; the milkman just told me. He moved his goods in the night, and the door's unfastened and everything empty this morning. Wish you 'Merry Christmas!'"

Mrs. Grayson covered her face and cried: "Could it be possible that the walls of her Jericho had fallen? Oh, what a reward for her feeble efforts!" "Well," she whispered to herself, "I guess the Crusaders didn't weep when they got their hearts' desire." But possibly her tears of joy were only another proof that she belonged to that glorious sisterhood. When, a little later, she opened an outer door, she saw a glorified landscape.

Miss Pike came out with an old broom to sweep her path. She too had heard the news, and waved her broom exultingly. "I do know about the Crusaders," she shouted, "and I was provoked with you yesterday and day before that. But I take it all back. I'm glad you went. I'm glad there's one woman in Four Corners that ain't afraid." Mrs. Grayson nodded and waved her hand.

Her heart was full of adoration, for the struggle was over, and she could join as never before in the Christmas song: Glory to God in the highest, on earth peace, good will to men.

Willimantic, Conn.

AFTER TWENTY YEARS.

BY MARY T. LATHRAP.

TWENTY years since the bell outrung—
Twenty years since the song was sung,
Twenty years since the tainted air—
Of the hall of death—
With its poison breath—
Its drunken revel, and fell despair,
Was smitten through by a woman's prayer;
When love and pain under holy spell,
Asked for their own at the doors of hell.

Beside the milestone where our forces pause to-day, stand with us both Memory and Prophecy. The hosts of reform called out by the spiritual tocsin of the Crusade, and held together by a great purpose, must after two decades feel the power of change. Bright heads are crowned with gray, young faces sobered by the touch of time; glad, hopeful eyes have deepened with the severity of the conflict, or the heart sickness of hope deferred; and ranks, however bravely filled by later comers, seem sadly thin as we count.

"The noble, great ones, gone!" What though the hope of immortality stirs our souls, that we know they dwell in fairer regions and in their joy rejoice? Still the battle seems a little sterner set since they are off the field, and between us and them lies that silence across which life's common language may not reach. What wonder then that memory, mute-lipped and tender-eyed, holds our hearts in thrall as, pausing, we look back over the way of the years?

A sadder thing must memory note, that some have withdrawn from a yet unfinished battle, and camp to-day on the ground of ease or compromise.

Crusaders of '73, afraid of the stern issue they themselves raised, in its logical outcome in '93. Leaders of '73, whose trumpet-call to the defence of principles not yet victorious, rang across the world, silent and inactive in '93. Comrades of '73, pledged in a fight to the finish, for "God and Home and Native Land," out of the ranks in '93, or doing dress-parade duty on non-combative ground. Time makes savage analysis of character, and develops or rots the fibre of it, according to quality.

The farewells to our faithful dead are jubilant peans, compared with those spoken to such as falter in danger, or betray by any stress of temptation, a cause like that for which the white ribbon is a token.

At our stone of remembrance this year, let a great prayer ascend for a call as divine and clear, a separation as complete, daring and unselfish, and a purpose as single and definite, as gave to us this anniversary. Memory sings out of the past:

Moved by loving and stung by pain,
Poor with losses, from vigils vain—
Swift from the homes whence light had fled,
Where hope was smitten, and love lay dead—
Women bereft went out to cry
In the ear of the world as it trampled by:
"We've watched and tended, have loved and prayed,
But stronger than we are the snares they laid.
To a guilty nation we now make moan
And seek at the doors of hell our own."

This is the issue and the battle-cry which lying on the hushed lips of memory, is taken up by the thrilling voice of Prophecy as she looks on the future into which our cause is leading, and our feet must go.

It may be counted a providence that the anniversary of the Crusade is so near the blessed Christmas time when the heart of the world grows glad over the birth of the greatest Reformer of the ages, and the only Saviour of men. Some things we may well study anew, since they will help us to a prophetic outlook for the temperance reform, and to the right qualities in those who are its leaders.

Jesus as a reformer, had faith in His mission. He did not succeed as men count success. He won no honors, wore no crowns. The only crowds that thronged Him were those who needed His mercy and these brought no credit to the movement, but He welcomed such to His kingdom since His mission was to "seek and save the lost."

Jesus was devoted to His Father's will. When it brought Him to the shadows of the garden and the unspeakable gloom of the cross, that devotion never faltered. "He gave himself a ransom for many." Jesus was faithful unto death. Nothing allured or discouraged; greater than the world for which He died, greater even than His divine personality was the unseen kingdom whose foundations He established. The shadow of the cross fell over all ways He trod, but He went on to the end and "finished His work."

Jesus was victorious. It did not look so at Calvary, but light fell clear on Olivet when He said, "All power is given unto me," and entered upon His glory. To-day the thrones of evil tremble because He reigns, and all things move to His universal dominion. Since Christ marked this path every reformer has followed it, or failed. To be Christlike is the only way of success in moral effort. The law of victory for the reform, as for the reformer, is of the greatest moment to those pledged to the world's uplifting on any great and general way.

Standing where the past and future meet, we may well rejoice at some of the winnings of twenty years. Total abstinence and prohibition, as principles, have been weighed in the balances, and tried in the fires of science and statesmanship, and have stood the test. They have come into the arena of logical debate, and no voice has been able to overthrow them. The only argument opposed is that of appetite and selfishness, and the nation's choice for bloom or blight lies between these and the truth.

The church, the home and the public school have been permeated with right thinking and true science on these great questions. Enough of the people know the truth to make either inaction or complicity with the wrong henceforth a sin. The reformers who have pushed these great principles to the front have made themselves worthy of a hearing by those who mean to obey the truth, and worthy of persecution by their enemies. The temperance reform has won its martyrs. They lie in graves where the licensed liquor traffic sent them, and to the shame of state and nation, their unavenged blood cries yet to heaven, while their murderers walk abroad unwhipped of Justice. But a government which allows truth to be slain in the streets, faces the future and the inevitable righteousness of God.

The W. C. T. U. has won a name, which has gone to the ends of the earth a synonym for whatsoever is pure, and has translated its high principles into the languages of the world. The W. C. T. U. has developed a rounded, earnest womanhood, and brought to worthy fame some of the best known women of to-day, while its leader easily stands preëminent in the place she holds and the work she has done for her country and her time.

All this being true, we should look for near tokens of ultimate victory. But they do not appear. The truths admitted by the brain and conscience of the nation do not get into its laws nor direct its statesmanship. The blood of souls yet stains the gold of her revenues. The actual revolt of Iowa Republicanism from the law and principle of prohibition outlines the future policy of that great division of citizens; and the fact that bishops and brewers both rejoice in the triumph of that party which thus throws off obligation to this greatest of questions is but a token of the moral obstinacy abroad. But

That cry rings on and it will not cease!
On our borders will never again be peace.
The voice of warning has come abroad,
The time grows ripe for the hour of God.

What then, says Prophecy, at the gateways swinging across the path of twenty years? This—righteous principles can never be defeated or overthrown.

When such principles are revealed to nations they form, if accepted, the basis of progress; if rejected, the ground of judgment. Compromise with evil always brings disaster; it has builded the tombs and written the epitaphs of the nations, and will while truth is truth. Well may this republic pause amid her starving and unemployed millions, and ask for diviner reasons than administrations, tariffs and silver bills for her confused councils, financial panics and industrial disasters. Back of them all God reigns, and when mischief is framed into statutes, and thrones of iniquity built by law, but one of two results can follow: "Repentance unto righteousness," or "Wrath unto retribution!"

The vital question of the hour for our pledged host is this: Have we in any way missed the path, divinely opened? Can we yet be trusted with the great principles so long defended? Every true reform is borne on by two lines of forces—the subjective and the objective. The subjective forces are the great, eternal, underlying truths by which it exists, through which it conquers, because of which it must be. These are first. Nothing should cloud them; no interest, no personality should divide honors or contest with them for the first place. Every voice should be but their messenger; every worker their servant, every trumpet their battle call. Principles define the cause; the cause is beyond all it creates.

The objective forces are the methods by which the reform is carried on, the interests built up, in greater or less wisdom, to advance it. These often express the reformer more than the reform, and may hinder rather than help the advance of principles. After twenty years the objective forces are the things to be guarded, lest they overtop, in what they ask of time and energy, the real thing involved.

It takes courage and faith to stand for principles where they seem to make no progress but wait silent as the "Sphinx in Egypt sands." Workers long to show results, to say to the world: See what has been achieved! They are often unwilling to wait the triumph of conviction wrought by the Spirit of God. Here lies the danger. We need a return to more spiritual weapons, a new consecration to principles which alone are eternal and triumphant. The curse is yet upon us; conscience sleeps, evil is abroad, and the God of Nations at the door. We must get right or be punished.

Set the trumpet to thy lips, O watcher,
Who heard the voice divine;
Blow one clear strain to rouse the souls that slumber
This is an evil time.

Set the trumpet to thy lip, O watcher!
Cry out across the night;
Stay by the truth, wherever it may lead thee,
At last 'tis crowned in light.

Set the trumpet to thy lip, O watcher;
Speak all thy soul hath known;
Fear not, for in the stress of any battle,
God watches o'er His own.

A CHRISTMAS PRAYER.

LORD, for the lonely heart
I pray apart.
Now, for the son of sorrow
Whom this to-morrow
Rejoiceth not, O Lord,
Hear my weak word.

For lives too bitter to be borne,
For the tempted and the torn,
For the prisoner in the cell,
For the shame lip doth not tell,
For the haggard suicide,
Peace, peace, this Christmastide!

Into the desert, trod
By the long sick, O God;
Into the patient gloom
Of that small room
Where lies the child of pain—
Of all neglected most—be fain
To enter, healing, and remain.

Now, at the fall of day,
I bow and pray
For those who cannot sleep,
A watch I keep.
Oh, let the starving brain
Be fed and fed again;
At thy behest
The tortured nerve find rest.

I see the vacant chair.
Father of souls, prepare
My poor thought's feeble power
To plead this hour:
For the empty, aching home
Where the silent footsteps come,
Where the unseen face looks on,
Where the hand-clasp is not felt,
Where the dearest eyes are gone,
Where the portrait on the wall
Stirs and struggles as to speak,
Where the light breath from the hall
Calls the color to the cheek,
Where the voice breaks in the hymn
When the sunset burneth dim,
Where the late, large tear will start,
Frozen by the broken heart,
Where the lesson is to learn
How to live, to grieve, to yearn,
How to bear and how to bow.
Oh, the Christmas that is fled!
Lord of living and of dead,
Comfort THOU!

RAILROAD TIES.

BY JOHN G. WOOLLEY.

CHRISTMAS and Crusade, did you say? . . . . . Judean hills running music in rivulets, God speaking to magi by a new star, to shepherds by angels singing, and to placid oxen, dumb but not insensible, by a baby's cry; and the song was—"Glory to God in the highest, on earth peace, good will to men," and what the cry meant no man knew.

Then Herod and Judas and Pilate—and nineteen hundred years!

A little company of women weeping, praying, and silently grieving in a church—a "white cap," faith-lit—in a flat, black ocean of woman's agony; and, ravening and devouring in all the ways, saloons,—right by the law of a Christian land! . . . . sobs on the street and tears falling—on the ground, mothers and wives kneeling on damp flags, in front of drinkshops, and oh, pitiful! singing!

Then Frances Willard and her two hundred thousand—organization, toil, treachery, triumph—then—Lady Henry Somerset!

And now you say, "Send something about Christmas and the Crusade in the spirit of both." What an order! Are the Christmas-Christ and the Crusade-Christ the same? How is it then, that in no place in all this world will Christmas day be celebrated so uniformly in this year of grace, as in the two hundred and fifty thousand saloons of this Christian land? Tons on tons of pine and holly are already ordered and in transit to them, to trim the bar, mirrors and chandeliers withal, and miles of Christmas mottoes are already made and making for their walls and windows—for this is the dramseller's harvest, and for his sake—and ours who take his "first fruits" for the treasury, and the last for the gutter, almshouse, jail and potter's field—in many a life, this Christmas eve and Christmas night will be twin monster shames, the end in suicide and silence of many a gallant struggle of a manful year. In millions of homes the bells will toll for Christmas hopes dead, and Jesus' name be coarsest blasphemy, and the sweet eve will cling about dead love like rotten velvet on an old coffin.

Mercy! Is there a Christ of the saloon?

God keep us, yes; and He is great and powerful. "In His hands are all the corners of the earth;" he lives in capitols, churches, palaces and sweet, safe homes; has wife and child; makes himself rich and of reputation; him, the saloons celebrate.

O sisters, Crusaders, gird yourselves again, and out into the sad streets fare. Stop not at the saloon, but on your knees before the Christian voter's home, kneel down and pray. Go to the Christian governor of the Crusade state, by more than eighty thousand good men's surplus votes returned to power and the foremost place of those who wait at Fame's great door. He hates the saloon, but it rejoices in him. I think if he could see the face of Mother Thompson kneeling at his door, patient and beautiful, glorified in prayer, pleading for the sake of Mary's Son for help—or at least a word of cheer—he would scorn the coward shifts and waitings of the politician and be a self-elected, royal man. When poverty and cruel loss and perfidy would have swamped him, only just now, the people quietly came about him and saved his home and his good name and made him rich beyond his wildest dreams in stuff immutable into coin, and to which no stamp adds any value—true civic faith and love. Tell him how the saloons rob and wreck and kill in all the land, and—pray, pray, pray! He dare not scorn you. Would he be brave enough to take your flag and carry it? God knows! but whatever the event your reward is sure.

In "'74" I saw my mother kneeling in the snow to pray at a saloon-door, and I crept out by a side way, stepping softly in the sawdust, ashamed—of her. That day's work caused her life, and the saloon not even paused, and her only child sped downward to the hell of drunkenness;—but that snow-set prayer persisted at God's throne through thirteen awful years, and for her importunity He could but always hear, and when I "would" He spoke to me; and speaks—and will speak on—and on—until on some sweet Christmas eve I find my mother's arms again, and leaning on her great heart celebrate the end of the Crusade.

A CHRISTMAS CRUSADE.

BY LILIAN WHITING.

IT is more than accident or chance when certain things happen at the same time and link themselves together. It is the outward sign of the inward leading, the visible token of that constant, invisible guidance of the attendant angels who "have charge concerning us."

This reflection is "borne in upon me," as our Quaker friends would say, this morning by the coincidence that just as I sat down to my desk to write something that should recall that marvelous Crusade of 1873 which inaugurated the potent movement of the W. C. T. U., I should take up a paper containing the letter written by that noble man, General Armstrong, found with his will, in which he says:

"A work that requires no sacrifices does not count for much in fulfilling God's plan. But what is commonly called sacrifice is really the best natural use of one's self and one's resources—the best investment of one's time, strength and means. He who makes no such sacrifice is most to be pitied. . . . . Prayer is the greatest power in the world; it keeps us near to God."

It impresses me as more than a coincidence that I should have fallen upon these words which are capable of so wide an interpretation, and which are as true of the great crusade for temperance as they are of General Armstrong's great work for the freedmen and the Indian; that what is commonly called sacrifice is really the best natural use of ourselves and our resources—the best investment of time, strength and means, is one of the great spiritual truths of life. We have all heard much of the beauty and the holiness of sacrifice; but it is a quality whose measure is far beyond any mere rhetorical phrasing. It is the unknown quantity, the unguessed possibility that may, at any hour, transfigure life and illumine the most ordinary experience.

It was in this spontaneous sacrifice that the Crusade touched greatness. No woman paused to count the cost. It was the living coal that she laid upon the altar. Her courage, her swift spiritual energy, her vision that discerned the nobler ideal of humanity, her faith in simple means to that end, were all in that spontaneous uprising. It was sowing the grain of mustard seed, and its growth has been as marvelous as that instanced in the parable.

That Christmas Crusade may well make itself the point of departure in our thoughts this Christmas-tide. A crusade against a specific sin, or against many sins; or the more positive aspect of a crusade to conquer beautiful and noble qualities of character,—in each and all these aspects it appeals to us.

And the latter is the greater and includes all others. Conquer divineness, achieve spirituality, and life adjusts itself to a new center. Achieve love and all hatred, envy and malice vanish of themselves. Accept service to humanity as a condition of completer life and burdens grow easy. This atmosphere of love should proceed from each one of us as fragrance from a rose. A crusade against all *un*lovingness would be the spiritual counterpart of that memorable one against intemperance. Nor is it difficult to cultivate this power of being glad in the gladness of others, of entering into the interests of each and all with a genuine sympathy. It is no particular merit to love the members of our own famiiy, or our particular friends and associates. Extend it to the maid who is caring for your room, the saleswoman who waits on you over the counter, the conductor who takes your fare in the street cars. By a look, a word, a smile, you may radiate cheerfulness if not happiness.

"I am afraid I disturb you to put your rooms in order while you are in," remarks Mitty, the maid, to you.

"Not at all," you reply; "I like to have you here, Mitty." And the chord of their mutual humanity is struck between mistress and maid, and Mitty does her work with a new feeling, a new self-respect, and added faithfulness because of this sympathetic recognition.

"Would you care for this paper or magazine?" as may be, you ask the conductor as you leave the street car, and nine times out of ten he is gladdened and cheered by the thought. The word, the smile, the spirit of sympathetic recognition carried into shopping, smooths away friction and impatience.

It is an essential factor in a Christian womanhood to so live and to so meet each and every one, in all the various relations of service or trade or social encounter, or friendship, as to diffuse this constant magnetism of good will and good cheer. And giving it, you have it; dividing it, you multiply it. Ever does the miracle of the loaves and the fishes repeat itself in daily life. It is not alone at the altar that we take the sacramental bread and wine. It is not only there that we fulfill the command, "Do this in remembrance of Me." But each time that we repress the impatient word, that we hold in check the selfish impulse, that we give the loving thought, the glad recognition, the generous encouragement, we do these in remembrance of Him. This is the daily sacrament of life whereby we grow into that divineness which is not merely a privilege or a possibility, but the personal responsibility of each man and woman.

Shall we not trace the direct relation between Christianity and Christmas? The connection between the gift-making season and the peace of mind, good-will toward others, meekness of heart and sweetness of spirit that puts always the best (not the worst) construction upon words and deeds, and the largeness of mind that thinketh no evil? The season should not be the specialty of the rich and the penalty of the poor. The spiritual festival should not be submerged in the material expression. Behind the gift let there be the gladness. Give gifts if you will and can, but above all give love, give faith, give hospitality of spirit. Forgive the hasty word, the imperfect deed, and hold the one who gave it in such sweet belief of perfect love that he is lifted forever above the lower plane of impatience and ill-feeling. Love, believing love, is the most priceless of Christmas gifts.

The Crusade for divineness will not be a fruitless quest or effort. To achieve it in some measure and in an increasing degree is always possible. Because in this divineness is the true atmosphere of the spirit. It is the life we were intended to live—the assertion of the higher over the lower.

"What is the harvest of thy saints—
O God! who dost abide?
When grow the garlands of thy chiefs
In blood and sorrow dyed?
What have thy servants for their pains?
This only, to have tried!"

Is not this the Christmas Crusade to which we are now called; that which shall say, "Sacrifice is the best use of one's self and one's resources; the best investment of one's time, strength and measure," and which feels that prayer "is the greatest power in the world"—keeping us close to God?

To achieve spirituality is to achieve that potent energy which transfigures life, and which creates for us that atmosphere of love, of magnetism that makes all anew.

Shall not this be our Holy Grail—our Christmas Crusade?

"THE SALOON-KEEPERS HEARD HER."

BY ELIZABETH WHEELER ANDREW.

THAT was an interesting incident of the recent National Convention when just after presenting our honored First Crusader, Mother Thompson, with the adjuration from the presiding officer to profound silence that all might hear her, Mother Stewart, the white-haired veteran, sitting just behind, interjected:

"The saloon-keepers heard her!" and

"Aye, they did!" rang out from a fraternal delegate with hearty British fervor. As I sat there listening to the undaunted tones of our gentle leader, my thoughts kept traveling on the lines suggested by Mother Stewart's exclamation and supplemented by our English sister.

"MOTHER THOMPSON"—IN HER 78TH YEAR.

Yes, "the saloon-keepers heard her," when she struck the first notes of that mighty diapason which to their death-dealing trade meant destruction, but to the world of lost humanity meant life and peace. Those were deep notes from the very heart of God Himself to go on echoing around the world, as they have done.

Witness the development of a great organization in the home land; the raising up of leaders; the evolution of nearly forty departments of work; recognition and opportunity afforded for countless individual gifts and activities.

Witness over twelve millions of children brought under scientific temperance instruction in the public schools of America, with gathering numbers in other lands. See the children enrolled also in the Loyal Temperance Legions and Bands of Hope in many countries to an army of over two hundred and fifty thousand. Hear the echoes of the Crusade as 3,000 little folks came marching down the streets of Chicago to the laying of the Temple corner-stone, singing: "The saloons, the saloons, the saloons must go."

Witness the outcome of that crucial beginning in the majesty of the Temple itself, with its soul-saving work in Willard Hall, and all its varied beneficences in process of full development.

Witness the triumph of medical science and skill without the aid of alcoholics in our National Temperance Hospital —a light to the whole world.

Witness the vast growth of our publishing interests; THE UNION SIGNAL spreading its banner over fifty countries and all the special literature to meet the needs of the various phases of the work.

Pass over the seas and behold the gathering ranks of noble women in more than forty countries of the earth, all bound together in the same consecrated sisterhood, and following out the same general lines of work. Witness that lovely group of sixty Y's at the Huguenot Seminary, in Wellington, South Africa, rising to welcome us round-the-world missionaries with the Chautauqua salute, and singing:

"There are bands of ribbon white
Around the world, around the world."

Witness the mute eloquence of that bronze bell from Japan, hanging in our W. C. T. U. exhibit all summer at the World's Fair, which tells of the thousands of tobacco pipes voluntarily surrendered by the men of the Sunrise Land in response to Mary Allen West's earnest appeals and arguments against narcotic poisons.

Who can tell the story? Echoes of it come floating in upon me from England, Canada, Africa, Australasia, India, Ceylon, Burmah, China, and the islands of the seas; expression fails; I can only bow my head in deepest thankfulness to God. A blessed cloud of witnesses to the power of the Crusade! for the Crusade held all in its heart, being sent out from the heart of Love Eternal.

HILLSBORO CRUSADE SKETCHES.
XX.

BY ELIZA J. THOMPSON.

A BAD vow is better broken than kept, 'tis said, therefore, at the earnest request of many friends (your editors included), I have agreed to pass the final chapters of the "Hillsboro Crusade Sketches" through THE UNION SIGNAL.

The unexpected changes in the tenor of the Woman's Christian Temperance work, at the different eras of the dispensation that came upon them December, 1873, afford proof positive of the divinity of its origin. No finite mind could have inspired the persistence and guided the ever varied tactics developed in this society of women, young and old, having its origin in the simple faith that God would do for them what they could not do for themselves, if they would obey His voice and walk according to the leadings of His spirit.

When the time came in our town for the Crusaders to decide upon a change of policy regarding their temperance work, special prayer was resorted to and passages of Scripture as definitely as the "pillar of fire by night and of cloud by day," directed them. The zeal of the women sought new outlets; speakers of note and influence from abroad were invited, and series of meetings held, causing an increase of interest in the community; and the constancy with which the regular weekly services were persevered in silenced all doubts as to the stability of the cause, or the intentions of "these invincible women!"

About the first of February, 1887, the ministers of the town, the "Murphy Men," the "Young Men's League," and other good temperance voters circulated a petition asking the common council to provide for a special election at which the electors of the city might be granted the privilege of voting for or against the liquor traffic under the local option clause of the Dow law.

Two hundred signatures of qualified voters were obtained and the petition was presented on February 7. The city council at first refused to grant the petition, but under strong pressure of public sentiment this action was reconsidered, and the election set for March 14, 1887.

At a meeting of the W. C. T. U. upon Monday, February 21, after most earnest devotional exercises, the subject of so much interest took possession of all hearts, and questions of aid without hindering caused much anxious discussion. Finally it was proposed that the ladies should furnish a free lunch to be served in the city hall, above the voting place on election day, provided the leading temperance men approved the plan. Another general meeting of the women was appointed to be held in the M. E. church on the following Saturday afternoon, March 5, and a general invitation issued to the ladies of the county to join them.

The committee in power, through the committee of ladies appointed at a former meeting to confer with them, signified their thanks and hearty approval. At once the women set their hospitable designs to work by the appointment of five most efficient workers as a "committee of trust," as to them was assigned the important obligation of selecting the serving committee, whose duty it should be to serve the tables at the hours assigned during the day, from nine o'clock a. m. to five p. m.

A meeting of citizens of all faiths, religious and political, was called for Saturday evening, the 26th, in city hall by the ministers of all the churches and the signatures of thirty-three prominent citizens. This meeting was held in the parlor of the Young Men's League in the M. E. church on the evening of the 22d, and, by the way, this association of non-partisan, non-sectarian young men formed a most hopeful feature of our community. They owed their origin to the zeal and conservative spirit of the Rev. Davis W. Clark, son of Bishop Clark (deceased), and pastor of the M. E. church of this place at that time. He took a most active part in this contest, and was urged to write up the marvelous victory for prohibition in this Crusade town. From his account of things we make some quotations for the benefit of those interested.

Speaking of the meeting that was held on Saturday evening, February 26, in city hall, he says: "Hon. J. H. Thompson was called to the chair. To him belongs the honor, not only of making an admirable opening address, but of having uttered a prophecy of victory, which had literal fulfillment. Dr. W. J. McSurely, of Crusade fame, followed in a forcible speech." An executive committee was appointed to have charge of the campaign. Mass-meetings now followed in quick succession, and were sustained by the best talent of this and neighboring communities.

On Tuesday evening, 10th, by invitation of the men's executive committee, the Young Men's League held a remarkable meeting in Armory Hall. Over one hundred young men fell into line, and with J. M. Hughy for captain, and to the inspiring tap of the drum corps they paraded the streets. This demonstration produced a profound sensation. It seemed a mute but eloquent appeal. They were the class most endangered by the existence of the saloon. When the brave "League boys" filed into the hall and took the seats reserved for them, they received a perfect ovation from the immense audience.

On the Sabbath preceding the election the pulpits rang out with no uncertain sound. Rev. J. W. Joyce, D. D., (since bishop), arrived from Cincinnati, on Saturday evening by special invitation, and as the News Herald has it, "He preached on the subject of temperance at the M. E. church, both morning and evening, and talked on the same subject at Armory Hall in the afternoon. He was greeted with immense and enthusiastic audiences at each meeting. Rev. Davis W. Clark says:

Our movement was preëminently religious. The affair had its inception in a meeting of ministers and under the roof of a church. All public meetings opened with prayer, and closed with doxology and benediction. It was a minister's voice in the closing hours of our struggle that called into line the last straggler. The cry of the Crusade may not have been audibly uttered, but it certainly kept ringing in the conscience, "The Lord wills it." The spontaneous praise service was an appropriate conclusion to the campaign.

Any account of our recent struggle omitting to mention the share of the consecrated women in it, would be sadly defective. They did everything but vote. They made personal appeals, and were instant in prayer.

The local union of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union formed a happy nucleus, around which the elect ladies gathered, thus again proving itself a providential agency. Next to the church we esteem the Woman's Christian Temperance Union the most thoroughly organized and efficient philanthropic society of our times.

A continuous prayer-meeting, March 14, 1887, in the M. E. Church was held in support of the efforts at the polls, and the lunch at the city hall was free to all voters! Of this meeting our secretary, Mrs. Maggie L. Gregg, says:

There was a Presence whose manifestations and influence could be felt upon entering the room. The "God of Jacob" in whom the old Crusaders trusted and into whose ear the prayers of thousands of women have been received in the past thirteen years, was there whispering the assuring words: "Said I not, if thou wouldst believe thou shouldst see the glory of God."

The polls closed at five o'clock, and as we lingered to hear the last report it was proposed that when our victory should be assured the bells must ring out the praise of God, beginning with a few taps from the bell of the "Old Crusade Church!" As the crowd dispersed an announcement was made by the ministers for a praise meeting at 7:30 in the M. E. Church. And thus the hilariousness of the people found a glorious channel in songs of victory and prayers of thanksgiving.

EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

A Trumpet Call from the "Chieftain."

BELOVED COMRADES:—We have come a long way in twenty years; the prayer and plea of the Crusade have been transformed into the purpose and plan of the white-ribbon army. They who deem this change a loss know little of the correlation of forces in the Kingdom of God. It is a thing as holy to dedicate the intellect's utmost ingenuity to the cause of a pure life and a protected home as it was to breathe out one's soul in the circle of the "praying band," saying, "How long, O Lord, how long?"

If ever Christian women had a "campaign of education" the last twenty years have witnessed it, and the Woman's Christian Temperance Union has been the school where they have received no small portion of the teaching they required. Before the Crusade they were patriots; now they are intelligent patriots; before the Crusade they were Christians; now they have learned a little about that famous phrase, "Christianity applied." If I were asked the very best result for humanity that is the outcome of these years of prayer and work, I should say it is the arrest of thought that has come to Christian women concerning their duty to obtain the ballot and to use it as a weapon for the protection of their homes from the curse of the saloon, the gambling house and the haunt of infamy.

It was the sacred fire carried to New Zealand by Mrs. Mary Clement Leavitt and Miss Jessie Ackermann that kindled in the hearts of white-ribboners, enrolled under our flag away yonder in New Zealand, the enthusiasm that led them to circulate petitions and "work up" a movement that has resulted in securing complete enfranchisement for women in that country. To-day the great enlightened, free-hearted young Commonwealth of Colorado has emancipated its women. Wherever on the round earth women have combined to throw off the shackles of ignorance, prejudice and worn-out conservatism and to rise in the dignity and strength of intelligent patriotism and every-day Christianity, there the white flag is at the front, inscribed "For God and Home and Native Land."

December 23, 1893, ought to be the greatest Crusade celebration that we have ever known; twenty trustful, teachable years of torch-bearing have come and gone, our hands are not yet wearied, the flame burns bright and clear, and "Signals" gleam from peak to peak; "there are bands of ribbon white around the world." The great cause of Purity to which we have dedicated "our lives, our fortunes and our sacred honor" embraces total abstinence, prohibition, and the emancipation of "white slaves"; and this declaration of independence is read in letters of light at the camp-fires of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union around the whole wide earth to-day.

Whoever lifts a woman up to the level of a self-poised, self-respecting independence with an honorable bread-winning weapon in her hand has recruited one more soldier against the huge embattled host of blighting self-indulgence, whose war-cry "wine and women" has echoed through long centuries of degradation, and will never cease until the mother and child become central figures of a civilization founded at the cradle in Bethlehem. The world needs mothering; no other power can still its pitiful lament. The best men feel this most, the men whose natures, like those of the Master Himself, illustrate the highest qualities in the character of man and woman. These men are becoming mighty in the councils of nations, churches, scientists, scholars and journalists; they are the leaders in the great new host of organized labor. Beyond belief has the great cause strengthened since December 23, 1873.

Let us thank God and take courage, remembering the tender womanliness and the undaunted bravery of those great-hearts who bore the brunt of that bloodless battle, when in fifty days the dramshops were routed "horse, foot and dragoons" out of two hundred and fifty towns and villages. Let us thank God that such women as these have lived and died in the Holy Name of Him whose Gospel alone could inspire such heroism; let us dedicate ourselves to the cause of His enthronement whose right it is to reign not only in the hearts but in the homes of the nation, the customs of society, and the laws of the land.

Crusade day will be celebrated throughout England; may the flames of its camp-fires encircle that great land of the Crusade's nativity which is the Gospel's promise, the world's hope, the coming of the dawn.

A NEW CRUSADE BY THE PREACHERS.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—Not long after the publication of the Minneapolis mayor's saloon policy in the Journal, referred to in THE UNION SIGNAL of December 7, the Crusaders against Sunday opening called upon the ministers to aid them in enforcing the law. As a preliminary step, the ministers appointed a committee to invite the mayor to a conference in which it was proposed to give his honor a fair hearing and an opportunity to defend his position.

To this Mayor Eustis cordially consented, and at the appointed time met some thirty ministers of various evangelical denominations, and for about forty-five minutes spoke upon many points, but somehow failed to mention the Sunday closing issue. He told the ministers they were the leaders in morality—meaning, probably, moral sentiment—and that he should deem it a calamity should ministers and mayor misunderstand each other and get at loggerheads over this great work.

On the saloon question he said: "In discussing the saloon as an evil we should not lose sight of other evils and push the saloon into too great prominence. Hitherto we have had only two kinds of administration—a wide open one, and a closed one. In the former, the tough element was in full control, and in the latter the ministers and moral men arrayed themselves against the saloons, and much bitterness and strife resulted."

The mayor here signified his willingness to answer any questions the ministers might desire to ask, whereupon Rev. Wayland Hoyt promptly inquired: "Why, if it was possible to close the saloons at midnight, it was not possible to close them on Sunday? Why was the mayor not enforcing the Sunday law?" To which the mayor made the following remarkable reply: "There are two great kinds of law, those of God and of man. I look at these questions in a broad light. The selling of liquor in this community to minors is against the laws of God as well as against the laws of man, so is the selling to drunkards. The selling on Sunday is not in the same category, and I have not yet seen the necessity for enforcing the law."

The following Sabbath the mayor and the Sunday saloons was the topic in most of the leading pulpits, at least eleven ministers directing their discourse towards it. Speaking with all charity towards the man, they hesitated not to speak out boldly in defence of the law and the necessity of enforcing it. Because they felt deeply, they used forcible language. Dr. Holman, of Hennepin Ave. M. E. church, a pronounced Prohibitionist, and a man who never minces his words, asked: "What law is sacred, if his honor, the mayor, can single it out? It is not his duty to interpret the law, or to frame it, but to enforce it. The worst anarchist who makes bombs in Chicago is no more dangerous to the community than is this man who refuses to enforce the laws of the city."

Dr. Wayland Hoyt, of the First Baptist church, said the mayor had conducted himself manfully on all points at the conference save one, the Sunday saloon. The attitude of the mayor toward this law would breed a spirit of contempt for all laws. The mayor declined to execute the law. If his honor would not act, it was the highest and noblest patriotism on the part of the citizen to investigate, secure evidence and move against the saloons through the courts.

Rev. O. R. Jenks, of the North Minneapolis Advent church, said: "The administration is under solemn oath to close the saloons on Sunday. If the aldermen and mayor neglect or refuse to do so, they break their oath of office. Christian voters ought to demand that the laws be enforced." Others were fully as outspoken.

Rev. W. J. Shannon, of the Church of Christ, was right when he said in his sermon: "We believe the mayor is misled as to public opinion. Ten thousand homes are against the saloon, but they are silent, or only weeping in shame and seclusion over the drunken wrecks in them. Ten thousand business men are against it, but they are attending to business. Meantime a few hundred brewers and saloon-keepers hobbing and nobbing with a little nest of dirty politicians are making all the noise, and the mayor mistakes that for public sentiment."

The mayor defends his policy by pointing to the fact that every front door of every saloon in the city is closed on Sunday, and people passing on the streets do not know there is any violation. There is no disorder, drunkenness, nothing to touch the sensibilities of the most punctilious church-goer.

God works through manifold agencies. Twenty years ago His Spirit moved the women of Ohio to a Crusade which spread throughout the country, and men have not yet ceased to bless His name for that holy uprising. To-day He is stirring the beautiful city of Minneapolis, the Crusaders in this instance being the ministers of His word and a handful of Christian workers, the object of the Crusade being the same—the saloon. While the results may not be so wide-spread, we are trusting, hoping, praying that they may be as effective.

BY MATILDA B. CARSE.

Blessed is she that believed, for there shall be a performance of those things which were told her from the Lord.—Luke 1:45.

The beautiful Christmas time is again at our door. The very atmosphere seems pregnant with a great and coming joy—the joy that made the angels two centuries ago sing, "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men." The love that is dead unto self and alive unto the happiness and joy of others is more prevalent during these Christmas days than at any other season of the year, hence we welcome its return. There is so much self-denial in order that others may be made happy. It is a time when we stop and count who are our friends and send them some little loving token of our regard. How happy we become in the anticipation of the pleasure we are to give others. Our faces beam, our hands clasp the hands of friends with a more hearty grasp. The world seems transformed by love,—if we have enemies we forget and forgive them. Heaven seems indeed to stoop to earth and kiss it. Why cannot we make the blessed Christmas-tide spread over all the days of the year?

What could there be more lovely for a little Christmas gift than the Columbian souvenir incased in its dainty, silk-lined box, with an exquisite cut of the Temple outlined on the beautiful silvery aluminum, and on the reverse side the face of our beloved leader, Miss Willard. Surely this is a gift that will delight the heart, not only of our white-ribboners, but all women who love their sex. All persons who send one dollar before the new year will be credited with the above amount as a gift to the Temple, and beside will receive the beautiful souvenir. The small photogravure of the Temple when framed will make a gift that will be greatly prized by a white-ribboner or an L. T. L. boy or girl. Persons sending fifty cents before January 1 will receive one of these pictures of the Temple. What a touching description of our "House Beautiful" is given by Mrs. Andrew in last week's SIGNAL. On her return after an absence of three years in her trip around the world, she says: "Walking down Monroe street, Chicago, one September morning, two days after my arrival, suddenly I caught sight of the Temple, and the vision smote me so to the very center of my being, that I stood still instantly, trembling, while the tears gathered involuntarily in my eyes. I have beheld the ineffable beauty of the Taj Mahal, bathed in the moonlight or in the golden glory of the noontide, and realized all its exquisite charm. I have climbed to the top of the great pyramid, and have felt the tides of centuries of history pulse about me while I gazed across the sandy billows of the desert and into the eyes of the inscrutable sphinx at its foot. I have seen glorious cathedrals, palaces, shrines and tombs, but nothing ever moved me as did this building, looming up grand and stately before me, amid Chicago's busy turmoil." Should not the picture of a building that can thus impress and touch the heart, be in the homes of all temperance people?

The following is the first response received to our call for a gift of fifty cents or a dollar to the Temple. The letter is from Miss Dora M. Harris, Englewood, Ill. She writes: "My UNION SIGNAL reached me this p. m., November 18. I read your request for every white-ribboner and L. T. L. to send fifty cents on or before January 1st, for the Temple. I said, 'That means me, as I am a white-ribboner, and before I sleep I will enclose one dollar.' I hope to be one of the first to respond because I feel it to be my duty and sweet pleasure. I wish it were more, but it is self-denial to send this small amount just now." Another who was among the first to respond was Mrs. Jennie C. Morton, Frankfort, Ky. She says: "In response to your call in THE UNION SIGNAL, just read, I enclose $1 for the Temple, fifty cents for myself and fifty for some other white-ribbon sister who would like to send you that amount but cannot spare it." In the same spirit, in answer to the call, Mrs. J. R. Dewey, Chicago, sends $5. Mrs. Maggie A. Taylor, King City, Mo., was also one of the first to respond, and sent $5.

The dollar gifts for the Temple are coming in nicely (considering the hard times), and every mail sees a large number of the beautiful Columbian souvenirs go back in return to all of our one dollar donors. Mrs. Stephen Coates, Oberlin, O., writes: "I want to tell you how pleased I am with the Columbian souvenir. I had no thought it would be so nice. I wish every King's Daughter and temperance lover would send a dollar and have in a form to keep forever this souvenir of the Temple which combines with it the faces of Miss Willard and Mrs. Carse. It's a beauty! I would not take five dollars for mine if I could not get another." Just before sailing for England, Miss Anna Gordon wrote: "In response to Mrs. Carse's call for $1 each from W. C. T. U. women, please find enclosed $2 from mother and me. I do hope every white-ribboner will send at once. It is little for each one to do, but means much to the Temple."

A two-cent stamp sent to Mrs. Matilda B. Carse, The Temple, Chicago, will secure a mite-box. Remember, any one placing in the box $2.50 from May 1, 1893, to May 1, 1894, will receive the lovely Columbian souvenir made of aluminum, with a cut of the Temple on one side and on the reverse the face of Miss Willard with suitable inscriptions. All money orders should be made out in the name of the treasurer, William D. Preston, and sent to our financial secretary, Miss Sara G. Johnson, The Temple Chicago, Ill.

The Lord looseth the prisoners; the Lord openeth the eyes of the blind; the Lord raiseth them that are bowed down; the Lord loveth the righteous; the Lord preserveth the strangers; he relieveth the fatherless and widow, but the way of the wicked he turneth upside down.—Crusade Psalm (146).

Give to the winds thy fears,
Hope, and be undismayed;
God hears thy sighs, and counts thy tears;
God shall lift up thy head.

Through waves and clouds and storms
He gently clears thy way;
Wait thou His time, so shall this night
Soon end in joyous day.

OUR "SOBER SECOND THOUGHT."

"Second thoughts" are not always "best." Often the quick impulse of a first thought is a Divine inspiration, and the "second thought" but the patching up of a very worldly wisdom. There are not wanting those who would have us believe that this is true of our own work of to-day. They admit its divine inception, but they claim that in carrying out that inception we are "very far gone from original righteousness."

Only the other day we clipped from a religious periodical the report of an address by a prominent Christian worker, in which he said, substantially, as follows: "The day of power for the W. C. T. U. was the day when the women went out into the streets and visited the saloons. It will never get back its power until it is baptized with the old baptism; until it ceases to be 'respectable' and goes in for saving souls."

Surely we, who joy in the memory of that Crusade as our most precious earthly legacy, are not likely to question the divinity of our "first thought." We know the Crusade was born from above. We know its leaders were baptized with a very pentecostal baptism. We rejoice in it as the most striking proof given to this age that God has not left His world, but that He is still "the God who answers by fire."

But does it follow of necessity that our "second thought" is not also divine? Other things being at all equal, is not the sequence to one inspiration a second inspiration? If the earnestness, the zeal, the consecration which prompted the first are present in the second, is not that, also, as likely to prove God-prompted and God-filled?

What are the facts of the case in point? The Woman's Christian Temperance Union is the "Child of the Crusade";—our "sober second thought." Has it "back-slidden," or is its unfoldment in the direct line of God's purpose as truly of and from Himself as was its beginning?

Let us suppose that we had always clung to Crusade methods, never leaving them for an instant, never taking up other lines; our preventive work a thing unknown, our publications undreamed of, legislation, petition—everything null and void, nothing thought and nothing attempted beyond praying in the streets, and working for the personal salvation of individuals among drunkards and saloon-keepers, what would be the state of things to-day? We should long since have been only a memory. The absolute impossibility of keeping up, year after year, the nervous strain of that work proves this. The necessary neglect of homes and of all other interests,—social, educational, governmental, is another proof. The undoubted fact that the novelty of our methods having worn away, we should soon have been accounted mere "nuisances" and either forcibly suppressed or quietly ignored, is too patent to be denied.

The Crusade did not "come to stay" in its original form; it had not staying qualities. The whirlwind or the "blizzard" have very important parts to play in our physical economy; they purify the atmosphere, and make room for better life-conditions, but they are by no means healthy or desirable conditions under which to live. The Crusade came from God; it went to God. It did its work, and did it gloriously, but who does not feel to-day that the divinest part of that work has been the organization which sprang from the Crusade, the organization which, baptized by Crusade fire, has carried that fire and that spirit into forty distinct lines of work for the good of humanity, thus laying the foundations for the new heavens and the new earth wherein shall "dwell righteousness."

Wise were they who interpreted the Divine command which followed the Crusade into the word "organize!" Wiser still they who have not been content to rest in the fixed forms of a changeless organization, but have evolved rather an organism, vital with life, ready always to adapt itself to the law of growth under whatever changed conditions.

If it be God's work to kneel in the street before the saloon door, it is equally God's work to walk that street, firm in the resolve that the saloon shall have no foothold there. If it be the work of God to close one saloon and save one drunkard, how much more the work of God to close, by law, all saloons and save all drunkards from the very sight of that which damns.

Would our friends who would remand us to a perpetual clinging to Crusade days and Crusade lines have remanded the Christian church to a perpetual tarrying in the city of Jerusalem, with a line of work marked out before it which should never overstep the methods rendered necessary by the conditions of that age? That church would have had but the briefest of histories, had it not been able to prove its divine origin by the very fact that it was ever ready to adapt itself to new demands and new conditions. That which possesses life must change; it is the law of all living organisms.

We do not grow out of the old in the sense of abandoning it; the mighty oak keeps always the essential life principle of the acorn, but the old constantly enters into the new and is clothed upon with other and better forms. We have not given up working for the salvation of the drunkard because we have stopped praying in the streets. That which began at the saloon door is carried on in Willard Hall, each day the year through; and the Willard Hall meetings are but a type of the countless Gospel meetings the W. C. T. U. is holding all over the world. If need arose we would as willingly pray in the streets to-day as twenty years ago; the need having passed away, and other methods proving better adapted to our ends, would we not be of all people most foolish if we still persisted in clinging to the old methods, simply because they came first? That was the great mistake of the Jews;—refusing to accredit any messenger who did not bear the old familiar stamp. "We know that God spoke through Moses; as for this fellew, we know not whence He is." And yet He whom they knew not was God's latest "Word" to humanity.

It is possible to make the mistake of the Jews in the nineteenth century, and in the Christian Church. May God keep us of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union from making it! Evermore the voice which speaks to us is declaring: "I will show you yet greater things than these."

OUR TWENTY YEARS' MARCH.

This twentieth anniversary is a milestone at which we appropriately linger long enough to mark the significance of that wonderful event which unsealed the fountains of prayer and petition and precipitated our great organization.

Twice before has THE UNION SIGNAL celebrated Crusade Day, upon the tenth and sixteenth anniversaries, and it is good to find that there is still material enough for this and future celebrations. As long as a Crusader or a Crusader's child lives, so long will the story of the "praying bands" be told with rejoicing and heard with reverence.

Our cover page illustrates the origin and development of our movement. The story is there in a nutshell—the little band of devout women kneeling in the snow before a low saloon, and in the presence of the proprietor and customers, beseeching Almighty God to incline their hearts to see the wickedness of their ways. As a diametrical scene, our artist has drawn a corner of Willard Hall with its cultured, attentive audience, and its beautiful decorations. Without the Crusade we would never have had our stately Temple and its handsome inner sanctuary. The one is a natural growth from the other—the result of organization, development and power. The bit of holly serves to remind us that our Christmas time is also our Crusade time, and we love to reflect that the birth of our organization was so near the anniversary of the birth of the dear Christ.

The interesting letters which follow are replies to this request sent to as many friends as our limited space would accommodate:

December 23, 1893, will witness the completion of the second decade since the Woman's Crusade fires were lighted. It is the purpose of the editors of THE UNION SIGNAL to issue a jubilee Crusade number on the 14th of December, to commemorate this important and unique event in temperance history.

We are desirous of having a few words from you for this number. You are at liberty to write just as the spirit moves you on the subject, either by way of recollections of that wonderful Crusade which originated in Hillsboro, O., or your estimate of the present status and worth of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of to-day, which has been so fitly called the "sober second thought" of the Crusade.

AN EPOCH.

The woman's Crusade was the beginning of one of the noblest movements of the nineteenth century. Future historians will refer to it as one of the epochs which mark the dawn of a higher civilization.

SO MANY POINTS OF ATTACK.

The Woman's Christian Temperance Union, belting the globe, has so many points of attack against the enemy of our race, that probably no other single combination is so feared and hated as this, by the Prince of Evil and the Powers of Darkness.

A PERSONAL TESTIMONY.

I am familiar with the origin of that wonderful Crusade which originated in Hillsboro, O. Mrs. E. J. Thompson, who was the chief actor in the movement, was a daughter of ex-Governor Trimble, a noble woman and eminently worthy of bearing the palm in that great movement. I am most happy to bear this testimony to one I knew well and highly esteemed.

NO BRIGHTER DATE.

When the Christian achievements of this best of centuries are reviewed seven years hence in a round-the-world series of Christian conventions, no brighter date will be found than December 23, 1873, when the greatest and longest of Crusades began, a Crusade still in triumphant progress.

To save the holy land of home
We make our high crusade;
Our leader Judah's lion-heart
In whom our faith is stayed.

A MATCHLESS ACHIEVEMENT.

The twenty years chronicle nothing more signal than the march of this movement. The Woman's Christian Temperance Union of to-day, the outgrowth and product of that agony of prayer and that passionate protest against wrong which marked the lighting of the Crusade fires, is a matchless achievement and an immense benefaction. I stand amazed before its growth and reach and aims and victories.

What hidden and unguessed capacities it has developed! What heroism it has kindled! What wrongs, individual, family and social, it has righted. What slaves to passion it has charmed out of their kennels of sin and misery, and what transformations it has wrought for Christ and the home! They are known only to Him who bottles the tears of the saints, and keeps record of every secret thing.

But one need only read Miss Frances Willard's address before the twentieth annual convention of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, recently held at Chicago, to see that this organization is encompassing the globe, and making not only more widely, but more intrinsically, efficient its manifold agencies for sobriety, social purity, gospel temperance and woman's uplift.

May it continue to build on the everlasting foundations and be kept forever true to the spirit of those women who twenty years ago, out of their wrung hearts, baptized this movement with their prayers and tears.

THE DRINK CURSE WILL BE SWEPT AWAY.

"Except the family tie, there is none so close and tender and true as that which binds together the hearts of white-ribboners," declared a sweet missionary lady.

As I ponder what I may say in a few words concerning the status and work of the W. C. T. U., the words of the missionary quoted above come to me anew, and I ask what may it not bring to pass to have the hearts of the women the world over united as they are in the W. C. T. U., to put down the greatest enemy of the home—the liquor traffic? For this the Crusade fire was kindled, for this the W. C. T. U. was born, and never a shadow of doubt crosses my mind but that "some glad day" the drink curse will be swept away and "Praise ye the Lord" will be read with new and glorious meaning.

INVITE MEMBERS.

As we come to another anniversary of the Crusade, we ask, What does the Crusade mean to us at this present point of vision. To me it tells of God's call to motherhood and sisterhood for enlistment in an army that shall wage "a peaceful war" for the protection of our boys and girls from an enemy that our husbands and fathers have entertained, entrenched and protected by law, an army that shall not ask for furlough or discharge on this lower field. It tells me of a heroic band that answered, "Here am I, send me." It tells me also that a great host, valiant and true, have heard the call until they are well named the "Grandest army of the Republic." But we need recruits; our ranks are daily being thinned by the call of the Captain, "Come up higher." There are thousands of good Christian women who should join our band, and would, were they properly approached and earnestly invited. Do not fail to extend an invitation.

AN UNCONDITIONAL CONTRACT.

Twenty years ago, sitting in the shelter of my conservative home, an Episcopalian of the Episcopalians, hearing of the wonderful wildfire which had broken out over the West, I, who had never been touched, even remotely, by the awful curse of intemperance, presumed to sit in judgment over my sisters upon whom the Spirit of the Lord had so signally fallen. But as the wave spread, and came even to our own doors, I felt constrained to say: "If this be of man, it will come to naught, but of God, it will stand." Then followed the "sober second thought," and the Woman's Christian Temperance Union came. The blessed influence of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, who can measure? The reflex influence upon the hearts and lives of the women themselves has not been the least wonderful result. Then the home influence, the social results, the church advancement and the growth of public sentiment! A wag, seeing the cabalistic letters, W. C. T. U., put one under the other, upon a placard, wrote "Washing Contract Taken Unconditionally." He wrote better than he knew. We have taken an unconditional contract upon our hands to wash the nation clean, and in our "do-everything" policy we feel assured of success. "Revolutions never go backward," and with God on our side and the word discouragement eliminated from our vocabulary, we mean to work for "God, Home and Humanity," till the end.

ANNA M. HAMMER,

OUR BAPTISM FOR WORK.

In the uprising of Europe during the Crusades a cross of red cloth stitched upon the right shoulder of the mantle proclaimed the wearer a soldier of the cross—a Crusader. In these later days a bow of white ribbon worn upon the dress proclaims the wearer loyal to Christ in a work to Him most precious, a soldier of the cross and Crusader in the holiest of warfares.

The Crusade of 1873–74 was the breath of God which stirred into life a great organization of women. Other organizations have various reasons for their being, but the Woman's Christian Temperance Union alone has for its birthright the honor and wondrous glory of the Crusade, and its day of blessed memory in December 23.

The twenty years which intervene since that memorable event have gone swiftly by, but they hold in their embrace such wealth of consecration, such fidelity to purpose as the world has seldom known.

The Crusade was a time of great spiritual quickening. Human dependence there was none. The cry for help went straight to God and the need of every soul was met and answered.

The Crusade was our baptism for work. Its promise has kept our hearts brave and our hands strong; its blessing has brightened the years that have come and gone since then, and at the last its benediction will be with all who have set their feet in this way and who have tried to serve Him.

THE TRUE SECRET.

When the Crusaders knelt in front of the saloon the great hereditary destroyer of mankind met its true foe.

Policy, expediency, self-protection had done much, but when the souls of those godly women laid hold upon the sword of the spirit, then a royal and victorious warfare began. For when we pray we make God a party to our purpose. If we continue in prayer He will not suffer us to make false issues. He will not permit our eyes to be darkened to the central truth of things. His indwelling spirit renders us clairvoyant and prophetic.

Here lies the secret of this miracle of the nineteenth century, the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. It is the Lord's doing and it is marvelous in our eyes. Here lies the secret of its ever enlarging work, the variety of its agencies, the dividing and subdividing of its branches, till like a system of nerves it is embracing the entire life of Christian womanhood. It is working every day better than it knows because it is led, taught, illuminated, by the Divine Spirit.

REV. J. H. ECOB.

A LARGER HOPE FOR THE RACE.

The prayer Crusade made an epoch in the history of the temperance reform. The very novelty of it—its godly audacity—was sure to provoke adverse criticism, but even criticism in that dark day was better than the deathlike torpor that prevailed. Sentiment was aroused, the heart of the great Christian public was touched as never before; the promotion of the temperance reform was felt to be the imperative duty of godly people, and prayer recognized as the mightiest agency for achieving the victory.

It was clear at the time to sympathetic minds that God was in this strange movement, that out of it would come a Providential unfolding that might change the form but would preserve the high faith and marvelous energy of the woman's Crusade. God has many ways of answering prayers, and the agonizing cries of those godly women were answered in the formation of the best organized and the most persistent, practical and efficient reformatory force outside the Christian church known in history.

It has not closed the saloons, nor sobered all drunkards, but its influence has been immense in toning the public conscience, making drinking habits odious, safe-guarding the young, rescuing the perishing and impressing all classes that a force had appeared in our times, that through evil report and good report, come victory or defeat, would have the undying tenacity of its convictions and the sustained courage to maintain them till in God's time the holy triumph should be won. Good men breathe freer; we have a larger hope for the race when we reflect that the Woman's Christian Temperance Union is our vigorous ally and helper in the righteous cause for which we struggle.

W. X. NINDE,

Detroit, Mich. Bishop M. E. Church.

IN THE FULLNESS OF TIME.

The remarkable rise in history of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union must fill any Christian observer with wonder and cause him to exclaim, "What hath God wrought!" Like all God's plans the union came into existence in the fullness of time. God always fixes upon the exact day which men call "the nick of time" for the working of His great designs. He never is in a hurry and never lags behind the critical moment. His all-seeing eye knew that the hour had come for striking a new blow at the selfishness of man and his greed of gain, and to strike this blow he used what formerly was considered the puny hand of woman.

Other movements had arisen and done their work and fallen into decadence. A mightier and more comprehensive movement with a staying power which the others had not known He saw was necessary to fulfill His purposes, and He made use of agencies which politicians had sneered at and worldly men had ridiculed but which he saw were the mightiest of all for the pulling down of the stronghold of Satan. Together with our profound gratitude to the organization which has accomplished so much and to the noble women who have been its inspiration and its guide during these many years, let us give supreme thanks to Him, who, when the fullness of time had come, stirred the hearts of those early Crusaders to attack the rum power in one of its own innumerable citadels. How else could they have aroused the world and started the wonderful crusade which was then begun, except by praying on the very steps of the rum shops, except by going to the very spot where Satan's seat is?

At the end of this second decade the heart of every one who sees this jubilee number will turn with affectionate interest across the seas and will offer a prayer for the life and health and long leadership of the noble woman who has always been in the forefront of the fray, and whose battle flag has never been surrendered even in times of apparent defeat. May it be her happy lot to lead on the hosts of women the world over to a complete and final triumph over the liquor power.

WHERE THE RESPONSIBILITY RESTS.

Precious memories of the temperance Crusade crowd upon me as I attempt to write you concerning that wonderful display of the power of the Mighty God. Then the timid became brave and the weak strong, then in prayer and praise glad utterance was given by those who before were affrighted at the sound of their own voice. God has demonstrated to this nation by the working of His power in the temperance Crusade. where the responsibility rests for the continued existence of the saloon and the liquor traffic. And the organization and history of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union bear testimony also to the fact that this menace to our Christian civilization, this enemy of righteous government, this greedy, ravenous destroyer of the souls and bodies of men exists here, rules here, demoralizes here, because so-called Christian men and women are willing that it should be thus. If there were real Christians enough to stand for the right and the true, through whom God could manifest His power, how speedily would this iniquity be overthrown.

BROOMS NOT COMPLIMENTS.

The Woman's Christian Temperance Union is now loved, feared and hated all over the globe.

Christians love it because it is doing the noble work of promoting and establishing the kingdom of our Father in heaven, until it has come to stay on earth. Men fear it and think it menaces their personal liberty, and threatens to bring their women into dangers incident to power, place and politics.

For this same reason, brewers, distillers, saloon-keepers, and their "boss partner," Uncle Sam, himself, hates the W. C. T. U. with a bitter hatred, because it attacks the vast power built up by political machinery, which holds the government itself in a fatal grasp.

Women have been called on to "sweep the rascals out" here in Louisiana, and they came forward and helped to destroy the lottery. They have been encouraged to rally to the support of the Sunday law, and requested to interview women saloon-keepers, and recently they have been prompted to stir up the city council who have allowed minors to frequent the saloons.

Men say, "'Sweep the rascals out,' ladies. You have a right to protect your homes." "Gentlemen," replied a brave woman, "your sweeping implement is the ballot; give us that, and we will help you sweep these 'rascals' out of office." The "smile" of woman, and her "indirect influence," is powerful, but when a general cleaning is to be done, give us brooms not compliments.

WHAT WAS THE WOMAN'S CRUSADE?

It was the spiritual awakening of wronged womanhood, the call "to arms" of an unsuspected reserve corps, that marched into the battle of Right against Rum, and carried consternation to the foe. God knew both humanity's halves were needed to perfect a balance sheet for His final inspection; and He called into the sum of Life's problem the potential factor which makes possible its solution.

It was the second Pentecost. The Holy Spirit descended in baptism upon Christian women. He filled our souls with Himself. Worldly words and works were crowded out. His glorious presence eclipsed all other things.

Then came to us a vision—wan and weary women, starving, neglected childhood, a procession of drunkards, wrecks of manhood, staggering out of saloons and dens of degradation. In horror we turned away our eyes and beheld the Christ—one hand extended toward the sufferers, the other beckoning us to go and help them. We heard the widow's wail of woe, the orphan's pathetic plea. Next came the voice of Jesus saying, "Inasmuch as ye did it not to one of the least of these, ye did it not to Me." Then He gave us two scrolls, one was the Gospel, the other was the law.

We followed the Shekinah. For three months we were led thereby into saloons and city slums, with prayer and entreaty. Souls were saved by power divine in places unused to prayer. The Shekinah moved and stood over school-house and home. We went in and laid foundations of scientific and religious truth in imprisoned minds. It moved over the state house and the National Capitol. We followed with petitions, stirring law-makers' consciences.

Later a voice said, "Organize to serve until the victory's won!" Then evolved the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, State and National; and then our emblematic ribbon white went waving round the world, and made all nations "near of kin" in common cause. Joel's prophecy was fulfilled, "the daughters prophesied."

Now mother-love breathes its purifying breath into the Republic's politics, into the social and religious life of every nation.

Now purer lives in happier homes foretell the glad day's dawning; when celestial joy-bells shall "ring out the darkness of the land," ring in THE CHRIST that here shall reign.

World's W. C. T. U.

MOTTO: "For God and Home and Every Land."

OBJECT: To unify the methods of woman's temperance work the world over.

BADGE: A knot of white ribbon.

HOUR OF PRAYER: Noon.

METHODS: Agitate, educate, organize.

DEPARTMENTS: Preventive, educational, evangelistic, social and legal.

THE POLYGLOT PETITION has been circulated throughout the world and signed by representatives of over forty countries. It asks for the outlawing of the alcohol and opium trade and the system of legalized vice. The chief auxiliaries of the W. W. C. T. U. are the United States, Canada, Great Britain, Australia, South Africa, India, Japan and the Sandwich Islands.

SOUTH AUSTRALIA.

"AS COLD WATER TO A THIRSTY SOUL, SO IS GOOD NEWS FROM A FAR COUNTRY."

The fifth annual convention of the W. C. T. U. of South Australia held in Pirie Street Wesleyan Lecture Hall (We regret that our correspondent does not give the name of the city.—EDS.), on the 4th and the three succeeding days of September, was an all-round success, in spite of measles and mud, both prevailing to an unusual extent. Our painstaking colonial officers presented us with an unique and attractive program, and the fact that no items fell through in the press of time speaks much for our president's administrative abilities. Our stanch friend, Rev. Joseph Berry, pastor of Pirie Street church, gave us brotherly aid, and preached a rousing sermon on the liquor traffic on Sunday night, September 3, whereat certain, "whose craft is in danger," were so incensed that, calling in question some of the Reverend gentleman's statements, they caused him to reiterate them, thereby affording our views an additional airing.

Monday morning we led off with the Crusade hymn and psalm, followed by prayers, striking the keynote of thanksgiving. The roll-call brought rows of earnest faces forward, as the delegates took their places, and it was good to remember that these women were awake to the red-hot questions of these restless times, and determined to spare neither brains nor pains in pushing righteous measures and protesting against unrighteous ones.

Conferences on departments, of which the colonial union has taken up twenty-eight, occupied a large portion of each day, and resulted in profitable discussions, notably that on social purity. It so happened that when this report came before the convention Madam Antoinette Stirling was an honored guest upon our platform, and regardless of false delicacy and "ears polite," that very sweet singer gave all and sundry sinners against purity an unequivocal broadside. It was very pathetic to hear that strong-faced woman, out of the depths of her motherhood, storming, protesting, entreating, weeping, like some old-time prophetess, delivering the burden of her soul with such power that many women of more timid mould were moved to express themselves with no uncertain sound, and there and then social purity was handled as, I venture to say, it never was before from that platform, certainly never so before by women.

Three excellent topical papers, contributed respectively by our president, on "Public Speaking," by Miss Lockwood, on "Financial Needs and Obligations," and by Mrs. Milne, on "The Sweating System," were read during the sessions, showing that we are not without women who possess "grace, grit and gumption."

Provision was made for the spiritual element, a distinguishing feature of which was the delightfully refreshing Bible readings by Mrs. Hone, Mrs. Shearing, and Rev. Allan Webb, a loyal friend of temperance. Our evening meetings also were successful. Suffrage, of course, was well to the fore, claiming one whole evening. Dr. Emma Brainerd Ryder, who is visiting South Australia in the interests of "the little wives of India," received a most cordial welcome to convention, and made the speech of the evening at the suffrage meeting. We are asking for adult suffrage, pure and simple; and I believe we shall have it soon! Our memorial service was lovely, taking in four of your saints, Miss Ames, Madam Willard, Miss West, and Miss Jennie Casseday, together with our own promoted South Australian comrades.

Thursday night wound up with beautiful appropriateness, by a consecration service, an awakening address by Rev. R. M. Hunter, solemnly sweet testimonies by brothers and sisters, lovely singing and inspiring prayers. We are on the march; in perplexities often, frequently face to face with great mountains of difficulty; but our Zerubbabel is strong. Nothing is more likely to help us in our work than a firm sense of the righteousness of our cause, and therefore a confident assurance of ultimate victory. "The Lord shall reign forever and ever!"

Union work has been a blessing to many South Australian women, discovering and developing faculties and abilities hitherto dormant, turning into beneficent channels the forces that were running to waste, widening and liberalizing the ideas and views, and making cosmopolitan the influences which had been resting upon narrow and selfish aims. We bless you, our Transatlantic sisters, for your noble example and the world-wide labors of your consecrated hands, hearts and brains.

J. A. CLATWORTHY.

QUEENSLAND W. C. T. U.

IN ANNUAL CONVENTION.

The program for our eighth annual convention was headed by the promise: "Certainly I will be with thee," and it was wonderfully fulfilled! Although, as the colonial president said, we had no "big guns" this time, yet our own women were drawn out in new ways, and many who came only to listen, returned to their unions full of ideas and enthusiasm. We were greatly disappointed that Miss Ackermann could not be with us, as expected.

Sunday, September 24, was marked by evangelistic services and special sermons, and on Monday afternoon all delegates and hostesses, beside the ministers and their wives, were invited to a reception given by the convention committee. It was not as strangers, therefore, that we met on Tuesday morning, ready for real hard work. Busy fingers had adorned the hall with banners (from local unions), flags, palms, etc., and from the platform the faces of our best known leaders smiled a welcome or a blessing. Each delegate received a dainty shield-shaped badge and all were entertained at luncheon, served each day by one of the unions who conjointly invited the convention to Brisbane.

Queensland has now forty-four unions, with a membership of over fourteen hundred. More than one hundred and thirty delegates answered to the roll-call. Our ranks have been largely increased this year through the mission of Mrs. Harrison Lee, a visitor from Victoria. Loving words of welcome to the convention were spoken by Mesdames Sagar and T. G. Harris and a song of welcome was sung by some L. T. L. members, to which Mrs. Williams gracefully responded. Mrs. Britten, who is one of our most effective and self-denying workers, gave her report as colonial organizer, and a resolution was passed, recognizing her constant help to local unions, as well as her special missions.

Letters of greeting came from Miss Ackermann, Mrs. Andrew and Dr. Bushnell, besides those of the different colonies and private members. W. C. T. U. work throughout our whole colony has suffered because of the general depression, consequent on floods and bank failures, but departmental reports showed that we are steadily holding our own, and in some cases, making sure progress. Wednesday morning was mainly devoted to purity papers and discussions, and we believe that the outcome will be a marked advance in thought and action concerning this subject.

A scientific instruction scheme was ably advocated by Mrs. Dinning and Loyal Temperance Legions were explained by Mrs. Patrick, one of our most successful juvenile workers. The election of colonial officers resulted as follows: President, Mrs. Brentnall; corresponding secretary, Mrs. Carvosso; recording secretary, Miss McLean; treasurer, Mrs. Steele. The only new department undertaken was that of narcotics. The question-box proved useful to many, and each noon-tide was preceded by a helpful Bible reading. This break in the morning business always seemed so restful. At different sessions we received fraternal delegates, had business discussions and talks on "How to make a union successful," "Replenishing the treasury," "The responsibility of mothers," "Woman suffrage," etc.

The Y's met in conference on Wednesday afternoon, where many girls gave valuable suggestion or received advice from the different Y superintendents present.

The most important business action of the convention was the adoption of district unions, notice of motion having been given a year previous. Henceforth, Queensland will be divided into six districts, with the hope that in this way, many women, especially in the North and West, will be drawn out and the detail work of the colonial officers will be lightened.

Great interest centered round the evening meetings. On Tuesday night five Y unions contributed to the program, making a pleasing variety of music, speeches, etc. A tableau, in which a Y represented "Purity," was followed by a "hygienic dinner," and the meeting closed after "Columbia's Conclave," with national songs and dresses, had been held. Mrs. Payne presided over the women's meeting on Thursday, when Mrs. Britten gave an account of her western organizing trip. Great excitement prevailed on "the children's night," Friday, and the platform proved all too small for the many L. T. L. soldiers. This was the first time they had been to convention, and we felt very proud of them, from the smallest "infantry" to the "advanced class" of boys. Our hearts were lifted up in gratitude that God had taught some of our women to train these children, and to show them the scientific results of the use of alcohol.

After electing delegates to go to the Australasian convention next year, and passing a set of strong resolutions, we closed our convention by singing, "God be with you." However, most of the delegates met again on Saturday afternoon, at a river trip which had been arranged to help the colonial friends, and to enable the country delegates to enjoy our beautiful river and the ozone in Moreton Bay. The afternoon was most successful and proved a fitting close to a delightful though tiring week. The next convention will be held in Maryborough.

WOMEN AS VOTERS.

By this post I am sending you some papers, having an account of the passing of the woman's suffrage clause of the electoral bill. We can hardly believe it ourselves yet. As soon as it was known that the bill had passed its third and final reading in the Upper House, the Publican or Liquor party put up a petition of protest to the governor advising him not to give his consent to it. This was carried from house to house, and people were waylaid in the streets and importuned to sign. In a few days several thousands of names had been obtained, and the precious documents sent to Wellington. Our franchise superintendent tried asking the governor to remember the 31,000 women who asked for citizen's right. At noon, on September 19, the writing was signed and at once wired all over the colony. It did not take long for some of us to vote.

The Woman's Franchise League has had meetings in all the larger towns and cities, and we have had Thanksgiving services. The power now put into our hands is a sacred trust laid on us as Christian women of this W. C. T. U. and when the day of election comes we must vote for temperance candidates without regard to politics. This we must do; this power has been given to us for the very purpose of hastening the end of the drink traffic. I feel now that the world is looking on to see how we will use our new-found liberty. I don't think we shall see a very great change in this first election. Our women want information. But already some of our legislators are quaking as to their possible rejection.

Our women are waking up to their duty in this matter, and the press has daily the number of women who have registered. How I wish every country had this right; we must urge it on our rulers. Send petitions to every session. Write to members and legislators, and educate public opinion till the demand is met.

NEWS OF THE WORKERS.

You will be pleased to hear we are doing a good work here. I am sure our influence is being felt. We held our annual meeting last week and they have still kept me as president. I know you will pray for us, that we may be divinely directed.

We have started another union in Harbor Grace, some thirty miles away. Mrs. McNab, the Presbyterian minister's wife, is president. They have had some public meetings well attended, they have a night school and from all I can hear are doing a good work. We hope during the winter to start a Loyal Temperance Legion among our young folks. Our temperance hall has been rebuilt, and now we have some place where we could meet. We held our weekly meetings in a small shed, our public meetings in the different churches. We have had a temperance lecturer going round the island. The general elections take place this fall, and we are trying for temperance men to be elected. Our city is being built up very fast, and the streets will be very much improved, the houses that are being built are very much better than those that were burnt.

HOLLAND.

You will, I know, rejoice that the Dutch ladies have formed a branch of the World's Union. About thirty of them met of late for the purpose, and after a good deal of consideration organized and elected the following officers: Mme. M. W. de Ranitz, of Groningen, president; Miss Hartsen, Hague, vice-president; Mme. Van Herwaarden, Hague, secretary; (née Baronne Quarles Van Ufford); Mme. Hood, Hague, and Mde. Philipse, (née de Ranitz) Harlem, on committee. Most, if not all these ladies, attended a prayer-meeting which was held each morning before the great International Congress met.

Madame Selmar, from Denmark, presented her paper in French, which was excellent, and one which would be very useful to distribute as a leaflet in the French speaking countries; it is short. She followed it, being a beautiful and earnest speaker, with an account in English, of the work in Denmark. She was more enthusiastically received than any other speaker.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

THE NINETEENTH ANNUAL CONVENTION

was held September 26. There was a good attendance, although the weather was inauspicious. The day's session opened with devotional exercises led by Mrs. Anna C. McDowell, which were followed by the report of the corresponding secretary, Miss L. S. Weightman. It was stated in this report that the total number of auxiliaries had been brought up to thirteen, with a membership of 600. The auxiliaries reported quiet, systematic work, increased interest in jail, almshouse, L. T. L., evangelistic and flower mission work, also in fighting the granting of license; one reports having closed the only saloon in the locality. Meetings for mothers have also been held; cheering words, tender prayers and gifts of fruit and flowers have reached those needing them. Receptions and public meetings were held.

Our president, who has served us so faithfully for eight years, feels she can do so no longer; in this last year she has not slackened her efforts nor quenched the ardor of her zeal, and no report would be complete that failed to record her usefulness, her many sacrifices of personal care or her unflagging zeal.

Two new auxiliaries have been organized during the year, one at Brookland, with thirty members, the other at Le Droit Park, membership twenty-five. At the close of the corresponding secretary's report, Mr. Suter, the attorney for the Anti-saloon League of this city, was introduced to the convention; he read the constitution of that organization, told of his duties and experience in fighting the granting of licenses and the good work being done by the League. Mrs. M. B. Platt moved that the W. C. T. U. join with the League in making arrangements for a public meeting. Some of our unions have made contributions to the work of the League. Mr. Suter spends a great deal of time at the district commissioner's office, especially at the meetings of the excise board, in order to know if the law is enforced or evaded.

At eleven o'clock a number of the city pastors addressed the convention for an hour.

The first hour of the afternoon session was spent in devotional exercises and short addresses from a number of the delegates, in memory of Mrs. Judge Clark, Mrs. Blackford and Mother Shively, after which Mrs. M. E. Griffith led in prayer; at the close of this service Mrs. La Fetra read her annual address.

For nearly seven years we have maintained our tender and merciful "Hope and Help Mission," with only the limited appropriation of one thousand dollars annually from Congress for the past five years. On account of the establishment of the "Girls' Reform School," and the desire of the district superintendent of charities to consolidate and strengthen, so far as possible, the older and more permanent institutions of the city, our appropriation from Congress was this year withheld because of the unusual financial depression; our receipts from charitable friends have unavoidably been less; it was deemed advisable after much prayer and thought to leave the matter of deciding what was best to do with the "Home," with a committee, composed of Mesdames La Fetra, Catlin and Knowles; they have decided to run it as an independent work, two gentlemen who have been very much interested in the work in the past, (Messrs. Jarvis and Petty) assisting them in the finances.

At the close of Mrs. La Fetra's address there was quite a general comment on the subject of woman's suffrage.

After the indorsement of the president's address, a rising vote of thanks was tendered to the ministers of the city for their attendance.

Governor Hughes, of Arizona, made a short address, in which he commented on the temperance situation in Arizona and said that he was working hard on the line of prohibition, and that he was satisfied that this movement would be considerably aided by the passage at the next meeting of the legislature of the woman's suffrage bill. Treasurer reported receipts from all sources, $3,159.61; disbursements, $2,913.59; raised and expended by local unions, $371.76.

The first session of the second day of the convention was opened with devotional exercises. The union presented Mrs. La Fetra with a beautiful palm plant.

Mrs. Mary E. Griffith, who was elected president, has been one of the members of the W. C. T. U. ever since its organization in 1873, and has a record for effective work in the Kansas campaign for state prohibition, where she held the position of state superintendent of the evangelistic department of the union for five years. She has for a number of years past been identified with the Women's Home Missionary Society, in which she has been the district organizer for five years.

After the devotional exercises at the opening of the afternoon session, which were led by Mrs. J. H. Robinson, the committee on resolutions reported.

The reports of superintendents were heard:

Prison and jail superintendent made thirty-five visits to the jail, fourteen to almshouse and hospitals. Distributed 4,633 papers; 2,189 leaflets; magazines, 258; Bibles and other good books, 105; picture books, ten; envelopes with paper; sixty calendars, also a large number of picture cards. Money expended, $8.67. New workers have been added to our ranks, so that each week these institutions are visited. Several families of prisoners have been visited, and help extended in ways that seemed judicious.

In scientific temperance instruction there has been much encouragement. Teachers generally seem impressed with the importance of the work, although there is a tendency not to make it prominent. Some think their time is too limited for this branch of study, compelling them to give only outlines; those whose hearts are in the cause are more faithful. The work is growing in thought and action.

Two new L. T. L's have been organized, which make the total fourteen; membership, 5,212. The Temperance Temple and Willard Fountain have been held prominently before the children, in my visits to each Legion. The chalk-talker has given twenty talks.

Unfortunately the law prohibiting the sale of cigars, cigarettes or tobacco in any form to minors under sixteen years of age is not helpful to us in that it punishes the person selling same, but there is no penalty attached to the purchaser, moreover the minor will not inform on the seller. This being the condition, it has been very difficult to do anything more than make personal appeals. Have written to all the passenger railway presidents, urging them not to use envelopes for tickets, advertising certain brands of cigarettes. One road replied that they were not using them. Mrs. Shelten made an opportunity to interview some of the officials of one railroad, asking why our communication had not been noticed; it proved the fault of a clerk; the result of this interview was the abandonment of the cigarette advertisement and the substitution of the plain envelopes.

Mrs. R. F. Brown, a member of Chapin union, has had the Alley mission so laid upon her heart that she rented a mission house in Willow Tree Alley, and carries the responsibility of meeting the rent; it's wonderful how God answers her prayers in the wherewithal. She succeeded in getting a French family to leave the alley and go into a better home; they have employment and are greatly improved in their deportment. A boy and man who annoyed us in our work have so changed in spirit that we have no further trouble. Some of the young girls who seemed possessed with Satan, have confessed their sins, and felt the Saviour's touch. There have been donations of bread, clothing, literature and money.

All sections of the city have done good work in disseminating religious and temperance literature, notably in barber shops, railways, watch boxes, hospitals and public institutions. The papers in many places were distributed by the members of the union every week, and care was taken to leave them open at some attractive story or other taking feature. Many of the watch boxes in the northeast section of the city are (we are credibly informed), turned into regular covert saloons for tippling purposes. The sections of the union were trying to do something to prevent this evil practice. During the year there has been distributed over 153,600 pages of good wholesome literature.

The evangelistic meetings attended and Bible readings given number fifty. A series of meetings held for two weeks in tents were ably supported, two Christian Endeavor Societies have been addressed and three Y's visited. Services have been conducted at the Hope and Help Mission on alternate Sabbaths. Capital Hill union, the First Baptist Y and Calvary Y have held Sabbath services at the same place. Literature distributed in this department, 1,575 pages; money expended, $6.50; letters and postals written, seventy-five.

Through the influence and labor of our organization, the city is free from all display of obscene pictures, which were formerly used by tobacconists and bill posters as advertising mediums; these men begin to fear the power of our organization, and no longer make any attempt to attract the eye of the public through the nude form of woman.

The churches largely use unfermented wine with the exception of some colored, a few Presbyterian, the Episcopal and Catholics. While we have labored with others our work has been principally with the colored churches; by persistent effort on our part quite a number have abandoned the use of the fermented wine. A local superintendent was granted a hearing at a colored Baptist union, in May, in South Washington, through which action was taken by that body recommending its use and pledging themselves to advise and aid in getting it used in their churches. It was signed by quite a number of the pastors.

By the prompt and vigorous action of certain ministers and Christian workers, the command had been sent to those in authority to keep the pension building closed on Sunday. When the World's Fair was opened on Sunday we wrote to President Cleveland and Mr. Palmer, president World's Columbian Exposition Commission, entreating them to use their power in enforcing the Sunday closing law. We have communicated with the commissioners and major of police in regard to protests against the granting of license in all cases brought to our notice; it depends almost entirely upon the lieutenant in charge of a precinct whether our protests are considered favorably or not; if he reports respectable places the protest amounts to nothing. We have received many letters, asking for help in saving some loved one from the downward path, begging to have some particular saloon closed.

Our prohibition bill has been presented to Congress year after year until the last; petition after petition from every state and territory in the union, from all classes of people and from large representative and clerical bodies, asking for prohibition for this district. Many good people and some representative churches have criticised and blamed us for opposing high license; for that reason we did not again present the prohibition bill, nor do anything during the last session of Congress to oppose the new law, hoping that after giving it a trial, Congress would eventually grant our petition for prohibition. The World's Petition was circulated by the unions. It is a matter of great regret to the union that Mrs. M. A. Weaver, who has served as superintendent of this department so many years, declined a reëlection, because of the press of other duties. Mrs. Clinton Smith, 720 19th St., N. W., formerly of Vermont, was elected to fill the vacancy.

Our flower mission superintendent reports: Visits to sick, 266; hospitals, 28; poor, 20; almshouse, 6; homes found for women, 3; literature distributed, 6,548 pages; money expended, $121.75; bouquets given, 805; potted plants, 4; postals written, 93; letters, 11; distributed fruit, groceries and clothing.

Since the annual convention Mrs. M. E. Griffith has been elected superintendent of railroad work. At the annual meeting of the Chapin Auxiliary interesting reports were made.

OREGON.

AUTUMN FRUITS.

County conventions seem to have been in the minority during the summer, instead of taking up my entire report as last time. I have but one to record, the quarterly one of Marion county, where Mrs. S. H. Spangler has gone to reside, and where she has already made herself felt. She was disappointed at the outset by having a report from but one local secretary, but the interest and enthusiasm of the convention augurs that there will be more another time. The two evenings were filled by Mrs. A. R. Riggs and Miss Rose Trumbull. The Junior League excited extra interest by their imposing appearance as they marched in with their banners flying.

Two new unions have been organized by Mrs. Helen B. Harford, of Newberg, at Laurel and Middleton, both in Washington county, with Mrs. Maud Messinger and Mrs. L. A. P. White for their respective presidents. If I remember right, Mrs. White was the first W. C. T. U. woman in Oregon. I think this came out in the first state convention held by Miss Willard in 1882. It is but what we should expect, that when she changes her home she should still be the nucleus round which a fresh union will form itself.

A union has been also lately organized at Lents, in the neighborhood of Portland, by Mrs. L. H. Additon, who has gone to reside there. This—the Mt. Scott union—under the leadership of Mrs. McKenzie, has gone straight into work, by arranging to occupy every alternate Sunday with religious services.

The Multnomah convention, taking place in May, was never reported anywhere. Mrs. Additon's department in the state is the relation of temperance (or one might say *in*temperance) to labor. At the present juncture it seems to me one of our most important departments, and I am glad that Mrs. Additon, who feels the subject most ardently, should have taken the lecture field as an almost necessary adjunct to her work.

E. W. HOYT & CO., LOWELL, MASS.

At said convention, held close to our "hub," Mrs. Additon spoke, I hear, to great satisfaction, at the railroad car-shops, both at noon and at the reception given to railroad men in the evening.

Our L. T. L. superintendent has been fortunate in obtaining the consummation of her wishes and plans. Through the mail she has, during a lengthened absence, gathered up what L. T. L. reports Oregon had to give. At Wasco was held the first commencement exercises that have taken place in our state. There were five graduates, all doing excellent work, and the program was diversified with music and recitations. Moro has since followed suit, and the pupils are now reading for seals.

At Creswell, an L. T. L. entertainment came off with the interesting features of a drill by the temperance cadets, and a fan drill by sixteen girls.

In the same line of work have been our Demorest medal contests. The third of a series was held at Weston, in which Miss Olive Morgan was the successful candidate.

Yamhill county has had another gold medal contest, and Newberg, as usual carried off the prize, it being awarded to Miss Mary Cook. The Yamhill county executive took the opportunity of being together to do some wise planning with regard to their financial status.

Union county has held its first gold medal contest at Island City, where Miss Fuller won the medal on the "Martyred Mother." The young people were invited to repeat their performances at Elgin for a book prize, which was won this time by Miss Lilah Thomas.

Our superintendent on fairs, etc., Mrs. Shipley, has been called upon to suffer bereavement in the loss of her husband who has ever shown himself a true friend to the W. C. T. U. and to the temperance cause. Hard as she found it to take up life's burden again alone, Mrs. Shipley made a great effort on behalf of her department, gathering in from far and near literature for the state fair held at Salem, in September, and doing what she could since to aid the Portland union at the time of the annual exposition. The report of each must come later on.

Mrs. Delle Coxe, of Newberg, writes that they had a decorated booth on their fair grounds, which was in constant charge of their superintendent of literature. As our National organizer she gave a week to Polk county, attending the annual L. T. L. picnic at Falls City, and speaking at the neighboring town of Dallas, at Monmouth, the seat of our Normal School, at Independence and Buena Vista.

Our state president has lectured at Gardiner and Coquille City. At the former place the union had been energetically circulating a remonstrance petition to the saloon-keepers in accordance with our Oregon law. They succeeded in closing the saloons for a time, and would have succeeded again had not their petition (on which there was a majority of names over the saloon-keepers) been detained in the post-office. Meanwhile the liquor petitions were rushed through the court, and licenses granted.

Mrs. Mary Clement Leavitt spoke several times in Portland the second week in September before large audiences. She stopped en route to California at Ashland, a little place amid the mountains, where she had organized the union in 1884, just before starting on her round-the-world trip. There were but three charter members left to welcome her back again after these arduous years of work and travel.

Our refuge home has had to part with its matron, Mrs. M. T. Kersey, who has filled the post so admirably for four years, and whose health demands rest after such anxious labor. A handsome silver tea set was presented to her on leaving as a testimonial of esteem by the board. Mrs. Updegraff, of Bloomington, Ill., has been secured to fill her place and is already winning the confidence of all under her charge. Another change in the refuge home is a change of quarters. The old house has been all along far too small and inconvenient, and donations have been for some time accumulating in the bank for this purpose. A generous gift of a thousand dollars from Charles N. Crittenton, of New York, has made this change at last possible, and a fine property has been lately purchased on the east side of the Willamette.

Our East side friends have had to mourn the loss of Mrs. G. J. Ross, a woman of strong purpose and Christian character, for many years president of their W. C. T. U.

The department of work among foreigners in Washington, D. C., has been pursued steadily throughout the year, by a leaflet here and a paper there, with a word of advice, encouragement or good cheer as opportunity presented itself. Six thousand pages of literature have been distributed and three visits to the jail have been made. A number have signed the pledge.

PENNSYLVANIA CULLINGS.

Clinton county held its annual convention at Renovo. The church was beautifully decorated. The program was excellent; the paper by the recording secretary on "Can another do my work?" and the president's address were very fine. The discussion of the question, "Can any other Organization do the work of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union?" proved most interesting. Rev. Jordan, familiarly known as the "Texas cyclone," a colored orator of Philadelphia, made the evening address, subject, "How to get there and stay."

The second day Mrs. Rev. Blair conducted an interesting praise service. The corresponding secretary read a very encouraging report. Seven new unions have been organized during the year. The girls' industrial school of Lock Haven closed the school year with an attendance of forty pupils; each was presented with a Bible. Fifteen departments of work are carried on and there are one hundred and fourteen paying members in the county. All agree in pronouncing this one of the best conventions ever held in Clinton county.

The following cheering news comes from Lehigh county: The sixth anniversary of the Girls' Parlor and Reading Room Association of Allentown, was held recently. It has a pleasant room, nicely furnished with piano, chairs, tables, and plenty of good reading; they also have a circulating library of 400 volumes, free to girls and women who visit the rooms; the object in opening the room was for the benefit of the working girls of this city. The aggregate attendance during the year has been 5,483; average attendance nightly of twenty-eight. Books circulated were 2,953.

The annual convention held at Breningsville was one full of interest. Twenty-two delegates answered to the roll-call. The Allentown union maintains a Sunday union gospel temperance meeting which meets quarterly as well as the Girls' Parlor and Reading Room Association.

Huntingdon county held its convention at Huntingdon and received a most cordial welcome. The work all over the county is flourishing. Huntingdon is preparing for a contest. Cassville is in love with Mrs. Mair and her work, and has sent Bibles, scrap books and good reading for the railroad boys. Three Springs union rejoices in a reading room. Huntingdon and Petersburg unions made 325 bouquets for the inmates of the reformatory and their hearts were rejoiced by hearing that the boys carefully treasured the cards and asked permission to take them home with them. Temperance sermons are being preached and great advancement is being made in many ways all over our county.

Excellent reports are received from Fayette county. Mrs. Lulu Luce has charge of press work in that county and is proving a most able superintendent. Bell Vernon union in this county is doing most valiant service in the temperance cause. A very interesting public temperance meeting was held recently at which there was a large attendance. This union numbers twenty-two earnest workers. They furnish teachers with the Monthly Advices.

Perryopolis union held an exceedingly interesting mothers' meeting. The special subject for discussion "One Standard of Purity for both Sexes" was introduced by Mrs. Samuel Luce. Mrs. Dr. Whitsett read an excellent paper on "The Duty of Mothers in Temperance Work." A contest was held with good audience by this union, at which Miss Emma Luce received the medal. Uniontown held a special meeting, at which five mite-boxes were distributed and a collection was taken up. Connellsville union held its election of officers. Mrs. Lillie Bard Edie was elected president; at a special meeting very suggestive papers and addresses were made by the president on our work.

Dunbar union held a public meeting, at which addresses were made by Revs. Mr. Stewart and Mr. Inskeep. The Dunbar Y's hold meetings twice a month. Dunbar Loyal Legion was reorganized, with an enrollment of eighty members at the first meeting. Lawrence county young women are doing most excellent work under the able leadership of Miss Margaret Walker. A fine program for Y night at convention was arranged. Miss Alice Neal's essay on "The Boy's Place in the Home," was especially good; the solos by Mrs. Stevenson and Miss Hamilton were much enjoyed, while the recitations by Mrs. Wood and Miss Ella Stitt were most delightful. Rev. Davis, of New Bedford, and Rev. Godfrey, of Pulaski, each gave brief addresses. The annual address of Mrs. Cynthia S. Holcomb, president of Bucks county, was one of the most masterly productions that we have seen. Lack of space forbids even a synopsis of it.

Blair county held an unusually interesting county convention at Tyrone. Altoona union has a girls' home under their special charge. It has had fourteen girls during the year. A very able paper was read, descriptive of the origin and aims of this home by Mrs. Blair. Mrs. A. M. Holvey made an impressive address on "Government, and the Christian's Relation to It."

MINNESOTA.

HERE AND THERE.

Royalton recently held its third medal contest, in which seven young girls took part, the medal being awarded to Miss Hester Caughey. The local paper, commenting on the contest, says, "Strange the boys do not compete for some of these medals. Are they willing to admit that the girls are so far ahead of them mentally that they dare not enter a contest with them for fear of being defeated? In the three contests already held we believe only one boy has taken part."

Redwood Falls, with a population of 2,000, supports seven saloons and the powers of evil are mighty. But it has also a union of fifty members who are fighting King Alcohol under the leadership of the King of kings. Of even this small band, some have grown faint-hearted. But a few—enough to claim the promise—are working earnestly and faithfully, determined to win. The L. T. L. has made a creditable report for the past year. Aside from the regular weekly meetings considerable industrial and charitable work has been done. Socials have been held every month, one during the summer being made a reception to the "Fresh Air" children who were in the village from the cities; another a reception to the W. C. T. U.

A plan used by this union in the distribution of literature is worthy of mention. Packages of papers, magazines and leaflets are left at the stores with the request that they be sent into the country and given to country customers. Many merchants are very glad to please their customers in this way. Not only temperance literature is thus used, but home papers as well, such as Home Journal, Youth's Companion and the like. The union has a small sum of money laid by, and hopes to so increase it that it may own a home in the not far distant future.

Several persons have written me for the address of the St. Paul paper which so kindly offered us space at our recent state convention. I have answered each inquiry, but for the benefit of others who may not know I wish to give it here. Send all communications to Miss L. Virginia Baldwin, care of St. Paul Daily News, St. Paul, Minn. The Lucy Hayes union of this city has subscribed for a copy of the paper, to be sent to the lady at whose home the union meets; thus all who attend the meeting can see it and get the news from its temperance column.

NEWS IN A NUTSHELL.

At Plattville, Wis., the W. C. T. U. has just held a number of gospel temperance meetings, with W. R. Ladd, as leader.

Temperance literature for missionary purposes could be used to excellent advantage by Mrs. A. L. Burnet, Mt. Pleasant, Utah.

Mrs. Wilson, an ardent white-ribboner of Edgerton, Minn., is seventy-six years old, and has been a faithful worker in temperance for many years.

Bellefonte, Pa., has had Major Hilton in a series of temperance meetings. Cadiz, O., churches joined with the W. C. T. U. in support of Major Hilton's two weeks' course there.

There was an array of American orators rarely seen on a Canadian platform the same evening. The combination consisted of Major and Mrs. E. T. Scott, A. G. Wolfenbarger, J. H. Hector and Prof. A. B. Huckins, the singer. The event was November 3, in Cowan Avenue Methodist church, Toronto, Ont. Each spoke, and each was loudly applauded, with several encores for Professor Huckins. The occasion will long be remembered as an unusual one.

Mrs. Putney, of East Hatley, Quebec, in a recent address stated that women possess the intelligence, conscientiousness and patriotism necessary to make laws of their country. In speaking of the time-worn objection that the polls were not a fit place for women, she raised a genuine laugh by describing a band of women who went to the polls with their husbands, brothers, and the men they were accustomed to mix with in daily social life, dropped their ballots quickly and quietly, and returned home to look after the household dinner, to which the men might or might not return, according as they found the attraction of smoking and hanging round the polls too strong for them.

SEND TO GOOD & REESE, SPRINGFIELD, OHIO for their beautiful catalogue of roses and shrubs

So MANY good things have come for this Crusade number that it is not easy to find a place for them. Here is one from the superintendent of narcotics in New York state, which arrived too late for other location: "As we pause for a glance backward over the twenty years of labor for this sacred cause we are constrained to say, 'What hath God wrought!' In the place of raw recruits we have a well-regulated army with leaders tried and true; in the place of stolid indifference, there is an awakened public conscience, not always ready, it is true, to respond to our forward movements—but we do not have the inertia to contend with that we did in former years. There is not time nor space to enumerate the spoils and the conquests of the years gone by, but grateful for the way our Heavenly Father hath led us; grateful for the many mercies and privileges of this association, feeling that the outlook was never more hopeful we would dedicate ourselves anew to this blessed work. Rejoicing in the record of these score of years we would not rest satisfied but 'forgetting those things which are behind let us press forward unto those things which are before.' There remaineth much land to be possessed."

THE union in Fairport, N. Y., is sixteen years old, organized in 1877, April 16. It has seventy members and is the only temperance organization in the village maintaining a continuous existence. One sister union, the one in South Perinton, on the other side of the town, is but little younger, and both are active centers of loving power. Both these unions stand for all that is pure and strong, zealous, persistent and steadfast in the temperance sentiment of the town. At the town elections these two past years, a large no-license majority has been secured, albeit the will of the people is most shamelessly and illegally disregarded at present. But the women have never wavered for one moment. There has never been any period of "suspended animation," not even of interrupted meetings. Steadily onward, with face to the foe, many a silent, unheralded victory has been gained and many a storm-tossed soul saved from eternal shipwreck. Twenty departments of work have able and devoted leaders, and each fills a niche of steady usefulness all the year. Monroe county, Miss Willard's native county, of which Fairport union has from the first formed a part, is in several matters the banner county of the state, has twelve hundred members and thirty-eight unions, and is a tower of strength for temperance in its vicinity.

THE following account of the germ of the Crusade, and of its planting in fruitful soil to develop finally into the great movement of 1874, is an interesting item for our Crusade number, and is furnished by Mrs. A. E. Sturtevant of Missouri. "Rev. William Jones of the M. E. Church, now presiding elder of the Sedalia, Missouri District, at my request furnishes the following statement of facts: 'At the National camp-meeting at Urbana, O., in August, 1872, there came upon three different women, a very strong and clear conviction that there ought to be definite religious work done for the saloons, and personal effort for drinkers and dealers. One of these ladies was a member of the Quaker church, one a Presbyterian and another a member of my church at Marion, O. In October or November the last mentioned lady made a statement of her convictions to me as her pastor, and we conferred about it. She commenced with a saloon near her own house, and succeeded, the keepers going out of the business. In May, 1873, she, with some others, visited some places in Bucyrus, O., and held religious services in the saloons; one especially vicious place was reformed, and both the proprietors converted. The one that superintended the gambling department joined the Presbyterian church with his wife; for years I was intimately acquainted with him. The other joined the M. E. church, and became an evangelist and I think is still living. This sentiment had been earnestly discussed in the central part of Ohio from this time until December, 1873, when it crystallized in the organized Crusade.' Will some one furnish the names of those three women, as they should be preserved in the history of the movement?"

Treasurer's Corner.

I wish every white-ribboner could sit down in the treasurer's office and read the letters that bring the dimes in response to our president's appeal. Occasionally a dollar bill would cheer your heart, but whether ten cents or a dollar, the words of love and sympathy for our leader and for the National W. C. T. U. that accompanies the gifts are encouraging. Many good brothers are remembering us with gifts.

A Maine man writes: "I have never yet contributed to your work, but wish to begin this year. I am thoroughly in sympathy with your object and wish you God-speed." Enclosed was a contribution for "self, wife and three-year-old Theresa." Note he "begins this year." We know he will continue to help in the years to come.

A good sister from Nebraska says: "Please find one dollar and ten cents in answer to Miss Willard's appeal. The ten cents is from a friend not a white-ribboner." Another: "I enclose one dollar for W. C. T. U. work. I am a temperance woman, but not a member." (May she soon "belong.") She adds, "I am proud of the good work they are doing."

From Ohio comes: "Miss Willard's letter has stirred my heart and moved me to go round among our union to gather dimes. No one refused. I send eight dimes." When the women go around, the "wheels will go around."

Fifty cents comes from Minnesota. "The five are mother, three brothers and sister," writes the sender. "We are glad to do this for Miss Willard, 'the Noble.'"

One young man writes: "I have read with great interest the appeal from Miss Willard for dimes. From me she can have whatever she asks if I've got it. I enclose my dime and some for a few women who ought to belong, but don't."

Massachusetts headquarters sends a dime each for five officers.

From a good sister in Canada comes a loving letter with a dime and words of cheer as to the prospects of prohibition in Ontario.

From Maine: "In response to Miss Willard's call, I send five dimes instead of one and will 'do it now and be done with it.'"

A white-ribboner from Pennsylvania says: "My prayers shall follow the offering, for I know this work is part of the kingdom of Christ." I love to think that every dime is the expression of a heart's prayer for our blessed work.

From New Jersey comes thirty-two cents.

Two cents come from a dear baby boy, who heard his mother read the appeal. He had three pennies, but insisted that one should be sent Miss Willard direct by mail.

A Michigan sister writes: "Find enclosed postal note for one dollar, ten cents for my assessment and ninety cents for nine poor worthy sisters who are unable to pay."

One of our National lecturers took a collection immediately upon reading the call and sent the result. But I could fill THE UNION SIGNAL with these encouraging items, and I have only a little corner. At Headquarters we all say, "May God bless every donor of every dime." Every name will be recorded, and each state credited with the amount sent from its men and women.

HELEN M. BARKER,
National Treasurer.

Cor. Secy's Notes.

[This department is established for the benefit of the workers, the entire two hundred thousand who make up the busy W. C. T. U. hive. It is hoped that the interchange of thought between the National corresponding secretary and the local, county, district or state officers, which here finds expression, may stimulate to renewed effort and lead to a closer bond of union. Extracts from letters will be given, questions answered and difficulties explained. It will be an "Open Parliament" to which all are welcome.]

There come to us earnest appeals for the help of speakers and organizers, accompanied with the statement repeated in many pathetic ways of the poverty of unions. We sympathize with each and all of these, and would that we might meet the demand, but our National organizers are women without money, and the little they gather by the way is the supply of the necessaries of life. They can neither travel nor give their service without remuneration, while the National W. C. T. U. has a sadly depleted treasury, from which no financial aid can be proffered.

That W. C. T. U. work must not cease nor suspend, is, however, certain, and as there is no independence so satisfactory as that which comes from helping ourselves, I venture to propose a plan which I trust will be helpful:

Miss Willard has always advocated free meetings, believing a fee, however small, will limit the number of hearers, but we think she, would if here, agree with us that the financial status of our country warrants an equal distribution of the expense of meetings, by which no one will be burdened, but all will be blessed. I have seen the plan tried with much success, having known money left in the treasury of twenty-six out of twenty-seven unions after all expenses were paid.

When a speaker or organizer is desired, ascertain exactly her charge. A church or hall will, no doubt, be donated, but the expense of janitor, fire and light is often met by the union, unless a noble generosity leads the trustees to contribute all. Calculate the necessary outgo for advertising; then finding the aggregate of these items, sell tickets enough at ten cents each to raise the full amount before the date of the meeting. Five desirable things will thus be secured: 1. Through sale of the tickets there will be a large advertisement of the meeting. 2. An audience is assured. 3. The money required is raised. 4. Women will be relieved from anxiety, and able to enter heartily into the work. 5. Every penny taken at the door will be a bonus to the local treasury.

We believe this to be a practical way of meeting the desired end, and a few energetic women will accomplish great things by the effort. Will not unions try the plan? We will gladly give all information possible concerning speakers, organizers, etc.

A large amount of literature was donated from time to time during the World's Fair for general distribution. A quantity remains which we will be glad to send out upon receipt of postage; 25 "Total Abstinence" leaflets for one cent, or 22 on other topics for one cent (as per size and weight).

A letter just received from Miss Clara Parrish, Y organizer, tells us of six unions organized since the National Convention. Who would not like to be in her parish? and who will send for her to come and do likewise in their community?

Dr. Louise C. Purington, 3 Park street, Boston, superintendent franchise department, greatly desires to push Colorado's victory for woman's ballot into every state, and wishes a superintendent of franchise in each. Will each state union where a W. C. T. U. superintendent has not been appointed respond to her request, and making such appointment immediately, forward to her the full address of the appointee?

The president of N. J., W. C. T. U. writes that her "state union thinks the fullness of time has come to remove the black patch from their map, and proposes to work the coming winter for scientific temperance instruction in public schools." Mrs. Hunt's counsel has already been sought.

Mrs. Mary J. Weaver, National evangelist, writes of more invitations for evangelistic work than she is able to fill. She is now in the Metropolitan M. E. Church of Washington, D. C., where she expects to remain six weeks, after which she will be steadily employed for the winter in New York.

We heartily welcome the return to labor (though in somewhat limited degree) of our beloved National evangelist, Mrs. S. M. I. Henry. Though not yet able to travel a long distance from home, she will respond to calls in Chicago, and the region round about for afternoon meetings, Bible readings and general W. C. T. U. work.

MARY A. WOODBRIDGE.

Organizers' Corner.

STATUS OF ORGANIZERS.

The mistaken idea prevails in many portions of the country that a National organizer is fitted only to organize new unions, whereas she must be a public speaker as well, especially prepared to enthuse and instruct the masses in regard to the distinctive features of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. She must be a woman of tact, consecration and knowledge of our many departments, willing to enter difficult fields, enlist new workers, strengthen and enlarge unions already formed as well as organize new ones, and instruct in regard to our special methods. Our National organizers are carefully selected by our National executive committee, and elected by the Convention.

By the coöperation and concerted action of the state and county officers, the stronger unions may help the weaker, and greatly benefit their own work by employing the National organizers while going to and from their distant fields of labor, thereby reducing their traveling expenses, which will enable them to give lower rates at each point.

The following is the list of National organizers for the present year, and whether W's or Y's they are all accredited public speakers and fully prepared to organize W's, Y's, L. T. L's, or speak to the general public and add to the membership of unions, having been long in the work.

For terms and dates address as below:

Mrs. Helen L. Bullock, Elmira, N. Y.
Mrs. L. H. Washington, Port Jervis, N. Y.
Miss Frances E. Griffin, Montgomery, Ala.
Mrs. Mary Bynon Reese, Chautauqua, Wash.
Mrs. Emily Pitt Stevens, 1907 Bush street, San Francisco, Cal.
Mrs. E. A. Blair, 936 Cottage Place, Los Angeles, Cal.
Mrs. Maude L. Green, Manitou Springs, Col.
Mrs. E. Norinne Law, Baraga, Mich.
Miss Belle Kearney, Flora, Miss.
Mrs. Delle H. Cox, Newberg, Ore.
Miss Ida Clothier, Manitou Springs, Col.
Mrs. Henrietta Skelton, 132 McAlister street, San Francisco, Cal.
Miss S. C. Harris, Franklin, Va.
Mrs. F. E. W. Harper, Bainbridge street, Philadelphia, Pa.
Miss Clara Parrish, Paris, Ill.
Miss Carrie Lee Carter, Dexter, Mo.
Miss Frances Ensign, Madison, O.
Mrs. E. A. Kenyon, Townshend, Vt.

This "Corner" may be obliged to try several positions before it finds just the niche it can best fill, but it is the desire of the editors of THE UNION SIGNAL, and of the chairman of the board of organizers, that the list of names be kept standing in the paper, and that each organizer feel free to insert an itineracy of her engagements.

NATIONAL TEMPERANCE HOSPITAL.

The Trustees of the National Temperance Hospital met in quarterly conference in the pleasant parlors of that institution at 1619 Diversey Ave., Monday, December 4. The recent heavy fall of snow and severe cold weather did not prevent a large attendance. In fact, the more stringent the times, and more severe the weather, the more the hearts of the people turn to works humane, as shown by a letter received from a Mr. Cobb, living in Kalamazoo county, Mich., saying, that his mother, who had passed on before, left one hundred dollars by will to the Temperance Hospital. This is the second bequest of the kind that has quite recently cheered the hearts of the directors as showing a growing interest in the work, and they dare to express the hope that, as the good results become wider known, they will be remembered by large gifts and endowments as that will be the only way they can do the amount of charity work that the cause seems to demand. The meeting was highly satisfactory; patients are doing well; sanitary conditions are excellent, expenditures well looked after, and no debts. An all-day's session made it necessary to test the qualifications of the cook, as well as the management of the matron, both of which were found to be "not wanting." We submit the report of the house physician for the quarter ending December 1st.

No critical cases now in the house. There have been three typhoid cases; one, Mrs. E. A. Russell, having recovered. Two cases are now in the hospital, one of which is a nurse. They are both on the road to recovery. One of our medical cases was that of myxœdema. This disease has been considered incurable, but the patient has now returned to her home in Mississippi, very greatly improved. With a continuation of the treatment, Dr. Sarah Hackett Stevenson regards her case cured. There have been five capital operations.

Patients having left the hospital, have been entirely cured or greatly benefited.

TOMMIE'S CHRISTMAS CRUSADE.

BY ADA M. MELVILLE.

"COME, Tommie! Come! The mush is getting cold. You will freeze out there. What boys find to enjoy in snow and ice I don't see. Come in, child, and be thankful for your warm breakfast. There's many a boy would be glad this morning for the scraps you leave and the hot fire you run away from."

Tommie's mother pushed her little son gently in and shut the door, through which the wind was blowing little white flurries of snow, and Tommie danced and whistled through the big sunny kitchen into the dining-room where the "piping hot" breakfast stood waiting.

"Merry Chris'mus!" he shouted, taking a hop, skip and jump into his father's arms and from then hugging each of his uncles by turn. "Ain't it just fine out, though? Colder'n Greenland and snowing so's we can go sledding before noon. Guess the mill-pond's frozen over and Big Hill will be ready for coasting. Hurrah!—Merry Chris'mus, gran'ma!"

A dear old lady wearing a white cap entered the room just as Tommie finished his long speech, and he ran to give her a Christmas hug and kiss, though he had to be more gentle than he had been with the others.

"A merry Christmas, little man! May you never have a less happy one."

She kissed him and as she passed around to her chair, said, looking out at the storm, "I wish all the boys and girls could have a warm breakfast in a warm room this morning. You're a rich boy, my lad."

Tommie gave himself a little shake. He didn't want to be reminded of the troubles of other little boys and girls when he was so comfortable. Somehow it spoiled his mush and milk and made his mutton-chop taste less good. But he soon managed to forget what mother and grandmother had said in planning how he would spend the day. There were a new sled, new skates, new mittens and a fur cap that would keep Jack Frost away from ears and forehead. Wouldn't he have a good time, though?

All this time he was not listening to what the grown-up folks at the table were talking about, until his attention was called back by hearing his grandmother say, "Yes, it was a happy day for me twenty years ago when John gave up his saloon."

"What?" cried Tommie, "did grandpa keep a saloon?"

No one smiled at his question, for those unhappy days were passed and gone and there had been no need for the little boy to know about them. However, now that grandma had mentioned it the story would have to be finished, for Tommie was a thoughtful little fellow and asked a great many questions.

"Come to my room after we have had prayers and I will tell you about it," said grandma.

Tommie looked a wee bit disappointed, but to tell the truth, it was always hard to choose between any kind of a good time and grandmother's stories. Besides he wanted to know all about the saloon,—such a dreadful thing, and he never had heard of it—so the sled and skates, mittens and cap could wait.

Grandma's room was big and sunshiny, and the little fellow did not find it a bit hard to curl down on the soft rug before the fire while she took her knitting and began. Tommie usually liked to find pictures in the fire, but the story was so interesting, he turned his back to the merry blaze and forgot all about it as he watched grandma's face and listened.

"It is just twenty years," said the old lady, "since John stood behind his bar, while a lady with white hair like mine—mine was black then—knelt down with me and we prayed that he might be led to give up the place."

So the story went on, and Tommie for the first time in his life understood what "The Crusade" really was and understood just why mother and grandmother always wore a tiny bow of white ribbon.

"Then after the saloon was closed up, your grandfather opened a grocery store right in the same place, and when poor people came to buy he always gave them over measure because he said he could never make up for the harm he had done when he sold beer and whisky. We had never been happy—really happy—before, but after my husband gave up his old ways, and obeyed our Heavenly Father, we were happy and prosperous."

Tommie rolled over and stared at the fire awhile, and grandma's needles clicked busily. Then he rolled back. "Is there any Crusade now?" he asked.

"Always, dear. It has never stopped. Aren't you learning every day from mother and father and uncles, in church, at school, and in your L. T. L. to fight against wrong, particularly the drink wrong?"

"Yes'm; only I never thought much about it. Can I go now?"

So he ran away and soon was at the top of Big Hill and then spinning down on the beautiful sled. There was a little house half way up Big Hill, a poor little house that Tommie always hated because it stood right in the middle of what would have been a lovely slide, and the boys' sleds all had to curve around the little house and sometimes they ran into it and were upset. Three times that morning Tommie's sled went bump against the side of the house and spoiled three elegant "spins." The third time he stood still and looked at it. He could see his own home from where he stood, the smoke curling up from the chimneys, and the pretty plants in the windows. Then he looked at the little house and was surprised to see no smoke at all, and the windows all thick with frost. The old shed behind the house had no wood in it.

Tommie knew who lived there—Charlie Petersen and his widowed mother. She took in washing for a living. Yes, and Charlie's father used to drink. They were very poor in the little house. Tommie stood there kicking the snow with his feet and thinking a queer jumble about Crusades, Christmas times in a little house that hadn't enough fire to make a smoke, hot breakfasts, cold breakfasts, new sleds or no sleds at all, white ribbons, and little boys fighting such a big thing as King Alcohol.

He never knew quite how he came to do it, but after he had stood there so long that the falling snow covered him from head to foot so that he looked like a snow man, he went up and knocked at the little door. After a long while Charlie opened it, and his blue eyes all swollen with crying, grew very round when he saw Tommie.

"Merry Chris'mus," said Tommie, and then wished he hadn't for there wasn't anything merry to be seen.

Boys have ways of finding things out and soon Tommie knew that there had been no fire in the house for several hours, that the poor mother was sick, and half a loaf of bread, a few potatoes, no wood and no money was the lookout for the days to come. Tommie didn't say much, but the sled went flying down Big Hill and soon he stood in his own warm kitchen panting out the story.

"And I thought we could—could crusade, you know. Mother can fix up a chicken and things and I can haul some wood on my sled—may I?"

"Yes, my boy, you may 'crusade.' Drink has done much mischief in the little house on Big Hill and perhaps a little kindness now will save Charlie from being like his father."

So the red sled began its journeys up and down Big Hill and the smoke soon curled from the little chimney. Mrs. Petersen was sitting up in bed, looking almost happy at the promise that by and by Tommie's mother would make her a visit and "straighten things up."

Tommie had made his last trip and was watching Charlie as he buried his sharp, white teeth in a big slice of plain cake. He fumbled around in his pocket and edged toward the door. Just as he opened it he tossed something over to Charlie crying "catch!" It was his bank. He had been saving money to buy himself a bicycle, and father was to help him when he had saved twenty dollars. He had only saved five. It was not easy to give it up but he wanted to make sure he was doing all he could to "crusade" and help Charlie and his mother so they would never, never "take to drinking." He pulled the door shut after him and then popped his head in again. "Merry Chris'mus!" he shouted at the top of his voice and this time Charlie's face and his mother's were full of Christmas joy as they answered back, "a merry, merry Christmas, Tommie," and the little fellow went flying down the hill again very happy over his first crusade and glad he had heard about grandmother's Crusade memories of twenty years before.

LEARN to speak one little word
  In its proper place;
Let no timid doubt be heard
  Clothed with sceptic grace;
Let thy lips without disguise
  Boldly pour it out,
Though a thousand dulcet lies
  Keep hovering about.
For be sure our lives would lose
  Future years of woe
If our courage could refuse
  The present hour with "No."

DEAR BOYS AND GIRLS:—Have you not heard your mothers and elder sisters talking about plans for a Crusade camp fire? And did you not wonder what it meant? Perhaps you imagined a large bonfire to which each would bring a big log and around which the company would gather.

The celebration which the temperance mothers are planning has been well named a camp fire, but the fire, though a real one, will burn in their hearts at the remembrance of the great wrongs caused by the saloon power and the logs which blaze so bright will be the memories of the great Crusade of 1874, which was the beginning of the W. C. T. U. and woman's active temperance work.

Do you know what the woman's Crusade was? Ask your mother to tell you. Study the beautiful picture which our artist has drawn for the cover of this paper to illustrate the Crusade. Hearing or reading about it will inspire you to do your utmost to bring about the victory over King Alcohol in the bloodless battle of which the great Crusade was only the beginning.

Yours for the new Crusade,

Aunt Jane

NEPHEWS AND NIECES.

We all go to the L. T. L. after school every Wednesday. There are more than 150 members. Our teacher gives us nice lessons, and we write essays about them. I hope we will soon have prohibition. I want to do all for temperance I can. I hope you will accept a Canadian niece,

Parrsboro, Nova Scotia. EDITH AVORA MACLEOD.

A warm welcome to the temperance girl from Nova Scotia. Don't you wish we could hear some of the essays written by that splendid Loyal Temperance Legion, children?

We are L. T. L. children in the little town of Pryor Creek, I. T. We wish that you could come and see us. Our motto is "Touch not, taste not, handle not the unclean thing." We learn a proverb every Saturday and we are going to grow up to be temperance men and women.

FAWN NASH, JANIE VAUN,
ROXIE BATES, MATTIE PHARIS,
GRACIE MILLER, MASTER LOVE PARKER.

Crowd right into our corner, little ones. Here's just the place for a group with such a motto and aim. May the good promise be fulfilled for each one of you.

I thought I would write what we are doing away down South here in Louisiana. We have a W. C. T. U. and Loyal Temperance Legion here in our town, and we do not have any saloons here, but I do wish they would send some missionary to teach among the natives, for they drink and dip snuff so bad. MARJORIE MOORE.

Jennings, La.

And I wish so, too. May you grow up to be a little home missionary yourself, Marjorie.

I am a little boy ten years old. I will always stand up for temperance. I would like to be a member of the Cozy Corner. Mamma takes THE UNION SIGNAL and we all like it very much. LOUIS VAN ZANDT.

Willington, Conn.

The boy who "will always stand up for temperance" is just the sort for the Cozy Corner. Salute him, nephews and nieces.

CHRISTMAS GIFTS FOR THE HOSPITAL.

Letters from all parts of the country are constantly inquiring, "What can our union do for the hospital?" The last few weeks they ask, "What do you need most? We wish to send something for Christmas."

In answer I would say, anything you use in your homes can be utilized in our large family. Beside the sick ones, there are several in health with good appetites, to be fed three times daily, hence, flour, cornmeal, cereals, sugar, rice, poultry, eggs, potatoes, apples, cabbage, onions, canned fruits, etc., will be very acceptable. Blankets, towels, napkins, table cloths, (four yards long), are among the needs in this line. The latest works in good books are often asked for. Money to buy chairs for the dining room, also a set of dishes, is solicited. In former years the hearts of our nurses were made glad by receiving from the Y's nice white aprons.

There is on the top floor in the hospital a neat diet kitchen where nurses are trained to prepare delicacies for the sick, perhaps you would like to contribute to that.

Crackers of fancy makes, wafers, arrowroot, gelatine, pink and white sea-moss, celery salt and nice flavorings are some of the required articles. When you pack your box please do not forget to put an address on a slip of paper inside, in order that we may know to whom we should acknowledge the receipt of the box. Scarcely a week but boxes or barrels come without a line to tell from whence they come. Soon letters will come asking if we had "not received such and such a box. Our W. C. T. Union sent one, have heard nothing from you." Then we write to them to describe the contents, after which we look in the list of receipts marked "unknown" and find them. We then write them they have been received, all of which takes time, stationery and postage stamps, which in a year amounts to more than you have any idea of.

In another way the friends can aid us—when ordering literature or reports to enclose stamps for return postage. Please do not forget to prepay charges to the hospital as there is no fund for that purpose; prepaying to Chicago does not mean to the hospital. The express companies have their limits for free delivery. We are outside of those limits, hence we are charged for delivering goods. As this is not entirely a free hospital the companies will not deliver free of charge as they do to free institutions. When the friends understand how much that means to the hospital, we are sure all their presents will come prepaid.

Wishing you all a Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year, I remain,

Yours in all good work,
MRS. SARAH M. HORNBY, Matron.

Three and a half years ago, every time I picked up my 'Journal' to read, the first thing I would see was your advertisement and picture of PEARLINE. I got so tired of looking at it that I said I would get a package and try it. The result was, when the package was gone, I bought another package, and so I have done ever since. I never think of going to wash clothes since, without my PEARLINE. I have recommended it to quite a number of people, who are now using it, just from my recommendation. I have just written this to you to let you know how highly I prize it. I don't want my name and address to go before the public."*

The bill for the admission of Utah to the United States was passed by the House of Representatives December 13, two important amendments being added to the enabling act: The prohibition of polygamy forever and the reduction to one-half of the land granted to the state for common school purposes.

THE UNION SIGNAL is fortunate in securing for publication the famous "Round Robin Letters" of Hannah Whitall Smith. Every old reader of our paper will remember the delightful Bible readings that Mrs. Smith formerly furnished us, and no doubt wonders why they were not continued. The editors have often importuned "our Hannah" for copy, but since her residence in England she has been so occupied with various duties that such contributions have seemed out of the question. We are, therefore, the more gratified that these personal letters, written primarily for a half hundred American friends, have found place in our columns. The series is inaugurated in this issue, and will be continued at intervals during the year.

WE share the disappointment of our readers in the absence of the corresponding secretary's notes in this issue. Mrs. Woodbridge had them carefully prepared but an unusual pressure of material crowded them out. They will appear next week and, we trust, regularly thereafter. The same is true of the organizers' corner.

"NO TAXATION without representation" was the key-note again struck by the Massachusetts Woman's Suffrage Association in its celebration, at Faneuil Hall last Saturday, of the 120th anniversary of the famous "Boston Tea Party"—this time in favor of not only the 28,000 women who pay taxes upon one hundred million dollars of property in Boston alone, but for all the women in the state. May Faneuil Hall prove as appropriate a cradle for woman's enfranchisement as it did for the great cause a century ago.

GREATLY to our regret we announce the resignation of Mrs. Daisy Hubbard Carlock as secretary of the Chicago Central W. C. T. U. and leader of the Willard Hall noon meetings. Mrs. Carlock has endeared herself to the hundreds who have attended the noon meetings, and will be keenly missed there and at the Illinois and Chicago headquarters. She has accepted a position in Berea College, Kentucky, in order to be with her two little fatherless boys. The warmest wishes of all her former co-laborers accompany her. It is gratifying to know that a worthy successor has been selected for Willard Hall—Mrs. Jane Eggleston Zimmerman, of Evanston, Ill., who is a white-ribboner of unusual ability and culture, and possessed of much experience in gospel temperance work.

BY inadvertence, our paragraph concerning the President's message, delivered to Congress December 4, was omitted from last week's paper. It is too late now to discuss the message at length, but we cannot afford to ignore two important points which relate particularly to our interests. One is a recommendation that Congress pass an act "prohibiting the sale of arms and intoxicants" by our citizens to the natives of Central Africa. While it may seem to many that it is a simple matter to recommend the prohibition of the liquor traffic in far-distant Africa, we wish to emphasize the fact that no other President has taken so decided and progressive a stand on this vital question. The other point concerns international arbitration, in the shape of a resolution passed by the British Parliament on the 16th of July last, "cordially sympathizing with the purpose in view" and promising "ready coöperation with the United States." President Cleveland adds: "It affords me signal pleasure to lay this parliamentary resolution before the Congress and to express my sincere gratification that the sentiment of two great and kindred nations is thus authoritatively manifest in favor of the rational and peaceable settlement of international quarrels by honorable resort to arbitration." Whether or no Congress takes action on these measures, we are rejoiced that the highest executive of our nation has given out no uncertain sound.

SOME surprising revelations were made at the recent meeting of the American Federation of Labor in Chicago. It was a matter of newspaper comment that the convention as a whole was not in favor of compulsory arbitration, which as one delegate put it, "seemed like a severe comment on our boasted progress at a time when one of the most conservative European governments has just declared in favor of the principle." The discussion, however, brought out many strong counter arguments deduced from the practical application of the principle, showing that fair and impartial arbitrators were hard to secure and that laborers would be at the mercy of capitalists who would demand too frequent compromises, and that it meant the death-blow of the labor organizations, by a weakening of interest among members. Our great wonder, however, during the week, has been that a deliberative body having under consideration the welfare of the laborer, could totally ignore his greatest foe, because an unremitting and subtle one—the liquor traffic. The subjection and lack of political representation of many thousands of laborers, too, the suffrageless sex, was not even considered among the various far-reaching resolutions. Compulsory education, direct legislation, a legal eight-hour work day, sanitary inspection of workshop, mine and home; liability of employers for physical disability, abolition of contract labor in all public work, abolition of the sweating system, municipal ownership of street cars, electric light and gas plants; nationalization of telegraphs, telephone, railways and mines; collective ownership by the people of all means of production and distribution, the principle of referendum in all legislation, unite a number of good planks, but we express most emphatically our amazement that the brothers of the labor confederation should blindly omit from their platform two such important and strengthening beams as these we have indicated. The arguments in favor of these principles are incontrovertible.

MR. STEAD has furnished us another occasion for an editorial paragraph, and this time we are so delighted that we can almost forgive him (although he has not asked us to) for all he has said against us and our methods. The Chicago people have listened to Mr. Stead with the patience and good-nature that is characteristic of Americans, but it does seem to be almost beyond the demands of either courtesy or self-respect to receive without rebuke such a statement as the gentleman in question made in Willard Hall last Tuesday, to wit: "That half drunken man (whose wisdom he had been extolling) had more sense in his intoxicated brain than your sober noggins contain." Considering that Mr. Stead was speaking chiefly to an audience of temperance ladies in their own hall the remark was far from polite, to say the least. Mrs. Carse had cheerfully granted him the use of the hall, since he felt that his views had been misinterpreted, and the cozy little auditorium was well filled on the day mentioned, chiefly by white-ribboners, and Mr. Stead's particular admirers. The latter were hearty in their applause as the Londoner proceeded to point out Chicago's necessities and remedies. In one breath he denounced the temperance people as "half-hearted," and in another as "intemperate fanatics." He finally reached the end of his remarks and many a weary listener wondered if that intelligent audience could not furnish a speaker who would in a breath demolish the sophistries of our brother's suggestions. At this juncture, Mrs. Carlock, the leader of the meeting, introduced Mrs. Helen M. Barker, who in ten minutes' time covered pointedly, eloquently and conclusively the arguments for total prohibition of the liquor traffic versus the monopolized regulation that Mr. Stead had recommended. The applause was frequent and tremendous, and we confess that we never heard a more finished and logical speech, albeit it was quite impromptu. So kind and courteous was it, that when in closing Mrs. Barker referred with eloquence and gratitude to Mr. Stead's invaluable services to the cause of social purity, the very hearers who had most heartily applauded her prohibition sentiments showed that they could bestow honor where honor is due. White-ribboners have been characterized as minute women, but never did an occasion more truly show their ability in this direction. We do not object to Mr. Stead's crusade against wrong and destitution in this country, but we do protest against his representations of the conditions of the New World as far worse than those of the Old, and for the distrust of all existing forms of organized effort which his criticisms create in the minds of the idle and vicious. This is a time when confidence needs to be strengthened rather than weakened.

BELLS.

BY C. B. BROWN.

Columbian bells are ringing, we catch the joyous strain,
And every rocky hillside repeats the glad refrain;
Just hear the joyful story! There is a time to be,
When every son and daughter from bondage will be free;
The body free from poison that comes from Asia's plains,
The body free from poison the sunny southland drains,
The body free from poison that comes from out the still;
The soul alone submissive to gracious heavenly will.
And with those bells a-ringing,
There come the children singing:—
"There is to workers weary a blessed, coming rest,
When right and law together shall plan for all the best."

The bell that told the story there was one nation free,
Has been reverberating all through the century,
And louder now its echoes than all the years before;
It rings through hills and valleys, and sounds from shore to shore,
And 'tis the grandest anthem the world has ever heard,
Since angels with their voices the hills of Bethlehem stirred;
And with those echoes pealing
There comes a message stealing
In loving, gentle murmurs, like mother's song at eve—
That tells the faithful toilers there is no need to grieve;
The precious seed they're sowing, though hidden long from sight,
Will many wains o'erburden the coming harvest night.

Another bell is bringing a tale from proud Japan;
Of all the Eastern nations, she clearly leads the van;
She hails each new idea, and gladly takes the best—
Witness the welcome given to Mary Allen West;
And 'tis the same blest story of greatness yet to be,
When Christ, our Lord, at coming, shall set the nations free.
At coming! He is with us; our hearts, with love, that burn
Are going on to Emmaus, there lessons sweet to learn.
And with that bell a-tolling,
There comes a joyful rolling
Of ocean's waves, with tidings of many souls set free,
As dawns a clearer knowledge of what makes liberty.

The Christmas bells are chiming, we hear them once again,
Glad Christmas bells repeating the ever welcome strain
Of "Peace on earth," the story the same the angels told
That night the shepherds, watching beside the quiet fold,
Saw light so brightly gleaming they knew 'twas from above,
For earth had no effulgence to match that light of love.
And with those bells a-chiming,
The children's cycle timing,
And every heart so tender because a child was born—
With praise and loving-kindness we greet the Christmas morn.

HOW A CHRISTMAS DREAM CAME TRUE.

A Beautiful Time that Everybody Was In.

BY ELIZABETH BOYNTON HARBERT, PH. D.

"You must have been enjoying a most delightful dream, my dear, if one may judge by the smiles with which your face has been beaming," said Judge Ainsee to his wife as he sat by her side gently moving the hammock in which she had been enjoying a short sleep.

"Yes, indeed, it was a most beautiful dream, and one certain to come true, since with your aid I intend to bring it to pass. Oh, it was such a beautiful sight, such a joyous time; it almost seems as though the children's good angel had pictured it to me. I dreamed that it was Christmas morning; the brightest, gladdest, merriest Christmas morning that ever dawned upon our pleasant village, for throughout our entire limits there was not one cold, hungry or neglected child, consequently not one bitter, heart-stricken father or mother. It was so blessed, so glad, so Christlike; and it was all done so easily. As I think of it, I believe that at this very hour, right here in our own town, Christian people have enough unused toys, clothing, books and luxuries, which if shared would render every little shivering, ragged, hungry child in our midst comfortable, happy and content, at least for one glad day."

"Really, Louise, you wax almost eloquent in your enthusiasm; I thought you were the busiest person in the community already, and now, in addition to your own family you propose to adopt all the children of the village."

"Never too busy, I hope, to gladden a child's heart if I can, and each Christmas morning, as I have seen our own darlings almost surfeited with presents, my pleasure has been marred by the thought of sister-women in the homes of poverty, agonizing over the heartaches and disappointments of their precious little ones; so, taking a merely selfish view of it, I do not know of anything that would make me so happy as the thought that every child in our village had plenty to eat and to wear; that every boy had a drum or a box of tools, or a book, and every girl a doll."

"Take care, Louise! You would better think twice, as Santa Claus may put you to the test. Do you really think that money enough to make your dream come true would be the best gift you could have?"

"Oh, I am sure of it."

" 'Certain sure,' as the children say?"

"Yes, 'dead sure.' "

Judge Ainsee's hand slipped from the hammock rope and disappeared within the depths of his pocket, from whence he drew a bank check endorsed to his wife's order to the amount of five hundred dollars. He smoothed the check carefully and then said as he placed it in her hand: "Well, then, here it is. I had been planning to surprise you with this for the long coveted new piano, but if you prefer to thrum away on the old one and make your new music in the hearts of the children, you can commence to organize your orchestra at once."

"Oh, a piano!" leaped from the lips of music loving Louise Ainsee, and for a moment she looked wistfully at the check, but soon she smiled through happy tears, meanwhile laughingly wiping some suspicious drops from the face of the kind-hearted Judge as she said, her voice vibrating with happiness: "Oh, I am sure that this will be the merriest, happiest Christmas that we have ever passed. I will go to the city to-morrow to purchase the dolls, and then give a 'lunch and thimble party' where the ladies can assist me in dressing them. The associated charities and Woman's Benevolent Association will aid with mittens and stockings. The school teachers, ministers, doctors and the editors will coöperate in devising plans for finding the children. We will have the churches thrown open for some inspiring, free organ concerts, and we will secure the most blessed time this village has ever enjoyed, since to everybody will be offered the luxury of doing something for somebody else."

. . . . . .

There was intense excitement produced by a tremor of glad anticipation at "Round House Center" on a certain afternoon in December, when the merry jingle of sleigh-bells clanged through the frosty air, while at the end of the short alley an unusual picture appeared upon the snow-white canvas of that usually dull, gray neighborhood, as a handsome sleigh came into view.

The spirited horses, the smiling, portly, fur-coated driver, were very suggestive of pictures of Santa Claus; the young girl occupants of the sleigh were radiant with delight and conscious responsibility, while the "big brother"—who accompanied them riding his pony in order to make his way through any alleys too narrow for the passage of the sleigh,—seemed to be serving as a mounted guard, and also as the purveyor of dignity for the occasion.

A sleigh and a pony in this narrow alley were so unusual that in a moment a score of open-eyed children, a half-dozen hungry looking dogs and several half-starved cats had rushed together in a motley group anxious to see what was to happen next.

With eyes sparkling and cheeks flushing red with the glad excitement, Marian, Bessie and Louise sorted the invitations again and again, and with matronly caution charged Donald to see to it that every boy and girl received one. Now the mystery deepened. As the manly boy approached the thoroughly anxious little group he doffed his cap and inquired if Mary O'Flinn and Bridget McCartney, and Gretchen Graham and Patrick Finnegan and Hans Boker lived there? As half a dozen voices shouted "Yes!" he produced the small, pink and white "little letters," each one correctly addressed and signed by Santa Claus, inviting them to meet him at Union Hall on Christmas eve, and the best part of it all was as the children crowded about Donald Ainsee, and little grimy hands eagerly grasped the invitations, there was one for every child. So thoroughly had the preliminary work been done, that not a child had been overlooked, and amid a chorus of somewhat naive but heartfelt "Thank yous," Donald Ainsee rejoined his sisters as they hastened on their mission of love.

. . . . . .

Christmas eve in Washington; Christmas eve in Paris; Christmas eve in palace and in hovel, in crowded cities and on prairies lone. To-night the Christian world bows down with gifts of gold, frankincense and myrrh. On this festal night pealing bells and childish voices ring out or chant their grateful praises to the erst-time Babe of Bethlehem.

In quiet country homes sturdy little yeomen hang their home-made stockings by the wide-mouthed chimneys, and upon Christmas morning shout and rejoice and hold as high carnival over their sugar hearts and pop-corn, their home-made dolls and sleds, as do the richly clad children of luxury over their imported toys and costly bon-bons.

The homes of rich and poor alike are haunted by little white ghosts that flit from chimney corner to crib, with eyes that "will come unbottened," as, like little juvenile Micawbers, they "wait for something to turn up."

The happiest town in all the world, I ween, was that of "Union Center," where Mrs. Ainsee's dream came true, and the people found that a village in which every child was happy and glad was a little section of paradise. As Mrs. Ainsee had prophesied, every one had caught the contagion, and the churches had been opened, and many homes had yielded up their treasures of toys, books and clothing, selfishly hoarded for years. Little children had found great delight in weaving the garlands and helping to dress the dolls.

The contagion spread until a committee of gentlemen said: "Why not include the children of a larger growth, and see to it that no one in our midst is cold or hungry or forgotten on this glad day?" And so it came about that loads of coal and appetizing turkeys, warm flannels and comfortable bedding were provided for every home.

After it was all over and Judge and Mrs. Ainsee with their happy children were grouped about the fire, little Marian exclaimed: "If it is such fun and so easy to make everybody happy for one day, why don't the big folks study how to do it every day? Mamma, dear, suppose you dream next time that the good time lasted all the year round."

"You couldn't do it, no use trying, unless you dream the liquor saloons out of the way and devise some way to cure all the sick folks," somewhat hastily replied our philosophical Donald.

"Well, children, who knows but that some of your mother's strange dreams about those matters may come true," replied the father. "You know that she insists that one chief cause of drunkenness is poverty and idleness and lack of amusements and social enjoyment. I met our wise, old Doctor Allbright this afternoon and he said: 'Judge, I begin to believe that that wife of yours is more than half right, after all, in her ideas about health and happiness being contagious, and that love will work miracles where punishment sometimes fails, for the fact is that I have never known as happy a community as this has been during the past two days and I do not know of a single case of severe illness in the town.' Even the liquor saloons are closed to-night. I just met Jack Downing and Pat Dugan and asked them how it happened; they said: 'Sure, and whin we saw ivery one thryin' to make the children so aisy and happy we hadn't the heart to sell the liquor to their fathers and brothers; an' sure an' yez know yoursel' that what preachin,' an' prayin', too, for that matter, won't make yez do, the besachin' eyes of a little gurl has done money the time. Good luck to 'em.' "

And who knows but at last the nations will listen to the loving question and command still echoing from the hills of Palestine, "Simon, Simon, lovest thou me?" "Feed my lambs."

THE BRITISH AND AMERICAN GOVERNMENTS AND THE OPIUM TRAFFIC.

BY REV. S. L. BALDWIN, D. D.

For the last quarter of a century the British government has been directly responsible for the whole iniquity, from the growth of the poppy in India to the sale of the drug in China. Almost at the very time that British cannon were thundering in Chinese ports to secure the treaty which legalized the opium traffic, the governing power in India was taken away from the East India Company by act of Parliament, and the crown assumed direct control. Since 1858 the British government has been the great opium grower of the world. Before that date the production of opium in India was a monopoly of the East India Company. To this precious privilege, as well as to all other rights of the company, the crown had succeeded. What a convenient coincidence that the legalization of the traffic was effected just as the government went directly into the business of opium raising, and took control of India! It would not have looked well for the British government to be directly promoting a contraband trade. When its responsibility was filtered through the East India Company the iniquity could not be brought so close home; but now that the government was going into the business, it was respectable and seemly to have legal sanction to the trade. As an opium monopolist, it is not too much to say that the British government has not only emulated the example of its predecessor, the East India Company, but has gone far beyond it.

It is a little over a century since the East India Company begin to export opium to China. In the sixty years which elapsed before the monopoly of British trade in China was taken away from that company (1773-1834), the amount of opium imported into that country was run up from 200 chests to 21,785 chests, valued at $14,454,193. (A chest contains about 133⅓ pounds.) The company then lost its monopoly of trade in China, but retained its monopoly of production in India, and in 1858 had run up the total export from India to 74,738 chests. The British government then took its place, and by 1872 had increased the exports to 88,789 chests. Its net revenue from opium then amounted to $38,286,065. In 1879 the amount of opium imported into China from India, under monopoly of the British government, was over 83,000 chests, (more than eleven millions of pounds, or over five thousand tons). It is estimated that about 22,000 chests were smuggled from Hong Kong into China the same year—which would make the whole amount about fourteen millions of pounds, or over six thousand tons! The value of the regularly imported drug was $50,700,000; while the value of all the tea exported was only $46,000,000—so that, after China had given up her entire crop of two hundred and sixty-five millions of pounds of tea, she had still to pay $4,700,000 to make up the amount due for opium!

No wonder the Archbishop of York felt moved to say: "The state of the matter is this, that the Christian nation of England has been in the past continually engaged in enforcing an unwilling nation to purchase great quantities of poison, which it has given to them; and has not scrupled to go to war even to enforce what I must call an iniquitous trade. Now, that being so, I do say that we cannot hold up our heads among the nations of the world, if, when attention has once been directed to this matter, we allow it to slumber and sleep. . . . . It makes the Queen herself, who is now the sovereign, the Empress of India, responsible . . . . for poisoning the people, for destroying them physically and morally, and for corrupting a whole nation that is ready to protest against the corruption. . . . . We say that it is a wrong thing from first to last. We say that it is a disgrace and a shame to this country that a heathen people should have to ask us to hold our hands and not to force the opium upon them, and that we, as a Christian people, should refuse to hold our hands, and with fire and sword make them take this deadly drug."

It is hardly possible fully to realize, or to characterize in adequate terms, the awful iniquity of this death-dealing traffic. The spectacle presented is not that of a government reluctantly protecting some of its unworthy subjects in a trade abhorrent to itself, but that of the Christian government of one of the greatest, most powerful and most enlightened nations of the earth, deliberately entering into the growth, manufacture and sale of a noxious drug, stimulating its production, complacently gloating over the increasing demand, anxiously watching for new openings, refusing to listen to the pleadings of a pagan emperor and his officials against so ruinous a traffic, demanding with sword and cannon the payment of indemnity for contraband opium righteously destroyed, forcing the legalization of the traffic, and continuing to push the trade with unscrupulous vigor, and to pocket its ungodly revenue for the benefit of its lavish and luxurious Indian government. Surely the curse of heaven must rest upon this dark and damning traffic and upon its most unholy gains.

Prince Kung and his colleagues, in a dispatch to the British minister in 1869, say: "That opium is like a deadly poison, that it is most injurious to mankind, and a most serious provocative of ill feeling, is, the writers think, perfectly well known to His Excellency, and it is therefore needless for them to enlarge further on these points."

Sir Thomas Wade, the British minister, in a dispatch to his own government, says: "It is to me vain to think otherwise of the use of the drug in China than as of a habit many times more pernicious, nationally speaking, than the gin and whisky drinking which we deplore at home. It takes possession more insidiously, and keeps its hold to the full as tenaciously. I know no case of radical cure. It has insured in every case within my knowledge the steady descent, moral and physical, of the smoker, and is so far a greater mischief than drink that it does not, by external evidence of its effects, expose its victim to the loss of repute which is the penalty of habitual drunkenness."

Mr. Alexander Wylie, who was for seventeen years superintendent of the London Missionary Society's press at Shanghai, and afterward for fifteen years traveled extensively through the empire as agent of the British and Foreign Bible Society, says: "Any one who has lived half of that time (that is, half of twenty years,) among the Chinese, can scarcely have a doubt as to the destructive effects of opium, physically, mentally and morally. Undoubtedly this is one of the greatest evils with which China is afflicted, and unless some means be found to check the practice, it bids fair to accomplish the utter destruction, morally and physically, of that great empire."

The Rev. Dr. Legge, professor of the Chinese language and literature at Oxford University, states: "It is as certain as anything can be that the opium traffic, unless it be arrested, will reduce the empire of China to beggary and ruin."

Similar testimonies might be added by the hundred. The great missionary conference at Shanghai, in 1877, gave voice to the unanimous conviction of the missionaries of China in its resolution "that opium smoking is a vice highly injurious, physically, morally and socially."

THE RELATION OF THE UNITED STATES TO THIS TRADE.

So far as government action is concerned, our general policy has been to have no trouble about anything with China, to keep on perfectly friendly terms with that country, to let the British and French fight their own battles, and when the war was ended, and treaties were to be made, to come in with the other nations and secure for our country and our trade as much as was promised to any other country. This has been a very economical and, on the whole, quite a successful method of conducting affairs. It is true that the first treaty between the United States and China, in 1844, contained a prohibition of the opium traffic; but this clause was from the very first a dead letter. Almost from the beginning, Americans had their share in the profitable but deadly traffic. For many years there was but one American mercantile firm in China which had not more or less connection with the traffic, namely, that of Messrs. Olyphant & Co., which was always an honorable exception, it being a rule of the house that no opium should be bought or sold by the firm; that none should be transported on any vessel belonging to them; and that it should never be mentioned in their market reports. This stand was taken purely on moral grounds, and was the result of the conscientious conviction of the head of the firm, who was a consistent member of the Presbyterian church. But, with this exception, American merchants freely participated in the gains of the unholy trade.

But in 1880 our government wished to negotiate a new treaty with China concerning the limitation of Chinese immigration to this country. The clamor for such a treaty was without a decent basis of reason, and was in contravention of our acknowledged principles and our consistent practice for a century. But this is not the place to discuss that question, and it is here introduced only as it is connected with the opium traffic. In the discussions between our commissioners and those of the Chinese government, the latter pointed out that Chinese laborers first went to America because they were greatly desired, and that the new desire that they should stay away was due to the influence of violent men. They, however, agreed to a treaty allowing our government to limit or suspend the immigration of laborers. Now, it is a principle firmly rooted in the Chinese mind that when a concession has been made on one side, there must be a concession on the other side. And when China conceded to us the right to limit immigration what did she ask in return? Simply that we would help her to get rid of the traffic in opium. This request was made when the "commercial treaty" was under consideration, it having been well understood that the treaty in regard to immigration should be followed by said commercial treaty. Our commissioners, Messrs. Angell, Swift and Trescott, in their letter to Secretary Evarts, of November 17, 1880, say:

"The Chinese commissioners submitted a proposition which we had, from information received, been expecting, but of which they had so far given no sign. That was the prohibition of trade in opium to citizens of the United States. We knew that the Chinese government was very anxious to introduce such an article in any new treaties which they might make. . . . Since our arrival here, we have had some opportunity of learning how thoroughly sincere the Chinese government was in its desire to suppress this mischievous trade, and we believed that the government had in this effort the entire sympathy both of the government and people of the United States. We therefore agreed to adopt the article (on certain conditions which they name)."

The treaty thus agreed to was ratified by the President and the Senate. For a thorough-going and concise specimen of prohibition, Article II of that treaty cannot be too highly commended. It is as follows:

Article II.—The governments of China and of the United States mutually agree and undertake that Chinese subjects shall not be permitted to import opium into any of the ports of the United States; and citizens of the United States shall not be permitted to import opium into any of the open ports of China, to transport it from one open port to any other open port, or to buy or sell opium in any of the open ports of China. This absolute prohibition, which extends to vessels owned by the citizens or subjects of either power, and employed by other persons for the transportation of opium, shall be enforced by appropriate legislation on the part of China and the United States, and the benefits of the favored nation clause in existing treaties shall not be claimed by the citizens or subjects of either power as against the provisions of this article."

This treaty will not have much effect in stopping the opium trade as long as England is free to import as much of the drug as she pleases. But it gives China the moral support of the United States in her efforts against the traffic.

Other nations, while not actively engaged in promoting the traffic, have availed themselves of it by allowing their merchants to participate in its profits. As to the question "What ought to be the attitude of Christian governments" toward such a traffic as this?—there can be but one answer. The "Golden Rule" forever settles that question. "Whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them," allows us no choice but to pursue such a damning traffic with unrelenting hostility, and wipe it from the face of the earth.

Instead of China's being compelled to plead against the imposition of such a traffic upon her by a Christian nation, she ought to have the heartiest support of every such nation in all efforts to extirpate it.

The United States government confiscates opium and sells it to the highest bidder, which does not check its power for evil at all. The Chinese government confiscated it, and ordered it floated through a trench into the sea to be utterly destroyed.

Why cannot the governments of Christian nations be Christian? What is needed is that Christian people make themselves felt in the legislative halls and in government departments. Let the voice of every church be heard in unmistakable tones; let Christian men everywhere make known to congressmen and members of Parliament that they mean to have Christianity represented in this matter by the action of the governments. Then Great Britain will be obliged to listen to the universal protest of Christendom, and will soon find means either to decrease the expenses of the Indian government or to provide for them in some other way than by carrying ruin and death into countless thousands of Chinese homes.

An earnest and determined effort on the part of the Christian nations of the world to help China to free herself from this abominable and destructive traffic would do much to assure the heathen world of the sincerity of western Christians to demolish one of the greatest obstacles to the progress of the Christian religion, and to hasten the coming of the millennium. For this let us all pray, and let us all work with unceasing activity. May God speed the day!

LA MARECHALE.

BY FRANCES E. WILLARD.

Whoever brings charm of person, voice or manner to the service of God and humanity, has brought a double blessing. "Through the eye to the heart" is an air-line road; if "the man wonderful" dwells in a "house beautiful," so much the better, provided always that his gifts are laid on the white altar where glows the fire of Heavenly Love.

I thought of all these things as among the fair hills of Switzerland I looked upon and listened to "La Maréchale." She is the eldest daughter of that great and holy woman, Catherine Booth, "mother of the Salvation Army," and inherits, it is said, beyond any other of the endowed and consecrated eight children of the General and Mrs. Booth, their special gifts, graces and grace. She may be thirty-five years old, but although the mother of five lovely children, she seems but twenty-five or thereabouts. Edward Clifford, the London artist and well-known Christian worker, painted her portrait for the Royal Academy exhibition, and gave it to her mother; she was certainly a charming subject. Her parents had marked physical advantages which she inherits in accentuated form. She is tall, like her father, and of erect and graceful bearing. She has a countenance full of strength, sweetness, and light, fair brown hair, soft and abundant, with a chestnut tinge, plaited behind and without crimps or puffs, lying in waves around her delicate face with its sweet tender mouth, frank gray-blue eyes, pencilled eyebrows, regal Roman nose, brilliant complexion, thoughtful forehead, and smile as sweet as summer. Beside her, cuddled up against her mother, was Evangeline, her eldest little girl, five years of age, and around and in the little cottage sleeping-room adjoining were her three boys and another girl—the baby being but one month old.

Her husband, Arthur Booth-Clibborn, was absent, but we attended an orchard meeting conducted by him on a Sunday, and he is for a man as handsome and every way attractive as she is for a woman. La Maréchale cannot say enough of his goodness and gifts. To say the truth, we never met a young pair more ideally fitted for each other, or more righteously fond of one another. As she handed us books and brochures of his, she said repeatedly with kindling glance, "Have you read this? It is so good. You've no idea what a success my husband's books have made." We did not doubt it, but we knew what a success she was; going to Paris at twenty-two, with hardly any knowledge of French, she had made herself mistress of the language, and her addresses in it were attended by the most cultivated Parisians, while her books, like those of her husband, have had a remarkably large sale in France and Switzerland, as well as in Russia, Armenia and other distant lands. They are at the head of the army in these countries, and as all Christendom knows, have served and suffered as few others in our day have had the opportunity to do, for Christ and His cause.

La Maréchale's career already fulfills her father's prophecy that women will, if once left free in their action, develop administrative powers fully equal, and oftentimes superior, to those of men. In our conversation of an hour she referred constantly to the sayings and doings of her mother somewhat after this order: "She was so honest-hearted before God and men; she never blinked the truth for anybody; there is so little plain dealing even among Christian people, and as a matter of course, it is altogether unknown in fashionable life. But mother wounded only that she might heal, and always began by telling a person every good thing she could think of that he had done, thus preparing him for the statement of his vanity, lightness, neglect, or habits hindering to character and the cause. In her presence one felt that mere appearances of goodness all went for nothing; one knew that she was saying, if it were true, 'You have not a single eye to God's glory, you are not spiritual, your presence lowers the temperature.' But she made each soul feel that she was a loving sister to him or her, and she proved this in the only way that people will receive it nowadays when profession so often mocks performance —by her deeds of helpfulness. Oh! if we who claim to be disciples were but honest with each other; if we said to the person himself what we retail to others about him, how it would change the outlook of the world for those from whom the world has reason to expect golden rule conduct!"

Referring to the officers, La Maréchale said: "Our officers are heroic. When I came up here and could not go out for awhile into active service, I wrote several hundred letters to them from my bed, and if I could show you the replies that came in, you would think as one has said, that they 'read like a new Acts of the Apostles.' I write letters for hours together sometimes lying down, and have had remarkable answers to prayers for money, for I began my work in France on the principle of 'no debt,' and therefore a very extensive correspondence is necessary in order to obtain the requisite financial aid.'

For nine years not a penny was received for the work in France or Switzerland, except as La Maréchale and those associated with her begged for it. Though collecting some $25,000 a year for the work, Mr. and Mrs. Booth-Clibborn commenced their married life in a flat of three rooms with an annual rent of $130. Their present home in Paris is a small flat in a fifth story.

Six hundred evangelistic workers, including the "local" leaders, are under their care; raised up from the ranks, they were mostly infidels, worldlings or Catholics. "The officers here are recruited from among the people; they have left their places as artisans and cast in their lot and take their chance with the rest of us," said she. "They know they will get their clothes, and 'bread and cheese,' but nothing superfluous. We tell them that so far as the best and happiest life is concerned, there is one thing needful, 'Seek first the kingdom,' and then the necessaries shall be provided."

Miss Booth commenced public work when only fourteen years of age, driven to it by an irresistible urging of divine love after she had received a remarkable baptism of the spirit. It was at that time a thing almost unknown for a young woman (and how much more a child) to stand up to speak in public in England. The prejudice against any woman speaking before a mixed audience was very great, as her devoted mother had proved. Added to this Miss Booth was of a very timid and retiring nature, and a curvature of the spine which often obliged her to lie on her back the greater part of the day, opposed a physical obstacle to great efforts in public. But the trait which has most marked her career—heroic courage and self-forgetfulness, enabled her to trample all that under her feet. True to the training and example of her parents the moment she found herself in front of an audience of deathless souls, she conquered. And what multitudes of young women, including her precious sisters, have been inspired to follow in her steps.

I asked this beautiful woman what led her to an undertaking so stupendous as the effort to evangelize the masses in France; that country which derides living Christianity, and has produced the two anomalies of a comic Bible and child suicide. She said that as a child at school studying its history, she learned to pity France from the bottom of her heart, and subsequently her father designated her for this mission. It had been said by a leading Indian officer: "Give me two Bombays before one Paris," regarding that city as far worse than India because so steeped in infidelity. She always had a special liking for the French language. "I love France," said she to me with sparkling eyes. "France makes no official profession of religion, while England which engraves texts of Scripture in her public buildings, and opens her houses of Parliament every day with prayer, yet fastens the opium curse, the drink traffic and legalized vice upon her colonies. Early rising and industry are national characteristics of the French. They are a kind, warm-hearted people—gushing, if you please,—they have not the stiffness and stand-offness of the English. John Bull has assumed that he is to rule the world, he and his island are everything, but France is a great and wonderful country, and I love its people every bit as well as I ever loved my own. I have become familiar with the people in the provinces; have sat down with the French women who clatter about in sabots; have shared their chestnuts, heard of their sorrows as well as their joys, and believe me, the human heart is just the same in France as it is everywhere, and if you should classify the saints whose histories have come down to us, France would occupy the front rank. A nation that has produced a Lacordaire, a Pascal, a Fénélon and a Madame Guyon, does not lack the germs of spiritual life!"

When La Maréchale opened the batteries of the Salvation Army on the Parisians it seemed a forlorn hope. In her little hall at the bottom of an impasse in one of the rowdiest quarters of the city, the worst elements congregated, and it was amidst a bedlam of hostile voices, representing all the most aggressive forms of immorality and infidelity, that this frail woman fought nightly for God; for six months she kept up this fatiguing struggle every night, with the exception of a few Saturdays. No wonder she was wasted to a shadow. But it was not long before the "something" supernatural which inspired her was recognized, and the people began to call her "Sainte Catherine."

Several years later how changed were the circumstances. The Maréchale was able to secure in the fashionable "Salle de Conferences" of the Grands Boulevards, the attention of the elite of Paris. She announced a series of afternoon lectures on the general theme—What religion will suit France? This seemed to strike a popular keynote, and rows upon rows of seats in the hall where she held her meetings were occupied by leading men and deputies from the Corps Legislatif, who sometimes remained from four till seven o'clock. She asked and answered the questions: Will a sad religion suit France? Will a merry religion? Will a materialistic religion? Will a formalistic religion?

"WHAT WOMAN HAS DONE WOMAN MAY DO."

BY HELEN M. BARKER.

Mrs. B.—"We ought to have fifty dollars this minute to furnish these rooms, and I believe the women of this town would give it to us if they knew our needs."

Mrs. S.—(a staunch worker, but somewhat discouraged), "I would be glad if we could get five dollars."

Mrs. B.—"Well, if we cannot furnish these rooms we may as well give them up as they would be useless in this condition."

This conversation and much more took place at the close of a W. C. T. U. meeting in a little town in western New York, ten years ago. Each member went home with a burden of needs and no money to meet them. They had rented beautiful rooms in a new central block, just across from the post-office, for headquarters, but they were bare save a few pieces of furniture that had been donated.

A day or two after this Mrs. B— called upon Mrs. C—, note-book and pencil in hand, and said: "Put on your bonnet and go with me this afternoon and we will soon find out whether the women will help us furnish our rooms."

In a moment she was ready, and the two women, both pastors' wives, went forth full of faith that they were doing the Lord's work.

Mrs. C.—"Surely you are not going in here. Does not Mrs. Cole live here?"

Mrs. B.—"Yes, she does. Why?"

Mrs. C.—"I have heard that she has wine on her table and is not a temperance woman."

Mrs. B.—"I fear this is true, but she is generous and good and ready to help; if she contributes to this it may interest her in our work."

Fortunately Mrs. Cole was at home, and, after listening to a brief statement of the needs, the temperance school, etc., she took the little book, saying, "I am so glad to know about your work," and wrote five dollars opposite her name. The two encouraged women left her with thanks, expressing a hope that she might at some time see her way clear to "belong."

But I cannot tell all about how they went from house to house talking about "our work," and how cheered they were that not a woman refused. But they went back home at six o'clock tired but happy, and Mrs. C., who carried the bag, had fifty dollars in it. "According to your faith be it unto you."

But the faith put in exercise had begotten greater faith, and the next afternoon the two started out for another two hours' work, so that none could feel slighted because they had not received a call. At the close of the second afternoon's work they had eighty-seven dollars paid in and pledges to make the total a round one hundred dollars. But better than that even, they had a list of thirty-seven bona fide new members and twenty-one associate members, as the result of the face to face talks.

Did not that union have a jubilee at their next weekly meeting? That union still maintains its headquarters, and has ever since been strong and active and growing.

"What woman has done woman may do."

May our women be inspired to go two and two and disciple (teach) the women about our blessed W. C. T. U. work.

FAMILIAR LETTERS ON CURRENT THEMES.

My Dear Comrades:—It has long been my habit to send a circular letter to my relatives and friends in my dear native country; indeed, I have just written "Number 78" of the series, and Miss Willard thinks I can reproduce many of the points therein contained for what she calls the "great hospitable circle that sits around the hearth-stone of the World's W. C. T. U." reading The Union Signal.

I confess the picture is attractive to one who, from the first, has been with you heart and soul in the movement, not only in spirit, but in active coöperation. It is also borne in upon my memory that I was once editor of The Union Signal when it was Our Union, by request of your president "standing in the gap" when its fortunes looked uncertain, and somebody who did not require a salary was at a premium. So I feel myself altogether at home as a member of the great white ribbon group, and you must be lenient with me if I sometimes manifest the garrulity of growing years. My letters will be a sort of journal, not only of my own work, but of the reform and philanthropic movements with which it has been my joy to be connected for many years in London; so you will hear directly from what has justly been called "humanity's capital," by the pen of one of your most enthusiastic comrades; and with this introduction, "here goes":

All the last half of October, while Alys was away—she seems to have had what she calls "a heavenly time" in America—was spent very quietly at Friday's Hill, as I had tried to keep myself free from engagements for that time in order to take care of Miss Willard. She had begun to feel the good effects of her trip to Switzerland with Lady Henry, as well as of the régime adopted. She became a different creature; iher appetite returned, her spirits revived, and she felt something of her old vigor coming back again. I cannot help hoping now that she will have enough common sense to devote her energies to the one simple business of getting well.

We have had a most interesting guest staying with us, Miss Jessie Ackermann, one of our round-the-worlders. She has during this time put the white ribbon on 9,000 women, and has traveled 100,000 miles to do it, and has visited almost every country on the face of the globe, and has endured incredible hardships, and surmounted endless, apparently insurmountable difficulties. And all this she has done alone, and without any financial aid from the society that sent her out. She made the money for her work by lecturing, and has in this way actually donated to the temperance cause during the last six years the sum of $12,000! In it all she has been sustained and comforted by the belief that the divine Master had called her into the work, and that His hand was leading her along the way. Robert thinks her story the most remarkable one he has ever heard. I expect it to come out bit by bit in Lady Henry's new paper that is to begin at Christmas, as he is preparing it for that.

Another matter that has been absorbing our interest very much during the past month has been the lockout of the miners. About sixteen weeks ago the coal owners announced a reduction of wages. This reduction was to a point below what the miners felt to be a "living wage," and they refused to accept it, and were locked out of work. The consequences in distress and starvation have been something appalling, and the whole country has been aroused. Lady Henry Somerset took Alys, the next week after their return from America, and visited one of the worst places. Stirred up by this visit, my son, Logan, also, has been to the same place and spent several days helping in the distribution of relief and investigating the distress. He says no words can describe the dreadful sufferings tha have been steadfastly and patiently endured by the miners and their wives and children in their sixteen weeks' long battle for a "living wage." To-day, however, the country is full of thanksgiving. Matters became so bad, and the coal famine affected so many industries, that it became at last a national question, and the government was forced to intervene. Yesterday there was a conference between delegates chosen by the miners and delegates chosen by the masters, with Lord Rosebery in the chair as arbitrator; and the result was a complete victory for the miners. The papers are jubilant. They say almost universally that it is the greatest labor victory that this or any other country has ever seen. For the first time has been established in industrial history the principle of the minimum wage, i. e., that the selling price of anything must be regulated on the basis of a "living wage" being paid to those who produce that thing, just as it would necessarily be regulated by the cost of any other ingredient in its production.

One paper, The Daily Chronicle, says: "All along the line the men have stood firm through the long, weary weeks. Their discipline and loyalty, their sublime endurance, their faith in one another and in the triumph of justice, have been unshaken. Grander even than the courage of the men has been the courage of the women. The instincts of these Spartan women have taught them that it was better for their children to die than to accept life on the hopeless terms offered them."

Another paper calls attention to an unexpected outcome of the struggle, and that is the immense impetus given to the question of the nationalization of land, and of the minerals under the land. Twenty years preaching, the paper says, could not have produced one-tenth part the result that this one object lesson has produced. When the Socialists first preached this doctrine it was imagined that they were disciples of disorder and wickedness; but it was plainly proved, in Lancashire at least, that it is the great capitalist owners who have created the present widespread disorder, and have paralyzed the interests of industry over the whole country, and all simply in order to keep up the abnormally high dividends on their investments. The masters seem, without being in the least conscious of it, to have played directly into the hands of the Socialists, so the Socialist papers says.

Meanwhile another victory has been won on another line, that is scarcely less interesting to what Samantha Allen calls the "female sect." A few nights ago, Mr. Walter McLaren, the great parliamentary friend of woman's suffrage, introduced what is called an "instruction," for the inserting in the Parish Council's bill of a clause permitting women to vote in regard to it on the same terms as men. This to the surprise of everybody, was carried, and carried against the government, which had foolishly, in the person of Mr. Fowler, taken its stand against it. We all feel this to be a great forward step, because it acknowledges the principle "on the same terms as men," and this is the first time such a principle has been acknowledged anywhere in England. Consequently, taken in conjunction with the bill conferring the franchise on women in New Zealand, this victory in Parliament makes us feel very jubilant. The Parish Council's bill, to which this "instruction" has been attached, is itself a most interesting one. It is a bill to create Parish Councils for the local self-government of the parishes; and, if carried, will take out of the hands of the squire and the parson the present arbitrary control exercised by them over the parish, and put it into the hands of the people themselves. This bill, if it passes, will change all this and will give the local control to the people of the locality; and you can easily see what an important step it is to allow women to vote for these councils. Whether this means that they can also sit on them I am not quite sure, but I think it does. Certainly women ought to sit on councils that are appointed to control things so vital to their homes as the local affairs of village life. It looks to me as if what we must do all the world over is to arm our recruits before we go to war, that is, fit the women out with the ballot and then do battle with the liquor traffic.

I must tell you before I close that our B. W. T. A., since the splinter went off, has been very flourishing. We already have formed over one hundred new branches, and we have most enthusiastic meetings all over the country. Next week we go to Sunderland for a conference. Lady Henry is full of energy and enthusiasm, and carries all hearts captive wherever she goes.

To my mind the spirit of the Crusade was never more alive, only, "being born of God out of Heaven," it never crystallizes into a set form but is now transferred from the attitude of pleading into a new inspiration concerning personal habits, social customs, and governmental laws. This is, as you know, the faith of your "Chieftain," and the talks we have had on the subject are to us an inpiration.

With warm Christmas greeting, and in the fervent faith that Christ is not only coming, but He is already here, believe me, my dear comrades,

HANNAH WHITALL SMITH.

SUBLIME HEROISM.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—I was sent to Johnstown, Penn., by the women physicians of Chicago for relief work immediately after the Johnstown flood. That was one of the greatest national calamities that has ever come upon us. About eight thousand people lost their lives in the water, and some ten or twelve thousand homes were wrecked right in the heart of a large manufacturing town, the business part of the town being completely swept away.

A few days after the flood an amendment to the constitution of the state of Pennsylvania was up for decision in the legislature. This amendment was for the total prohibition of the liquor traffic throughout the state, and the W. C. T. U. of Pennsylvania had appointed that this day should be for all-day-prayer among white-ribbon women throughout the state.

Upon this particular day I was wading through the mud of a wrecked street when I met three or four women wearing the white ribbon and accosted them. They told me they were going into a house close by where they were to have a meeting. I looked at the place, a large, two-storied, square brick house, the inside of which had been completely wrecked by the water and mud. This mud had been shovelled out of the windows and doors and was heaped up in a great bank around the house, and the ruined furniture was strewn in every direction.

I entered the house with the women. There was no provision for a meeting, such as chairs, etc., but all of us stood about and knelt on the muddy floor in prayer. It was a most touching sight; many of these women were experiencing the first hardships of their lives. They were dressed for the most part in the simple brown wrappers given them by the relief committees; with veils and cloths tied over their heads for bonnets. Their homes had been utterly wrecked, their every earthly possession had been swept away; they had come in from standing by the side of those who were digging for the bodies of their lost loved ones who had been buried up in the mud by the flood. But in spite of their awful circumstances, many of them were actually hungry, and had slept on the ground in the open air the previous night, they had not forgotten our day of prayer for the abolition of the public house, but had gathered together according to appointment. I need hardly add that it was one of the most thrilling occasions I have ever known.

I remember another day; perhaps the day following. I had been out on a long tramp over the hills searching for the destitute, and relieving them to the degree that was in my power. I returned to the headquarters of our relief work to find a little group waiting to make application through me for various necessaries. Our relief headquarters were in an abandoned house that had been flooded out, and every inmate, so far as we could learn, drowned. When the mud had been shoveled out of the house I secured from the wrecked furniture an old table and a chair; the latter piece of furniture was a very valuable one to me at such a time as that. A chair was a real luxury, and in order to secure it for my own personal use on returning from my long walks to office work at relief headquarters (I need not say there were neither windows nor doors in the house we were occupying) I had built up with my own hands a crude little railing about the table and chair, that it might be understood that others were forbidden to enter my sanctum.

As I came in that afternoon and set myself to take the record of the wants of the applicants who were waiting in the room, I noticed a very delicate, sickly-looking woman whose condition showed that she was unable to stand on her feet. Passing the chair over the railing, I bade her seat herself on it while I stood at the table writing. After the others had been attended to it came her turn. She told me of her desperate need, and that her home and her husband's business were completely gone, while clothes she must have immediately for the little one that was expected.

Turning to me she said: "Dr. Bushnell, you don't know me, but I know very well who you are. You are one of our own workers; I am one of the district officers of the W. C. T. U., and I have yet another matter of business I should like to speak with you about. Within a short time will be the date of our district convention; we hoped to have a good convention, and I must not let it be a failure; but I fear it will be impossible now to secure a speaker from a distance who would expect us to pay her expenses and a lecture fee. Would you be able to assist us in securing some one who would be willing to come free of cost to us, so that the work need not suffer in consequence of the flood?"

Tears sprang to my eyes, and I have often thought since that such a spirit as this of working right on for the bringing in of Christ's Kingdom, even when the enemy had come in like a flood, is the spirit of the "women's whisky war" and the true source of power in our devoted army.

But wilt thou know, O vain man, that faith without works is dead?—James 2: 20.

The circular letter sent out two or three weeks ago by the Board of Temple Trustees, asking the unions to pledge $100, or whatever they can afford, by January, 1896, is beginning to bear fruit already. We have received from unions $100 pledges amounting to $2,000, besides a very large number of pledges for less sums. The following are the names of unions that have thus pledged: Delaware, O.; Blackstone, Mass.; Fayette, Ia.; Newtown, Pa.; Mohawk, N. Y.; Webster Grove, Mo.; Columbian Union, South Evanston, Ills.; East Hamilton, N. Y.; Norfolk, Va.; Grant City, Mo.; Marissa, Ill.; Westerly, R. I.; Louisiana, Mo.; Richmond and Hopkinton, R. I.; Greenport, L. I. Mrs. H. T. Kidd, of Wabash, Ind., superintendent of Temple work, expects to raise $300 in her county for the Temple by 1896. Mrs. J. M. Perkins, Cleveland, O., writes: "Our union, the Central, gave $100 the first year to the Temple. Were it not that we must prepare for the great W. C. T. U. Convention next fall, we would pledge another $100 now; but after the Convention is over we will raise that amount."

Mrs. Perkins says, in the letter above referred to: "Should two hundred thousand women pay one penny a day for two years, it would wipe out the debt on the Temple. I am willing to do this, so please send me five mite-boxes, and I will get four others to do likewise." Are there not more of our white-ribboners who will follow this noble example? This is what James would call showing our faith by our works.

The call for fifty cent and dollar contributions to the Temple before the first of the new year has found a warm response in many hearts. Every mail sees a large number of the beautiful Columbian souvenirs go back in return to all of our one dollar donors. Mrs. Stephen Coates, Oberlin, O., writes: "I want to tell you how pleased I am with the Columbian souvenir. I had no thought it would be so nice. I wish every King's Daughter and temperance lover would send a dollar and have in a form to keep forever this souvenir of the Temple, which combines with it the faces of Miss Willard and Mrs. Carse. It's a beauty! I would not take five dollars for mine if I could not get another."

Patience Darling, Greenwich, R. I., writes: "I have always been interested in the Temple. I am very indignant at the abuse you have had, and I regret that I cannot do more to pay for it. I am eighty years old. I had $2 given me on my birthday; I send it for the Temple. Please send the souvenir." Mrs. B. V. Muir, Brownsville, Neb., writes: "Enclosed find draft for one dollar from a white-ribboner who feels highly gratified with your management of the Temple finances and hopes your appeal will meet with a hearty response." Miss Cornelia M. Dow, the worthy daughter of our "grand old man," Neal Dow, Portland, Me., writes: "When reading THE UNION SIGNAL last evening, and the Temple Items for which we always look with interest, father said: 'You better send to the Temple a dollar for the souvenir.' So here it is."

Mrs. Sophie F. Grubb, the well-known superintendent of foreign work, has of late been called to pass through the furnace of affliction. First her eldest born, a man in his splendid prime, talented and full of every noble impulse, was cut down in a night without warning. A few months after a lovely daughter full of rich promise began to fade before her mother's eyes, until at last the angels bore her sweet young spirit to that fair land where sickness and death are unknown. The following letter is from Mrs. Grubb. She says: "The enclosed post-office order for $5 for the Temple is bought with a gold piece that was in the purse of our precious daughter, Edith, who 'crossed the border' last spring. I know nothing would please her more than that it should go for the 'House Beautiful' in which she was intensely interested to the last. Its companion I will send to Mrs. Barker for our beloved National W. C. T. U."

The L. T. L's ought to be depended on to do a great deal for the Temple in the next two years, for they are the ones who will reap the greatest benefit from it in the years to come. We are glad to state that a department of Temple work has been opened in The Young Crusader in which all gifts sent to the Temple by children and L. T. L's will be reported. Mrs. M. E. Lupton, Excelsior, Minn., sends $10 for the Excelsior L. T. L. She writes: "It gives us real pleasure to be able to help even a little, in so noble an undertaking, and if our little band should attain to the hoped-for $100 mark, and its name be engraved on a tablet, we shall feel it highest honor." Mrs. E. L. Wood, Brooklyn, N. Y., sends $6 to be credited to the Kings county L. T. L. Mrs. M. C. Hamilton sends $1.75 as a birthday offering from Oakland, Fair Haven, L. T. L., Allegheny county, Pa.

A two-cent stamp sent to Mrs. Matilda B. Carse, The Temple, Chicago, will secure a mite-box. Remember, any one placing in the box $2.50 from May 1, 1893, to May 1, 1894, will receive the lovely Columbian souvenir made of aluminum, with a cut of the Temple on one side and on the reverse the face of Miss Willard with suitable inscriptions. All money orders should be made out in the name of the treasurer, William D. Preston, and sent to our financial secretary, Miss Sara G. Johnson, The Temple, Chicago, Ill.

HEART LINES.

On Christmas Day
A little life
My life entwined,
A little heart
My heart enshrined,
On Christmas Day.

On New Year's Day
My heart sends forth
A piteous moan.
That little life
From mine is gone,
On New Year's Day.

On Easter Day
With a sense of peace
My heart is blessed.
That little life
With Christ doth rest,
On Easter Day.

"IN REMEMBRANCE OF ME."

BY NORA MARBLE.

Seedy, unkempt, hollow-eyed, with bowed head, lagging step, no purpose in eye or motion,—an observer noting the man walking thus mid the blustering hail of New Year's eve would unquestionably have classed him as a "tramp," but evidences of toil upon both hands and garb proved such classification false.

It is Sunday eve and there is no shifting panorama of the daily streets to engage the wanderer's attention as he wanders aimlessly on past houses of luxury whose lace-draped windows alone would have put scores such as he beyond the pangs of want; past houses whose heavy doors turned upon golden hinges; past portals of moneyed kings, of untitled, but gem-crowned society queens. The laughing voice of a child from a partly open window aroused his attention.

"My Jemmy," he sighed, pausing for a moment, "how much that laugh sounded like his."

He strained his eyes to catch a glimpse of the laughing one, but failing this, walked on, his face now sad and troubled.

"Five years!" he muttered, passing one rough hand across his forehead, the dews of memory gathering there, "and I have been going down hill ever since. If Jemmy had lived, mayhap it wouldn't have been so, for," his chin quivering a little, "many's the time I passed the tavern for his dear sake, feelin' ashamed to hev his innocent eyes look into mine when stupid with drink."

At the corner he hesitated.

"I'll go home," he resolved, repeating "home," with a bitter smile as he noted the mansions about him, "I'd better say den."

On the opposite side of the way a flood of light streamed forth upon the wet pavement. Wide the portal, stately the edifice, aspiring the steeple; a church in keeping with the homes of wealth about it. The low rumble of an organ, subdued voices in a chant broke upon the evening stillness.

"Jemmy did so love to go to church," thought the man, and impelled by that remembrance he crossed the street.

"Go in," whispered a voice—so much like Jemmy's—"go in."

"Don't!" he seemed to hear another say. "You're not fit to enter so grand a church. Think of your shabby clothes."

The man withdrew his foot, and nodded in the affirmative.

"'Tis the house of God," said the wee voice. "Think only of Him."

"Fashion worships here!" mocked the other. "God's house for such as you lies in another direction."

"Jemmy did so love to go to church," reflected the man with a sigh, as he stood irresolute, the rain driven by an angry gust of wind, dashing against him.

"Such a bad night," he thought, "there'll be plenty of room," and as the music ceased the man ventured within the vestibule. Courage! No proud glances there to abash him. Timidly then he pushed open the swinging door, noiselessly dropped into the nearest pew. An usher's cold civility, a curious stare as he crossed that threshold, and the man undoubtedly would have retreated into the darkness again.

A voice, grave, tender, almost pathetic in its earnestness, was saying, as the bread was passed: "Take, eat, this is my body which is given for you: do this in remembrance of me."

Vividly before the man's vision arose a face of deadly pallor marred by great drops of blood. A crown of thorns whose piercing points mocked the head it encircled; limbs broken, side pierced and bleeding. He trembled, and with difficulty suppressed a cry.

"Drink ye all of this,"—again that voice in tender beseeching, as the cup was passed, "My blood which was shed for you, drink in remembrance of me."

In remembrance of Me! To that crouching, shabby figure in the rear pew, the minister's voice seemed merged into one of childish treble. That form upon the cross faded, and in its place came the vision of a tiny one stretched upon a bed of suffering.

"Promise me, Pop, promise you'll keep sober for my sake—for the sake of your little Jemmy."

And he had promised. Yes, he had promised! How could he do else, he reflected, with those beseeching eyes gazing into his; when that entreaty came from lips upon which the purple hues were already settling.

"In remembrance of Me!" And the smile with which death sealed those baby lips as he had promised! How like, to the man's awakened conscience, did it seem to the one on those other lips, those divine lips from which had issued the cry "It is finished."

"Go in peace." Dimly was the man conscious of those final words; of the murmur of a departing congregation; of curious glances; of pitying smiles.

"Come!" said the sexton, as silence fell upon the church, "Come, my man! This is no sleeping place for tramps."

"True," said Jemmy's father, struggling to his feet. "True, and yet—"

"Yet what?" asked the sexton in no very gentle tone.

"And yet the Son of Man had not where to lay His head."

He made a motion to depart, then, with a sudden resolution advanced up the aisle to the altar. Removing his poor head covering he stood for a moment gazing upon the symbol dimly outlined upon the wall. Then, with uplifted hand he said solemnly: "In remembrance of Thee—and Jemmy! I promise!"

That was all, but it was enough to straighten the bent form, to transfigure the sin-seamed face, and so, with that new light upon it, the man turned and went swiftly out into the night again.

. . . . . .

A hopeless, sorrowing woman, waiting as was her wont for the too often reeling footsteps of her husband, marked with a glad hope, a while later, that light upon the penitent man's face—a hope which grew when upon bended knee he poured out all the emotion of his troubled soul; a hope which ceased to be hope, blossoming as the days went on, into the beautiful, fragrant flower of certainty.

THE GREATEST LACK IN THE WORLD—POCKETS.

BY EDITH E. METCALF.

"A man without a country" is to be pitied and perhaps scorned, for it is probably his own fault. But an object worthy a tenfold deeper sympathy is a woman without a pocket. In our present state of civilization a man without a pocket is an unimaginable being. When in some future age you attend a World's Fair that boasts a man's building, where man as a class exhibits—though a strong-minded few may force their way into the other buildings controlled by women—perhaps there you may see a pocketless man.

He start out of the front door in the morning pinning his handkerchief under his waistcoat, clutching his small change, bank bills and letters to mail in one hand, his umbrella in the other, and trying to invent some button or hook whereon to hang his latch key, and afterward, in the street car, some safe place to lay the whole conglomeration while he reads his newspaper? He bury his watch in some innermost recess of his being, somewhere in the Midway Plaisance of his person, and twist its chain through a buttonhole, when to extricate it means an agonized wriggle of from three to five minutes, so that he generally prefers to forego knowing the time of day to undertaking the exploit, or takes refuge in asking some woman who sits beside him? He reduced in desperation to carrying a black silk bag dangling by a string from his arm? Preposterous! How his whole career would be crippled! What a vain and useless creature he would become. Query: Could he be a man at all without a pocket?

Suppose the mandate of international tailordom itself should decree that the incoming styles of manly apparel excluded pockets, would that make any difference to a man? Even the very "pink of perfection," fashion's pet, who cares more for the cut of his coat than the salvation of his soul, would only say, "Bother the tailor, when it comes to that, it's my pocket or his life." My sister women, reflect! How much would the life of any man's tailor be worth who advocated the abolition of pockets?

And the pitiful thing about it all, sisters, is that we never had but one pocket to hold everything. A man always had a pocket for each separate article, if he wanted it, handy vest pockets, whence bills can be pulled out neatly with thumb and forefinger; oddly-shaped little ones in various places, known only to the tailor and himself, for car fares; big trouser ones for odds and ends, and, luxury of luxuries, a handkerchief pocket in the tail of his coat. In just the twinkling of an eye he can reach hither and thither all over himself and collect all his possessions, or let a highwayman do it for him in half the time. Surely from her that hath not shall be taken away even that which she hath—our one and only little ewe lamb of a pocket.

Of course there is the man's side to this grumble. Brother Jack speaks up: "What's all this hue and cry about pockets? We men get the worst of it, after all. I'd 'most rather have no pocket than be converted into a walking storage building for you women, as we're compelled to be in these recent times. I leave it to you, which is most aggravating, to be without a pocket, or to have several and the use of none, because they're all rented out free of charge to the lady you're escorting? Her keys, fan, gloves, pocketbook and all that are crowded into our pockets, till we can't button our coats without looking like a pouter pigeon."

I listened lately to this conversation with the dressmaker: "Is there any hope of pockets this season?" this in a timid, deprecating tone.

"No, madam"—this in a determined, cast-iron tone. "We all admit"—here the little woman is very much ashamed of herself for asking the question—"that the pocket"—very scornful emphasis on the word, as if a thing too vile for mention—"is a deformity to any artistically designed gown, and a well-dressed woman could never desire one."

And the questioner submitted, snubbed by one made to serve, not to crush, her. One woman said to me in confidence not long since: "I've been without husband and children for years, but that is nothing to me in comparison with being without a pocket, having once known the luxury of the latter, the former never."

Women, arouse! Think what we have lost. Pockets before now have helped to save life. Whatever would Mrs. Lecks and Mrs. Aleshine have done in the middle of the sea without their pockets? As important as the black stockings to protect from sharks were those capacious submarine pockets of theirs. Is it not high time to resist the high-handed tyranny of the dressmaker and be free? In this World's Fair year, who will invent a pretty gown with capacious pockets conveniently placed all over it? She shall live and die honored by all her country women.

Let us offer a prize! Or, better still, let us call a woman's congress on the revival of the pocket. Much valuable breath has been wasted on theosophy and kindred subjects remote from practical life. Why not bend the common sense of the world to so large a problem as how to recover to woman her greatest earthly good, the lost pocket?

TYPICAL LESSONS FOR LOYAL TEMPERANCE LEGION TEACHERS.

II.

Playing By The Brook.

BY MARY E. RUDD.

Opening exercises, 15 minutes:—Read over the directions for the first lesson, and follow carefully the suggestions adding to the program "The Little Boy's Walk," by Emilie Poulson.

Rhythmical exercises, 15 minutes:—Add to your other exercises the motion with the hands intended to represent swimming. A motion which you may improvise according to your own idea.

Lesson, 25 minutes:—I wonder who can remember our little story about Dot and Trot and what they found in the woods? (The answers to the question must determine the teacher's next words. If the children are eager to tell, give each one a chance to tell some one thing. If the language is incorrect try to have the child repeat the fact, using the right words. But if, as is probable, they have forgotten the story in the week that has elapsed, help them to recall it, and also the song of the brook which the children may repeat and then sing.)

And what was it the little brook was always giving? Perhaps you couldn't think very well so I will try to help you. It gave a little song to the twins, didn't it? for you remember they asked their papa what the brook was saying as it danced along on its way. Then it gave a home to the little fishes, for when Dot and Trot looked down into it they saw many, many little fishes swimming about and hiding under the pebbles. And then it gave something else, too, for while the twins were playing about they saw something come flying down to the water. It had wings and it flew just so. (Imitate with the arms the flying motion.) And what do you think it was? Yes, it was a bird. And what do you suppose it had come after? Yes, it wanted a drink.

But it came for something else, too. For while the little boys were watching it, it flew right down into the water, and then such a splashing and fluttering as there was, for the little bird was getting the nicest kind of a bath right there in the brook. And then it sat on a twig in the sunshine until it was quite dry, then flew away.

Then when Dot and Trot saw it they said: "I wonder if our mamma gives our birdie some water to drink and to bathe in every day. Let's go and see."

So they asked their mamma and she said: "Yes, the birdie must have a cup of water every day."

And Dot said: "We would like to give the birdie the water every day."

Their mamma said they might if they would be sure not to forget it; then they went back to their play very happy, for "You know," said Trot, "then we'll be giving like the little stream."

The children played almost all day by the brook, and when it was nearly evening and they were tired of running, they brought chairs and benches from the house and sat down to rest. And their papa and mamma sat down too.

Then their papa said: "Do you hear the brook sing?"

And they answered: "Yes, papa, you told us how the brook sings about giving."

And their papa replied: "Yes, and sometimes the brook sings another little song just because it is so very happy. Listen to what it says: (Repeat four stanzas of Tennyson's "Brook," beginning with the stanza, "I chatter, chatter as I flow.")

Then they told their papa about the bird and the fishes and all the things they had seen, and their mamma asked them how they thought the brook came to be there. And Dot said: "Why, I guess it just happened, that's all."

Then their mamma brought out a big book that they knew was the Bible, and found this verse: "He sendeth the springs into the valleys." They knew that meant God, and they asked: "Did God send the brook?"

And their mamma told them: "God has sent the brook to give a song to you, and a drink to the birdies, and pleasure to all around." (Have the children repeat text, Psalm 104: 10.)

Games, 10 minutes:—Fish swimming about in a stream, birds flying about and stopping to sip water from the brook. Marching to represent stream as in first lesson.

Occupation, 5 minutes:—Use sticks and make pictures of chairs, benches, etc., also cup and dipper, perhaps the house where the twins lived.

Closing exercises, 5 minutes:—Collection of pennies. Can they not be used to help other children, perhaps to aid in sending them to the country to see the pretty sights? Singing and good-bys.

CHRISTMAS DAY.

The Christmas chimes are pealing high
Beneath the solemn Christmas sky,
And blowing winds their notes prolong
Like echoes from an angel's song;
Good will and peace, peace and good will,
Ring out the carols glad and gay,
Telling the heavenly message still,
That Christ, the Child, was born to-day.

In lowly hut and palace hall,
Peasant and king keep festival,
And childhood wears a fairer guise,
And tenderer shine all mother-eyes;
The aged man forgets his years,
The mirthful heart is doubly gay,
The sad are cheated of their tears,
For Christ, the Lord, was born to-day.

CHRISTMAS HELPERS.

BY EMILY V. KEEVER.

"There, that gift is finished, no more sewing to-day," cried little Ethel Grant to her aunt, who had come to spend the holidays with them.

Miss Charlotte Harris, a sweet-faced, middle-aged lady, smiled thoughtfully as she said, "I would like to tell you a story, Ethel."

"I just wish you would tell me about something interesting, Aunt Lot; I'm too tired to do anything more on my Christmas gifts, and it's nearly time for our Junior Y meeting," said Ethel, settling herself in a comfortable position near her auntie's chair.

Miss Harris picked up the afghan strip of crimson wool she was crocheting, and as her ivory needle flashed in and out she began in her low, even tones.

"Last year, about the first of December, I was at Mrs. Grill's for three weeks. She has eight children, Mabel, who is thirteen, is the eldest, and Jack and Jen, the twins, were only two years old then.

"One afternoon a little girl of about eleven or twelve was shown into the sitting-room. She led a sturdy boy of three by the hand. Her manner as she replied to Mrs. Grill's friendly greeting was perfect, and even the little tot tugged at his cap with his left hand as he put up his right one for Mrs. Grill to shake. I noticed the minute they came in that their clothes were old and mended, but clean and neat. Within two minutes I had said to myself, 'Those children have a lady for a mother.' You see we grown folks are apt to form an opinion of the mothers by the way the children act and talk.

"The little girl whose name was Alice, then said:

"'I came up, Mrs. Grill, to see if you would not like to have me take care of the twins so that you can go to the W. C. T. U. meeting this afternoon.'

"'You blessed child!' exclaimed Mrs. Grill; 'how did you know I was unusually desirous of attending the meeting to-day?'

"'I didn't know it,' returned Alice, looking very bright and smiling in a minute, 'but I thought I'd come and see. 'I would like a few pieces of silk and velvet if you have them to spare, and I want to pay for them by looking after the children. I had to bring Carl, because you know mother is away now.'

"'Oh, yes, I did hear that she was sent for on account of her mother's illness. Have you heard from her?'

"'Yes'm,' replied Alice, her blue eyes filling with tears, "she wrote that poor grandma could not live very long, and if I was getting on all right with the work and the children she wanted to stay awhile. I thought perhaps you would write her a card urging her to stay there longer.'

"'I will write, certainly. What are you going to make, Alice?' said Mrs. Grill, very kindly.

"'A pin-cushion for mamma's Christmas present,' replied Alice, politely.

"Mrs. Grill hurried off leaving the children whom Alice in her quiet motherly way kept pleasant and serene. After awhile I drew her into a conversation about Christmas.

"'We always have a little something extra for dinner and mamma manages to get a present for each of us,' said Alice. 'Last year I had a dress, Nannie a coat made out of one of mamma's, Johnnie had a sled, and Carl a slate and a pair of shoes. I began something for mamma in the spring; something large and very nice, but I haven't it half done,' she added sighing. 'I couldn't get rags enough, besides it would cost something to get it finished and I can't find any way to earn any money except a dime now and then by coming here.'

"'What did you begin, Alice?' I asked, feeling quite touched at this evidence of her devotion to her mother.

"'A rag carpet for the sitting-room,' she replied. 'Ours is so shabby. We have the table standing over one big darned spot and a rocking chair over another. I was keeping it a great secret sewing upstairs in the attic, and hiding my balls in a barrel; but I could not take the old clothes without asking mamma and then she'd know, so I thought I'd make her a pin-cushion for this Christmas, and put around it a frill of lace that was on a baby dress of mine—beautiful lace that was bought before father——.'

"She stopped suddenly but I knew what thought was in her mind, for her father was a drunkard and her mother supported a family of six with her sewing.

"We passed a very pleasant afternoon, and when Mrs. Grill returned bright and smiling and refreshed by her walk in the open air and her meeting with the sisters of her beloved union she made up a nice roll of silk and velvet pieces for Alice, and then filled a grape basket with biscuit, doughnuts and apples.

"That evening Hattie Grill entertained her 'club girls' as they called themselves. There were six of them and they met once a week at each other's homes. When they met at Mrs. Grill's she drilled them an hour on health topics asking all sorts of questions in regard to caring for their health. This lasted an hour and then they had a general conversation for an hour. I sat in my quiet corner and sewed and listened.

"One girl said: 'Our minister told us last Sunday that if we wanted to be happy on Christmas we must try to make some one else so. I've tried to think what I could do but I can't think of anything worth while. Papa always gives me five dollars and I buy what I please for presents.'

"'That's just the way it is with me,' cried another.

"'And me! and me! and me!' echoed the others.

"A sudden thought came to me, and I said: 'Girls, I know of something nice you could all do, and if you'll agree to the plan I'll help you.'

"They looked at each other and at Mrs. Grill, but no one spoke.

"'What is it, Miss Harris?' said she; 'I know it's something nice.'

"'Well,' said I, 'I know a little girl, a sweet-mannered, polite little girl, who has been trying for a year to make her mother a rag carpet. Now, if each of us eight could make two very large balls apiece, and each give half a dollar for warp and the weaving we could make two persons very happy; and if you will come to-morrow evening and bring all the bright colored cloth your mothers can spare we will begin. We can do it in three evenings, I feel sure, and if each one of us could earn her half dollar within the next two weeks, it would be very nice.'

"'A splendid plan!' said Mrs. Grill in her bright, enthusiastic way. 'Now, all who want to join this band raise a hand;' and every hand went up.

"Of course, they wanted to know who was to have the carpet when finished, but I told them I wanted to keep that a secret until Christmas, and I asked them to refrain from mentioning to any one what we were going to do.

"We had a grand time those three evenings, and it would make a good story if I were to tell you how each earned her half dollar. Just before it was ready for the weaver I had to let Alice into the secret, and she brought over her six big balls, and I thought I never saw a sweeter, happier looking face than hers. With a few nails, brads, tacks, a pot of glue and a bottle of varnish, I worked wonders. Out of an old-fashioned 'whatnot' I made a nice bookcase and a corner bracket with two shelves.

"Mrs. Grill brought over a damask portière that was badly faded, but I dipped it in Diamond dye and turned it a rich crimson and we covered a large rocking-chair, a small rocking-chair and a sofa with it.

"Mrs. Grill and I went over one evening and put down the new carpet—a beauty it was, too—and then we surprised Alice by bringing in the furniture. A happier child I never saw. She told me afterwards that when her mother reached home on Christmas eve and saw the transformed room she cried for joy. 'Because she was so pleased to have it and to have such kind friends,' explained Alice fearing I would not understand.

"I should have thought her father would have been ashamed to have other folks fixing up his house," said Ethel.

"I guess he was somewhat," replied Miss Harris, "for he has done a great deal better ever since. He drinks less and works more and we have hopes that he will become a respectable member of society once more."

"Auntie, you've given me an idea for our Junior Y's. There's still time before Christmas and I'm going to propose that we do the same thing for poor Mrs. Brown. You'll help us, won't you, auntie?" And with a hug and a kiss Ethel vanished.

DEAR BOYS AND GIRLS:—Christmas is really here! You have been planning and looking forward to it for so long—such long weeks—that it hardly seems possible that it is actually here, does it? I hope that every Cozy Cornerer will find "in his stocking" Monday morning just the something that he wants, and if that something isn't there that he won't mind, but just enjoy all that is there for the sake of the givers.

The givers! Yes, Christmas time ought to be called the happy season of giving. You know Christ, whose birthday it is that we celebrate in this way, taught that it is more blessed to give than to receive. Does this seem hard to believe? Those of you who have made sacrifices to give something to dear friends know in part its meaning. And those who have gathered gifts for an L. T. L. gift service or helped the flower mission in its annual distribution to poor families who would otherwise know nothing of Christmas joys, will say with all your hearts, "Yes, it is more blessed to give than to receive."

A number of good letters have been received from Cozy Cornerers who have been wearing their thinking caps. Look out for them next week.

A merry holiday season to you all!

It is expedient for you that I go away: for if I go not away, the Comforter will not come unto you; but if I depart, I will send him unto you.—John 16:7.

CHRISTMAS GIVING.

From its first dawning Christmas has been devoted to the spirit of giving. It began with a gift. Love, through all the ages since, has been tested by what it gives. From the woman with the alabaster box of ointment and that other woman casting into the treasury her two mites, down to the present time, it is a divine as well as a human axiom that if we love much we give much.

Small wonder then that Christmas has been consecrated as the "feast of gifts," or that young and old alike look upon it as the time when love shall have freest expression, and shall pour itself out upon the loved one. But is there not something radically wrong in our Christmas giving to-day? Look at the fevered throng of shoppers filling our stores. See the anxious faces of the women (and men, too, sometimes) who are striving to "make both ends meet" and secure an almost unlimited number of Christmas gifts out of a very limited Christmas income. See the half insane mania which possesses many otherwise sane women, that no one in their whole list of acquaintances shall be forgotten. See the chagrin upon their faces, oftentimes, when they find as Christmas comes that they have been remembered by some one whom they had failed to remember. See the careful balancing of cost, and the anxiety to give as expensive presents as are received. We actually know a case in which one friend asked another, "Now, what did this cost? I always want to give value for value."

Shame upon the sordid spirit which can thus rob giving of that which is its sole charm—the spontaneous outreaching of love and good-will!

White-ribbon women, above all others, should seek to raise the Christmas time above this base, sordid level. Never let us give a Christmas gift to any human being simply because we think that person may expect it, or may give to us. Give as God gives, from our love and to others' needs.

Costly gifts, bric-a-brac, and the thousand nothings which enter into the giving of thoughtless women, should have no place in ours. Our friends, if we really love them, know that we do. We need not enforce that fact by sending them presents for which they have no need, when others of our brothers and sisters are hungry and cold, lacking the common necessities of life. Send your friend a loving letter on Christmas morning, and spend the five dollars you had meant to spend on a vase that appealed to your aesthetic taste, in buying warm flannels or flour for those who are in actual want.

Somehow it has come to us as never before in this year of poverty and destitution, that God will hold us accountable for our Christmas giving.

DRINK AND DESTITUTION.

Under the above caption the Chicago Tribune in a recent issue comments at length upon the state of affairs in the iron districts of Michigan. In view of its well-known attitude toward the liquor traffic we are truly surprised to find this paper descanting upon the evils of the drink business, and attributing the present destitution in the poverty-stricken towns of that mining region to the saloon. While the mines were being operated it says the miners earned good wages, which, if, instead of spending lavishly on drink they had providently used, would have been sufficient to carry them through the present "rainy day."

It seems there are sixty-two saloons in Iron Mountain, or one for every twenty-eight voters, "all prosperous." Last year a little city of about 10,000 population paid $30,000 in liquor licenses, and over $50,000 in saloon rents which explains, says the Tribune, a large part of the story of dire destitution which comes from that locality. The Tribune regards it as a "burning shame that relief must come out of the savings of many men and women who now would have nothing to give had they been equally reckless in the past as were the iron miners of the Upper Peninsula," and declares it is a "thousand pities that those who fattened upon the vices of the workers and pandered to their depraved appetites cannot be made to disgorge at least a portion of the plunder." All this from a paper that has always stood as the friend of the saloon, and advocated its legalization as a "necessary evil"!

From its handling of the subject one might almost imagine that the great Chicago daily was beginning to question the expediency of the liquor traffic even from the "revenue" standpoint.

We quite agree with this leader (or follower) of public sentiment, that those who fatten upon the vices of the miners should be made to "disgorge." The question is who are "those"? Are the saloon-keepers the only ones who pander to depraved appetites? The liquor seller has a legal right to fatten upon the people's vices and to pander to their depraved appetites, and after conferring this right upon him it would be unjust in the extreme to make him "disgorge" more than he already does. According to the Tribune the saloon-keepers of Iron Mountain "disgorge" over $80,000 annually in licenses and rents—fully their share, we think, under the circumstances.

But what about that portion of the "plunder" which goes into the state coffers? What about that which finds its way into the pockets of the lessors of these places of business? And that we may know of a truth who are the fatteners and panderers, it is in order to inquire further how many office-holders in the municipality of Iron Mountain owe their position directly to the saloon-keepers and their following? Also, how many voters of Michigan pander to depraved appetites by supporting a party that supports the saloon? So far from its being a "burning shame" that sober and provident people are called upon to relieve destitution caused by the drink traffic in the mining regions of Michigan or anywhere else, it is an instance of a poetic justice which is also prosaically practical.

The only people who have earned the right to be exempt from the consequences of the liquor evil—if such exemption were possible—are the men and women who vote and work for prohibition, municipal, state and national. Every man who votes for, every woman who "lends her influence" to a liquor party, and thus aids in perpetuating the license system ought to be "made to disgorge" a portion of his or her wealth, be it great or small, to relieve the poverty and suffering produced by the saloon.

We rejoice at this indication of an "evoluting" process going on in the inner consciousness of the Chicago Tribune. For once let it be admitted that the liquor traffic is a potent cause of poverty and vice, and the next step is necessarily to concede the wisdom of removing that cause. But until the Tribune feels sure that the house it lives in is made of less fragile material than glass, it should refrain from throwing stones at the saloon-keepers. It is not becoming in any Republican or Democratic organ to attempt to make a scapegoat of the drink-seller. Let every adherent of the old parties shoulder his share of the responsibility with as good grace as he can, and if unsatisfactory economic conditions suggest the fallacy of the "revenue" argument let him utter no protest, but come forward with his share of dollars and cents to relieve the suffering caused by pandering to the depraved appetites of wage workers.

Surely every "good Republican" must frown upon such editorials as this of the Tribune as jeopardizing the interests of the "grand old party" by throwing too much light upon the workings of the license system. Drink and destitution are ever inseparable, and it is significant of much when an avowed anti-prohibition paper, and a leading Republican organ, calls attention to the connection between the two.

WHAT THE WORLD'S FAIR JUDGES THOUGHT OF SCIENTIFIC TEMPERANCE.

The educational exhibits at the World's Fair were so extended that the judges have only recently had time to report upon the largest group, No. 149. No single exhibit in that group, nor in all the educational displays of the White City attracted more attention, or excited more interest, than that of scientific temperance instruction in the public schools. The exhibitor, Mrs. Mary H. Hunt, of Boston, has been informed that this exhibit has been assigned five highest awards:

1. For legislation requiring physiological temperance instruction in the public schools in forty-four states and territories of the United States and Canada and in Sweden.

2. For graded series of text-books on this subject in the English language.

3. For translations of these books, now in use in five different languages.

4. For methods of schoolroom study in this science.

5. For exhibit of pupil work in this branch from various states in the United States.

COURTESY IN PUBLIC SPEAKERS.

A few incidents which have been recently brought to our attention lead us to think that a book of etiquette specially adapted to the use of public speakers is one of the pressing needs of this age. Incident number one is that of a white man, a northern white man, who attended the dedication of a large and quite important colored church. As a matter of courtesy he was asked to say a few words. He congratulated the colored brothers upon their new church, and upon the general improvement of their race in morals, assuring them that they didn't steal as much as they used to, that he knew a colored man who hadn't stolen anything for a year. Of course this is a most extreme case. It is not often that one to whom the courtesies of any public gathering had been extended would display his own utter lack of Christian decency, not to say courtesy, by thus wantonly insulting those who had treated him with the courtesy ordinarily extended to Christian gentlemen. If the man were a nobody we should not think of mentioning the incident. It is a case, perhaps, which a book on etiquette would not reach, as it is too gross a breach of the proprieties to be credited unless actually experienced.

On two other occasions conventions of women were the sufferers. In the first case the question of adopting the woman's suffrage plank of the National was under consideration by one of the state conventions of the W. C. T. U. After strong but amicable discussion, the matter had reached a decision in the resolutions committee and awaited the action of the convention. It was the last day of the convention, the time was limited and many important matters were waiting to be decided. In the midst of the business, a good brother who had shown himself the friend of the union, and was a somewhat privileged character, one who had already spoken by invitation to the convention, sent word to the president that he desired to say a few words. The time was given him, he arose and in a half-hour's speech informed the convention that he had heard that a woman's suffrage resolution was to be passed. He then urged upon them the danger of hasty, ill-advised action on this most important subject, and cautioned them to "go slow." His remarks, probably, had no effect whatever on the vote taken afterwards, and if they had, we should not complain of his action on those grounds. We would not see any motion carry, however desirable the thing in itself, if fuller discussion would have defeated it. But consider the impertinence of thus assuming that such a body of women would act like a set of thoughtless children and were not capable of taking in all sides of a subject, that they are in such danger of ruining their cause that it is imperative that some wise male friend interrupt their business and obtain permission to address the assembly in order to show them the dangers into which they are heedlessly rushing.

A third incident is like unto this second, only worse and "more of it." An assembly of women larger and more august than a state convention of the W. C. T. U. had devoted nearly a day to the discussion of a question in which the members were deeply interested and concerning which they were sharply divided. The opinion of the body had been given by a strong vote. Soon after, a gentleman of world-wide repute honored the convention with his presence and was invited to speak. In the course of his remarks he took it upon himself to discuss this matter, expressing opinions the opposite to those of the majority of the convention. Now in these two cases it matters not at all on which side of the subject the speakers arrayed themselves. The inexcusable impertinence of it consists in their alluding to the disputed subjects at all. Some years ago a convention of women dared to express their wishes concerning the prospective action of the Methodist Episcopal church relative to the admission of women to the general conference, and very many members of said church were loud in their denunciations of this "unpardonable impertinence."

In our judgment these women did not go beyond their legitimate and proper bounds, and we venture to say that the W. C. T. U. would receive kindly, even if it did not see fit to adopt, any suggestions from the general conference of the Methodist Episcopal church in which that august body had as deep an interest as did those women in the admission of their Methodist sisters to the supreme council of the church, but, if the action of these women was regarded so severely, what would probably be the fate of a woman who when invited to speak before any conclave of the brethren, should presume to give unasked her advice concerning any matter which said assembly had under consideration and concerning which the members were sharply divided? If some of the brethren will kindly inform us how they would treat this suppositious, reckless woman, perhaps we will know next time how to conduct ourselves toward the brother who presumes upon the courtesy of our conventions to discuss matters which do not concern him and about which we do not desire his advice.

THE charge that prohibition sentiment is making no headway in this country sometimes meets an unexpected refutation. Going into the New Mexico Building, just before the close of the World's Columbian Exposition, we were given a beautifully illustrated catalogue of the Pecos Valley—the fruit belt of that territory. In looking over, a few days later, its wonderful story of the results of irrigation, among the attractions of the new town of Eddy—which in less than three years has attained a population of two thousand, with churches, banks, public schools, sugar, ice and planing factories, water works and electricity—is found this clause: "Every deed given by the Town Company contains a stipulation prohibiting the sale of liquors on the premises." Further on in the enumeration and advantages of other towns in this rapidly settling valley of surpassing loveliness, we read: "The prohibition clause that is inserted in all the deeds made by the Pecos Valley Town Company, and which has been the means of bringing such a superior class of people to Eddy, will also insure peace, order and good citizenship in all the towns that grow up in the Pecos Valley." The record of the settlement of new territory in this country has always been that the first man to get there was the saloon-keeper, and, thank God, the second one was a Methodist circuit-rider. Let cavilers and travelers take note; a new country now to secure a good class of settlers offers a prohibition clause against the saloon as one of its allurements. The practical wisdom of "temperance fanatics" is being justified at last, and now is their reward nigher than when they believed, for cities are being founded in righteousness instead of "in blood," and their doctrine of the outlawry of the saloon is the cause of it.

RECENT letters tell us that Miss Willard is getting the victory over the bicycle. She is delighted that she has graduated from the tricycle and is out twice a day on her "wabbly steed," as she designates the bicycle because it will not yet obey her will. She is taking a course of lessons from a young lady who runs beside her, and is privileged in enjoying the seclusion and beauty of the Priory grounds at Reigate, thirty miles from London. She writes: "I had a beautiful time yesterday though I did fall off once! That machine is a study in mental and moral philosophy and psychology—I must write it up some day."

THE practical suggestion has been made in a recent exchange that the organized Salvation Army be made agents in connection with the church and other relief committees to reach the worthy suffering poor. That our alms may be wisely and impartially administered, no more effective and discriminating agency could be utilized. Consult with the Salvation Army leaders, church and W. C. T. U. workers and philanthropists, and much unnecessary waste of energy will be prevented.

GOVERNOR TILLMAN'S proposition to build the dormitory of the Girls' Industrial College of South Carolina with revenue from his state liquor dispensary, is meeting with hot opposition from the Charleston News and Courier, the leading journal of the southeast, as well as from the temperance sentiment of the state. Education of children by "blood money" is more generally abhorred than any other use of revenue from liquor.

PLEDGE.—"I hereby solemnly promise, God helping me, to abstain from all distilled, fermented and malt liquor, including Wine and Cider, and to employ all proper means to discourage the use of and traffic in the same."

QUESTION.—Is it in accord with parliamentary usage for any president (as soon as a subject is presented to a union) to vacate her chair and express her own opinion, then declare it open for other discussion?

ANSWER.—As a president is expected to vote only when a tie occurs, she is not expected to speak to a question except under conditions of equal emergency.

Q.—Does the W. C. T. U. admit as honorary members any who use tobacco or other narcotics?

A.—Honorary members are not asked to sign a pledge covering more ground than does that of the National W. C. T. U., but we believe that "where the treasure is there will the heart be also," and hope all those moved to give their names and dues will follow on to perfection.

Q.—Has each or any local union the power to alter or amend the constitution governing local unions, or is this power vested in the state executive?

A.—Every union is a law unto itself and can change its own constitution so long as it does not violate its spirit, for instance, it could not refuse to be a temperance organization, nor could it change its name, etc.

Q.—Is it legal for a member of the W. C. T. U. to belong to more than one union at a time?

A.—There might be sufficient personal reasons for joining a second union, but it would not be legal to vote in more than one union.

Q.—Why was the exhibition of nude statuary allowed in the Woman's Building at the World's Fair?

A.—This is a difficult question. Sometime in January of last year Mrs. Palmer came into the office and said, "Mrs. Candace Wheeler and I have been considering what shall find a place in the Woman's Building, and we have decided to reject all nude statuary." I clapped my hands and immediately wrote Miss Willard, as I knew she would rejoice. I heard nothing more until the exhibits began to be installed, and to my surprise found specimens of the nude creeping in. Have not been able to ascertain why that wise decision was overruled.

Q.—1. What are the teachings of the W. C. T. U. in regard to cider?

2. Can I tell our women and children they may drink it the day it is made?

A.—Since cider is the special temptation of many country towns, and since many refuse to acknowledge its dangerous character, it is imperative that the W. C. T. U. shall take very high ground in regard to it. As a matter of fact really sweet cider is too insipid to be regarded usually as a pleasant drink; most people do not care for it until it has begun to ferment.

We teach the children that the only safe course is to abstain from all cider for the following reasons:

(a) The lighter alcoholic drinks, including cider, are far more dangerous as regards the children than the stronger liquors.

(b) We can fix no definite age for cider at which the alcohol will begin to form, this depending upon various conditions, such as the condition of the atmosphere and the quality of the apples.

(c) When we have agreed to let cider entirely alone, there is no doubt remaining. If we take it at all there is constant temptation to risk a little more as regards its age and alcoholic character.

(d) We should avoid even the appearance of evil for the sake of our influence and example.

(e) We cannot thoroughly respect ourselves, nor be strong to persuade any one else to leave the wrong or seek the right, if we refuse to practice so small a self-denial as the giving up of cider, for our own safety, and the good of others.

I should be most unwilling to believe that any W. C. T. U. woman would consent to a lower standard than this, or to less stringent teaching, either for children or adults.

A woman editor in Yokohama having been deposed through a change in the proprietorship, wrote a valedictory. In it she said: "It has been urged more than once that under the present editorship it has been impossible for our contemporaries to write freely, but when we recall the fact that we have been termed a liar, a virago, likened to a senseless creature who pokes the fire from the top, stigmatized as an irate female, a female fibber, and alluded to in a variety of other amicable ways, we are tempted to wonder to what limits journalistic freedom aspires to soar." I am glad editing is not such a trial in this country.

On Duty saw, with hosts of other women, the pathos and the triumph of the Harvard Annex adjustment. She is proud that women have at last an equal footing with men in grand old Harvard, but sorry that it had to come through a dowry of two hundred and fifty thousand dollars. The challenge was offered and accepted, and now "Radcliffe College" (named from Anne Radcliffe, the first woman to aid the college financially) is a part of the regular university, and the meaningless "Annex" is no more. All honor to Mrs. Agassiz, Mrs. Claflin, Miss Longfellow, Miss Horsford and the other earnest women who have personally raised this handsome ransom fee.

ON DUTY does not object to a very practical item occasionally. Here is one contributed by Lillian S. Wells, of Tampa, Fla., entitled, "Griddle cakes without smoke:" "In a recent Columbian Crumbs article the baking of cakes by electricity on a polished griddle without grease was described and the question unanswered as to whether a common griddle could be used in the same way. Several years ago I advocated this method of baking cakes, and explained how any griddle, even an old one, could be scoured and made as smooth as possible and used without greasing. Several points should be observed: The griddle must be perfectly clean and as smooth as may be. It should be the right temperature, i. e., just hot enough to produce a golden brown. A good stiff cake slice is desirable, though a broad, flexible knife will answer. Do not be tempted to use 'just a little' grease. After a fifteen years' practical experience with this method myself and after hearing the appreciative words from friends who have tried it I feel confident in recommending it to others."

Mrs. Bramwell Booth related this story, because it had a moral, at the expense of one of our leaders. She said that when the leader in question (Mrs. A.) appeared on the platform of the Salvation Army (when the General was to speak) she had on a very handsome hat, covered with white and gray ostrich plumes. The facts are that a friend, whom we will call Mrs. B. for convenience sake, had just put this aside, one of her relations having passed away, in consequence of which fact she had gone into mourning. She insisted on Mrs. A. wearing the hat on this occasion, neither of them ever expecting that they would be brought to the front, and the rim affording great help to the eyes; but, behold, she was led to the platform, and there was Mrs. Bramwell Booth and her little daughter, ten years old, who, on returning home, made some kind remark about Mrs. A., closing with the words: "But, mamma, that lady that you have told me about so much had on the same kind of feathers that your naughty girls wear" (in the rescue homes). Mrs. Booth told this as a pleasantry to a friend, and said that it seemed as if those girls would barter their very souls for feathers any day. It was their prevailing complaint. The victim of this remark on the part of the enfant terrible decided that this should be a lesson to her, and she is going to make a rule always to have a sort of fringed ribbon instead of feathers on her hats. She had hitherto drawn the line at ostrich feathers, because it was said that they were obtained without pain to the bird; but if women are giving themselves away to get such feathers then I think the other women who wish them well had better quit setting such a bad example.

Superintendents' Reports.

[According to our promise, we continue in this number the publication of the National superintendents' reports, which were not read at the Convention. We will publish as many of them in each issue as space will permit, until they are all printed, observing the order on the Convention program, and again invite those superintendents who have not already done so, to send us their reports. It is impossible to publish the long reports in full.—EDS.]

LOYAL TEMPERANCE LEGION.

The spirit and aim of this department are expressed in the motto adopted by its graduates: "Lifting others as we climb."

Through all the years of its existence the Legion has been climbing, and to-day it stands upon a mountain peak from which the past may be surveyed with humble gratitude and the future with glad expectation.

First among the causes for thanksgiving should be mentioned the enthusiastic interest of some state W. C. T. U. presidents in the progress of the Legion, one of whom says that in organizing and visiting unions she exhorts the women to make the work for the children their first care, and to spend whatever time and strength remain upon other departments. Is not this equivalent to an exhortation to lay broad and deep foundations and then rear upon them the superstructure?

The Legion has been steadily climbing to the height where the value of its work to the future of the temperance cause is finding recognition. Pulpit and press are giving it heartiest indorsement. By invitation from one of the editors of Harper's Young People an article upon the Loyal Temperance Legion is about to appear in that magazine, with favorable comments by the editor.

The following glowing tribute from the secretary of the Youth's Congress, recently held in this building, tells its own story: "There are fifteen hundred young people made members of this congress, and eight hundred of them are the cream of this country, the graduates of the course of study of the Loyal Temperance Legion."

The following states, fourteen in number, have given representation to the L. T. L. in their annual W. C. T. U. conventions: New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, New York, Pennsylvania, Georgia, Mississippi, Arkansas, Indiana, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Iowa, Nebraska, Oregon. Oregon and Illinois have made the L. T. L. a branch, and its superintendent a secretary, with membership in the state executive committee.

Idaho Legions are raising the amount necessary to inscribe their name upon a tablet in the Temple.

County L. T. L. conventions are now held in many states, with constantly increasing numbers and interest. The organization of county Legions with full corps of juvenile officers, under the direction of an adult leader, and with payment of county dues, has dignified our work in the estimation of our aspiring young people, who will not be held back, but, impelled by the spirit of the age, rush on either into good or evil.

With the development of the diploma course of study, and the multiplying of graduates on every hand, comes greater need than ever of trained leaders. In county conferences specially called to meet this need, Connecticut leads the way, and other states are falling into line.

The inspiring state L. T. L. conventions of Wisconsin and Pennsylvania have been supplemented by a telegram announcing that the New York state Legion was successfully launched on October 2. Michigan, Nebraska, Massachusetts, Indiana, Oregon and Mississippi record their expectation of similar organizations in 1894, and other states are working toward the same end.

"Lifting others as we climb" young hearts are being trained to give quick sympathy to the needs of the unfortunate, and young hands and feet to translate this sympathy into helpful deeds. Miss Gordon's inspiring plans for this Columbian year have linked the boys and girls, through the autograph cards, with this wonderful World's Fair, and through the Willard Fountain, with the name of our beloved leader, and with this marvelous city of Chicago, in a practical way that cannot fail to leave a lasting impression upon their lives.

And yet some of our local unions, made up of blessed women whose hearts are running over with mother-love, are outside the current of all this joy and inspiration, because they are childless unions.

While some of our leading states must, in spite of all the pleadings of faithful superintendents, report a majority of their unions without a Legion, others one-half thus desolate, and so on through the dreary list, "there remains very much land to be possessed." May God send upon us all the spirit of conviction as to our responsibility and our opportunity for the children; and the spirit of consecration which overcomes all hindrances in the power of the Lord.

Some time since in addressing a company of children, having drawn from them by questions their ideas in regard to the evils of the saloon, I asked: "And what are you boys and girls going to do about it?"

One very little fellow answered: "Keep it a-going."

"Keep what going?" I responded.

"The Loyal Temperance Legion," was his reply.

To my question, "And what good will that do?" came his ready answer: "Oh! the Loyal Temperance Legion are growing up, and the bad people will die off, and then we'll all be good."

So my word to you, dear sisters, comes from the lips of the boy in whose behalf I plead to-day, "Keep it a-going."

Teach the children everywhere this L. T. L. salute: 1. Thumb and forefinger of right hand resting lightly on forehead. 2. Right hand on heart. 3. Right hand extended horizontally. Also the interpretation of this salute, as follows, with the motions given above in their appropriate places:

My head, my heart, and this right hand,
For God and Home and Native Land.
Let them make our country ring from ocean to ocean
With their rallying cry: P-r-o Pro h-i hi Prohi b-i bi Prohibi t-i-o-n tion Prohibition.

Saloons must go, (clapping hands in time with the forcible pronunciation of these last three words).

Separate the companies with senior and junior grades; develop graduates; organize state and county Legions; let the children march with their banners, flags and badges through the streets of all our cities and towns. "Keep it a-going."

SCHOOL OF METHODS.

The departure of Mary Allen West to the eternal mansions left an aching void in thousands of hearts, and deeply has her loss been felt in many departments of the W. C. T. U. work, but in no place outside of the editorial room has her loss been felt more keenly than in her own National department, the School of Methods. But I am glad to be able to report that notwithstanding the bitter loss of this able woman, God's blessing has evidently been upon this department during the past year, as evinced by the fact that so many states report beginning for the first time systematic work in school of methods, while all reports indicate progress and greater efficiency along this line.

NORTHERN CALIFORNIA has held its annual school of methods, with an eight days' session, at the Chautauqua Assembly grounds of Pacific Grove, but separate from the Chautauqua Assembly. The various state superintendents were largely present, and presented their own departments. The expenses of this school were met by collections and fees on evening entertainments. This state school of methods, from all reports I receive, is ably conducted, largely attended and undoubtedly a great help to the W. C. T. U. women of Northern California, as well as an educator in W. C. T. U. aims to the people in general.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA reports: We held two state schools of methods during the past year, one at Carlsbad, San Diego county, during the M. E. Assembly, and the other at Long Beach, Chautauqua grounds. In each case the school lasted two days, with three sessions each day. Many of the state superintendents were present to lead in presenting their departments. At Long Beach the attendance during the day was three hundred and twenty-four, and in the evening about one thousand. No county or district schools have been held, but the superintendent reports that she has asked each county president to hold at least one school of methods this year. She also reports the great benefit the school of methods has already been as an educator to the general public.

TEXAS reports: We have no state school of methods, but have held three district schools during the year. Two of them were under the superintendency of the state president; the other by the state superintendent of evangelistic work. These schools were not held during our state convention. They each continued six days with three sessions a day. The state superintendents assisted. The expenses were met by subscriptions and collections.

NEW HAMPSHIRE has not held a regular school of methods, but has given the department some attention in the county conventions. Will take it up systematically this coming year.

NEBRASKA: Four state schools have been held. One conducted by the president, Mrs. Hitchcock, one by Mrs. C. H. Waller, and two by the state superintendent of the department, Mrs. C. W. Woodward. These schools covered a period of twelve days each. Almost all of the departments were presented by the county and state superintendents. The expenses were met partly by the management of the Chautauqua grounds and partly by the state union. The attendance was good and much interest manifested.

CONNECTICUT reports three schools held in connection with county conventions, at which scientific temperance instruction, L. T. L. and evangelistic departments were discussed.

VERMONT has held one state school at which various departments were presented by the county presidents and superintendents. The average attendance was 250. The expenses were covered by collections. This state has found the school of methods most interesting and helpful, and will take it up as a regular department hereafter.

KANSAS: The president of this state writes: The school of methods has been made one of the most prominent of our departments in the past two years. The Forest Park Assembly at Ottawa, one of the largest and most important Sabbath school assemblies, has granted a place to the W. C. T. U. and given us an appropriation of fifty dollars each year to carry on our work. Our school of methods there this year was a most successful one. We had two hours a day for ten days. The state superintendents of departments each gave a valuable paper, which were discussed thoroughly by the large, enthusiastic audiences that always attended. I gave a paper on the "Outlook of the W. C. T. U." that brought out several departments and their usefulness. The management consider this school of methods one of the attractions of the assembly, and aid and encourage it by every means in their power. The assembly at Winfield, in the southern part of the state, learning of this, invited us to establish a school of methods at their Chautauqua. This was equally successful as Ottawa and so pleased the management that they gave us a prominent place, with an appropriation and the promise of an hour each day on the platform of the tabernacle.

OHIO has held one state school at Lakeside summer assembly. The term was two days and the superintendents were given two hours each day to present the work of their departments. This is the first state school held by Ohio, and hereafter a summer school will be held annually at Lakeside. Each superintendent paid her own expenses.

TENNESSEE has ground broken for an Assembly Hall, for a school of methods at Waynesville, N. C., and a few contributions raised already for a Mary Allen West memorial room.

WEST WASHINGTON reports one state school held during the Chautauqua Assembly. The length of the term was three days. Three hours a day were given to the work. Each superintendent with others read valuable papers, after which a general discussion followed. The Health Institute occupied one whole day, the press symposium an afternoon. The afternoon sessions were more largely attended than the day meetings of Chautauqua. Each person paid her own expenses. One district school has been held.

DELAWARE has had no regular school of methods, but in both county and state conventions special consideration is given to methods of department work.

KENTUCKY held a state school in connection with the Chautauqua Assembly held at Lexington. The term was ten days, and one hour a day was given to this department. The superintendent writes: "I think the state school has done especially good work by bringing the W. C. T. U. before the public, thus removing much prejudice, and creating a friendly feeling. We are on very friendly terms with Chautauqua Assembly; they would grant any reasonable demand we would make. This place has been won for the W. C. T. U. by patient perseverance in well-doing. It was not at first accorded, but we feel secure in our footing now." The expenses were met by subscriptions from various local unions and individuals.

RHODE ISLAND has no state school. One has been held in connection with the Kent county convention, conducted by Mrs. Mary H. Hunt in the interest of her department. The length of the session was one day and evening. All the schools in the town were closed with one exception, and forty-five teachers were present. Some teachers from adjoining towns were present, and also the county school superintendent. A good impression was made and much information imparted concerning scientific temperance instruction.

MINNESOTA reports having held schools of methods in connection with district and county conventions, at which the general departments were presented by superintendents and others and given wherever needed. The district and county presidents have had charge of these schools.

MAINE has held a state school in connection with Old Orchard temperance camp-meeting. There was a term of three days, three sessions a day of three hours each. All the departments were presented and discussed. Many prominent workers were present from all parts of the state, also some from other states and Canada. The state president conducted the school. The expenses were met by collections.

PENNSYLVANIA reports a number of county schools held, but no state school. These schools were conducted by the state superintendents, and the various departments were explained by her after her manner of conducting a normal class. The expenses were met by the local unions of the counties in which they were held, and by collections.

SOUTH DAKOTA has held two state schools in connection with the Chautauqua programs. The schools occupied ten days each, with two sessions a day for one hour. All the departments were presented by the state superintendents and others. The sessions were well attended by the gentlemen. The expenses of these schools were met by the Chautauqua management.

MICHIGAN reports two excellent schools of methods, both in connection with summer assemblies, one at Hackley Park, under the charge of the state president, Mrs. Mary T. Lathrap, and the other at Bay View, in connection with the Bay View Chautauqua Assembly, and conducted by Mrs. C. B. Buell. Both of these had admirable programs. Most of the faculty of the Hackley Park were the state officers and superintendents. A number of the instructors at Bay View were National officers from outside the state. Both these state schools are fortunate in having halls or auditoriums of their own at the assembly grounds. At both of these schools not only department work, but other topics of importance to the local workers were discussed, and able temperance lectures, by prominent speakers, were also delivered. The whole program proved so interesting, not only to W. C. T. U. women, but to the general public, that although only those were admitted who bought tickets to the Chautauqua Assembly, yet from two to three hundred persons are reported as being in daily attendance.

These are all the full state reports that have been received by the National superintendent of this department. Other states have reported that although nothing has been done this year, the work will be taken up and vigorously prosecuted next year. Allow me to offer the following suggestions: First: That each state superintendent read carefully the reports from other states and adopt in her own any helpful suggestions as to finance or methods of conducting such schools. Second: That during the coming year, each state begin early to plan to take up this department in a systematic manner, and give it a prominent place, from the great summer assemblies down to the county conventions, assured that such work will not only pay back tenfold all its labor and expense in increased efficiency of W. C. T. U. workers, but equally so, in winning the general public to understand and respect our work.

COLORADO.

SUFFRAGE IN THE SILVER STATE.

The month in our state has been one of rejoicing over the victory for woman suffrage, and there is little doubt that the W. C. T. U. was the strongest force in this achievement. The totality in its favor was 6,347.

Mrs. Susan Fessenden, of Boston, delighted Denver audiences, and visited Colorado Springs in company with Mrs. Senator N. P. Hill, whose hospitality was shared in their elegant Denver home. They were both warmly received at Colorado Springs, and their forceful arguments were greeted with storms of applause.

Mrs. Carrie Lane Chapman has been making a tour through the state, and enthusiastically received. Mrs. Jenkins and Mrs. Leonora Barry-Lake have appeared before appreciative audiences under the auspices of the Equal Suffrage Association.

As the eyes of the nation are upon our state at this time, Dr. Robert McIntyre, pastor of Trinity M. E. church, where the National Convention was held one year ago, will deliver a series of Sunday evening lectures on "The Coming Woman." It is needless to add, this eloquent poet-preacher is in hearty sympathy with our W. C. T. U. from turret to foundation stone.

Mrs. Wrigley, our franchise superintendent, planned and presided at a "yellow ribbon contest" in North Denver, the prize being two dollars, and Harry Saunders was the successful winner. The whole entertainment was novel and interesting, and reflected credit on all the participants.

At Loveland, a silver medal contest was held, and Misses Wright, Skiles and Virden won the prizes.

Mrs. R. R. Webb, superintendent of the Y's, has organized a Y at Hygiene with ten members, that promises much in the future.

A concert for the benefit of the Longmont reading-room netted seventy-five dollars and seventeen cents, and was pronounced one of the best entertainments ever given. This union suffers a loss in the removal of one of their number, Mrs. S. J. Robbins, who will spend the winter in California, hoping for restoration to health, and may reside there permanently.

The annual meeting of the Grand Junction union was full of enthusiasm. They reëlected, by acclamation, their able and efficient president, Mrs. E. W. A. Fisk, and at the supper given each lady entertained a non-member, thereby increasing interest and adding to their treasury. In connection with the Y. M. C. A., have been secured commodious reading and reception rooms neatly furnished, a library and dining-room that are well patronized by homeless young men and transient visitors. Mrs. S. B. Pickett, county president, unable to walk without crutches, gave an encouraging talk, commending the union for work accomplished during the year.

An error must be corrected regarding the statement in my last letter "that Larimer county has no saloons or billiard hall." This fact should be credited to the small town of Berthoud, that happily boasts of no such dens of iniquity.

The annual meeting in behalf of the World's W. C. T. U. was held by the Colorado Springs union, November 12. Mrs. A. F. Newton, evangelistic superintendent, presided, and sketches of the life and work of the World's missionaries were given by different members of the union. A collection for the World's W. C. T. U. was taken.

A delightful reception to Mrs. A. A. Cameron was given by the Leonard W. C. T. U., of Denver, at the residence of the president, Mrs. Cassell. Despite the inclemency of the weather, seventy-five ladies were present to bid farewell to Mrs. Cameron, an active member of the W. C. T. U., who leaves early in December for Brooklyn, N. Y., where her husband, Rev. A. A. Cameron, has been called to the pastorate of Calvary Baptist church. Rev. Mrs. Leonard, Mrs. Higgins and Mrs. Collier assisted at the reception. Piano selections and recitations furnished much enjoyment. Rev. Mrs. Leonard offered a prayer, Mrs. Cassell made a farewell talk and Mrs. Teetor sang "There are Bands of Ribbon White Around the World," after which all united in singing "God Be With You Till We Meet Again." The table decorations, designed by Mrs. Cassell, were unique and pertinent to the cause. A picture of Miss Willard was suspended from beneath the chandelier, just over the center of the table, and from its four corners long white ribbons extended to the four corners of the table, symbolic of the bands of ribbon white reaching to the four quarters of the earth. Smilax and flowers, dainty china and glass lent their charms to the scene.

The Florence Crittenton mission in Denver is attaining fame and prominence, and not long since received a donation of twenty-five dollars from Buffalo Bill, through the indefatigable vice-president, Mrs. S. M. W. Likens. The president is Mrs. Governor Waite.

All these items of interest have given cause for gratitude and hope for better things in the varied branches of our work. We now turn the leaf to mention our sorrow that our Father has taken to Himself another loved worker, and former president of Colorado W. C. T. U., Mrs. C. D. H. Thompson, who passed away in her lovely home at Longmont. Her illness was of long duration. "At last, the thread was snapped," "the golden bowl broken." Resolutions of respect and sympathy were sent from many unions to the husband. Truly, our circle is enlarging on high with "comrades of yesterday, now Saints of God."

UTAH.

IN ANNUAL CONVENTION.

The third territorial convention of the W. C. T. U. was held in the First Presbyterian church in Salt Lake City, Utah, October 5 and 6. Mrs. Martin, second vice-president, of Manti, presided very ably, and after organization the various committees were appointed.

Mrs. Griffith made the address of welcome, which was full of good cheer and pleasant greeting to our visiting delegates. Miss Kellogg, of Provo, replied in a most charming manner, her only regret being that she represented a defunct union. We were sorry to hear that the Provo union had disbanded, but hope soon to hear of their reorganization.

An interesting paper on evangelistic work was sent in by Mrs. Burnett, who was unable to be present. Mrs. Griffith followed with a report of her work among the soldiers at Ft. Douglas, which was most encouraging. Surely God has called this sister to this very work, as a year's labor is already bearing fruit. Many of the soldiers have found the true life and many are trying to break away from the liquor and tobacco habit as a preparation for a Christian life. Socials for the soldier boys are held once a month at the home of Mrs. Griffith. These are a source of much pleasure and are often very entertaining. Refreshments are served.

During the convention the ladies of the union furnished lunch in the church parlors. These were preceded by our noon-day prayer-meeting. Nothing could have done more to promote sociability than these luncheons, and many were the helpful thoughts gained from various sources.

Miss Kellogg, of Provo, gave a most concise and interesting talk on "The laws we have and the laws we need," and showed by her thorough knowledge of the laws of Utah that our laws are all strong enough and just what we need—yet it is the enforcement that is not carried out.

Mrs. Milliron gave a most excellent paper on the evils of tobacco, quoting the most learned authorities, for her statements of its effect on the human system, especially the growing boy. In our special memorial service, Mrs. Rathbone spoke of the life of Jennie Casseday, our beloved leader of the flower mission work, who from her bed of suffering reached out to others shut in. Mrs. McNeice followed with a short sketch of the life of Mary Allen West.

Mrs. Eddy, of Logan, gave a Bible reading and exposition of the 37th Psalm, making special mention of the two words fret and shall. If more ladies had the enthusiasm of Mrs. Eddy, we would carry all Utah for prohibition and reach out to help our sister states within the next year.

The report of the work all over the territory was, with a few exceptions, most encouraging and for the next year we have planned broader work than ever before.

A Demorest medal contest took place the first evening of the convention and was much enjoyed by our visiting delegates.

The following officers were elected: Mrs. Griffith, president, Salt Lake City; Mrs. Eddy, first vice-president, Logan; Mrs. Martin, second vice-president, Manti; Mrs. McNeice, third vice-president; Mrs. Rathbone, corresponding secretary; Mrs. Shepard, recording secretary, and Mrs. Dunshee, treasurer, all of Salt Lake City.

MRS. E. E. SHEPARD,
Recording Secretary, Salt Lake City.

OKLAHOMA.

"Only a drop in the bucket,
But every drop will tell,
The bucket would soon be empty
Without the drops in the well."

The youngest and smallest child in the great W. C. T. U. family met in annual convention in Oklahoma City. Fifteen delegates answered the roll-call and the first hour was occupied with a praise-meeting that lifted hearts heavenward.

The usual expressions of welcome were tendered us by the city, churches and union. The Republican mayor, Mr. Mitscher, for the city, paid a high tribute to women, as leaders in good works. Rev. F. W. Hawley, pastor of the Presbyterian wing of Christianity, spoke cheeringly of the good will felt by the churches toward our organization. Mrs. M. D. Storm, president of the local union, told us how joyfully the members had anticipated our coming. Mrs. M. A. Copland, of Guthrie, responded to all these welcomes in glowing terms of thankfulness.

The meeting was then thrown open to the various ministers of the city who had received special invitations to be present and express their views and opinions, and tell of their work along the lines of the temperance reform. Some were outspoken in their denunciation of the liquor traffic, testifying that it was the greatest hindrance to the work of the ministry. Others were conservative, allowing woman a wider range in temperance work than men, because she was not "in business." The "moral coward" was portrayed in scathing words by Dr. Delos Walker, a physician of Oklahoma City, who was called upon after the ministers had had their say.

The first hour of the second day session was devoted to memorial services for Mary Allen West and Jennie Casseday. A lady present, recently from California, told of the lasting work done upon the Pacific coast by Miss West before she sailed half way round the globe to meet death.

The president, Mrs. Nellie Sheplor's annual message was full of faithful work done for the Master, under many trying circumstances. The interest of the convention was curtailed by superintendents failing to report, there being only three reports from the ten departments.

A parliamentary drill conducted by Mrs. O. P. Light showed a lamentable ignorance of many along this line, while others were up to "high-water mark." A paper on finance, by Mrs. M. H. Switzer, of Kingfisher, who was our president elect, threw out some helpful hints toward a wise financial policy. The resolutions adopted were strongly in favor of equal suffrage, opposition to the universal tobacco habit, our solemn protest against fermented wine at the communion table, and the circulating of impure literature, and rejoicing that the Wrightman's gambling bill had helped the cause of temperance.

The last evening was devoted to a Demorest gold medal contest, but owing to the stringent rules governing contests, we were unable to give out the medal, as one contestant was too sick to recite, but the class of five girls did nobly. Miss Daisy Newell, of Yukon, received the highest marks.

Oklahoma City union, which was organized last May, with twelve members, deserves much praise for the superb manner in which it entertained the convention, opening its homes so cordially to the delegates, and making each one feel that it was good to be there.

The following is the list of officers for the ensuing year: President, Mrs. M. H. Switzer, Kingfisher; corresponding secretary, Mrs. M. D. Storm, Oklahoma City; recording secretary, Mrs. M. A. Copland, Guthrie; treasurer, Mrs. O. P. Light, El Reno.

BUSY WEEKS.

The months since our state convention have been a season of unremitting office work for the state corresponding secretary, and since October 1 the letter to THE UNION SIGNAL has had to wait its turn.

Since our last letter, we regret to record, sorrow has again come to the home of our beloved state president, and the angel of death has claimed for his own the lovely wife of her son Lawrence, whose death occurred at the home of her parents in Columbus, November 18. The summons was a sudden one, and our president is sorely bereaved.

A series of gospel meetings, conducted by Maj. Geo. A. Hilton, was held in Cadiz from October 15 to 29. The three churches, pastors and people, the W. C. T. U., the Y. P. S. C. E. and the Epworth League all united, working in closest harmony together. Four services each day were held, a morning prayer-meeting, a Bible reading in the afternoon and a prayer-meeting, followed by the gospel service in the evening. Major Hilton is a consecrated man, filled with the spirit of God, and speaks with great force and power.

Steubenville union, through its superintendent of scientific temperance instruction, has induced the board of education of that city to subscribe for fifty copies of Mrs. Mary H. Hunt's "Monthly Advices" for the help of their teachers. These, with good text books and the excellent charts which the board purchased last year, form an admirable equipment for the teaching of the scientific truths regarding the effects of alcohol and narcotics on the body. This union has also opened a free kitchen garden, where children will be taught dining and bed-room work, sweeping, dusting and other things which will fit them for good housekeepers. The merry singing of the rules as they work does much to keep up the interest of the pupils. This kitchen garden may later develop into a cooking school.

Marietta Y's have opened an industrial school, and have two classes of fifty pupils, to which they give careful instruction in cutting, fitting and sewing one day each week.

Many annual county and district meetings have been held since our last letter, which we can mention but briefly. The nineteenth district, comprising Miami, Champaign, Darke and Shelby counties, held its convention at Mechanicsburg. The president, Mrs. M. P. Robb, of Sidney, presided. Eleven unions were represented. The president's annual address was full of good thoughts. A most impressive consecration service was held, and with the devotional exercises, morning and afternoon, was very uplifting. Instructive papers were read, efficient superintendents were appointed for literature, Sabbath observance, evangelistic, franchise, prison and jail work, and a district bureau of exchange was created. Mrs. Hedges gave an interesting report of the National Convention held at Denver, to which she was delegate, and conducted a workers' round table. Upon the resignation of Mrs. Robb, Mrs. Mary B. Murray, of Mechanicsburg, was elected president. Dr. Anna H. Shaw gave the evening address, "Fate of Republics."

Miami county held the largest county convention it has ever held, at Piqua; Mrs. L. F. Hedges, president, in the chair. Six unions were represented. An interesting Bible reading was given by Rev. May Pemberton, of Ludlow Falls. Seven departments of work adopted by the county have active superintendents. The address of welcome was ably delivered by Mrs. Hannah Wertz, of Piqua, and was followed by a beautiful scene, the introduction of Miss Margaret, infant daughter of Mrs. Wertz, whom the convention pleasingly recognized as a new Y emblem of purity and innocence in recognition of which the president pinned upon her the white ribbon. The response was given by Mrs. Shuman, of Covington. An instructive parliamentary drill was given by Mrs. Stillwell, of Troy. The reports of superintendents and the question drawer added interest. The devotional exercises of the evening were led by Mrs. W. I. Fee, an imprisoned Cincinnati Crusader. The address of the evening was given by Dr. Anna H. Shaw.

Jefferson county union held its convention at Emerson, the session continuing through the afternoon and evening. Encouraging reports were given by the local presidents. Papers on helpful topics were read, recitations and a reading by a Steubenville Y, completed the program. Miss Hartford, of Steubenville, gave her observations regarding the influence of whisky upon the Choctaw Indians. The attendance was large, the house crowded at the evening meeting, and the interest continued to the close.

The Hamilton county union held its annual convention in the Pendleton M. E. Church, Mrs. M. M. Cottrell, president, presiding. There are nine W and three Y unions in the county, nine of which were represented by delegates at this convention. The treasurer reported $267.37 in the treasury. The superintendents presented their departments. Dr. Linkmyer, superintendent, spoke of the importance of a clear understanding of hygienic law, and made an appeal for financial help for the superintendents. Later she was called out again and spoke of the great need of dress reform. The president spoke feelingly of the death of Mrs. L. M. Packer, county superintendent of social purity. Mrs. Mercer, of Walnut Hills, read an able paper on equal suffrage, taking the ground that it is the corner-stone of all reforms. Mrs. Pendery, superintendent of fair work, reported success in every respect. Mrs. McDonald gave a cordial welcome. Dr. Amelia Prior read a paper on scientific temperance. Rev. Edw. McHugh made an encouraging speech.

The president's annual address was a very able and instructive one. Mrs. Lilian Cole Bethel, of Columbus, gave a half-hour's parliamentary drill. Miss Susie Rennick read a clear, pointed paper on scientific temperance instruction. Mrs. Shrader, state superintendent of legislative work, spoke ten minutes in behalf of the ballot for woman, showing its influence upon moral purity, and urged the need of women at the polls. The address of the evening was given by Mrs. Lilian Cole Bethel.

The ninth district held a profitable convention in Sardis, Monroe county, Miss Belle O. Browne, president, in the chair. Routine business was promptly dispatched. Literature and physical culture were well presented. A parliamentary drill was given, Miss Browne's annual address was very fine. After the addresses of welcome and response, reports from county unions were given and marked progress in the work. Superintendents' reports were encouraging. Mrs. Dora Webb, state superintendent, gave an address on purity; Mrs. P. A. West gave "A Word to Mothers." The report of the district, and excellent papers finished the program. The address of the evening was given by Mrs. Helen S. Burns, of Athens.

Licking county's annual meeting was held at Johnstown. The hall was tastefully decorated. A goodly number of delegates were present from the various unions of the county; Mrs. Eggleston, the president, presided. Mrs. H. E. Hammond, editor of the Ohio Messenger, was present and gave a most instructive Bible reading on "She hath done what she could," and also the address of the evening on "Christian Endeavor in Temperance Work," which was well received. Thirteen departments are carried on by the county organization. That of prison and jail work, Miss Grace Trowbridge, of Newark, superintendent, has been crowned with abundant success. Mrs. J. M. Graham read an admirable paper on Temple work; Mrs. A. S. Alsdorf on the World's Temperance Congress; Rev. Whetzel, of Utica, and Rev. Bates, of Johnstown, made brief but excellent addresses. The resolutions were strong, the report on finance presented several ways and means by which empty treasuries could be replenished, and the people educated at the same time. Two recitations were given. The Johnstown Y's furnished beautiful music.

Franklin county union held its convention at Reynoldsburg. The attendance was good and the meeting profitable. Mrs. Trego gave an excellent address in the evening, which delighted and instructed the people.

Huron county met in convention in the Universalist church of Norwalk. Chrysanthemums, vines, pictures and mottoes made the place beautiful. Mrs. James Buck led the devotional exercises. Mrs. N. S. Hershiser read an excellent paper which noted many pertinent facts in the temperance work. Mrs. L. C. Bethel was present and gave good service in parliamentary drills. Hon. Gideon T. Stewart was present all day. After the noontide prayer Revs. Gleason, of Wakeman, and Felt, of Norwalk, were introduced. A generous dinner was served in the church parlors. Miss Danforth tendered her resignation as county president and Mrs. Hershiser was elected. Dr. Sarah J. Bebout welcomed the convention, Miss Emma J. Carl responded. Mrs. J. T. Foote, of Cleveland, read a paper on "Alcoholism." Miss Lizzie C. Boehm, the National delegate from this district, gave a good report of that great Convention in Chicago. A memorial service for the late Mrs. Farr was held. The evening meetings were replete with good things.

Medina county union held its regular quarterly convention at Wadsworth, with an unusually interesting program. Mrs. J. T. Foote, of Cleveland, and Miss Florence Savage, of Akron, were present. York, one of the oldest local unions, was not represented. Lodi, Medina, Seville and Wadsworth gave reports of work done. In rural districts the difficulty of meeting regularly stands in the way of the work. Mrs. Shaw, of Summit county, was present and read an instructive paper on W. C. T. U. work. Miss Wilson presented good thoughts on various lines of practical reform. Mrs. Foote told many things that unions ought to know. Unions die for lack of knowledge. They must know the status of temperance reform, and in order to know must take and read temperance papers. Mrs. Beach read a paper on Sabbath observance. The delegates were united in determination to sustain the Temple to the best of their ability, and the county is well on the way of their second one hundred dollars for that purpose. The convention voted to assist in entertaining the National next year. Miss Savage gave the evening address, subject, "W. C. T. U. Evangelistic Work."

Cuyahoga county met in quarterly convention at the headquarters of the East End union, Cleveland, Nov. 9th, with good attendance. Devotional exercises were conducted by Mrs. Silver. The address of welcome was by Mrs. D. W. Gage, response by Mrs. S. McCroskey. Mrs. Perkins presented the following resolution: "Resolved, that we heartily endorse Mrs. Carse in her effort to pay the debt upon the Temple and pledge ourselves to do all that we can to assist in the noble work." Unanimously adopted. Mrs. Dr. Champlain gave a talk upon the social evil, which called out an animated discussion. Mrs. T. K. Doty gave an interesting account of the jail and prison work. Mrs. Perkins gave a pleasing account of the late National convention and announced that the invitation of Cleveland to the National to hold the next Convention in their city had been accepted. This was received with applause. Noontide prayer was offered by Mrs. J. M. Gilmore. At the afternoon meeting papers were read on "How to Revive a Dying Union," "Mothers' meetings," "What Unions ought to know," "Is the Child safe?" "Are the Y's doing all in their power to discourage the use of stimulants and narcotics," "What the Times demand of W. C. T. U. workers." Miss DeClaire gave a fine recitation. The question drawer was conducted by Mrs. D. W. Gage. At 4:30 the children of the East End L. T. L. gave their recitations, songs and apt answers to questions asked them by their leader. The evening meeting was held in Euclid Avenue Disciples church; Rev. J. Z. Tyler, pastor, led the devotional exercises. A beautiful piano solo was rendered by Miss Edith Shepherd. The address of the evening was given by Mrs. Dora Webb, state superintendent of social purity. It was full of earnest thought, presented in a quiet, forcible way that impressed all who heard her with the truth of her position.

ITEMS FROM LOCAL UNIONS.

Lowellville has been at work, though its membership is small. With thirteen members, they have sent to the state union $4 as a thankoffering, and $1.50 from their self-denial fund. They have also sent $2.50 to the coffee house at Youngstown, and are piecing a quilt for its benefit. They have organized a Y within the year, and have added seven new members to the W. They have placed the scientific temperance bulletins in their schools, and secured sixty-three signatures to the triple pledge and forwarded them to Miss Gordon.

St. Mary's union has circulated much literature. Their superintendent of evangelistic work is very active. Through her earnestness they have gospel, temperance, mothers' and parlor meetings. Their president is also earnest, prompt and anxious to do all the good she can. Of their twenty-three members, almost every one takes some temperance paper.

South Zanesville, though but two years old, has steadily increased in membership. Evangelistic work is their chief department. They are interested readers of THE UNION SIGNAL, keep three wall pockets supplied with literature and take The Young Crusader for their Sunday-schools. They have no saloons in their town.

Gallipolis union has held weekly prayer-meetings that have been very helpful, and their interest and numbers have increased. They have visited the hospital weekly, and have held meetings in the jail. During the past year they gave out 5,462 pages of literature. They have an L. T. L. of fifty members.

Treasurer's Corner.

[We wish every white-ribboner could sit down in the treasurer's office and read the letters that bring the dimes in response to our president's appeal. Occasionally a dollar bill would cheer your heart, but whether ten cents or a dollar, the words of love and sympathy for our leader and for the National W C. T. U. that accompanies the gifts are encouraging. Many good brothers are remembering us with gifts.]

Our hearts were all made to rejoice at the good news that a generous gift had been bequeathed to our National W. C. T. U. by our good friend and brother, Mr. Rogers, of Connecticut. I trust none of our other friends will withhold the mites they had felt they wanted to give, because of the announcement of this bequest. It takes time always to settle an estate, and it may be a year or even two, before this money will be available, and in the meantime debts must be paid and obligations and expenses met. So, my good sisters, send on the ten cents.

Our contributions up to date are largely from individuals, though a few unions have sent their mites. If some good sister would collect the dimes that I am sure are waiting to be sent, it would expedite the work.

Two hundred and fifty dollars have been received in these first two weeks. But we are sure the great host of white-ribboners that will be glad to help have not all responded. Let the good work go on till we are free from debt.

From Arkansas comes twenty cents and this tribute to the North: "If we poor Southern women just had the 'get up and get' that so many have up North, we could help more things along a little here." Yet this good woman's thankoffering came before some of our Northern sisters.

"Please find two dimes, one for myself and one for my mother, who has joined the white-ribbon host above," writes another.

"Ten cents does not grow on every bush near my home, but I want to do my share in bringing the National out of debt, so, 'Do it and be done with it.' One of my neighbors says, 'Send mine along with it,' so here goes twenty cents," writes a Connecticut sister.

New Castle, (Del.) Y's send $2 for twenty members. Welcome to our dear girls in all our work.

A bright girl from Catskill writes: "I send ten cents for my sister, and also add one for myself; though I am not exactly a member and have my own beloved hobby, for which I want at least a million times as many cents as I can get! Otherwise I would gladly increase this small contribution by way of tribute to Miss Willard, who is such a creditable exhibit for the United States to send abroad." May our young friend be prospered in her hobby, for I'm sure it is a noble one.

Houston, Texas, Greenville, Ohio, Mechanicsville, Vt., Holyoke, Mass., Holliston, Mass., Green Valley, Cal., Mansfield, O., Winchester, Va., Dover and Foxcroft, Me., Concord, N. H., Coats Grove, Mich., and many other unions have sent in their collected dimes, and if all unions would send in their thankoffering mites we would very soon be able to pay off our outstanding debts that weigh so heavily upon our hearts.

Official Communications.

LITERATURE DEPARTMENT.

The newly appointed superintendent of this important department desires to communicate with her co-laborers through the columns of THE UNION SIGNAL. She has several requests to make, and suggestions to offer.

She asks: 1. That each state superintendent will forward to her her name and address at the earliest possible moment.

2. That they will exercise patience if she does not evolve her "plan of work" as quickly as under ordinary circumstances she ought to do. Her appointment has been of very recent date; her acceptance still more recent; and the fact that she has to adjust herself to several other untried positions makes delay inevitable.

3. That each state superintendent help her by suggestion and by criticism; and that their work of pushing the department in their own states may not be allowed to intermit, because of this interreqnum of leadership at National Headquarters.

SUGGESTIONS.

Since "advance plans" are but just taking form, the "suggestions" shall be few and brief.

1. Never allow yourself to underestimate the importance of this department. It is, in a very broad sense, the foundation stone of all others. "As a man thinketh in his heart, so he is," may find its companion precept in, "As a man readeth, he is very apt to think."

2. This department should never be left without personal leadership. There should be always a firm hand at the helm, and a keen eye alert at the outlook. To this end the superintendent should study:

(1.) The special needs of her state at special crises. Do not scatter local option literature when a prohibitory amendment is pending, and vice versa. It is the word in season which tells.

(2.) The W. T. P. A. catalogue and the announcements of new leaflets in the Publisher's Notes of THE UNION SIGNAL. I have often wondered if each state superintendent read these. Order new leaflets as soon as issued.

(3.) The fittest time and place for distribution. Find where they are most quickly taken and seem best appreciated, then crowd as much work as possible into those special openings.

(4.) How most accurately to record results. The report of this department always falls infinitely below the work done. I shall try in my circular letter to suggest some simple system of keeping the record which each state, county and local superintendent may adopt. Meantime, urge upon your superintendents the importance of keeping accurate accounts of all moneys expended and literature sent out.

3. Try to have on hand, constantly, a supply of the "sinews of war." Without money what can we do?

"But we are poor," you say. Yes, unfortunately we are, and yet there is money enough somewhere in the world. If we set our brains to work we can surely get some of it. Use the "Literature Fund Card" inaugurated by your former superintendent, Mrs. Rastall. We have still a supply on hand. Put them into the hands of each member of your union who will take one and set them flying. Ask the rich men and women of your community for larger amounts than one dime. When they find its use they will give.

Have at least one public meeting a year with collections for this department.

Get up either of the entertainments soon to be ready, "A Model Union" and "An evening with the W. T. P. A.," charge a small admission fee, and "there's millions in it."

I hope to send a circular letter with advanced plans of work early in January.

Meantime, let us "sow beside all waters," remembering that "he who soweth bountifully shall reap also bountifully," and that our harvest is a future clean world.

Let me know if, in any way, I can help you; and will you help me by sympathy, suggestion and, above all, by prayer?

Your co-laborer,

KATHARINE LENTE STEVENSON,
Nat. Supt. of Literature,

NEW BOOKS.

"IN SORROW AND IN WANT," a Christmas Carol, by Frederic W. Farrar, D. D., F. R. S. This exquisite book contains the poem from which it takes its name, and illustrated by two reproductions, one from Roesler and one from Hohenhey.

Thomas Whittaker, 2 and 3 Bible House, New York City.

THOUGHTS FOR THE THOUGHTFUL, by Adelaide S. Seaverns, is one of the most perfectly arranged and edited books for daily readings that has been published. "The supreme value of the book," says the introduction by Charles Parkhurst, of Zion's Herald, "will be found in its modernness." It is entirely new, pulsating with latest thoughts on oldest truths. Its mission is to all—"high, low, rich and poor," sad and glad.

Published by Hunt & Eaton, New York, and Cranston & Curts, Cincinnati.

THE CHILD'S DAY BOOK is the only day book issued solely for the little child, with morning and evening prayers, grace before meals, a text of Scripture and a selection of prose or poetry for each day, with a supplementary journal for the use of the child. There are day and year-books for all other ages. It remained for Margaret Sidney, whose name and well-known insight into, and love for, the children, is a guarantee of its worth, to compile and arrange this to meet the need of the little ones. The book has five full-page colored inserts, and many other dainty illustrations. The covers and colored inserts are by the best artists, lithographed in eight and ten colors, and the binding is substantial and harmonious. Parents as well as the children will prize this day book among their choicest and most helpful possessions.

D. Lothrop Company, Boston.

TALKS BY QUEER FOLKS, by Mary E. Bamford, author of "My Land and Water Friends"; "Look-About Club," etc. This book of natural history will be hugged up in the arms of many a boy and girl who loves the speechless friends that people the nooks and corners of old earth and puzzle wise-heads by their queer ways. Large print and apt illustrations make reading attractive to all, and these talks coming, as it were, from the queer folks themselves will never be skipped as "dry" by the eager-eyed critics.

D. Lothrop Company, Boston.

It would take a pen as gifted in word-picturing as is the author's in pen and ink sketches to do justice to L. J. Bridgman's ODD BUSINESS, or HIGH ART IN FUN, FROLIC, AND FANCY WITH THE PENCIL AND QUILL. A book for children yet so full of the humorous side of "high art" as to be attractive for readers of all ages. The artist has given to children that most coveted of all pleasures for them—laughable situations which convey no hint of misfortune or discomfort to any of the parties concerned. Bright verses, inimitable take-off "ads," and the most charming of all fairy tales about "—the mischievous Puck Wudjies,

. . . . . .
They the fairies and the pigmies," all made humorous by the quaint and original pencil of the artist. Such a book proves the best kind of an antidote to crossed tempers, and must be a real sunshine-maker wherever it is opened.

The National Exposition Souvenir, WHAT AMERICA OWES TO WOMEN, edited by Lydia Hoyt Farmer; introduction by Julia Ward Howe. Published by Charles Wells Moulton, Chicago, Buffalo and New York.

This superb book contains over 500 pages with full index, is handsomely bound in white cloth with unique decorations in gold, and is illustrated with forty full-page portraits, including the pictures of most of the authors contributing articles to the book, together with the portraits of several of the most famous wives of the Presidents. Each portrait is placed in an attractive setting of artistic design, printed in delicate color. The binding, paper and typographical features of the Souvenir are in every respect of great merit and of the best quality. This work will be of enduring worth, and no efforts have been spared to make the volume rich and attractive, as is befitting the important place it holds in literature and history.

HUMANICS, COMMENTS, APHORISMS AND ESSAYS; Touches of Shadow and Light, to Bring out the Likeness of Man and Substance of Things. By John Staples White. Funk & Wagnalls Co., New York, London and Toronto.

This book is full of ideas, written in plain language, "to bring out the likeness of man and the substance of things." In some of his remarks the author will undoubtedly be found open to unfavorable criticism, while many of his contributions to moral and social ethics will be found calculated to convince as well as to instruct, are of high merit, and provide hundreds of apt quotations. These contributions will be found of especial use as an incentive to thought, and inspiring for those whose profession calls for constant exercise or study in sociology, moral philosophy, etc. The following partial list will serve to indicate the range of subjects treated: Animal, Civilization, Consciousness, Death, Evolution, Faith, Genius, God, Heaven, Happiness, Human Nature, Humanity, Humbug, Immorality, Knowledge, Language, Law, Love, Man, Mind, Money, Nature, People, Politics, Reputation, Sensation, Sentiment, Self-conceit, Sin, Skepticism, Slander, Society, Soul, Speculation, Spirit, Style, Trade, Whisky, Will, Woman, Work, etc., etc.

INDEPENDENCE, a story of the American Revolution. By John R. Musick. Published by Messrs. Funk & Wagnalls, 18 and 20 Astor Place, New York City.

This story covers a period of forty years from the real inception of the struggle for independence to its triumph. Pen pictures of the great struggles of our forefathers are given with painstaking fidelity to truth. During these struggles the great majority of the common people in England were undoubtedly in sympathy with the Americans, and the author has done well in this lively narrative to give prominence to the parts taken in behalf of American Independence by many noble foreigners, among whom were Lafayette, Pulaski, De Kalb, De Barre, Duplesses, De Fleury, and other Frenchmen; and Pitt, Fox, Burke, Barre, and other Englishmen.

As in the preceding volumes, this book contains a romance interwoven with the history, which, while not objectionable to the student, will charm its readers, young or old.

ELI BROWN.

FREE.

The following remarkable statement, to which we direct special attention, is from a Tennessee farmer.

My age is 63. I suffered intensely from catarrh 10 years; dry scabs formed in nostrils, one or both sides stopped up continually, dryness and soreness of throat, hoarseness, intense headache, took cold easily, and had continual roaring, cracking, buzzing and singing in my ears. My hearing began to fail, and for three years I was almost entirely deaf, and continually grew worse. Everything I had tried, failed. In despair I commenced to use the Aerial Medication in 1888, and the effect of the first application was simply wonderful. In less than five minutes my hearing was fully restored, and has been perfect ever since, and in a few months was entirely cured of catarrh.

BOOKS.

Some Passages in the Practice of Dr. Martha Scarborough.

By HELEN CAMPBELL. Price $1.

In the guise of fiction, Mrs. Campbell here presents some common-sense opinions as to the care of "the human form divine." Dr. Martha is daughter of another physician, a practitioner in good standing, who nevertheless loses his own children, one after another, until only one remains and she a delicate little girl; so he stops dosing her, takes her with him in his buggy as he makes his round of calls, and cures and saves her with fresh air. But this is not all; the treatment quickens her wits; she becomes a keen questioner, learns all her father can tell her, and afterward puts her knowledge to practical use. Could this book be put into the hands of all women, and could all women be made sensible, there would soon be a remarkable decline in the number of infants' funerals, invalid wives, and "nervous prostration" cases among young women (Roberts Brothers, Boston.)

Brilliants from Phillips Brooks is the title of a dainty volume in which are compiled the choicest thoughts of that gifted man. The book contains twenty engravings, which make it attractive as well as helpful. Board covers in white and gold, 50 cents; white vellum, 25 cents.

Touching Incidents and Remarkable Answers to Prayer.

By REV. S. B. SHAW. Cloth, $1.

This book is neither doctrinal nor denominational, yet distinctly Christian. Its high religious tone, its fascinating spirit and the high rank of its contributors, make it a strong faith tonic and an inspiration to prevailing prayer.

The Well-Dressed Woman.

By HELEN GILBERT ECOB. Illustrated. Cloth, $1.

This is a work which appeals to every intelligent mother. It is valuable in its exposition, both in text and illustrations, of the artistic ideal and rules of dress, and is full of the best of advice for school-girls, young women at college and young mothers. Miss Willard and the whole corps of earnest workers in the W. C. T. U. are very hearty in their indorsement of this book, and it should be in the hands of every sensible woman.

Bright-Eyes

Or, Pleasure and Profit for Sunday Afternoon. Arranged by ALICE M. GUERNSEY. Price, 50 cents.

This pretty little quarto is ingeniously devised, so as to suggest to children, by means of outline pictures, the work of searching the Scriptures in order to find the passages which the vignettes chime in with. It will be of service to many a mother, or older sister, or brother, on a Sunday afternoon, in the endeavor to teach or interest the little ones.—Central Christian Advocate.

A book designed by the author to stimulate other young women to "be something," to make the most of their opportunities.

A Woman's Evangel.

By EVA KINNEY GRIFFITH. Price cloth, $1.25

"This book will interest and benefit many readers. It has some literary merit, but its special feature is the fact that it is written to explain and advocate the various kinds of effort in behalf of total abstinence which the Woman's Christian Temperance Union is making. The many members of, or sympathizers with, that influential organization will read it with approval, and so will others."—The Congregationalist.

Columbus, and What He Found.

By MRS. MARY H. HULL. Price $1.

This is a wonder-tale filled with all the romance and truth of the great event of America's discovery, and told for young readers in a pure yet thrilling manner. There is already a large demand for this unique child's history among parents and teachers who desire to answer authentically all questions and controversies which come to the ears of children. Columbus will be always with us as much a feature in the future as Washington, being the step beyond Washington and the home-nation into the great mother, Europe, and the beginnings of the child Columbia. This book is filled with patriotic enthusiasm.

ALL CREEDS AND SECTS.

Unique Volume Containing the History of the World's Parliament of Religions.

The greatest living leaders in the schools of religious thought contributed to the proceedings of the World's Parliament of Religions, lately held in Chicago. Representatives were present from every considerable denomination, sect and creed, including the Roman Catholic, Protestant Episcopal (both English and American churches), Baptist, Presbyterian, Jewish, Lutheran, Greek, Bulgarian, Nestarian, Armenian, Buddhist, Shinto, Confucian, Parsees, Hindu, Brahmin, Mohammedan, Methodist, Friends, Universalist, Unitarian, Congregational, Swedenborgian, and many others. Each was represented at the parliament by one or more of its leaders, and these men delivered short, but carefully prepared sketches of their respective faiths, what they are and what they have done for the world.

The same privilege was accorded to eminent exponents of the Christian faith, in all its manifold denominations, to Mohammedans, Parsees, Shintoists, Hindus, Brahmins, and indeed, to the representatives of every considerable religion on earth. The result was a grand parliament of which Sir Edwin Arnold, Max Müller, Rev. Josiah Strong, Hon. John Wanamaker and many other, lay and clerical, have spoken in the highest terms. The gifted John Ireland, Archbishop of St. Paul, said: "The conception of such a religious assembly seems almost like an inspiration."

Although the Parliament of Religions has adjourned and passed into history, a complete and authentic record of all the proceedings has been kept and collected into a neat and handsome form which ought to be in the library of every thinking person. We call the attention of our readers to the fact that we supply the entire proceedings for $1 delivered.

"Outgeneraled," is a delightful temperance program or colloquy for L. T. L's, by Mrs. G. M. Alden (Pansy). Just the thing to use at the close of a meeting where refreshments are to be served.

The supplement to this number contains Miss Alice M. Guernsey's sparkling account of the great convention in October—"Mother National and the Children"; a letter from Miss Willard's cat, Toots Willard, accompanied by his beautiful picture; bright responses to roll-call, and acknowledgment of contributions to the Willard Fountain Fund.

Has your subscription expired? Are all your cousins and nephews and nieces supplied with this temperance paper for children? We are making special terms to agents. Now is the time to help the L. T. L. children by pushing their own paper.

THE GREAT THROUGH CAR LINE.

It is a well established fact that the North-Western Line (Chicago & North-Western R'y) in its equipment and train service, its general facilities for the accommodation of all classes of travel, and its methods of looking after the comfort and welfare of its patrons, takes rank with the leading railways of the world.

Its through car lines extend from Chicago to St. Paul and Minneapolis, the "Twin Cities of the Northwest;" to Duluth, the Superiors, Ashland, Marquette, and the wonderful iron and copper regions of northern Wisconsin and Michigan; to Winona, Pierre, and the rich agricultural sections of Minnesota and the Dakotas; to Des Moines, Sioux City, Council Bluffs, Omaha, Lincoln, the prosperous and growing cities of Iowa and Nebraska; to Deadwood, the Dakota Hot Springs, and the famous mining districts of the Black Hills; to Denver, Salt Lake, and the health resorts of Colorado and Utah; to San Francisco, Cal.; Portland, Oregon, and Pacific Coast and Puget Sound points.

The perfectly equipped vestibuled trains of the North-Western Line convey the traveler comfortably, safely and quickly to nearly every part of the West and Northwest, and while one may travel surrounded by all of the luxuries afforded by an equipment of magnificent sleeping cars, buffet and library cars, compartment sleeping cars and superb dining cars, the comfort and convenience of passengers desiring to travel at small expense is promoted by the provision of accommodations for their use in Tourist Sleeping Cars, Free Reclining Chair Cars and commodious day coaches.

In a word, if you contemplate a trip to almost any portion of the West and Northwest your ticket should read via the North-Western Line. Maps, time tables and general information can be obtained of ticket agents in the United States and Canada, or by addressing W. A. Thrall, General Passenger and Ticket Agent, Chicago & North-Western R'y, Chicago, Ill.

THE CROSS AND GRAIL. By Lucy Larcom.

The tradition of the removal into Britain by Joseph of Arimathea, of the cup from which our Lord drank at the Last Supper, and the search for it by the Knights of the Round Table is the familiar story out of which the poem grew.

The frontispiece represents the knight of old on his quest. The delicate colors seem to harmonize with the words:

"Sometimes, tinged with radiance strange,
Would the beaker seem to change
To the outline of a cross—
Emblem of life's gain in loss:
Glimpsing, fading like a cloud,
As he stood with forehead bowed."

Signal Notes.

THE Catholic Woman's Temperance Union was organized last June and has 450 members.

Two hundred and twenty-five thousand persons have been driven from their homes and land in Russia in one year.

DURING the discussion of the Parish council bill in the House of Commons, November 22, a new clause was introduced permitting all women who pay taxes to vote at all local elections.

A SINGLE brewery in the northwest provinces of India, where so many millions suffer from hunger, daily uses an amount of grain to form malt for beer that would feed twenty thousand each day.

BY the new school attendance act which will come into operation the first of the year, at least half a million of children in Wales and England will be kept in school a full year longer than now.

THE permanent committee on temperance appointed by the Minnesota conference of the M. E. church at its last session has organized by the election of Rev. Geo. F. Wells as chairman and Rev. F. B. Cowgill as secretary.

THE Jews constitute but 395 per cent of the population in Russia, yet the army conscriptions show the average proportion of Jewish soldiers to be 5.97 per cent, proving they are called on at the annual recruiting far more than the Russians.

THE attorney-general of England gives it as his opinion that clubs are the institutions of the age, some of the Westminster streets being a succession of them, not a few being especially intended for women, and a still larger number appealing for support to the working man. Their deterioration into mere drinking shops in many instances is a grave mistake.

THE Bay View Reading Circle is a new movement for systematic reading in history, literature and science, superintended by Mr. J. M. Hall, of Flint, Mich. Such names as Dr. P. S. Henson, Bishop W. X. Ninde, Mrs. Alice Freeman Palmer and President Bashford, as among its promoters, give it high endorsement. The expense per year is very slight, the sole aim of the society being to cultivate habits of regular home study.

DURING the late campaign for equal suffrage in Colorado, the Woman's Educational Society of Colorado College held a public meeting, which afforded to a large audience the opportunity to hear the subject discussed by Mrs. S. S. Fessenden, president of the Massachusetts W. C. T. U. and other able speakers. The society has since arranged for a course of lectures on American archæology, given at the college by Mrs. Gilbert McClurg, a pioneer in cliff-dwelling exploration, and these have been well attended by both students and the public.

A PLACARD placed by the order of the government in the Belgian schools, states that of 125,000 deaths, one fifth of the number, or 25,000, are attributed to alcohol. In one period, during which the population increased fourteen per cent, the use of alcohol grew thirty-seven per cent. The cases of insanity increased forty-five per cent, the criminals forty-seven, and suicides eighty per cent. Finally, might be mentioned that in the same period, the number of beggars and roving, unoccupied persons increased one hundred and fifty-six per cent.

THE American Institute of Christian Sociology have issued "Leaflet Number Two." This compact little publication concerns the organization of local institutes. An introduction by Prof. Geo. H. Herron, D.D., the principal of instruction and organization, contains recommendations of books to be read and discussed by local institutes. The body of the leaflet is occupied by "A History of the First Institute of Christian Sociology," by Edward M. Nealley, Burlington, Ia. From this history, brief though it is, many suggestions can be gathered for the organization of societies.

TO SECURE PEACE use SAPOLIO. It is a solid cake of scouring soap. Try it. SAPOLIO reduces labor but conquers dirt and makes home bright and happy.

A complete wreck of domestic happiness has often resulted from badly washed dishes, from an unclean kitchen, or from trifles which seemed light as air. But by these things a man often judges of his wife's devotion to her family, and charges her with general neglect when he finds her careless in these particulars. Many a home owes a large part of its thrifty neatness and its consequent happiness to SAPOLIO.

NOTICE TO INVENTORS.

There was never a time in the history of our country when the demand for inventions and improvements in the arts and sciences generally was so great as now. The conveniences of mankind in the factory and workshop, the household, on the farm, and in official life, require continual accessions to the appurtenances and implements of each in order to save labor, time and expense. The political change in the administration of government does not affect the progress of the American inventor, who, being on the alert and ready to perceive the existing deficiencies, does not permit the affairs of government to deter him from quickly conceiving the remedy to overcome existing discrepancies. Too great care cannot be exercised in choosing a competent and skillful attorney to prepare and prosecute an application for patent. Valuable interests have been lost and destroyed in innumerable instances by the employment of incompetent counsel, and especially is this advice applicable to those who adopt the "No patent, no pay" system. Inventors who entrust their business of this class of attorneys do so at imminent risk, as the breadth and strength of the patent is never considered in view of a quick endeavor to get an allowance and obtain the fee then due. THE PRESS CLAIMS COMPANY, John Wedderburn, General Manager, 618 F street, N. W., Washington, D. C., representing a large number of important daily and weekly papers, as well as general periodicals of the country, was instituted to protect its patrons from the unsafe methods heretofore employed in this line of business. The said Company is prepared to take charge of all patent business entrusted to it for reasonable fees, and prepares and prosecutes applications generally, including mechanical inventions, design patents, trade-marks, labels, copyrights, interferences, infringements, validity reports, and gives especial attention to rejected cases. It is also prepared to enter into competition with any firm in securing foreign patents.

Write for instructions and advice.

An invaluable gift of medical works, some of them beyond price, has been made to the Newberry library by Dr. Nicholas Senn, of Chicago.

The great Yerkes observatory of the Chicago University will be located at Lake Geneva, Wis., so as to be out of the fog and smoke of the city.

The Chicago West Side W. C. T. U. formed a committee, December 21, to give immediate aid to Chicago's unemployed and destitute women and girls.

The Christmas dinner of the Waifs' Mission took place at Battery D, Chicago, last Sunday, and thousands of poor little ones were provided with food and clothing.

Chairman Wilson for the majority of the Ways and Means Committee has formally presented the long expected tariff bill to the United States Congress for its consideration.

President Cleveland's message on his conduct of Hawaiian matters has been followed by a sharp arraignment of his policy by Republican leaders in the United States Senate and House.

A saloon-keeper was fined five hundred dollars at Cascade, Iowa, December 21, for assaulting and drawing a revolver on a constable who attempted to arrest him for selling liquor contrary to the prohibitory law.

A close watch upon all public buildings is being kept by the Paris police, through fear of anarchists, and active measures are being taken by the French Chamber of Deputies to treat anarchism as a national evil.

At the special election for mayor of Chicago, John P. Hopkins, Democrat, was declared elected by a majority of one thousand two hundred over the Republican candidate, George B. Swift. The election may be contested, as gross frauds are charged.

The week's reports contain a stimulating item to the effect that the Distilling and Cattle Feeding Company (the "whisky trust") last year sold forty-eight million gallons of whisky and have now about six million gallons on hand.

WE have often heard allusions to agonizing deathbed scenes, but never read of one more awful than that of a Baltimore miser who died last Wednesday clutching his bank book in his stiffening fingers and shrieking and cursing because he could not take it with him. He died of starvation, though his bank account was nearly five thousand dollars.

A NOTABLE convention will be held in Washington, D. C., February 15–20, 1894, namely, that of the National Woman Suffrage Association. The annual meetings of this association are always portentous, but the three signal victories of the past year—woman suffrage in Colorado, the magnificent Woman's Congress last May and the recognition on the part of the government, of women on the World's Fair Board of Managers render this twenty-sixth meeting of the suffrage association one to be eagerly anticipated and largely attended.

A NEW Methodist church, recently dedicated in Sullivan, Ill., has a large stained glass window bearing the letters "W. C. T. U.—For God and Home and Every Land." This may not be the first church window thus appropriated, but it is the first time such appreciated recognition has ever reached us and we would be glad to learn if others exist. The money for this window was raised by the faithful pastor, Rev. M. P. Wilkin, who writes: "May this army of noble women be honored as we honor our great Union Army." All honor to this noble preacher of the gospel.

MRS. ELIZABETH WHEELER ANDREW and Dr. Kate Bushnell sailed for India, Burma, China and Japan the last week in November, after recruiting a few days from their difficult voyage across the Atlantic. They were the guests of Mr. and Mrs. Pearsall Smith, in London, and of Lady Henry at Reigate, twenty miles from the city. They were in excellent health and spirits, and best of all the power of the Spirit was upon them. They go out under commission from the W. W. C. T. U. to form local unions, to strengthen and develop those already existing, to set forth the plans and purposes of our work by schools of methods wherever opportunity offers and to preach the unsearchable riches of Christ to the untaught and the unsaved. There is nothing in all the broad platform of the white ribbon movement that is alien for one moment to their loyal and loving interest. We have sent out no women whose work wears better.

OF course every union will wish to report its observance of Crusade Day and will report promptly. In doing so will each one remember that there are nearly ten thousand local unions, and that if even one-tenth of them report, our space will be heavily taxed. So we have decided to ask for a very brief account of one hundred words only from each union. Do not attempt to give the full program and the names of the performers, but tell, for instance, the very best number on the program, the remarks of the ministers or some prominent citizen, and above all the number of members secured and the number of subscribers to THE UNION SIGNAL. These brief reports may be sent either to the state reporter or THE UNION SIGNAL directly. Usually we prefer all local news to come through the state reporters, but on this twentieth anniversary, we make an exception to our rule, where it seems more desirable. Send the one hundred words at once.

A SMALL pamphlet has fallen into our hands, describing a certain "home for the aged and infirm" in New York City. As we turned the pages nothing of special interest attracted our attention until we came to a list entitled, "Kind attentions to inmates during the year." This contained a list of twenty-four donations, exactly twelve of which were kegs of beer and cases of wine!

THE regular study of the Sunday-school lesson, led by the various clergymen of the city, has been inaugurated at the Saturday noon meetings in Willard Hall and will doubtless prove to be a very helpful and popular feature of the work. The three lessons thus far have been conducted by Dr. Gilbert H. Frederick, Rev. O. P. Gifford and Rev. Fred Campbell and next week, Dr. Carlos Martyn will lead. Mother Wallace spoke at the noon meeting on Thursday and again at the Crusade meeting Sunday afternoon. We go to press too early this week to give any particulars of that meeting.

IT IS pleasant to note that the Minneapolis crusaders are still prosecuting their warfare against the Sunday saloons. Last Thursday twenty-six saloon keepers were cited to appear in the municipal court and fined twenty-five dollars each for violating the Sunday closing ordinance. Many of the crusaders who, we are informed by a reliable Minneapolis correspondent, are laymen rather than ministers, were present and received outspoken threats of revenge from the liquor men, but nothing daunted they are keeping on their courageous course, and the campaign is becoming more aggressive each day.

IT will be seen from reading the Treasurer's Corner that the thankofferings are coming in rapidly, considering the short time that has elapsed since the appeal was made. It is confidently expected that the Crusade celebration will result in so many dimes for the National treasury that it will take a half dozen women to count them, for as accurate bookkeeping is observed for these dimes as though they were dollars. If at all convenient, however, please collect the dimes and exchange them for a money-order or a check, as it will not only save the valuable time of the treasurer and her assistants, but insure greater safety of transit. And now the best news of all comes just as we go to press, and that is a gift of one hundred dollars, in response to Miss Willard's appeal, from a devoted white-ribboner who does not wish her name given, and modestly says it is her "ten cent thankoffering." That good woman must have many things to be thankful for.

WE expressed our regret last week that the great American Federation of Labor, in session in Chicago for the past eight days, had totally ignored the deadly liquor traffic in its resolutions. It seems now that we were premature in our statement, or possibly our expressions of regret led that august body to reconsider its resolutions, for after our paper had gone to press, we notice an increased interest on this subject, upon which a pronounced expression was finally passed. Our high license readers need not hold their breath for fear, nor our prohibition friends for joy, for the resolution in question concerns the makers of hoops and staves alone, and they are certainly to be congratulated. This is the momentous motion: To petition Congress against the use of whisky barrels by distilleries the second time! Surely "the trade" has a friend in court so long as this Federation will confine its attention to the barrels instead of their contents. It will be a very simple method to add twenty-three cents, the cost of a barrel, to the wholesale price, and charge the consumer accordingly. But perhaps this is the "regulation" we have so long waited for. If so, we welcome it.

"MY TIMES ARE IN THY HAND."

BY KATHARINE LENTE STEVENSON.

One radiant thought comes to my heart to-day,
As sad I sit beside the dying year;
One thought that, 'cross the gloom, bids sunbeams play,
And turns to rainbow's glowing light each tear;
One thought that lifts me out of all earth's night
Into the warmth of God's eternal day,
And thrills me with an infinite delight,
As, o'er and o'er, with trembling lips, I say:
"My times are in Thy hand."

My times! what are they? Yesterdays long past,
To-morrows yet to dawn, and this to-day;
The near and far, the first gleam and the last
Blended together in such wondrous way.
All that I've hoped, or sought, or gained, or lost,
All that I might have been, and still may be,
All that life holds for me, and all the cost,
These, Thou art keeping evermore for me.
"My times are in Thy hand."

That some deep joy Thou'rt hiding from me now
I cannot doubt; I dare not, if I could;
Perchance 'twill come sad-eyed, with weary brow,
But from Thy hand there can come only good.
The gladdest messengers of all the past
Have worn disguise of sorrow or of pain;
And can I doubt Thy love to me doth last,
Or fear to trust Thy wisdom once again?
"My times are in Thy hand."

"Thy hand!" Oh, safe, sure shelter, place of rest,
Defense and shield, strong tower, eternal home!
How safe am I! how infinitely blest!
What that could harm from Thy dear hand can come?
Then gladdest welcome to this strange New Year,
Which stands, reluctant, on the threshold still.
Its days can bring me nothing that I fear,
Since well I know those days fulfill Thy will.
"My times are in Thy hand."

A MODERN SAMARITAN.

BY LYDIA HOYT FARMER.

[Author of "A Story Book of Science," "A Knight of Faith," "The Life of La Fayette," "A Moral Inheritance," etc.]

It was New Year's eve. The night was cold. The wind was whirling the falling flakes of snow through the air in fantastic circles, suggesting some wild witch's dance among the frost fairies and the storm sprites, who were, perchance, holding high revel midst the blinking star gleams not wholly obscured by the scurrying snow clouds.

The city streets were gay with sleighing parties. Mr. and Mrs. Asa Allan were returning from an entertainment, and had just reached a crossing, when their carriage was blocked for a moment by a crowd collected around some object of interest in the center of the street.

"What is it?" asked Mildred Allan of her husband; and Asa stepped from the carriage to see, and returned soon, saying:

"It is a poor fellow insensible from drink or cold; he is young, and seems from his appearance to have seen better days."

"Can we not save him?" said Mildred, in sympathetic tones. "Perhaps he has a poor mother watching for him."

"We can try," replied Asa, who was as active in good deeds as his wife. "Shall we take him home, or provide a place for him somewhere else?"

"Let us try what our own bright home can do," said Mildred, earnestly; "tenderness sometimes reclaims when all else is vain."

Asa Allan returned to the crowd. "Lift the poor fellow to my carriage," he said; and the crowd moved back in wondering silence at such an unheard-of thing as a gentleman picking up a poor drunken man. One of the bystanders said harshly:

"Sure the station-house is good enough for such as he; you may get a villain into your house, sir; there's not much trusting such, though he does look as though he might have been a gentleman once. Good luck to you though, for your kind deed; may you not repent it!"

"I don't think I shall," replied Asa; and the poor, unconscious fellow was lifted and laid upon the cushions opposite to where Mildred sat, clothed in her costly furs and glowing velvets.

Only once did the poor boy utter a low groan. "I don't think he is so much under the influence of liquor as he is worn out with want," said Asa. "He has a fine face as I catch sight of it in the passing gaslight."

"Poor fellow!" murmured Mildred, lifting the rich carriage robe in her daintily gloved fingers and covering the thinly clad youth, whose pallid face looked ghastly in the dim light of the carriage lamps.

They arrived at their own door, and the sick stranger was carried into a pleasant room and laid upon a clean, white bed—a luxury he had not known for many a night. Only once did he open his eyes, and then, after a bewildered glance, he closed them in unconsciousness.

A doctor being summoned, he said that he thought the boy was insensible more from actual starvation than from liquor, and he ordered strengthening drinks and food to be given in small quantities at short intervals. An attendant was placed by the poor fellow's bedside to give him the necessary nourishment. Mr. and Mrs. Allan awaited the morning ere they could know anything more concerning their strange guest; of one thing they were persuaded, that he was suffering from want.

Consciousness slowly returned to the stranger; as the hours went by and he was strengthened by the nourishing food he asked faintly where he was. The attendant informed him how he had been picked up by the kind-hearted man under whose roof he then lay. Tears of gratitude filled the eyes of the sufferer as he said: "I did not think any one would be so kind to a stranger."

In the morning, with many thanks for their great kindness, the poor boy related to Mr. and Mrs. Allan his history. His home was in a quiet New England village, where he had father, mother and sister. He had been wild, he said, and fond of roving, and he had become tired of the restraints of home and determined to run away and come to the great city, where he could do as he pleased and make his own fortune. He had quite a sum of money when he first came, but it was soon spent with wild companions, who, when he had lost his money, left him to his fate. He had tried to get some kind of employment, but the places were all full, and as he had never been brought up to hard labor, there was not much that he knew how to do. He could write a fair hand, and he had tried to get a bookkeeper's place, but he found so many others seeking the same that he had been unsuccessful, and at last actual starvation stared him in the face. He had begged lodging at the station-house for a night or two, and had spent the days in searching for work. He was on his way back to the station-house to ask once more for shelter, when he sank down utterly exhausted from weariness and want of food in his toilsome search.

"Does your mother know where you are?" asked Mildred.

"No," answered the boy; "I have not written to her since I left home. She would be broken-hearted did she know how low I have fallen. I had every comfort at home, and my mother little imagines that her son has almost died of actual starvation. I was a foolish fellow to leave my home; my roving has brought me only bitterness."

"Will you not go home?" asked Asa.

"No, sir, not if I can obtain employment here. I ran away to make my fortune, and I will not go back a beggar. 'Twas very wrong to leave, but now I will show myself a man and strive to atone for the past. Can you direct me, sir, to any place where they would be likely to take a boy like me? As soon as I have obtained employment I will write to my parents, asking forgiveness for the past."

"Perhaps I can get work for you in the printing room of our paper," replied Asa, "but it will be close work and small pay."

"I do not care for that," said the boy; "if I can only get a start I think I can learn; will you try me? I will come with you now," he continued, trying to raise himself from the pillow, but falling back in weakness.

"No, my poor fellow, not to-day," said Asa kindly; "this is the holiday time, you remember, and you must rest and take good cheer; if you were able we would bid you to our New Year feast, but tonics and broths are better for you just now; but you shall still be treated to a royal dinner even though it may have to come a few days later, on account of your weak state."

"But I cannot impose longer upon your kindness, sir," said the boy, grateful tears filling his eyes. "I am a perfect stranger to you and have no claim upon your bounty."

"Yes, the claim of being our neighbor," replied Asa.

"I used to read the Bible daily with my mother, sir, but in my wild rovings I have given it up, and should scarcely dare to pray."

"You remember the Prodigal Son, do you not? We would none of us dare to pray did we think only of our wanderings," rejoined Asa.

When Asa and Mildred visited the sick boy a few hours later, they found him able to sit up.

"I did not learn your name this morning," said Asa, tenderly placing his hand upon the boy's shoulder with reassuring touch.

"My name is Edgar Thornton, sir; my father is a shipping merchant in S——."

"Oh, I used to know your father," replied Asa. "I am much indebted to him; when I was young and struggling without friends or means, he used his influence to secure me a position, which was my starting point, and I am, indeed, glad to have the opportunity to return the kindness to his son."

So Edgar not only found employment, but warm, true friends who received him into their home as one of their own number. He wrote to his parents a penitent letter, asking forgiveness for his waywardness, and telling them of his prospects in the future. Asa Allan also wrote a note to the boy's father, expressing his pleasure in being able to repay, in some measure, the kindness which he had received from him in the past, and promising an elder brother's care of Edgar.

Realizing his own wonderful deliverance from an evil course, Edgar felt that his mission was to aid others who were walking in the same downward paths, and many were the young men he was the means of saving from lives of folly and drunkenness; knowing from his own experience how best to reach their hearts and induce them to turn from evil.

Truly the ways of Providence are far-reaching and most marvelous. How may one good deed go on broadening in its influence, until none but God can estimate the results. This young man, rescued through the Christian love of Asa and Mildred Allan, became a light unto many others wandering in darkness, and the good which he was blessed of God to accomplish would have been lost, had those Christian hearts neglected the passing opportunity for tender charity on that New Year's eve, stilling the promptings of compassion with the cold reasonings of worldly policy.

Henceforth, with every passing year, after the Christmas chimes have rung out upon the air their joyful carol in commemoration of the angel's glad tidings, "Peace on earth, good-will toward men," Asa, Mildred and Edgar made it their special mission to seek and rescue some despairing ones, and in Christ's name minister to their needs and bless them with a new hope for the New Year.

LA MARECHALE.

BY FRANCES E. WILLARD.

(Concluded.)

The scene changes, and this time we find La Maréchale in the south of France. It is no exaggeration to say that the whole city is moved. The Casino Hall is crowded in the evening, and—sight so new—four to five hundred people hurried to the seven o'clock morning prayer-meeting. But a circle of what are called "orthodox Christians" became very indignant. Miss Booth was urged to meet them. But little did she dream what a storm was awaiting her. The unlawfulness of women's ministry and impossibility of true holiness were urged with a hot and irritated spirit which appalled her and Major Bisson, her helper. As each cutting thing was said, ladies, with faces red with excitement, clapped their hands. "Go home to your mother," cried one lady. "It is indecent for women to preach before men," said the principal lady opponent, forgetting she was speaking before men herself, many pastors being present. "But," answered Miss Booth, "there is no sex in soul. The true girl prophetess when preaching forgets the shell, the envelope, the body; however low the poor creature may have fallen, she sees but the immortal soul, which needs, as did her own soul, pardon and purity."

Then the blast of the onslaught turned upon holiness. "Let he or she who is without sin stand up and say so," said one. Miss Booth replied calmly: "You seek the young child but to kill it; nevertheless I will ask my comrade here to give his testimony." Major Bisson (now in heaven) then rose, and with childlike simplicity testified to heart purity. Miss Booth followed. The storm only grew worse, and having in vain tried to speak, she commenced to pray. The Spirit of the Lord worked mightily; many were in tears at the close. One lady went home and gave her heart to God that night. The next morning a deputation waited on Miss Booth to apologize, saying they were horrified at the spirit manifested, and next morning among those sobbing at the "penitent form" (or anxious seat, as we say in America), was one of the pastor's wives who had attacked her the most hotly. This lady went home and asked pardon of the two Salvationist servants whom she had treated with anything but charity, and confessed to them her wrong. One of them became in her turn a "prophetess," and won many souls to God. When she and her associates arrived in that town they had four pence, which they had gained by selling her mother's leaflets. They lived chiefly on potatoes, but after her visit the tide changed. The Salvationists have now three halls in that city, and three at Lyons.

At another place a Russian princess was converted, and when in Switzerland we learned that this lady, while standing at the door at a meeting in Vevey selling Salvation literature, had her bonnet torn from her head and was roughly kissed by a Swiss peasant, to which indignity she paid no attention whatever, but put on her bonnet and pursued her avocation. The lower class of Swiss people seem to be remarkably rude, crude, and almost cruel. In the orchard meeting to which I have referred, held by Commissioner Booth-Clibborn, (the husband of La Maréchale,) and attended by Lady Henry Somerset and me, the conduct of the boorish young men present exceeded anything that we had ever witnessed. They took the sheet containing the hymns, rolled it up, lighted it and smoked in the face of the preacher. They talked out loud to him and to each other, and during his most tender appeals turned their backs squarely upon him with jeers and laughter. When the Salvation Army women came to take the collection they dropped in greasy cards or stub ends of cigars. It did my heart good to learn that the editor of the leading paper in that locality was present, and that he gave the names of every one of those young ruffians and published them with a sound linguistic drubbing in the next issue of the paper.

It is thrilling to hear the account of the experiences of La Maréchale when she first came to Switzerland some ten years ago. So great a sensation was created in Geneva that when her meetings opened in Reformation Hall, where three thousand people could be accommodated, the cream of the city gathered long before the hour in order to secure places, and as much as twenty francs was offered to the door-keeper for a seat. The six o'clock morning meeting was packed. But she and her husband were expelled not only from this but two other cantons on the most trivial and iniquitous pretexts. It was largely a Protestant persecution. Catholics gave themselves no trouble, but probably rejoiced in what their rivals regarded as a calamity. Unable to account for the work of the Spirit, it was said that the good looks of the Maréchale and her husband and their attractive manner had hypnotized the people!

Within eight weeks twelve brochures were issued for and against their meetings, for wherever they were assailed some adequate defender was at once raised up. But a more blunderingly honest confession of the real cause of their expulsion—their Christlike mission and success—could scarcely have been made than the one contained in the theatrical paper of Geneva. Complimenting the lady whose furious pamphlet had helped to stir up the populace against them, this paper wrote: "Honor to Madame de G., and thanks, for her noble book has ridden us of the Salvationists; since their expulsion the theater has lost a formidable rival, and its seats are beginning to be occupied." This is textual.

The indignities and brutality endured by the officers of the army in Switzerland are beyond description. Every kind of instrument has been violently used against them, sticks and stones, knives, whips, flails, pitchforks, guns, revolvers and what not. In one year no less than two hundred brutal assaults occurred. The commissioners themselves have been frequently struck and stoned.

They were imprisoned several times for holding meetings or reëntering cantons from which they had been thrust out. But justice sometimes triumphed. After a fortnight's confinement in a cell, the nauseous odors of which made her ill every morning, the Maréchale was taken to trial. In her defence she appealed to the laws of the land. "In holding meetings," she said, "I simply place the national constitutional law above any decree made against us in violation of that law." The six jurymen, some of whom were of Huguenot descent, courageously pronounced her not guilty, to the bitter disappointment of her persecutors, who forthwith ordered her expulsion.

The headquarters of the Salvation Army in Paris are at No. 3 Rue Auber. In France and Switzerland last year the Salvation Army held nearly 300,000 meetings, dealt with nearly 5,000 souls at its penitent forms, while well nigh 800,000 copies of its salvation papers were sold.

EXTRACT FROM THE REPORT OF THE WORK BY THE MARECHALE'S HUSBAND.

"The three great obstacles to the work are: 1. Formalism. 2. Infidelity. 3. Utter indifference. Let us glance at some other points of contrast. Items which add to the difficulties of the struggle: 1. Unlike England, in France there are much longer factory hours, and much more turning of night into day. Hence the meetings which in England commence at 7 or 7:30, commence in France at half-past eight. This means far more wear and tear upon officers. 2. There are no free Saturday afternoons in France for the working classes. 3. No free Sunday for three-quarters of them. Hence the time in which they can be got at is greatly reduced. There are no processions or open-air meetings. 4. Military service, which lays its iron hand upon young French officers, makes them disappear for three years into the grinding vortex. Only last week two of the most devoted young captains, occupying stations far away in the south of France, had to lay down their Salvation uniform and go off into that kind of forced service which is the only surviving member of the family of slavery and serfdom still lingering in civilized nations in this nineteenth century—military service, the machinery of legalized systematized murder.

"5. Such difficulties as the above make all minor ones sink into insignificance. There are, however, many special regulations which help seriously to increase the cost and difficulty of salvation efforts. For instance, every public placard movable or immovable has to be stamped with a costly government stamp according to its size. The police have to receive written notice of all meetings twenty-four hours beforehand, etc."

During the last six months La Maréchale has traveled through Switzerland and right round France holding meetings, often series, in more than thirty stations and seeing in council and personally nearly all the officers in the territory. She was everywhere sustained in a remarkable degree with divine power, and not only were the meetings marked by densely crowded audiences, but by that light and life and liberty which constitute the one thing needful for saving souls—the indispensable environment in which Scripture truth acquires saving force, and the one thing impossible except where wholly consecrated or fire baptized souls are at work.

Such tours cannot be undertaken in such a work of poverty as this without plenty of 'roughing it.' But though terribly wearying to the body, especially of any delicate creature, nothing is more stimulating to the soul.

MEMORIES OF THE WHITE CITY.

II.

BY ELIZABETH CUMINGS.

Strictly speaking, I suppose a hearse is a means of transportation. Certain it is that along with other means of getting about, hearses were exhibited at the Transportation Building. One, I was told it was the most expensive vehicle of the sort shown, was ticketed as worth twelve thousand dollars, and it was, I regret to add, designed by a woman. The great bronze vase in the French section of the Liberal Arts Building, designed by Doré, was not more crowded with ornament than this funeral car, devised to lend pomp to—death. Possibly it may be a comfort to somebody to hire the use of the thing for a dear one departed. Nothing is more inscrutable than human nature. Still, I wish a woman had not designed that hearse. It ought to have been entirely the work of —"a funeral director."

. . . . . .

There seems to be an intimate connection between sound and leaving the mouth wide open and closing the eyes. It was curious to watch lips drop apart as a recital began in the Liberal Arts' organ exhibits. I often counted a dozen mouths open sufficiently for dental purposes. A small boy always shuts up his eyes when he is going to yell for all he is worth. The curious wind instruments in the Alaska exhibit at the Government Building ended in a wooden head. The eyes were carved closed, and over them was drawn a bandage. To make the mouth very open, teeth were carved only at the sides. The four front teeth, upper and under, were omitted.

. . . . . .

Either the tobacco habit causes men to become disrespectful, or a certain type of American is ingrainedly contemptuous toward objects curious and strange. There was a curious canoe in La Rabida dug out of a log, and other canoes in the Anthropological Building, and a great Alaskan war canoe decorated with considerable skill in the Government Building, also dug out of a solid tree trunk, and each one that I examined, whether it came from the far north, the West Indies, South America or Africa contained tobacco quids. Occasionally there was a pea-nut shuck, but the evidence of tobacco joys once tasted was universal. As I looked, I found myself hoping that foreigners would not see what I did.

. . . . . .

And speaking of pea-nuts reminds me it is not well to be too certain of what you know. A number of visitors were in the Japanese exhibit in the Agricultural building and paused before some silk cocoons. "Them's white pea-nuts, Mary Ann," said the wiseacre of the party. "They prob'bly grow that way in Japan." A Shaman is an Alaskan medicine man, as most people know, but before the collection of masks, rattles and robes worn by those functionaries I heard a would-be wise man holding forth: "This is a loan exhibit," said he; "this man Shaman has, as you observe, a very fine collection."

. . . . . .

There were certain places in which there was always a crowd. One was before the sea-anemones, fiddler-crabs and sea-horses in the Fisheries Building. Men and women became children in their wonder and delight before those strange revelations of the mysteries of aquatic life.

Staid, stout, middle-aged gentlemen breathed heavily, left their mouths open and crowded like boys about the anemones. From dawn till dark every day those wonderful links between the vegetable and the animal creation had their circle of admirers packed as close as the place would hold.

The quartermaster's department of the Government Building was another crowded region. The wooden horses and mules commanded no end of inspection and the Arctic scene excited continual interest. One could look at a fac-simile of the original Declaration of Independence quite at one's ease, but the Arctic scene must be viewed from the gallery if one objected to a crowd. In a vain moment I fancied I would draw near and discover the secret of the spell that held people there often half an hour after getting a good position. After long patience I stood an instant before the illusion. Suddenly a pin prick of the most pronounced description caused me to draw back and examin my dress. Too late I remembered that the pin could not be in my garments, and glancing about I saw a small woman in gray between whose thumb and forefinger was a long, black-headed pin. An instant later she had a better place. I had a general impression that I ought to complain of her, that at least I ought to go up to her and say, "Madam, I have seen your little game, and unless you stop I will speak," but I had not the courage. I dare say she went on gaining "points" of advantage wherever she desired. It was the one exhibit of meanness I saw at the Fair.

La Rabida was another crowded place. Many a visitor knew not its significance, and many missed the most precious exhibits. "Must be some relation of Columbuses," commented one as I stood before the portrait of the sympathetic prior, Juan Perez Marchena. "Good looking old feller," and he passed on. Let us hope he knew Columbus when he saw his statue or his picture.

. . . . . .

I may be stupid, but a cow, however beautifully painted, hardly seems an appropriate object to put upon a china plate. Yet there was a set of plates in the English china exhibit, exquisitely done, all ornamented with cows. But after all a plate is to be used, and who would eat even grapes off a cow, or a lion? I saw plates on which were painted lions! China decoration is not great art, but it is art, and I for one object to having a cow or a lion in my coffee cup or under my pie.

. . . . . .

It is not always easy to be just. Passing through the fruit exhibit of Oregon I sat down an instant to rest in one of the angles of the benches on which the jars stood. "You needn't talk to me, this whole business is wax in my opinion," said a gentleman pausing a few steps away. "Look at those cherries. Who ever saw cherries growing thick as that on a bough!"

"I have," I said, modestly as I could. "You are mistaken, this is a real exhibit."

"Are you from Oregon?" demanded the still incredulous visitor.

"Oh, no, but I've been there."

"Oh, — ah, well!" was the answer, but as they moved away I saw heads shaken at the big peaches, and especially at the quince apples.

. . . . . .

From the superb bronze group of Germania to the exhibit in the art galleries what a showing Germany made. In the Transportation Building, Machinery Building, Mines Building, everywhere, it was as if the Germans had said: "They will like to see this, and this, and this, those Americans." But perhaps the exhibit that went most to my heart was up in the gallery of the Liberal Arts Building. And there were the autograph letters of Charlemagne, of Schiller, Goethe, Kant, Schleirmacher, Lessing and of the present emperor's father and grandfather. What a childlike evidence that it was believed that what Germany loves and reveres must be dear to the world. I am haunted by a wish to know what a certain object I saw in the silver exhibit was for. Fancy an enormous shell, like a snail's shell, only of exquisite mother-of-pearl texture and tints; over the opening of the shell folded silver wings, above which rose a goose's neck and head. Below it were two very lifelike red legs and goose feet. I saw that the silver wings might be opened at the tail. Whether that sumptuous silver goose was to serve as a jewel box or for boiled eggs I could not discover. He was a very German bird, and expensive, and if he quacked it was, I am sure, in the polysyllabic language of Deutschesland.

. . . . . .

"I was dreadfully disappointed in the Horticultural Building," said a visitor to me during the intervals of sipping what was called coffee in a restaurant.

"And why?" I asked.

"Oh, because—er—well, perhaps tropical plants are always disappointing. There didn't seem to be much to look at."

"But the tree ferns, and the cycads, the elk horn ferns, the bird's nest ferns, the air plants, the screw palms, and the cocoanut tree, didn't you enjoy them?"

"Oh, I didn't see them. I just took what you might call a general view," was the answer. I remembered the calceolarias I had seen, twenty-five hundred or more in February, of every possible tint of blue, of crimson, and pink, milk white, and snow white, and white in combination with blue and crimson; I thought of the cyclamens, the myriad daffodils, tulips, pansies and azaleas, the pinks and the roses, and was silent. Silence is, after all, far more satisfactory than argument, and there are times when to impart information is painful. I stood before a very large tree fern which perhaps had been injured during transportation. At least the fronds were as yet small for the height of the trunk. The tub was marked "From Philadelphia." "Hum!" exclaimed a visitor who was evidently taking the Exposition very fast, "from Philadelphia. Well, I don't call that stick much of a show," and on he went.

. . . . . .

Before Timotheus visited the Midway, he said he thought it amazing that any one should spend time there. "I have my opinion of people who will squander opportunity there," he said, "with all there is to see in the grounds." We started one day expressly to see the English pictures. He suggested that we enter at the Midway entrance. We passed the beauty show, and a most gallant looking piper was drawing entrancing squeals out of his instrument as he marched at a sharp trot up and down the veranda. We paused. I liked the pipes, and Timotheus liked the performance. "Perhaps we'd better walk down the Midway," I suggested. We walked. We visited the streets of Cairo. I could not persuade Timotheus to give over gazing at the donkeys, the camels, and the women with stockings over their noses. We went into the temple of Carnack, I think that was the name. I could not tear myself from the weird music, and Timotheus was equally taken up with the mummies. We went on to the Java village, and paid our respects to the orang-outang. The sun was far down the west when we again reached the beauty show. We stopped to rest beneath one of the railroad bridges. A very stout German sat down beside us. "Well, this is interesting," said he. "I live at Kansas City, and this summer I went to my father's old home in Germany. He came over with me when I was three, and I wanted to see what the old place was like. Well, you should see it. Stone floors, and shoes to match. Everything so plain and poor, and made to last forever. Ah, you can't think how glad I was my father had been plucky enough to come over here, where his boys can have a chance. It is all very fine to come here and look at these peoples from everywhere on earth, but folks miss the nib of it who aren't thankful they live here. Bless me, how glad I am I belong in Kansas City!"

We visited the English pictures another day.

TEMPERANCE IN FINLAND.

BY REV. CARL F. ELTZHOLTZ.

The Eleventh Annual General Meeting of "The Finland Friends of Temperance" was, according to a report in Menneskevennen, held at Savonlinna, one of the most beautiful little towns in Finland. Finland's well-known temperance reformer, Dr. A. A. Groufelt, presided. One of the questions discussed at this meeting was "The proper attitude of ministers of the gospel toward the temperance cause." This subject was introduced by Mr. Alkio, who said in substance that this was a very important question which the ministers, who are the most prominent instructors of the people, ought to be either for or against—they could not be neutral. If the temperance cause and its teachings were false, then it would be wrong for them to be quiet; in that case they ought to oppose it, they ought to prove that total abstinence is against the Bible. But if they must admit (and admit they must if they will be conscientious) that the temperance cause is good, then they ought to be defenders of temperance. As the Bible teaches us that total abstinence from evil is not only lawful, but that it is a duty, then the ministers of the gospel who are the spiritual and moral teachers of the people ought to teach abstinence from this monster evil; they should teach and practice total abstinence themselves.

Another very important and interesting question was discussed, namely: "Is it desirable that the temperance people should nominate their own candidates for town and general election?" This question was ably introduced and discussed by Dr. Johnson, one of the professors in connection with the Helsingfors University. His wonderful revelations and pointed remarks made a great stir all over the country. In the course of his remarks the doctor said in substance, that it only took a few years before the people of Finland adopted the temperance cause. Such had never before been seen in Europe. When the cause of prohibition in 1885 and 1886 was laid before the Finnish people they at once put themselves on record as a people that favored the total prohibition of intoxicating drinks by law. In 1885 the farmers alone made nineteen petitions for a total prohibition law. But although the will of the people was not made the law of the land that time, something was gained by this agitation, for instance: The proper authorities in the cities were given power to decide whether intoxicating drinks should be sold or not. In the fall of 1886 meetings were held in most of the cities to agitate for prohibition. In these meetings a very large majority adopted petitions to the Finnish parliament asking for the enactment of prohibitory laws.

As the friends of prohibition desired to ascertain as thoroughly as possible what the public sentiment was concerning this question, they had the cities canvassed, and although there were only six days to do this in the capital city they received 10,270 names, and 8,751 of these demanded a prohibitory law, while only 1,519 were against such a law. In Jyvaskyla were four hundred persons in favor and only twenty against prohibition. The opponents of prohibition said, of course, that those who canvassed had principally asked friends of the prohibitory law to sign their names; but unfortunately for them it appeared that the whisky party also had canvassed two cities (Tavastehus and Tammerfors), and what was the result? They received only one hundred and ninety-three names in Tavastehus where the friends of prohibition had received eight hundred; and in Tammerfors the whisky party received only 391 names, while the temperance party received 4,656.

The prospects for the friends of temperance are therefore very bright. The people of Finland are still demanding a prohibitory law. Although the will of the people has not yet materialized in the Finnish parliament, the time will come when it will be represented there. All the friends of temperance in Finland ought henceforth to concentrate their efforts in this direction. They should unite in one independent political party, and they must never rest before such men, who promise to obey the will of the people, are elected to represent them in parliament. When the will of the people shall be faithfully represented in our legislative halls, then Finland will have a prohibitory law.

These are, indeed, golden words. Finland seems to be near the goal of national prohibition. The General Meeting decided that "Finland's Temperance Friends" should henceforth stand united as an independent temperance party. The atmosphere surrounding Finland is full of prohibition. May the Lord strengthen and encourage our friends, and give them a glorious victory. I feel assured that many of our temperance people, whose hearts are big enough to be interested in the welfare of the whole world, will follow the movements of these brave Finnish temperance reformers with the profoundest solicitude and deepest interest, wishing them God-speed and abundant success.

NEW YEAR LETTER FROM THE CHIEFTAIN."

To the White-Ribbon Women in all Lands:

BELOVED SISTERS:—As I grow older, the return of New Year's day means less to me than it did in my enthusiastic teens. For one thing, I have "got used to it," and for another, many of the grooves of thought and action that I then mapped out have become well-worn tracks, on which the wheels of the chariot of life now wend their wonted way; and for a third, I no longer

"Feel the wild pulsation that I felt before the strife,
When I heard my years before me and the tumult of my life."

But all the same the holidays are bright spots in the mists of bleak December, hallowed as they are by memories of home's sweet and sacred ministries, its voice of prayer and words of tender greeting, and its gifts of affectionate recognition and remembrance.

The National W. C. T. U. does not attain its majority until next year, and the World's W. C. T. U. in its organic form is but two years old, so that we may well "take account of stock," make resolutions, and forecast what it shall be as a society. It is clear that the movement has perpetually broadened since the Crusade beacon shone out on the wide plains of the West. The plea and prayer of the Crusaders are now correlated with the plan and purpose of the white-ribbon army, while individual conversion correlates with the conversion of society from selfish customs and government from wicked laws.

The psychologic moment seems to have come for a declaration, long deepening in the hearts of veterans who have borne the burden and heat of the day, and it is this: We are hobbling along on one foot in the temperance reform; we are going into the battle before we have recruited our troops; we cannot win in all this awful warfare until we call out the reserves and arm the home guards. Who believes for one moment that the PEOPLE of Iowa repudiated prohibition? It is the parties under leaders who key the state to that tune which in the nation they mean to play at the next presidential election. Who believes that in four years the temperance party would have won but four thousand votes per year if the votes of women had been counted? Who believes that in our large cities saloon politics would dominate the conscience of the church and the heart of the home if the home people could bring to bear their power at the point where, by the very organization of governmental forces in a republic, opinion passes over into law? Who believes that the wage-worker's cause would make such slow progress if the wives and daughters of the men whose labor is their only capital, could reinforce them at the ballot box?

For my part I am free to say that for me, as a Christian worker, the bright spots on the world's map in this year's retrospect are Colorado and New Zealand. I rejoice in the fact that these two modern republics are in opposite hemispheres, for this is a sure proof that the leaven is reaching the whole lump; and I thank God it is white-ribbon leaven. For it is universally conceded that the victory at the antipodes had its origin in the systematic work of the franchise department of the W. C. T. U. introduced by a Californian Y, Miss Jessie Ackermann; and no one will deny that the foundation work of our society in Colorado (which has been true from the beginning to the most progressive phases of our work) was of incalculable value in the recent campaign which has resulted in placing women side by side with men in the affairs of government.

It was well said by the Rev. Dr. Barrows, of Chicago, in one of his recent addresses, "that although we have big warehouses, newspapers, railroads, expectations and achievements, the biggest thing in all the city is the heart of man with its ample storehouse of welcome and salutation and good-will for all the nations of the earth." This utterance, while of the white-ribbon movement it is pre-eminently true, applies in a larger sense to our whole nation, and is rapidly winning its way around the world.

At the beginning of this century only one in seventy-five of the population of the United States professed themselves Christians; at present one in every five acknowledges that sacred name, and the New Testament has become the text-book of reform, the words of Christ being more frequently quoted, possibly, by women and working men than even by the rank and file of the church universal itself. If I have a wish for our militant arms, whose purpose it is to hasten the coming of the Kingdom of Heaven, it is that we might discern the signs of these times even more keenly and quickly than we have ever done before, for the march of humanity was never so rapid and it will soon be "on the double quick." We must cast aside every weight if we would keep well at the head of the people's mighty movement, and lift our eyes steadfastly to the heavenly beacons if we would not be overcome by the thronging forces of evil that seek at every step to intercept our progress.

To this end I am counting greatly on the general observation of the week of prayer, and on the response of temperance men and women everywhere, to the request that March 20th be observed as an universal time of renewing for the temperance forces of the world. On that day our great leader, General Neal Dow, of Portland, Maine, attains his ninetieth year, and in contemplation of his brave and beneficent life we may be able to concentrate thought and purpose on a forward movement that will strengthen our forces as no other can, by such a lengthening of cords and strengthening of stakes as shall utilize every ounce of power with which it has pleased God to endow the hearts and homes of Christendom.

Life without a purpose is oblivion; may God inspire us all with the purpose to enthrone Christ in the habit, custom and law of Christendom, is the prayer of

Yours ever tenderly,

Frances E. Willard.

NEW YEAR GREETING FROM LADY HENRY SOMERSET, OUR CONTRIBUTING EDITOR.

DEAR COMRADES:—It does not seem possible that I should have made three journeys to America and back within the last three years, participating in two World's Conventions—Boston and Chicago—and one National Convention at the foot of Pike's Peak. But I gladly cherish the belief that these goings and comings, so full of physical discomfort and weariness, have helped to weave some bright threads of mutual love and faith in that great "cloth-of-gold" fabric on which it has pleased our heavenly Father to set so many of us at work in the white ribbon ranks the wide world over.

It comforts me to feel that the temperance sisterhood on both sides of the sea has a growing sense of unity, not only in spirit, but in method, for we are giving and getting the best from one another; and this is not only true of the leaders in the two great countries that pioneer the world's reforms, but the "Signals" set high aloft by the white ribbon press flash out their light and leading to the most distant corners of the globe. I am told by our round-the-world missionaries that the same symbols, banners, mottoes, songs and plans of work are now found in every country, and that groups of women like-minded with ourselves have been inspired with the same faith and loyalty that animates us in London and Chicago. All this means more for the intelligent prosecution of the temperance, the woman and the labor movements than we can possibly perceive who are "working on the wall" too near to it ourselves to take in its vast proportions.

It is my most earnest hope as a Christian worker that within the next three years I may, in company with our president, visit every country where the white ribbon has become the emblem of purity, peace, prohibition and progress, and that we may carry the Polyglot Petition to the governments which license the sale of brain poisons, and thus deliberately and systematically undermine the power of thought in those for whom they are sworn to execute justice. When we return from that pilgrimage we shall, I am confident, be able to speak with more emphasis than ever before concerning that solidarity of woman for the protection of the home, which is the ultimate aim and purpose of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

You will be glad to know that with the New Year your sisters here begin the publication of a paper, to be called the Woman's Signal, with which the Woman's Herald and the Journal of the B. W. T. A. will be incorporated. We hope to make this to Great Britain what THE UNION SIGNAL is to the United States—a pure, wholesome, helpful home paper full of the modern spirit of Christianity applied to the problems of our own time. Let me also encourage you by saying that it now looks as if we should have eight hundred local societies when our annual meeting is held in May of 1894; this will be over two hundred more than we reported last year.

As the best method of signalizing the twentieth anniversary of what we in England call "the women's whisky war," we have resolved to found an industrial home for women inebriates, to which we hope the courts will send women who would otherwise be sentenced to jail. We recognize that drunkenness, in part, at least, is a disease, and we wish to give to women who are in its power better conditions for reformation than can be found behind the bolts and bars of prisons.

It seems to me there should be an effort made all along the line to establish in these twentieth and twenty-first years since the heroic women's praying bands went forth to battle, some beneficent institution by which their sacred memory shall be handed down to future generations; and surely nothing could be more appropriate than industrial homes for women who seek to rise above the bondage of the intoxicating cup.

With affectionate and grateful memories of all your kindness and good-will, I am my dear comrades, your loyal sister and co-worker,

Isabel Somerset

Reigate, England.

THE OUTCOME OF THE CRUSADE MOVEMENT.

DEAR UNION SIGNAL:—The movement known as the Temperance Crusade was a special, divine influence brought suddenly and sharply to bear upon the greatest universal evil of the time. Unique in manifestation, it arrested general attention and made a profound impression upon all classes of people. The conflict with this single evil, we believe, by divine guidance, became the initial point of a great organization, which, almost immediately, was also made a point of divergence by including in its propaganda many other open forms of evil.

This organization, doubtless, came into existence in this country, as Esther came into the Court of Persia, "for such a time as this." The United States, in some respects, above all other countries, is the light of the world. For some years enormous immigration of ignorant and degraded humanity, people often devoid of American and Christian ideas and correspondingly devoted to the debasing traditions of their own fatherlands, has smirched our moral atmosphere and threatened the suffocation of our religious life and national liberty by the inflowing vices and spirit of the Dark Ages which attend them.

The organized Crusade, known as the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, has more than any other federation the elements which reach all people. It has been, in a special sense, a call to women to "arise, their light having come." This call to women is as clear as the imperiled condition of the country—shall we say of the Anglo-Saxon race? It has found all classes of women, It has called them from the busy trifles of conventional life, from a comparative cloister life, occupied, perhaps, with fancy work, absorbed after thirty years of age in self-culture by literature, languages, art, philosophy, not heeding that at the same age the Master entered upon His mission to save the world.

Of the women called, how great the diversity of gifts! "But all these worketh that one and the self-same spirit, dividing to every man severally as he will." I. Cor. 12:11. This evangelical institution is supremely a unifying agency. It belongs to all churches, all sections, all countries. Enemies otherwise are brethren here. All sit down in hearty companionship with it in the Kingdom of God.

Taking women out of innumerable self-imposed and useless cares, it has set them to work at the problems which concern God and humanity. Lips bearing a divine message are multiplied and the message reaches the neglected of all classes, the upper, as well as the lower. Within twenty years it has been discovered that "the Lord gave the word; the multitude of women that publish it is a great host." The self-same Spirit which indicted that word has called the women of to-day to their predicted office.

Unexcelled in parliamentary debate, in practical common-sense and mother-wit, in brilliancy and in spiritual fervor, their magnificent conventions are an inspiration to true reform and progress, commanding universal respect and admiration.

Does not everything show that this organization, born of the Divine Spirit, like Ezekiel's wheels, full of eyes of intelligence, moving by the living Spirit within it, its four faces to all the earth, representing all people, is ordained to be one of the chief forces that shall cover the earth with the knowledge of the glory of the Lord?

H. C. MCCABE.

[The above from the pen of an original Crusader and the first W. C. T. U. president of the state of Ohio will be read with interest by many who are reaching out in this jubilee hour for the old links of the Crusade cable that in this restless, shifting American life have parted and drifted to new harbors; each one, however, carrying with it, like the sea shell, the refrain of its birthplace: "Make a chain, for the land is full of bloody crimes, and the city is full of violence."—EDS.]

BY MATILDA B. CARSE.

That the trial of your faith, being much more precious than that of gold that perisheth, though it be tried with fire, might be found unto praise and honor and glory at the appearing of Jesus Christ, —I. Peter 1:7.

The last sands of the old year are softly and silently falling through the hour-glass of time. As we stand here on the borderland of the new year, we cannot but take a retrospective glance over the days of the year that is just departing; we think of the many comrades who entered it with us that on the march have dropped at our side, and to-day the winter wind is singing a requiem over their silent dust. Is this the end? Ah, no; we look upward, and faith reveals their faces added to the great throng of the glorified ones in that fair land where the years count not; and a voice sounds forth, "Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord from henceforth. Yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors; and their works do follow them." The departure of such blessed souls has often been chronicled in this column during the year. They were those who redeemed the time and showed their faith by their works. Many who read these lines will not be with us at the close of another year.

The following extracts taken from a letter written by Mrs. E. T. Moyer, Napa, Cal., shows a family that is "redeeming the time." Mrs. Moyer says: "During the past year we have enjoyed working for temperance more than ever, because THE UNION SIGNAL has come weekly. The Temple Items have been of the deepest interest to us. To-morrow our Ethel, the only daughter in a family of five, is thirteen years of age. This morning the thank-offering bank and missionary box were opened and found to contain $3.79. We send $4 for the Temple fund, also a new subscription for THE UNION SIGNAL and The Crusader with our own renewals. Ethel feels this is a birthday present in that we are able to spread the glad temperance tide farther on, for surely the 'world's white ribbon' is an incentive for good and active, earnest work. We are surrounded by wine cellars; our four boys are growing up to fight King Alcohol and the cigarette. We heard our dear Miss Willard lecture when she visited here, and we now have a dear, bright, active little five-year-old Willard who says: 'Mamma, I will never touch wine.'" Our two National officers at the Temple, Mrs. Mary A. Woodbridge and Mrs. Helen M. Barker, have set a loyal example by handing in their dollars for the Temple. We receive daily scores of letters enclosing a dollar in answer to the call sent out. The cheer contained in the letters gives comfort beyond expression. Mrs. Hysluf, Nebraska City, writes: "I send one dollar for the 'House Beautiful'; wish I could make it one hundred. I do think every white-ribboner and L. T. L. should send their mite, so little for each and in the aggregate a nice sum for our Temple." Mrs. Netta Haworth, of the Kickapoo Mission, Oklahoma Territory, says: "Enclosed please find one dollar for the Temple. My prayer is that the hearts of the white-ribbon host may be stirred to gladly help our beautiful Temple."

Miss Della Neal, Berwick, La., state organizer and president of the fifth district, Louisiana, writes: "Please find inclosed $1. I have always been an advocate of the Temple enterprise, and since the recent National Convention, at which time I heard it discussed pro and con, nothing can ever change my opinion, and I shall give it every aid I can. I shall never allow an opportunity to pass without urging this noble work upon the members of our white-ribbon band." We wish the hundred thousand white-ribboners that have not as yet given one cent to the Temple enterprise, and who have stood aloof from doing so from much the same reason as the state secretary of Vermont, Mrs. G. E. Davidson, would turn over a new leaf with the New Year, and do works meet for repentance, as she has done. Mrs. Davidson writes: "I have not done much for the Temple yet, and have failed to be enthused over it until lately, feeling sure that the enterprise would succeed without the little help I can give. Since the National Convention I have become much more interested, and begin to see we must all take hold and all pull together. The opposition serves to discourage some, and in some it arouses a determination to succeed in spite of all obstacles. The inclosed fifty cents is only a little beginning of what I hope to do."

The W. C. T. U. of Sterrett, Pa., has sent $100 through the state treasurer. Mrs. E. C. Haynes, for the W. C. T. U. of Miles City, Mont., sends $40. This union sent $32 in 1888, and now is at work to finish its pledge. Mrs. N. K. Fite, superintendent of Temple work, sends $20 for the Indian Territory. Mrs. S. S. Shove sends $8 for the Central W. C. T. U. of New Orleans, La., making $62 this union has paid on its pledge. From the W. C. T. U. of Kingston, Jamaica, comes $15.22—the kind effort of Mrs. C. Maddiz. From the W. C. T. U. of Dayton, Pa., $18 comes. The secretary, Mrs. Hammond, writes: "The money is the outcome of a mite-box social. In the box of one of our devoted members, Mrs. Wilson, who has been called from labor to reward, was found $5; in another, that of little Clare Marshal, also summoned to the arms of the good Shepherd, was fifty cents."

A two-cent stamp sent to Mrs. Matilda B. Carse, The Temple, Chicago, will secure a mite-box. Remember, any one placing in the box $2.50 from May 1, 1893, to May 1, 1894, will receive the lovely Columbian souvenir made of aluminum, with a cut of the Temple on one side and on the reverse the face of Miss Willard with suitable inscriptions. All money orders should be made out in the name of the treasurer, William D. Preston, and sent to our financial secretary, Miss Sara G. Johnson, The Temple, Chicago, Ill. Any and all matter in regard to the Temple should be addressed to Mrs. Carse.

A NEW YEAR'S GREETING.

BY WARNER SNOAD.

A New Year's greeting! what can one say?
We've played out wishes for New Year's day,
We, the wishers, are not to blame,
One grows quite tired of saying the same;
And yet—well, most of us like to hear
Some sort of wish for the glad New Year.

Friends, one and all, I wish you this:
Lips that you love the best to kiss,
Strength to work with a right good will,
Peaceful sleep, whether well or ill,
Heaviness only fall on your purse,
Changes for better and none for worse;
Little worries all flee away,
Troubles pass or not come to stay;
Every day blessings, if all are given,
Yet by their magic, earth turns to heaven.

A PARASOL, A BONNET, OR A BUCKET

BY GRACE STEWART REID.

Carrie Seeright was so run down by spring weather and spring examinations that, as she herself expressed it, she had to be sent from home to be wound up.

"How happy I should be," said her mother, kissing her good-by, "if you were going to start a temperance movement in Pleasant Plain!"

"Well, really, mother," answered Carrie, "that is quite a little something to expect of one poor girl in a big place like Pleasant Plain that hasn't even a Band of Hope! But folks won't have any trouble in seeing which side I'm on, for I have a badge on every single dress, on both my outside jackets and on my waterproof—all sewed on tight with thirty-six cotton."

Soon after Carrie's arrival in Pleasant Plain the friends with whom she stayed gave a rosebud luncheon in her honor. Her cheeks were rosy with excitement and pleasure as she sat under the great Japanese umbrella from whose points rose lanterns trimmed with tinkling bells shed a soft light on a table laden with flowers and dainties.

She looked and tasted with delight till the appearance of some charming little pastry parasols filled with ice-cream roses and marked with the guest's initials. Before Carrie's reached her she knew from various sniffs and smiles they were prepared with wine. She thought of a host of things in a minute.

Could she eat the cream without tasting the wine in the pastry? Could she not break the whole thing up and toy with it as if she had been eating it? Would not that be acting a falsehood? It would be too bad to hurt her entertainer's feelings. It would be terrible to have all the other girls think her rude or laugh at her. It would be worse to lose the chance of a temperance hint to thoughtless Pleasant Plain. She sent away the beguiling parasol.

"Why, Carrie!" exclaimed her hostess, surprised and disappointed, for this conceit was intended to be the crown of the bill of fare.

Carrie lightly touched the bow of white ribbon on her dress, as every eye was turned toward her. Her cheeks burned and a faint mist of homesick tears blurred her sight as she covered the empty place before her with cake and fruit, and spoke with a nervous laugh to her neighbor.

That afternoon the troublesome parasol was sent next door to Mrs. Hark whose child's name began with the same letter as Carrie's.

"We have a temperance young lady staying with us," said the servant who brought it, "and you'd feel provoked at her not enjoying such a lovely thing only she's so mortified about denying herself before people."

"It is lovely, isn't it?" said Mrs. Hark, repeating the story to her husband. "I wish it would keep for an ornament for the parlor. I don't want Charlie to have it, but it would be a shame to destroy it."

"What is this temperance girl's name?" asked Mr. Hark looking at the initial on the stand of the parasol.

"I don't know," his wife answered.

"I think it must be Courage," said he, putting his hand on hers which held the gift. "Where courage leads faint hearts may follow," and he shook the little tempter into the grate fire.

Mrs. Hark told Mrs. Newsbiggle all about it when she called soon after.

"Well!" exclaimed Mrs. Newsbiggle, "it will be a wonder, indeed, if a slip of a girl can carry out her principles in the Newcombs' house. You know they're up to all the New York fads and even put a dash of old rum in the chocolate and bouillon for their afternoon receptions."

She walked home thoughtfully. "Maria," she said to her cook, "I am not going to use any more brandy or cider in mince pies, but I'd like you to make a couple to-morrow with the spiced vinegar I saved from my sweet pickles. I want you to take one to old Mrs. Sniffen, and you must tell her it is a temperance pie so she won't be afraid to give that weak son of hers a good piece."

Young Sniffen told his friend, Jo Nail, that if all his home cooking was as good as that temperance pie, the saloon's free lunches would not get much patronage from him. Jo told his mother and added: "Why not take a room near the polls at the next town election and give the boys coffee and sandwiches, no matter what party they vote for? Plenty of coffee must certainly mean a less quantity of beer and whisky."

Since her own dear boy had asked her, Mrs. Nail put aside her pride and invited her friends to join her in the experiment. On the long election day they were busy serving all who would partake—the good citizen and the bad, the sober and the half-seas-over. If it did not work a revolution, it told on the right side of the election and on the profits and tempers of the saloon-keepers.

It told, too, on Mrs. Nail who came home in such a languid condition that, till he knew the cause, Jo deeply regretted his suggestion. She went to bed early and not only slept heavily all night, but till noon the next day. Then she woke with a headache and realized that she had been overcome by the liquor and tobacco atmosphere of the previous day, and that the afternoon barely furnished time to rid her dress and wrap of the same taint before she put them on for prayer-meeting.

She did not think of her bonnet till the church-bell was ringing. It had been shut up in a bonnet-box for twenty-four hours. Now, Mrs. Nail had often expressed the opinion that a stout middle-aged matron in a fancy hat was a sight she did not care to see; but on this occasion she did not hesitate to leave her bonnet hanging out of a window and wear a broad affair of lace and feathers she had bought for a niece in Texas.

If her appearance excited some surprise among the sisters of the congregation, it was small to that produced by her rising to speak, for "Sister Nail" was a conservative who sat in a back seat to be hardly seen and never heard. In a few simple words she told the tale of her sleep and of her bonnet. If there was anything funny about it, the sisters respected her courage too much to smile, and the brethren said, "Amen!" heartily when she asked if it was not time to protect the town from two poisons that made even the air unsafe.

Major O'Rear, who had had temperance locked up in his heart for many a day, came to the front with a vow to battle for the right. John Appel stood up for groceries without wine and liquors. Thomas Handy protested that any short lives among truckmen, van-men, etc., were due not to over strain, but over drain of beer mugs. A long hidden desire for reform burst forth. The meeting was so dead in earnest that when the fire-bell rang, even the men in the seats by the door did not go out. It was actually not till smoke pervaded the room that the meeting broke up.

Strange to say, Mrs. Nail's house was one of those in danger, and a lurid light lit up her airing bonnet. It reminded somebody of the temperance lunch at the polls, and that the saloons and drugstores were always very careful that the fire-laddies' throats should not be dried up by heat and smoke. Hot coffee and cold milk were soon being quickly served from tea kettles and milk-cans, in cups, glasses, bowls and pitchers.

"Comrades!" called a grimy young Hercules, as the defeated fire sizzled away, and Joe Nail, from a ladder, gently poked his mother's bonnet, safe and purified, within her unharmed home. "Out with the money you've saved to-night for a temperance coffee-room!"

An embarrassed, derisive laugh started among the firemen, but the crowd changed it to a rousing cheer as the speaker held up a fire-bucket and slowly dropped in a handful of coin. It did not have to wait for company from firemen and on-lookers.

"Big trees from little acorns grow." But did Pleasant Plain's coffee-room, temperance lecture hall, day nursery, kitchen garden and bands of hope really begin with a bucket? Or with Mrs. Nail's illustrated tale of a bonnet? Or with a young girl's refusal to sell her colors for a treacherous parasol?

I think the temperance movement in Pleasant Plain started in a mother's last, best wish as she sent her daughter out into fashionable society.

LOOK AT THE BLUE SKY.

One of the wisest and wittiest women I ever knew once went to make her wedding call at a new suburban home, all in its bridal freshness. When the visitor rose to go, her hostess came with her to the door, and out upon the pleasant, broad piazza, which, however, looked a little dusty in the corners. "Oh, dear," said the youthful housekeeper, anxious to vindicate herself from any possible charge of carelessness, "how provoking servants are! I told Mary to sweep this piazza thoroughly, and now look at it." "Grace," said the older woman, looking into the disturbed young face with kindly, humorous eyes, "I am an old housekeeper. Let me give you a bit of advice. Never direct people's attention to defects. Unless you do so, they will rarely see them. Now, if I had been in your place and noticed the dirt, I should have said: 'How blue the sky is!' Then they would look at that as I spoke, and so get safely down the steps and out of sight."

The little story holds more than the immediate value. How many people habitually look at the sky every morning, actually or metaphorically? Some people do, feeling the free uplift of soul as they glance for a moment at the broad, clear arch of blue, and the slow-sailing soft white clouds. But too many are wondering whether they shall catch the 8:14 train, or have to wait till the 8:34. Too many, even then wearied and overtaxed, are planning how to get through with the labors of the hours to come.

Of course no work can be well done with one's head in the clouds. But I am sure it can be better done for an occasional upward look. The lesson of the man with the muck rake is patent still.

Going day by day through the busy streets, through the crowd of anxious, harassed, care-lined faces, one echoes Matthew Arnold's line:

"Most men in a brazen prison live."

I know of no description of the skies like his, beginning:

"Plainness and clearness without shadow of stain, Clearness divine!"

With this noble climax—

"You remain
A world above man's head, to let him see
How boundless might his soul's horizon be,
How vast, yet of what clear transparency!
How it were good to live there, and breathe free!"

I remember once getting up at four o'clock in the morning for some necessary and trying work. I forgot the discomfort in the sight of the sky. The whole broad heavens were filled with a wonderful pure glow, luminous and strange, growing toward sunrise; and as I looked, I realized for the first time the meaning of "the shining light, that shineth more and more unto the perfect day."—*C. TYPICAL LESSONS FOR LOYAL TEMPERANCE LEGION TEACHERS.

Water for Plants.

BY MARY E. RUDD.

Opening Exercises, 15 minutes:—Add a new song to-day. "A Wildwood Lesson," page 6, "Marching Songs" or "Cold Water for Me," page 18, "Marching Songs No. 2," are both appropriate and pretty, though childish voices would render them easier if written in a lower key. After the prayer a hymn, then the finger plays, adding to the others "The Little Men." Practice new song.

Rhythmical Exercises, 15 minutes:—Swimming, flying, clapping the hands in time to music, swinging the arms, etc.

Lesson, 25 minutes. Sing the song of the stream, and try to draw out the previous story, especially the thought of the stream giving a song to the children, a home to the little fishes, a drink and a bath to the birds. Add to this the thought of giving to the trees, to the grass, to the flowers. If possible, show two flowers picked several days previously, one of which has been kept in water and one not. Let the children see the difference and tell their own experiences in regard to flowers and plants. Tell simple stories, showing how plants almost withered have been revived by water. Speak of the fact that plants not only drink up water through the roots and stalks, but that the leaves also have a great many little mouths that take in food and drink. That is the reason the garden looks so much nicer after the rain than it does when we just water the roots of the plants. Talk of different ways of carrying water to the garden—in a cup, dipper, pail, watering-pot, garden hose. Let the children help in conversation.

Tell of the garden made by the twins. Show pictures of pansies growing in it. After awhile the plants began to droop. Why? Then the papa brought two little watering-pots and the little boys filled them at the brook and carried the water to the garden, and sprinkled the plants so carefully; and the pansies looked up and said:

"Thank you, little boys, that is such a nice drink."

Then Dot said: "We are like the little stream. We are giving a drink of water to the thirsty plants."

But Trot said: "Mamma said God sent the brook, and I wonder why He didn't send it over to our flower garden."

And Dot said, "We'll ask her. Mamma always knows."

So they asked her and mamma answered: "Yes, God sent the brook, but He sent it to stay in one place and do His work there. But He has given little boys feet and hands to carry the cooling drops wherever they are needed. So He says to the children, 'Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might.'"

(Have the children repeat both this and the text of the previous lesson, giving them a chance to tell how they have been givers during the last week.)

Games: Children as flowers, one child for gardener, Have a pansy bed, a rose bed or any flower you choose. only give definiteness to the game by having a name. Do not be merely plants. Do not let the child-gardener attempt to carry the child-plant to its place in the bed, as the little plant is happy to be placed where it can bloom for the kind gardener, and this will be expressed by the fact that the child goes of its own accord when called. Watering the garden is, of course, the principal feature, and may be represented by the motion of the hands, as if holding and tipping a watering-pot. Birds to fly about among the flowers will be a pretty addition.

Occupation: Have little watering pots cut from green paper. Each child may mount one on cardboard and take it home.

Closing: Good-by said quietly and in an orderly manner.

THE NEW YEAR.

Fairy stranger, who art thou,
With the gems upon thy brow?
Coming in the stilly night,
Clad in robes of spotless white,
Noiselessly thy footsteps fall,
In the cottage and the hall.

Soft and low the answer came:—
"Surely thou must know my name;
For, while speeding swift away,
Ere the dawning of the day,
All the voices of the night
Cheered me as I came in sight.

"Heard you not the minster bell
As it tolled the Old Year's knell?
Heard you not the glad refrain,
As all nature pealed the strain,
'Welcome to the bright New Year,
Welcome, welcome, cheer on cheer'?"

KING SPIRIT AND HIS HOME.

BY MRS. EVA GRIFFITH MILLER.

King Spirit lived in a beautiful house called Body. He had many loyal servants, who were prompt to obey his commands, and his palace was a very busy and happy place. There was Mrs. Blood, the housekeeper, who was ever going from room to room, searching out odd bits of dirt and filth, broken bits of wall and impurities that had drifted in from the street, and with her army of corpuscles all dressed in red uniforms, she had these things picked up and carried out so that the palace would be always clean and healthful.

Then there was Mr. Vitality, the builder, who, with an army of corpuscles dressed in white, went around after Mrs. Blood and repaired all the broken places in the walls and kept everything built up after the pattern which the king gave him. Mr. Vitality was always at work, for King Spirit kept his palace in constant use, and the walls would keep wearing out, no matter how strongly they were built.

King Spirit had his office in that part of the palace called the brain, which was situated just behind two beautiful light windows, where the king was wont to look out on the world. A great many little telegraph and messenger boys were employed by the king, and they were always running back and forth from the king's office to the extreme portions of the palace to carry orders to Mrs. Blood and Mr. Vitality, who were often busy in the remote parts of the great house. Sometimes, too, Mr. Vitality stayed awhile in the office, and then the telegraph and messenger boys had to take his orders to his corpuscles.

Some of the telegraph boys were stationed in the remote parts of the palace, where soldiers were set to watch, and whenever a bit of wall was broken down or an enemy appeared the soldiers sent the telegraph boys post haste to the king's office to let him know. The telegraph and messenger boys always traveled along smooth avenues, made on purpose for them, called nerves, and these avenues had to be always kept in good repair, or else the messages would be delayed and harm come to the palace.

The king had many enemies who were constantly trying to get into the palace and rob him of his jewels and drive him away, so he had guards stationed at all the doors to notify him when there were enemies lurking about.

There were troops of wicked little germs that tried to get in at the door nose, but the soldier, Smell, stood guard there to keep the germs out, and whenever he smelled bad air he would notify the king so he could move the palace to some other place. There were other enemies that tried to slip into the wide door, mouth, but the soldier, Taste, stood guard there. Then wicked oaths would come and try to get in at the ears, but Hearing stood guard there and would warn the king whenever they came around.

Professor Intelligence, in the king's office, studied up the history of the king's enemies and kept everybody informed as to their danger and habits, and the king's business manager, Mr. Common-sense, gave orders to the guards as to whom they should let in and whom keep out. No one was allowed to enter unless he could show a certificate of purity, which would prove him loyal to the king.

But one time a dreadful thing happened in the palace of the king. Mr. Common-sense went away on a vacation and left the business in charge of Mr. Desire. Now Mr. Desire was a very smart young man who thought he knew a great deal more than Mr. Common-sense, and he said there was no need of being so strict, and he was going to let the boys have a little fun.

That very day polite Mr. Tobacco came to the door of mouth and knocked. He was a very affable young gentleman, dressed in a stylish suit of brown, and he promised no end of good times to Appetite and Desire if they would only command the door to be opened. Smell and Taste didn't like him at all and they both sent alarming telegrams to the office to let the king know an enemy was near. The king called Mr. Desire and sent him to Mr. Intelligence to know what kind of an enemy Tobacco was.

Prof. Intelligence quickly informed him that Tobacco carried under his coat the dreadful poison Nicotine, with which he tore down the walls of the nerves and otherwise injured the palaces he entered. But Desire said he would watch him and see that he did no such mischief as that, besides he would turn him out the moment he saw him do any of these things. So King Spirit listened to Desire and allowed him to open the door to Mr. Tobacco. Taste fought hard against it, but he was soon overpowered, and then Smell, who wanted to keep on good terms with Mr. Desire, pretended that he liked Mr. Tobacco first-rate.

Tobacco came in very quietly at first, and only made a very short call. But he laughed in his sleeve at Mr. Desire and he said: "Ah, but you shall soon be my helpless slave, Mr. Desire."

The first thing Tobacco did was to put all the telegraph boys throughout the palace asleep, by giving them just a little of the Nicotine. Then he began to bring in little loads of dirt and filth and deposit them in corners around. Mrs. Blood was soon after him and she and her faithful red corpuscles carried out the dirt just as fast as they could, and they tried to rouse up the telegraph boys and send word to King Spirit that the palace was in danger, but the telegraph boys were too sleepy to mind, so the king never knew that there was anything the matter.

Then Tobacco, in some of his visits, broke tiny holes in the walls here and there. Mr. Vitality, who was around on a tour of inspection, found it out, and he called his white corpuscles together and repaired the holes as fast as he could, but he couldn't keep up with Tobacco after he began to come two or three times a day to make his visits.

Then the sly enemy, Tobacco, stirred up Taste and Thirst to demand another visitor to wake up the telegraph boys which he had put to sleep, and to make Mrs. Blood and Mr. Vitality work faster. So Thirst and Taste set up a great clamor, and to please them so they would keep still and not disturb his pleasure, Desire opened the doors of mouth and let in the sprightly King Alcohol, King Spirit's greatest and most terrible enemy.

Mrs. Blood was nearly frightened out of her wits when this wicked intruder entered the palace, and she flew hither and thither in a perfect panic, with her red corpuscles following close after her. She called Mr. Vitality to come and help her, and together they tried to throw King Alcohol out through the waste canals. They fought with him long and hard but he overpowered them both and ran straight to the king's office. First, he knocked down Mr. Intelligence with a single blow, then he grappled with King Spirit himself. The king called out to Desire to come and help him, but poor Desire was helplessly enchained by Tobacco and Alcohol his friend, and could not come. Taste was killed, Smell was wounded, the telegraph boys were all asleep, and poor Mrs. Blood and overworked Mr. Vitality had so much to do to repair the dreadful breaks Alcohol and Tobacco had made in the walls they couldn't give either time or strength to help King Spirit in his trouble.

Just then, while they were in the midst of this terrible battle with King Alcohol that bold robber, Disease, came along and seeing the walls to the palace down he went boldly in and began to fight and kill every one who stood in his way. He made short work of faithful Mrs. Blood; he soon threw her out of the way and plundered her private room, the heart. He drove Mr. Vitality clean away from his work and stole all his tools, and then he penetrated into the king's private office and stole his one great jewel, health.

King Spirit was just recovering from his long tussle with King Alcohol when the robber entered, so he had no strength with which to fight him. He just gave up and ran away from his beautiful palace and left it all cold and still and dark. Its walls were torn down and it was nothing but a ruin then, so it was of no use to King Spirit. He is now wandering in another country, sad and lonely, and grieving sadly for his lost palace and its shining jewels. From the bottom of his heart he regrets that he ever let Common-sense go away on that dreadful vacation, and that he did not insist on Desire's listening to the advice of honest Professor Intelligence.

"WHAT are pauses?" asked the teacher of a primary class. "Things that grow on cats," piped the small boy at the foot.

A Happy New Year, dear boys and girls! Have you had a pleasant holiday week? Your beaming faces tell the story as you crowd into the Cozy Corner, laughing and chatting. When you are all settled for our letters and nut-cracking, I want to make some suggestions.

Do you like to play games? Dear me, what an affirmative response. What is your favorite game? Such a variety! Well, my plan is that each one write out a brief description of an interesting game and send it to the Cozy Corner as soon as possible. Then we will have Our Children's whole page if necessary to give room to all the different ones you are sure to send. Don't forget to give the name of the game, how many can play it, and just how it is played. I wonder who will be the first to respond?

The text suggested in the little cousin's letter below is such a good one, and I wish each Cozy Cornerer would adopt the plan of choosing a text or motto for the New Year. The Bible will supply you one. There are many beautiful, poetical mottoes. Write one out and fasten it up where your eyes will fall upon the words each day. Then live up to it! With best wishes for the fulfillment of the New Year's promises, Faithfully your

I think this would be a good text for the New Year: "A good name is rather to be chosen than great riches, and loving favor rather than silver and gold." I am ten years old. MABEL FERNALD.

Plainfield, N. J.

A splendid text, Mabel! And one to remember through life.

I thought I would write an essay on cider. Cider first comes from decayed apples which are crushed worms and all. (Some men say that worms give the flavor to the cider.) Then the cider is sold to saloon-keepers, and ruins a great many people.

P. S.—I feel quite proud of the children's column becouse you chose my name to name it. Do not you think I have a good reason to be proud? I wish some of the boys and girls would write to me. BESSIE L. ATWOOD.

Kensington, Ct.

We all appreciate your little essay, Bessie, and wish there had been more of it.

We include cider in our pledge because it contains alcohol. Often people will take a glass of cider thinking it will do no harm, then a glass of wine and so on, till they love drink, and become drunkards, all from a glass of cider. Some people say there is no more harm in drinking a glass of cider than in eating an apple.

Fort Bragg, Cal. SUSIE E. JOHNSON.

Cozy Cornerers who have been taught the harmful effects of decayed apple juice, which we call cider, know there is a per cent of alcohol poison in it which is not found in the apple. So people who say there is no harm in cider-drinking are very much mistaken, are they not?

O TRAGIC ENDS.

Have you heard the news
The terrible news,
Of the boys who died last night?
They smoked the weed,
The poisonous weed;
They indeed were a pitiable sight.

Oh, how can you ask,
Yes, foolishly ask,
For the cause of their terrible death?
When you very well know,
At least so I know,
(And their smell, does it not taint your breath?)

THREE SPECIAL OFFERS FOR THE NEW YEAR.

We wonder sometimes if our readers know how perplexing a problem it is for our business manager and board of directors to furnish a paper of the character and appearance of THE UNION SIGNAL for the low price of one dollar a year, when its market value, if other religious and church papers be taken as a standard, would be two dollars and a half. We have seldom mentioned this fact, or any purely business items in these columns, but a New Year's editorial seems an appropriate place to sum up items for special thanksgiving. We simply desire that our readers shall be thankful for receiving a two dollar and a half paper for one dollar and to tell them how they can be assured of always receiving it at that price, and also lifting the burden for the publisher, and that is by inducing every other member of the union to become a subscriber.

While THE UNION SIGNAL is read by hundreds of men and women who are not members of our organization we do not lay claims to a large constituency outside our ranks. We make no special effort to attract such, but we do endeavor to prepare each week just such a bill of fare as will not only "tempt" white-ribboners, but is absolutely essential to their wholesome condition of mind and body as temperance advocates.

We have three special offers to make this year:

1. To send the paper to ministers for fifty cents a year.

2. To send from our philanthropy fund (as long as it lasts) a year's subscription to every white-ribboner who is not able to subscribe.

3. If present subscribers will send the names of the members of the union who do not take the paper, we will gladly send them sample copies, and endeavor to secure their subscriptions.

OUR OUTLOOK.

The words of Joshua to the children of Israel, at the crossing of the Jordan, "Ye have not passed this way heretofore," may well stand as the inscription upon the portal of each New Year.

No two years, however similar in outward manifestation, are in reality alike. Each comes with its own lessons; each finds us where no other has found us and leaves us under different conditions. The path between the dawning and the setting of each year is through an unknown country, and is an untried path. There can be no real precedent out of any past for any future. "Ye have not passed this way heretofore."

And yet, while this is true, it is also true that certain facts in the history of each old year give us data upon which to base our outlook for the new. The man who has steadily overdrawn his income for the past twelve months may with confidence look forward to failure and poverty in the next. That one who has broken all health's laws may expect sickness as a sure inheritance of the days to come. Other things being equal, certain conditions must inevitably produce other conditions, as cause leads to effect. Therefore it is not arrogating to one's self the prophet's function, as we stand upon the brink of 1894, to look forward into its as yet unborn days, and ask what they hold for us as an organization.

We are twenty years old. In the first flush, still, of youthful vigor, and yet having "put away childish things," may we not expect the new year to hold for us a maturity of thought and of purpose which no previous year has held? The magnitude of our work is only just dawning upon our workers. That superficial view which, of necessity, belongs to youth, is passing away. We are finding that it means something—this partnership with God, for the in-bringing of His reign of righteousness. We find that it means a devotion of every power, the brain not less than the heart, and we predict with confidence that the number of "specialists" in our ranks will increase rather than diminish as the days go by; that the women who are called of God to this work will be called also to such a preparation for it as shall equip us speedily, not only with skilled workmen, but with more master minds as leaders. The enemy is constantly strengthening its force for a stronger resistance; our forces must and will be continually strengthened for stronger and wiser attacks.

DIFFICULTIES.

That difficulties lie before us in the New Year, who so insane as to deny? They have lain before us every step of the way since Mother Thompson's face caught the glory-shine which fills it still, as she led that inaugural crusade. But just as resistance is more easily overcome as a body increases its momentum, so our difficulties are to be fewer and fewer as the years go by. For one victory scored last year we may hope to score ten this, so long as we keep within the order of God's eternal progress.

ENCOURAGEMENTS.

Let us "count up our mercies" just here upon the threshold. Our "chieftain," gaining strength so rapidly as to seem "almost herself" to those who have cared for her so long and tenderly. Confidently may we expect her to be with us again before the early summer. Given Frances Willard in her place, with a new impulse of life, and with the new sense of need and of appreciation which has been deepening in our hearts throughout these months of absence, and what may we not hope as the combined result of her inspiration and our work!

Peace and unity reign in all our borders. God has indeed made the "wrath of man to praise him," and has turned to naught the plotting of our foes. There has been no attack made upon us as an organization, nor upon our affiliated interests which has not reacted with a corresponding blessing. The Temple stands, and shall stand, more and more the Mecca of our hopes. The W. T. P. A. is weathering the financial storm with a tact and skill which would be marvelous, did we not know it to be of God. The Temperance Hospital is demonstrating, to the ends of the earth, the great principle upon which it is founded. The National union is rejoicing in the legacy of three thousand dollars from that friend who, having entered the vale, is still reaching out to us in benefaction.

Our department work is being better grasped and more efficiently pushed. The fact that the World's Fair judges awarded five distinct prizes to our L. T. L. exhibit is only one point in evidence. That great work, born in the heart and brain of one woman, has persistently pushed itself forward until it holds a prominent place in the American educational system of to-day, and is destined to achieve yet greater victories.

The same is true, to a greater or less degree, of all our department work. Our space will not admit of specification, but more and more we are making ourselves felt along the forty-three distinct lines of our department work. More and more we are tunneling, with the dynamite of light, the kingdom of darkness, and although the final explosion—which means con-struction, and not de-struction—may not come this year, yet this year, by just so much as we follow after truth, will surely hasten its coming.

One thing we see as chief cause for regret, and that is that the outlook along political and governmental lines is not brighter. We ought to be a far greater force in the political field to-day. Have we gained in any appreciable degree within the past decade? We fear not. With Iowan leaders false to their prohibitory allegiance; with a fatal paucity of votes upon election day, however flourishing may have been the crop of resolutions, the prospect, to say the least, is not alluring.

OUR GREAT INCENTIVES.

What then? Discouragement? No, but renewed effort. God works though men idle. Out of failure He organizes victory. The unrest which is seizing the world of to-day is but the first sound of His stately steppings. Out of the old He will bring forth the new. Out of the ashes of old parties shall be born the new party of Humanity, with the Christ upon its banner, and the Christ-spirit in its heart. Nearer by three hundred and sixty-five days is its birth than it was last year. Nearer still will it be when this year shall be old. Some day it shall be born of God himself into humanity.

The "outlook for 1894"? It is both an outlook and an up-look. Out, on the world's need; up, to God's supply. Out, on our weakness; up, to His might. Out, on our splendidly equipped organization; up, to Him who must be its motive power.

As white-ribboners there are three mottoes we may claim for each new year:

1. "Whereto we have already attained, let us walk by the same rule, let us mind the same thing."

2. "Speak ye to the children of Israel that they go forward."

3. "I will show you yet greater things than these."

If we but "follow the ark of the covenant of the Lord our God," the new year must be glorious in triumph. "Ye have not passed this way heretofore," but He who has "gone before us," through all the yesterdays will not leave us in the to-morrows.

"Where He leads, we will follow."

THE UNION SIGNAL'S NEW YEAR.

If the editors of THE UNION SIGNAL should ever be inclined to be lonesome or assert proprietary rights, they have only to look to the contents of their pages to realize their numerous family of contributors as well as of readers. Aside from the editorial matter, more than eight hundred writers contribute each year to the reading columns of THE UNION SIGNAL. A list of these writers will include the names of well-known authors, a large proportion of whom are our own white-ribboners. If THE UNION SIGNAL has accomplished no loftier end than encouraging the white-ribbon sisterhood to express their convictions by means of the printed page, its mission need not have been despised. We are confident that no other organization of women can claim so many members of ready utterance, not only by the voice, but by the pen.

NEWS FROM THE FIELD.

Our News from the Field department has grown and strengthened until we have a wide-awake, efficient reporter for every state and territory. With this plan for state reports so well systematized, THE UNION SIGNAL was never before so completely a National organ. As long as we published local reports we could not rightly claim to be National in scope, for in attempting to print, even in very abbreviated form, the reports from the local unions of one state, our space was consumed before half the states had been heard from. Now the plan is fair to all. To wit,—one column once a month from each state and territory, written by an officially appointed reporter, who has not only the literary qualifications, but a bird's-eye view all over her field. To ascertain the manner in which the state presidents viewed this plan, each was asked if the system were satisfactory to her. Thirty-seven replied emphatically, "Yes"; one said "No" and three were not positive.

This department is the stamping ground of the W. C. T. U. Set in solid type for lack of space, these pages may look dry to the general reader, but they are far from dry to the busy hive of local workers. It is here they look for suggestions for fresh endeavor as well as for reports of their own conquests and feel the responsive thrill of acknowledged service.

WORLD'S.

As a World's organ we are extending our boundaries and strengthening our stakes. Once a month we devote a page to the World's W. C. T. U. news, averaging about five countries a month. Among these are: Canada, England, India, Burmah, China, Japan, South Africa, West Africa, Ceylon, Australia, British Columbia, Madagascar, New Zealand, Newfoundland, Sweden, Norway and France.

Once a month we give a separate department to Canadian news, and we have just formulated a plan for the frequent representation of the Australian provinces, which will gain us many subscribers and increase the knowledge of our work in those sea-girt lands.

SPECIAL NUMBERS.

We have changed our plans somewhat as to special numbers. We will not decrease the number of special issues, but will arrange to either issue a supplement or to so increase the number of pages that the regular reading matter of the paper may not be crowded out. Aside from the usual Thanksgiving, Christmas and New Year's numbers, we will have at least four during the coming year: Prohibition number, Flower Mission, Fair Number and Convention numbers. We may introduce others later.

The next special number will be a Prohibition number. To be sure, every issue is a prohibition number, more or less, but this will be a regular prohibition broadside and will be a fitting observance of General Neal Dow's ninetieth birthday, which occurs March 20, 1894. We issue this number a month ahead, February 22, so that the unions may have the material for local celebration in abundance of time. This event is to be observed in the interests of prohibition in every civilized country on the face of the globe.

These special numbers not only create prominence for our special red-letter days and furnish a pleasant variety of reading matter but they are a great help in a business way, for in order to secure advertisements it is necessary to compete with other religious journals, all of which have more or less of these extras. There is fashion in journalism as there is in dress, and competition for the best writers and the best advertisements is very keen.

SCOPE.

In considering the scope of our paper it is difficult to determine any boundary line. Our field is peculiarly free from limitations or competition. We are the accepted organ of one hundred and fifty thousand white-ribbon women. If any one complains of the breadth of THE UNION SIGNAL let her first narrow the horizon of the W. C. T. U., for so long as it has editors that are true to their positions and loyal to the W. C. T. U. it will ring out in clear notes against every usurpation of W. C. T. U. ground and every attack upon W. C. T. U. interests, after they have been thoughtfully indorsed by the sacred majority.

OBJECTS.

We teach temperance; that is ever our objective goal, but we also teach the fundamental and correlated truths that underlie our forty-two departments, and they are as broad as the heavens. In this cosmopolitan age, one great truth is so linked with another that it is impossible to discuss one without touching the others. This breadth of treatment has been criticised by some as a wandering from our legitimate field. We have been advised to "stick to our text." That we try to do, but if we always had the same identical text our audiences would grow as weary as would those of a minister who invariably preached from one Bible verse. We look upon the great book of life as much ours to select from as a preacher does the Book of God. Others have suspected a shade of narrowness and limitation in the discussion of topics, and have advised us to give "two sides to every question." We do not consider that the purpose of our paper. THE UNION SIGNAL is the organ of the W. C. T. U., and as such proposes to keep in step with the progress and purpose of the organization. We interpret the mission of a National organ one of loyalty to the parent society whose declarations we publish and whose sentiments we advocate.

In looking ahead for the interests of our paper, we are impressed with the fact that this must be a year of great improvement. This twentieth year of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union must be furnished with the best literature it has ever possessed. We are confident that the great coming convention at Cleveland will not only celebrate victoriously the majority birthday of our organization, but will signalize the most valuable and growing year of its National organ.

WHITE-RIBBONERS everywhere will rejoice that the North Georgia conference of the Methodist Episcopal church South, representing one hundred and fifty thousand members, carried resolutions for the prohibition of the liquor traffic by the votes of Christian men, that were sharp, clear and decisive. With "brotherly love" they unanimously passed a resolution of praise for the W. C. T. U. in its great temperance work. This resolution will strengthen the hands of Mrs. W. C. Sibley, president of the Georgia W. C. T. U., and her earnest co-workers. A marked feature of the conference was a resolution of thanks to Chas. N. Crittenton, and the constant reference to special work among the fallen men and erring girls made by such noble preachers as Bishop Haygood, Evangelist Sam Jones, Rev. Dr. T. R. Kenall, whose wife is a staunch white-ribboner, Rev. G. H. Stradley, Dr. S. P. Richardson, Rev. W. F. Cook and Rev. Willard W. Wadsworth. The latter does honor to his first name—that of our beloved leader—by his noble championship of woman's prominent place in Christ's work, in his chapter upon that theme in his fine book, "The Coming Kingdom."

A FITTING OBSERVANCE.

The United Kingdom Alliance and the British Women's Temperance Association of England have taken up the suggestion made by the World's and National W. C. T. U., for a general observance, March 20, 1894, in the interest of temperance reform, of the ninetieth birthday of General Neal Dow, the father of prohibitory law. It is hoped by those who have combined to bring forward this proposition that temperance societies in all parts of the world will give it their indorsement, each one conducting the celebration according to its own judgment and opportunity, and all sending congratulations to our "Grand Old Man." It is needless to say that this would be done not only for the purpose of honoring this heroic leader in the temperance reform, but with the expectation that the principles of total abstinence for the individual and total prohibition for the state would thereby be brought before the public in a great many localities and in a variety of ways, the outcome of the effort being the advancement of the principles to which we are all alike devoted. The W. C. T. U. has always taken an attitude of friendly cooperation with the National Temperance Society, and I feel confident that in the present instance we shall not lack your sympathy and indorsement.

It is proposed to publish in all the temperance periodicals the picture of General Dow as he appeared in 1851, when the prohibitory law was adopted, and another as he looks now in his hale and honored age. With these pictures will doubtless be published a sketch of his life and some account of the success of prohibitory law in Maine, where it has been longest tried. Some of the wise and pungent sayings of General Dow—one of the most incisive speakers and writers that the reform has produced—will be collated, and odes in his honor and hymns commemorative of "prohibition day"—as we might well name the birthday of Prohibition's father—will be written—we may well believe—by our best pens in all parts of Christendom. I have long wished that we had a temperance "Auld Lang Syne" song, and one has recently been furnished for the W. C. T. U., but here is a grand opportunity for our writers to give us a song of universal adaptation that shall signalize the birthday of our noble chief.

Yours with every good wish,

Frances E. Willard.

THE COMPARATIVE VALUE OF A MAN AND A HORSE.

In proof of the position that we have often taken that nothing in the world is so cheap as a human being, take the following analysis of the value of a dead horse, to say nothing of a live one, and the uses to which he is put:

Carcass, from 20s. to 60s.; average value, 40s; weight, in pounds, from 672 to 1,138; average weight, 950 lb.

	Weig't.	Value.	Uses.
Hair	1½lb.	8d. to 1s. per lb.	Hair cloth, mattresses, plumes and bags for crushing seed in oil-mills.
Hide	30lb.	out 8s.	Leather.
Tendons	6lb.		Glue, gelatine.
Flesh	224lb.	Boiled, 28s.	Meat for men, dogs, cats and poultry.
Blood	60lb.		Prussiate of potash and manures.
Heart & tongue			A mystery.
Intestines	80lb.		Covering sausages and the like.
Fat	20lb.	3s. 4d.	Used for lamps after distilling.
Bones	160lb.	4s. 6d. cwt.	Knife-handles, phosphorus and superphosphate of lime and bone-dust.
Hoofs	6lb.	8s. to 10s. cwt.	Buttons, gelatine prussiates and snuff-boxes.
Shoes	5lb.	5s. to 10s. cwt.	Old iron.

It is said that the tongues of young horses are retailed for human consumption, while the hearts find their way into some of the mysterious compounds on which certain pork-butchers are an authority. Horse-flesh, as is well known, is largely eaten as human food on the Continent.

Not until the most valuable and valued object on the face of the earth in a practical as well as a theoretical sense is a human being, will the world ever be fit to live in at all; yet in our great cities men stand with their hands in their pockets by hundreds of thousands, with nothing to do, or wear, or eat, or hope for. General Booth's ideal was, indeed, a high one as things are going in the world to-day, namely, that a man should be housed and fed as well as a London cab-horse!

THE Evangelical Alliance issues once again its call to the churches of our Lord Jesus Christ to unite in prayer during the first week of 1894. The great tide of agitation and suffering that has swept over the nation from border to border, has been accompanied by an intensified activity among Christians to move the hearts of men God-ward, and as a result the interest in things spiritual is deeper and more widely spread. With these conditions it may be expected that the call will meet with a more hearty response than in past years even. The topics for the week beginning on Sunday, Jan. 7, are as follows: (1) Sermons: Pentecost Power; (2) Humiliation and Thanksgiving; (3) The Church Universal; (4) Nations and their Rulers; (Under this head is especially mentioned "the abolition of the slave, opium and strong drink traffic.") (5) Foreign Missions; (6) Home Missions; (7) The Family; (8) Sermons: The second coming of our Lord. Copies of the program may be secured at fifty cents a hundred, at 511 United Charities building, Fourth Ave., New York City.

One of the most graphic descriptions On Duty has ever read is that of Lady Henry Somerset's visit to the mining regions of Barnsley, England, where the families of the idle miners (no work has been in operation for months) are actually dying of starvation. Lady Henry describes the poor people as much above the average in intelligence and thrift, and her eloquent appeal for help has found its way in a score of English papers. A national fund is being raised by a woman's organization of which Miss Florence Balgarnie is the honorable secretary, and Lady Henry and Miss Willard among its council. As this involves no work for Miss Willard, she writes that she feels greatly pleased to have been so trusted.

The Georgia legislature has recently passed unanimously a bill admitting the women teachers of the state to the normal branch of the State University. The same legislature, I am sorry to say, also voted down a bill for a reformatory for young criminals and still clings to the old barbarous plan by which boys, convicted for petty crimes, are sent to the prisons and chain-gangs with old and hardened criminals.

Dr. Lyman Abbott, who is now pastor of Plymouth Church, where the broad, free spirit of Henry Ward Beecher ought to have left a better atmosphere, in his International Sunday School Lesson series says: "The wife will submit herself to her husband. Not because she is his inferior, nor because she is his servant, but because in every organization there must be some final authority, some real head; and in the household, according to the divine law of the household, the husband is the head. Therefore, no woman should marry unless she can reverence as well as love her husband; look up to him in a true sense, and rejoice in accepting his will as the law of the household. This submission is the submission of love, not subservience to power, legal or social." On Duty would like some letters on this subject from her readers; let us see if we can discover an exegesis more in harmony with the spirit of the gospel and the practice of the nineteenth century.

A manuscript received by one of our leaders recently, from a speaker of reputation, contains the following figure of speech: "A faint scintillation of the sweet breath of even'," in which the wires have evidently got crossed, since a breath does not "scintillate" much as yet, although of course we cannot tell what chemistry may educe from a zephyr in the way of glow. It is well to remember that the only safe way of treating a figure of speech is to picture in one's mind whether or not it is true to our observation of nature and the "facts of the case."

It is told on good authority of John Jacob Astor (father of the millionaire who now, unhappily, owns the Pall Mall Gazette), that having made a fortune he wished to found an institution in New York City that should perpetuate his name, and was about to give money for the erection of a hospital, when a bright journalist said to him, "You will do far better, sir, to found a library, for then all the literary fellows who never can keep their mouths shut, nor their pens still, will appreciate what you have done and will send the tidings of it ringing down the ages." The old miser took the hint, and what the journalist had said came true. It is related of him that in his last illness a clergyman proposed to read the Bible to him, and the old man said, "Read about Samson and the foxes. I have made lots of money out of foxes' skins!"

In a recent article, "How our Chieftain Received the News," note was made of a cablegram sent to Miss Willard announcing her reëlection. We have since learned that our absent President thought it a specially happy and prophetic omen that the messenger from the telegraph office who brought the good news from the grandest gathering of women that the land of liberty has ever seen, should have been a little girl. This child was feasted with good things while waiting for the answer which Miss Willard found it difficult to frame, keenly realizing the limitation which one meets when attempting to express in a few words the emotions of a heart overflowing with love and sympathy for comrades far away. We give the cablegram in full, as it has not appeared in our columns: "'What shall I render unto the Lord for all his benefits toward me? I will take the cup of salvation and call upon the name of the Lord. I will pay my vows unto the Lord now, in the presence of all His people.' Sing, 'We All Belong.'"

ON DUTY.

Superintendents' Reports.

[According to our promise, we continue in this number the publication of the National superintendents' reports which were not read at the Convention. We will publish as many of them in each issue as space will permit, until they are all printed, observing the order on the Convention program, and again invite those superintendents who have not already done so, to send us their reports. It is impossible to publish the long reports in full.—EDS.]

DEPARTMENT OF MERCY.

At the last National Convention, Mrs. L. A. Irons, of Ohio, was appointed organizer for this department, and at once did work in the states of Colorado, Nebraska, Kansas, Missouri and Ohio. She labored most faithfully, pledging hundreds of children and holding 150 meetings in the space of seven months.

The states having superintendents of this department are Florida, Iowa, Indiana, Kansas, Maine, Minnesota, New York, North Carolina, Ohio, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Utah, Wisconsin and Nebraska. Four states have taken up the department this year. Superintendents report a growing interest in the work and nearly all report Bands of Mercy in connection with the L. T. L., but it seems impossible to get definite information as to numbers.

The state superintendent in Oregon, Mrs. Louise P. Rounds, LaFayette, has done remarkable personal work in forming this year forty-one Bands of Mercy, and making seventy-three addresses at Sunday and day schools, colleges, a seminary and teachers' institute.

FLORIDA.—Mrs. Sarah B. Williams reports that owing to changing population, work is difficult to establish, but she has tried by correspondence with the thirty-two local unions and with literature to awaken interest.

IOWA.—Mrs. L. R. Eaton, Osage, reports Bands of Mercy formed and subject presented at teachers' meetings. One county superintendent writes articles for the papers against vivisection, and many articles have been published against all forms of cruelty.

INDIANA.—Mrs. Lou E. Rall, Huntingdon, reports steady increase in humane feeling, and largely through Bands of Mercy. In her own town, where there is a band of one hundred and nine members, the children raised ten dollars toward stopping the cowboy race, and thereby excited the attention of all the neighboring newspapers. Several sermons against cruelty have been preached.

KANSAS.—Mrs. Sophia Jones, Iola, reports great increase of workers and sentiment. The efforts of Mrs. Irons have done much good in connection with faithful work of state superintendent. Much literature has been sent out, including three hundred copies of "Black Beauty." This distribution of literature has created sentiment against vivisection and other forms of cruelty.

MAINE.—Mrs. Clara M. Mumford, Winthrop Center, reports eleven Bands of Mercy doing good work, and pupils in Sunday and day schools are signing pledges who are not members of Bands of Mercy.

MINNESOTA.—Miss Addie I. Carver, Etter, reports forty thousand pages of literature distributed. "Black Beauty" circulated; a growing interest.

NEW YORK.—Miss C. A. Goodale, Middletown, reports seven hundred and two pledged members of Bands of Mercy heard of, some good work done among teachers. One county superintendent means next year to have a Band in every Sunday-school in her town to report.

NORTH CAROLINA.—Miss Eula Dixon, Snow Camp, reports little done as yet except at Guilford College. Appeal to women has been circulated and a paper on the same subject of not wearing birds, was read at last state convention.

PENNSYLVANIA.—Mrs. Mary F. Lovell, superintendent. The chief work of the year has been the effort to secure amendment to existing law which would prohibit experiment on live animals before classes. Mainly by efforts of superintendents five thousand names were secured on petitions, and many letters were written to members of legislature. The bill passed the Senate but was defeated in the House by opposing doctors who wish to have young people educated by this method. But we hope the agitation and publicity given to the views of those who do not wish the hearts of the young made hard, will help to educate in the right direction. Much good work has been done by superintendents. One reports the erection of a fountain under the auspices of the department of mercy, the children assisting at its dedication on Decoration Day. What appropriate work for the department of mercy, and these fountains can be erected for comparatively small sums.

UTAH.—Miss L. Frost, Ephraim, reports distribution of literature, and letters written, some on subject of exhibit of live birds at World's Fair. Has introduced mercy teaching in kindergarten.

WISCONSIN.—Mrs. A. J. Bradbury reports work done toward having large boys and girls appointed in state L. T. L. to act as her assistants in mercy work; records fourteen Bands of Mercy; humane literature distributed. I have conferred with this state superintendent concerning the offering of the prize of a gold medal for the best essay on kindness written by a boy or girl member of a Band of Mercy, and the decision is that such a prize will be offered by the National department.

The formation of Bands of Mercy should progress faster than it is now doing. A little child trained to deeds of kindness not only is himself benefited, but may greatly influence others. And this training that we give, "blesses him who gives and him who takes." One whose business it is to teach lessons of kindness is sure to become more thoughtful concerning the treatment of our dumb brethren. If a woman, she will hardly wear egret plumes, sealskins, or the fur of the poor Astrakhan lamb. She will clothe herself without needless cruelty.

One of the commonest accompaniments of the drink evil is cruelty and brutality, which physiologists tell us is very likely to be inherited by the drinker's descendants. We have plenty of these descendants to deal with. It is the rising generation that we are specially aiming to reach. Reliable records tell us that no children thoroughly trained in kindness toward the dumb and helpless have ever been accused of any offense in any court of justice. Is it likely that children trained in habits of sobriety, gentleness and love would grow up to commit the awful outrages which disfigure our daily papers? The way to deal with the criminal classes is to deal with them before they are criminals. It lies in our power to mould now the future characters of many who would be criminals without our intervention. Shall we lightly disregard this responsibility? Where there are children, and that is everywhere, let us have Bands of Mercy. They can readily be introduced into the L. T. L's, day and Sunday-schools.

I am amazed over the indifference of the church to this matter of humane teaching. Our women are asking ministers of the Gospel to preach sermons on mercy, but why do they need asking? I have attended church all my life, but have never yet heard an entire sermon on the subject of mercy to the helpless. We are continually told of God's mercy to us; why are we not told more about the mercy we should show in consequence of it, to all His creatures? God made them, therefore it cannot be beneath any of His ministers to preach kindness to them, and it surely would be pleasing in His sight.

MRS. MARY F. LOVELL,
Supt.

YOUNG WOMAN'S BRANCH.

From the reports rendered, the Y. W. C. T. Unions are found to be working in all the departments prescribed by the W. C. T. U. and they are preëminently successful in social and flower mission work and in Loyal Temperance Legions and Demorest medal contests, as well as in the distribution of temperance literature. They usually send delegates to state and county W. C. T. U. conventions, and eight state Y conferences and one Y school of methods have been held. Their work has been presented at seventeen schools of methods in Indiana, two in New Jersey, one in Michigan and one in Missouri. Among the various subjects discussed were the following: "How to Carry on the Different Meetings," "Benevolent Y Funds," "Literature," "Social Work," "Honoraries," "Plans for Coöperation with Kindred Societies," with an occasional symposium on "The Way to Win."

They have engaged in fresh air work, and Rest Cottage, under the care of the Y's of Providence, Rhode Island, is assuming a more permanent form in the beautiful residence nearing completion, where they hope to accommodate three times the number heretofore cared for. They also support two tea rooms and both they and the Y's of Newport secured the services of Miss Mattie Gordon for a series of Bible readings.

One union in New York state held a series of meetings previous to election which aroused public sentiment; another joined the older ladies in working for no-license, which was carried by one hundred and fifty majority. One union joined the W. C. T. U. in adopting a baby that was left on a doorstep; still another is clothing and educating a blind girl; and others are helping in establishing coffee houses.

Seventeen essays were written in response to the offer of a prize for the best one on "The Effects of Alcohol," by a union in New Jersey to the students in the High School. A union in North Carolina has a committee to visit schools in the interest of scientific temperance instruction, and several unions in Ohio have given teachers' receptions, presented the subject of institutes and distributed Mrs. Hunt's "Monthly Advices."

The Y's of Indianapolis, Indiana, have conducted a "Noon Rest" for a number of years; for five years they have visited the Boys' Reformatory on flower mission day, holding services in the chapel; they receive a kind welcome from the officials, and the boys look forward with pleasure to their coming. The union of Walton, Indiana, has supported two old people whose home has been made desolate by King Alcohol.

Good work has been done by the Y's of Illinois in special evangelistic meetings conducted for young people; a special effort has been made to reach thoughtless girls whose carelessness often leads to a sad ending.

The Y's of Eyota, Minnesota, keep the street lamps trimmed and lighted, furnishing the oil. They were instrumental in obtaining "no-license," so when the old croakers complained that there would be no money to buy oil for the street lamps, they volunteered to do the work.

In the various states many signatures to the World's Petition have been obtained; ice water drinking fountains have been procured for many towns; the Y's have worked in Sunday-schools, kindergartens and kitchen gardens. The work is pressing into the young people's organizations in the churches; through suggestions from the members of the Y. W. C. T. U. the pledge is being circulated and public addresses given.

MRS. FRANCES J. BARNES, General Secretary.

PARLIAMENTARY USAGE.

The work of this department goes steadily forward. E ch year adds to the number of state, district, county and local superintendents. Each year the demand for instruction is greater and this demand is by no means confined to the W. C. T. U. Your superintendent is constantly solicited by other organizations to give "drills," and men and women alike join the classes instituted by the white-ribboners. No easier way can be devised to add to the exchequer of the local union and at the same time meet a felt need in the multiplied organizations of the land, than a series of drills. This, too, is an effective way to interest outsiders in our work. Very many otherwise intelligent people are peculiarly ignorant of the purpose and methods of the W. C. T. U. They have the idea that we are either a little prayer-meeting or a sort of political annex. It is not only our privilege, but our duty, as much as in us lies, to acquaint them with the work of our several departments, and no one of all the forty appeals so strongly to the average mind as does this one of parliamentary usage.

This very essential knowledge is not only desirable, it is necessary, and is most earnestly coveted by all intelligent persons. The man or woman who sits as a member of any deliberative body may have all other knowledge, but if ignorant of parliamentary law and practice must be at a sad disadvantage. The revolving wheel of office whirls one out and another in, and happy is she who adds to her other qualifications a thorough knowledge of parliamentary law, and without it, miserable indeed is the one who accepts the presidency of an organization. This fully accounts for the prominent place of this department in schools of methods and in conventions.

Literally, hundreds of drills attended by thousands of people have been given during the year just closed. The list of superintendents was never so long as now, and the women are coming more and more to see the necessity of being better equipped through constant study of authoritative manuals.

The most concise, and at the same time comprehensive, reports from state superintendents, are from New York and Indiana. Mrs. Bullock, superintendent of New York, received reports from twenty-nine county and forty-eight local superintendents. Sixteen unions have parliamentary critics for every meeting. One hundred and ten drills have been conducted. One of the county superintendents has a parliamentary game for the L. T. L., also a very helpful chart for unions.

Indiana superintendent reports fifty drills given by their own workers, besides others conducted by the superintendent of Ohio and the National superintendent, all of which found great favor in the sight of the people. The demand for the parliamentary cards and text-books has been remarkable, and is full of promise for the future.

This brief mention gives no adequate idea of the work even in these two states, but until the National superintendent receives reports more promptly it will be impossible to compile even a statistical report that will at all represent the amount of work, nor is it possible for her to aggregate the reports of local superintendents and do even a tithe of justice to the states and nation. Our women work much better than they report, and nothing is more embarrassing than to purport to report when a mere fraction of the work has been presented.

Sisters, let us *re*form and *in*form as we ought.

SCIENTIFIC COOKERY AND NUTRITION.

I have to report that the literature the past year so far as I know has unfortunately been limited to the articles written by Mrs. Abel and myself for THE UNION SIGNAL. My associate, Miss Shapleigh, has had much practical experience this year at the college settlements in Philadelphia and Chicago, concerning food problems. She is informed as to the kitchens established in our principal cities and the special study and adaptation each locality required. We are much gratified to have secured for the convention the paper by Mrs. Ellen H. Richards, and Mrs. Mary Hinman Abel, so suggestive of methods to meet needs. We are chiefly indebted to these authorities for what has been done in the line of work in this country, work which although still in its beginnings is of a quality to be proud of. Any information desired concerning this line of work for home or general application will be gladly supplied to the extent of our ability.

SOUTH DAKOTA.

FIFTH ANNUAL CONVENTION.

One hundred delegates met in Huron to do the yearly business of the South Dakota W. C. T. U. There were present all of the general officers, five vice-presidents, five county presidents and six superintendents. Several of the oldest and most efficient superintendents have removed from the state during the year. As the convention opened the president informed us that word had been received that Franc C. Dunton, president of Day county, was then lying at the point of death.

After the devotional exercises and the usual routine business the reports of the district presidents were given.

The work of the first district had been greatly retarded by the removal of its officers, but had increased its membership by twenty-four, and three counties had held conventions. The second district (Black Hills) sent no report.

Nearly all of the counties in the third district held conventions this year and four of them have all of the departments represented by superintendents.

The fourth district has twenty-nine working unions, seven more than last year. More department work has been done this year than before. The prohibitory law is generally enforced throughout the district.

The fifth district has seventeen unions and three Y's. The unions are helping to enforce the law.

The sixth district has twenty unions, two Y's and one L. T. L. Four unions have been organized during the year and three counties have held conventions.

After the noon-tide hour the delegates were invited into the lecture room of the church where dinner had been prepared for them. Huron knows how to entertain a convention, the knowledge having probably been gained by experience, it, because of the location, being the convention town of the state, and this was its second prohibition convention within six months.

Immediately after the opening exercises in the afternoon the president gave her report. The report showed that 108 addresses had been given, six unions and one Y organized, ten conventions attended, four states visited and 10,534 miles traveled. The modest report of "one legislature attended" brought to every mind the hard, tedious labor at our state capitol last winter, when our beloved president and vice-president by their vigilance and untiring endeavors, saved to South Dakota our prohibitory law.

The corresponding secretary, after emphasizing the fact that her report of unions and membership must be based upon dues paid into the state treasury, reported eighty-seven unions and a membership of 1,232.

The treasurer reported $1,222.98 collected during the year.

The organizer has organized twenty-two unions since last state convention. The largest of these is Gary, with an active membership of thirty-one, and twenty-one honorary members. She has given sixty-six addresses in the state and has raised by subscription $200 for state work.

The editor of the White Ribbon Journal reported 406 names on the subscription list. She also stated that she could no longer do the work on the paper. Propositions were called for, and Mrs. F. M. Swift offered to assume control of the paper, keep it at its present size, reduce the subscription price to twenty-five cents and relieve the state of the financial responsibility. Her very liberal offer was accepted.

After this came the reports of superintendents of departments. These showed much good work done, and a general advance all along the line.

The first evening session was one of unusual interest. Mrs. Bickle, of Pierre, conducted the singing, and little Mabel Bickle sang a beautiful solo, "Where, oh, where is Heaven!" Miss Stella Bloodgood presented Mrs. Cranmer an elegant gavel tied with a beautiful white ribbon, in behalf of the Huron union. The delegates were then extended a cordial welcome by the local union, the city, the educational institutions and by the clergy. Rev. Burtt, of the Congregational church, who spoke for the clergy, closed by saying that he welcomed us, not only in behalf of the good and the pure, but in the name of him who is a victim of appetite and of her who has fallen into an impure life, and in the name of all those in the city who are burdened by sin and need our help.

Mrs. Cranmer then gave her annual address. It was spoken of on all sides as an address of unusual literary merit, while it was also a comprehensive review of the year's work. Among other things, she said that "The foundation of our work is the evangelistic department. The union or white-ribboner that would prosper must build on no other foundation than this." Speaking of a visit to the Anchorage Mission in Chicago, she said: "Our aim should be to render such a refuge unnecessary in our state, but that condition is not yet reached, and except in perhaps a few private homes, there is no light in a window for any repentant girl. Too often the light shines out from some parlor window for her unrepentant companion. Soul has no sex. Heaven will be full of surprises. Oh, that the dawning of the twentieth century might usher in one code of morals for women and for men."

Concerning enforcement of law she said: "Never was there a time in the history of our state when more active, practical, positive courage in temperance work was needed more than now. 'Enforce the law' should be the battle-cry of every temperance man and woman. To do less is criminal. To fail means the legalized saloon. . . . If the strength of the government depends on the execution of its laws, are we strong? Here comes the test. In this last proposition is the quicksilver which separates the gold from the dross and shows our richness. Are we of the metal that acids cannot dissolve and fire cannot consume? Can we go through the furnace and come forth pure and bright? We are being assayed. What will be the result?

"An election to office somehow affects the spine and men become spineless. It affects the nerves and nerve prostration is the result. Gold dust produces blindness; the love of position weakens backbone until a large number of our officials are in a pitiable condition, and the only remedy is for these sick ones to be given a complete and perpetual rest when election day comes round."

On Sunday morning and again on Sunday evening the people of Huron showed their interest in and appreciation of our work by closing their churches and gathering in the opera house to listen to addresses by Clara C. Hoffman, of Missouri. Her subject in the morning was, "Our Legacy for the Future." Rev. Abi T. Huntly, an ordained Congregational minister and a delegate to the convention from Wessington, conducted the devotional exercises. Mrs. Hoffman's evening subject was: "What Hinders the Victory?"

Quite a flurry was caused during the Monday morning session by Rev. Koffman, of Milbank, rising and asking permission to address the convention. Ten minutes was granted him. He spoke very enthusiastically on the nationalization of the liquor traffic, and when he asked that a vote be taken to show how many were in favor of it, a score of women were on their feet at once, and most of them talking. For a time it resembled the average convention of men as to lack of order, but finally some sensible woman suggested that a negative vote be taken. This was done, and the reverend gentleman had but two supporters.

Monday afternoon Mrs. Professor Hood, of Huron, was introduced and gave an instructive paper on physical culture. Mrs. Hoffman was also with us during the afternoon session, and aided many times by practical suggestions. In the evening Mrs. Hoffman spoke on "Women from a Bible Standpoint."

Tuesday morning the old officers were all reëlected, and Tuesday afternoon was devoted to resolutions, and the "last things" of the convention.

The convention was one of harmony and will long be remembered as one of the most successful annual meetings ever held in our young state, while the plans there laid, and the encouragements received, must be felt in our work for the coming year.

CONNECTICUT'S CONVENTION.

Another yearly gathering of the white-ribbon host of this state was held in New Britain, November 14, 15, 16, and was a very busy, interesting session. The commodious and beautiful edifice in which we met, the South Congregational church, was placed at our disposal and we found its comfortable parlors, ante-rooms and dining-room most convenient. The good people of the city welcomed us heartily and entertained us royally. Every one was kind; even the electric cars were run out of the ordinary course for us and the officials were most accommodating. The city is pleasantly situated and has many delightful drives.

Of course, the convention was one continued feast of good things, from the moment when Mrs. Forbes, the president, dropped the gavel and pronounced the well-known mandate, "Convention is called to order," till the closing hymn was sung as we stood hand clasping hand and the sweet familiar words filled the air, "God be with you till we meet again."

The first day was bright as were all that followed, and the usual routine of opening proceeded rapidly. The platform was decorated with flags, flowers and banners. Delegates arrived on every train from all parts of the state, and when the convention opened between two and three hundred were in attendance. Mrs. Forbes said in opening: "It does my heart good to look into your faces and see that so many have assembled at this, the first meeting of our twentieth convention. It shows such interest that I am sure this will be a most successful gathering. I am glad also that we are met together in this city, in the heart of our state, a great educational center, but above all, the city of all others which has taken the right stand on the temperance question." (New Britain, at last city election, went no-license by a large majority.)

A devotional service followed, and after a prayer by Mrs. Herr the officers and superintendents answered the roll-call by a text or sentiment. Committees were appointed and echoes from the World's and National Conventions were presented by Mrs. FitzGerald, Mrs. Downs, Mrs. Fenner and Mrs. Webb. Reports from superintendents followed, and all reported increased interest.

A children's mass-meeting was held at four o'clock by Mrs. FitzGerald, who presided in her own inimitable way. A chalk talk was given by Mrs. Clara M. Leete. This service was held in the Swedish church, and it was packed, many wearing the blue ribbon; the singing was excellent. Two little misses recited, and all the children seemed interested. Rev. J. H. James presented a huge package of literature.

Tuesday evening the church was crowded, every seat being filled. The opening number was singing by a male quartette, the Rev. Mr. Sandwell read the Scriptures and Rev. Dr. Stidham offered prayer. The first address of welcome was given by the Rev. Dr. Cooper, who made us welcome in a pleasant and cordial address. Mayor Walsh gave a fine tribute to the organization that wears for its badge the snowy knot of white. Mrs. Wood, president of the local union, said very sweetly her womanly words of greeting and as sisters bound by the same bonds bade us welcome to all the hospitality of the city.

Miss Hannah A. Babcock, of the Pawcatuck union, responded, speaking of New Britain as seated on the rock of prohibition. She ascribed the result of the recent election due in some degree to the work of the W. C. T. U. "What we need," she said, "is to have womanly sentiment coined into law. The little word, male, should be stricken out of the elective franchise."

Mrs. J. K. Barney, of Rhode Island, delivered a fine address on "Clean Hands." She gave a thrilling picture of the old Jewish rite of purification after a man had been slain within the limits of the city and forcibly compared it with the present method of legalizing the selling of liquor, which is murder of a different kind, killing both soul and body. During her address she delivered a scathing arraignment of our national legislative and municipal officers and did not even hold that the churches were entirely guiltless. Rev. Dr. Cooper pronounced the benediction and thus the exercises of the evening closed.

Wednesday morning a devotional service was conducted by Mrs. Holmes, and the business of the day commenced with the decision of the convention to accept the act of legislation incorporating the W. C. T. U. On motion of Mrs. Downs, the old by-laws and constitution were adopted by the corporation. Mrs. Caroline B. Buell addressed the convention briefly, and was warmly received. Other business and reports of superintendents occupied the time till eleven o'clock, when Mrs. Barney gave a Bible reading from Isaiah 5. One lady said in regard to it, "If I had gone to the convention the whole three days and heard nothing except that Bible reading I should have felt that I had spent my time well."

In the afternoon a memorial service was held in memory of the members of the organization who had died during the year. Mrs. Herr conducted the service, and Miss Gladding sang at its close, "He giveth His beloved sleep."

The routine of business was again resumed, and the secretary's report showed gain in every county. There are now three thousand nine hundred and thirty-seven members in the state. The treasurer's report was also encouraging; a balance of $347.05 is now in her hands.

The president's address was as it always is, of intense interest to the delegates, but of course, too long for insertion here. A brief resumé, however, will not be out of place. She first gave a few words of reminiscence, speaking not only of the union but of the Loyal Temperance Legion, and the onward steps each had taken. She told of the long and exciting fight to secure the passage of the scientific temperance instruction bill. Of Mrs. Hunt's aid she said: "Without her wisdom, experience, consummate tact, persistence and discretion we should have failed." Our president modestly said nothing of her own untiring efforts, but most of us know that she was indefatigable and tactful and probably was the cause as much as any one, of the successful result. She then reviewed the subjects of school suffrage, police matrons, purity in literature and art, our state paper and finances. She also spoke of our incorporation and the Temperance Hospital, dwelling upon the most important phases of each. It was a fine address, spirited and fitted to inspire us to greater effort.

The Y's now had the floor, and for an hour were permitted to use the time for their own interests. Miss Cheney, the superintendent, gave her report; Miss Etta Aston, of Rockfall Y, gave a recitation, and Miss Olive A. Smith, from the same society, read an original paper entitled, "Gleanings from the National Convention," referring to some of the things said about the Y's, and done by them. Miss Ria Cornwell, of Middlefield, sang a solo, and a recitation by Miss Cheney closed the hour.

Several clergymen spoke, and Miss Laura Smith, a daughter of Mrs. J. B. Smith, of New Britain, former president of Hartford county W. C. T. U., was introduced and spoke a few words. Miss Smith is about to go to South Africa to engage in missionary work and was presented with two souvenir spoons by the ladies of the convention.

In the evening the church was again filled to overflowing with people eager to hear Mrs. Hunt lecture on scientific temperance instruction. The seats on the center aisle in the front of the church were reserved for the invited guests of the convention; those on the side aisles and in the rear being occupied by the delegates and visitors. The exercises opened with music, Prof. R. P. Paine rendering a selection on the organ. The Rev. Dr. Young read the Scripture and Rev. Dr. Cooper offered prayer. C. E. Wetmore and Miss Jessie Leigh sang a duet. Professor Camp, of the state normal school, was introduced and spoke a few words. Mrs. Hunt was then introduced and spoke at length on her special topic.

Thursday morning was filled with the closing business, the most important being the election of officers. The officers were reëlected and enthusiastically greeted. In the afternoon the ladies gave their "first experience at the polls." The county banner was awarded to New Haven county for having made the greatest gain per cent in membership, and thus ended the twentieth convention of the Connecticut W. C. T. U.

SIDE NOTES.

A mallet and block were presented to the president by Mr. Israel Brown, of New London. The mallet handle is of orange wood from Florida, the head of black walnut from the Kentucky Hermitage, and the block from Connecticut maple.

Thursday afternoon little Allie Kemble was introduced as the youngest W. C. T. U. member in the state. Her mother died when Allie was two years old and dying wished her to be made a member; she is now six years of age, a fair, blonde-haired child, and was greeted with great enthusiasm.

NEWS IN A NUTSHELL.

THE Michigan superintendent of narcotics, Mrs. G. S. Bradley, has changed her address from Hudson to 207 Union street, Hillsdale, Mich.

MRS. C. M. WOODWARD was taken very ill in Chicago at close of National Convention, but is now recovering. This has occasioned delay in the issuing of a new plan of work and circular letters for the railway department, which she hopes now to be able to prepare for publication.

EVERY one who knows the great-hearted George W. Bain and his noble wife will join in warmest sympathy on hearing of the great bereavement which has come in the loss of their beloved daughter, Laura Bain Morrison, who passed from her earthly home in Lexington, Ky., November 29. Mrs. Morrison was prominent in good works, being the wife of Rev. H. C. Morrison, of the Southern M. E. church, with whose pastoral duties she warmly coöperated as far as her physical strength and family cares would permit. Her death was a spiritual triumph.

THE Railroad Temperance Association of Omaha, Neb., No. 7, and members of No. 2 of Council Bluffs, Iowa, united in an all-day Thanksgiving service at Rescue Hall, Omaha, with results that will forever be blessedly remembered by many. Miss Hester A. Miller, president of association No. 7, presided. Mrs. C. M. Woodward, National superintendent of railway department, was present the entire day, giving all possible help. Another association will soon be formed, if present plans succeed, among employés in railway offices in Omaha, including also trainmen.

HERE is an earnest message from a temperance worker, which came too late for the Crusade-Christmas number of THE UNION SIGNAL: "If the Crusade days were so powerful for good when there were so few of us, what a wonderful power we ought to be now when there are so many of us and so well organized all over our own country and in many places around the globe. I do not think there was ever any good reason why we should have ceased active crusading. There is far more need of active work now than in early days. Why not make these the beginning of better days and again begin the Crusade? Of all years this is the year the drunkard and his family needs us to work in His interest and it cannot be done quicker and in a more effective way than by the old-fashioned Crusade."

Cor. Secy's Notes.

[This department is established for the benefit of the workers, the entire two hundred thousand who make up the busy W. C. T. U. hive. It is hoped that the interchange of thought between the National corresponding secretary and the local, county, district or state officers, which here finds expression, may stimulate to renewed effort and lead to a closer bond of union. Extracts from letters will be given, questions answered and difficulties explained. It will be an "Open Parliament" to which all are welcome.]

Thanks, dear friends, for your expressions of gratitude for the establishment of the column for notes. Your words are gratefully appreciated. It has been said that "Paul always enjoyed a companion." "Paul and Timothy, Paul and Silas," are his words, knowing well, as he did, that Paul was more than Paul when with one of like spirit—Timothy more than Timothy, and so on. So one W. C. T. U. woman quickens another, and many a discouraged soul may receive an uplift from one who has been victorious in like circumstances, or whose sympathy helps her to bear her trials. It is for such contact—that we may know more of one another, appreciate each other's labors better, and withal, knowing that "the prayer of the righteous availeth much," that we may be so kindled that we can present our sisters in arms of faith unto Him who alone can meet their every condition and need—that this column is established.

From Colorado come cheering reports of the work of our National evangelist, Mrs. R. J. Trego, who has been in that state since our National Convention, and is now in Greeley conducting a series of evangelistic meetings, having been invited by the pastor and official board, who preferred a W. C. T. U. woman. During the last ten days thirty-eight have been added to the church, and as many more await an opportunity to unite with the people of God, while other churches are being enriched by the outpouring of the Spirit.

Mrs. Mary Sparkes Wheeler is rejoicing over the Lord's blessing upon her work recently in California. Mrs. Harriette Walker is at South Manchester, Conn., proclaiming the "glad tidings of great joy." These women are not wholly engaged for the coming year, and if addressed without delay will make arrangements with unions or churches for 1894. The charge made by them for their services is so small that you have but to call them to your community, give earnest heed to preparation of heart for the coming of the blessing and make every necessary arrangement whereby your time and thought may be given to the work during their stay. The Lord waits to be gracious, and when His spirit is in the hearts of the people they will gladly aid you in meeting necessary expenses.

Our organizers are up and doing. Mrs. Maude L. Green, the famous chalk-talker, and Miss Ida Clothier, a pioneer in Y work, are, in association with Miss Dickson, Y superintendent of the state of Indiana, going from place to place and speaking to large audiences. Visits to the states of New York, New Jersey and Pennsylvania will follow, and states en route, or bordering upon the states mentioned can avail themselves of this opportunity to secure their services.

Mrs. E. A. Blair, chalk-talker for the Loyal Legion department, is in California and we learn made fine impression with her pictures and stirring facts at the Sunday-school convention at Pasadena, and there is desire that she speak in every Sunday-school in Los Angeles.

Mrs. F. E. W. Harper expects to spend part of the winter in Ohio and will gladly aid in work among her people and in wit, pathos and sense Mrs. Harper is par excellence.

Superintendents are never behind. The mother heart of Mrs. T. W. Merrill, of Portland, Me., superintendent of the department for securing homes for homeless children, is deeply moved for the needy little ones found in all our states at this time of great financial depression. This is a line of work that can be carried on without platform assistance and although interest might be greatly enhanced by an address from Miss Lucia E. F. Kimball, lecturer for the department, any locality feeling the need of the work can prosecute it without outside help, except from the superintendent, who will gladly render any possible assistance, Surely remembering the love of "Our Father" for His children and our heart thirst for His love, and the tenderness of Christ when upon earth for the "little ones," no state can afford to be without this department, but in the spirit of the Master all will "suffer the little ones to come unto them," and will not "forbid them" by failure to provide.

New York is the recipient of rare good fortune through the generosity of the W. C. T. U. state superintendent of peace and arbitration, who writes: "County and local unions in the state of New York desiring lectures on peace and arbitration may be supplied with an address from Emilie U. Burgess or some other speaker, by defraying traveling expenses and furnishing entertainment." Apply to Sarah W. Collins, 57 East 55th street, New York City.

A Merry Christmas and Happy New Year to all. "Merry" in the coming of the Christ-child, who is now our risen Saviour, and "Happy" that He permits us to be "co-laborers with Him."

MARY A. WOODBRIDGE.

Organizers' Corner.

STATUS OF ORGANIZERS.

The mistaken idea prevails in many portions of the country that a National organizer is fitted only to organize new unions, whereas she must be a public speaker as well, especially prepared to enthuse and instruct the masses in regard to the distinctive features of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. She must be a woman of tact, consecration and knowledge of our many departments, willing to enter difficult fields, enlist new workers, strengthen and enlarge unions already formed as well as organize new ones, and instruct in regard to our special methods. Our National organizers are carefully selected by our National executive committee, and elected by the Convention.

By the coöperation and concerted action of the state and county officers, the stronger unions may help the weaker, and greatly benefit their own work by employing the National organizers while going to and from their distant fields of labor, thereby reducing their traveling expenses, which will enable them to give lower rates at each point.

The following is the list of National organizers for the present year, and whether W's or Y's they are all accredited public speakers and fully prepared to organize W's, Y's, L. T. L's, or speak to the general public and add to the membership of unions, having been long in the work.

This "Corner" may be obliged to try several positions before it finds just the niche it can best fill, but it is the desire of the editors of THE UNION SIGNAL, and of the chairman of the board of organizers, that the list of names be kept standing in the paper, and that each organizer feel free to insert an itineracy of her engagements.

Mrs. Helen L. Bullock writes: "I am sure no one more fully appreciates the kindly action of THE UNION SIGNAL toward the National organizers than do the women who are earnestly working to lengthen the cords and strengthen the stakes of our grand organization, and I have no doubt their corner will often contain items of interest from the field. Since our convention, home duties have demanded my attention much of the time and I shall be unable to go to distant fields before the last of March. Meantime I will be glad to make a few engagements for a few days in New York or Pennsylvania. After March 20th I can go to any portion of the country where I am needed for four or five weeks. I have engagements in Maine from May 15th to June 20, 1894, and could answer a few calls in the east before or after that work. Last month I gave some public addresses in New York and Pennsylvania in the interest of rescue work for girls, and addressed one teachers' institute in the interest of scientific instruction, so I am not idle although just now needed on the home guard."

Treasurer's Corner.

[We wish every white-ribboner could sit down in the treasurer's office and read the letters that bring the dimes in response to our president's appeal. Occasionally a dollar bill would cheer your heart, but whether ten cents or a dollar, the words of love and sympathy for our leader and for the National W. C. T. U. that accompanies the gifts are encouraging. Many good brothers are remembering us with gifts.]

Eighty-four letters Monday and every one had an enclosure. The grief of my heart is that I cannot answer every letter that brings a dime from a loving heart, but our office force would have to be greatly increased in order to do it. Every name is recorded and in cases where money is sent by the treasurer of a union, we shall send receipt, but we trust those good friends who send ten, twenty and forty cents will not expect an answer.

One writes that if we will extend the time until after the holidays, many will send. There is no limit as to time. Miss Willard said, "Do it and be done with it," but we all know how many calls come at Christmas time and how busy you all are, and the dimes will be as welcome in January as they are in December. A lady who was helping me to count, record and bank the dimes, said: "I think it wonderful that so many take the time and find the dimes so near Christmas."

One lady writes: "I have been waiting for The Union Signal to tell us how to send dimes safely by mail." I received six in a letter to-day laid between two old postal cards and evidently each was held in place by a drop of mucilage or white of egg. Another lot were sewed between pieces of cloth and wrapped in a sheet of paper. Many coins come in stiff pasteboard with holes just the size of the coins to be sent. But a better way is to collect among your friends enough to make a dollar or two which can be sent in a letter, but if near a post-office it is safer to register. I received a letter from a good sister with one dollar in currency and fifty cents in stamps and the letter had never been sealed. That speaks well for Uncle Sam's officials.

Such a good letter comes from an Illinois woman that I will give it to you:

"When I first knew that the National was so largely in debt I was appalled and said: 'With the present depressed state of the finances and the many calls to charity, we never can pay that indebtedness.'

"But when this beloved letter from our 'Leader' came with the soothing balm of the 'ten cents' business, my soul cried out in joyfulness, 'Why, the payment of the debt is insured already! for who that reads this letter can withhold the ten cents?'"

A good friend and brother from Ohio sends $1.50 and writes: "My wife's mother collected all this. She is not in good health but has done what she could." Accompanying this was a list of fifteen names and "only two are white-ribboners." Who can tell how much good this collecting tour has done? May the dear sister be blessed in this good deed.

A money order from Raisin Valley, Mich., for four dollars—ten cents for each member of the union—was a cheering response to Miss Willard's call.

One from Missouri writes: "I send my pittance (10 cents) 'in His name.' How I wish I could send dollars instead of cents. I send it with a fervent prayer." Your prayer, my sister, will bring the dollars.

"I presented Miss Willard's appeal to our union and each one there cheerfully responded," writes a sister from Prescott, Ark. Let the appeal be read in every union, so all may have an opportunity to help.

"My little boy and girl want to send their ten cents to help kill 'old Moloch' as they call King Alcohol. I enclose one dollar," says a New Jersey woman.

One dear woman sends her "thankoffering with a broken heart." Her husband, pastor of a loving church, has recently been called to his home above. Our hearts sent up a prayer that this mourning one might be comforted. She does not forget to do good and will surely be blessed.

NEW BOOKS.

Among the Calendars for 1894 are two choice styles. One from E. P. Dutton & Co., New York, has twelve pages of leatherette, edged with gold, is beautiful in a rich simplicity that is yearly gaining ascendancy over the more elaborate decorations of the past. On each page is the calendar for the month, a rare poetic selection and a fitting illustration, all in the most delicate colors. Each page is a bit of art in itself, and worth preserving after the tale of the month's days is told. Size 8½x11 inches.

With less thought for decoration, but none the less beautiful in dainty design is the Silver Cross Calendar published by the International Order of The King's Daughters and Sons, 158 W. 23d St., New York City. The calendar is not unlike last year's but is much handsomer, in fact, the best yet issued by the society. It contains the Daily Scripture readings, choice selections, and on three pages, beautiful reproductions from Old Masters. The decorative colors are red and gold, and it is printed in red, gold and brown, on Imperial Japan Vellum paper, manufactured at the Insetsukioku of the Imperial Japanese government.

The Quarterly Illustrator inaugurates with the current number the second year of its successful existence. It has made an army of friends for itself during the past twelve months, and seems to be a welcome visitor wherever taste and culture reign. The most flattering commendations have been accorded it by artists, publishers, the general public and the press throughout the country. It has scored a great success in illustrated journalism, and stands to-day among the leading pictorial periodicals of the land.

Published by Harry C. Jones, 92, 94 and 96 Fifth avenue, New York.

Prominent among the series of "American Reformers" edited by Carlos Martyn, is the life of Henry Ward Beecher by John Henry Barrows. This masterly pen has done truest justice to "the Shakespeare of the pulpit," and given to the world a book that will not only be read by Mr. Beecher's contemporaries, but will carry itself into history because of its value in setting before coming generations in the best possible dress, the life of this great man. The style is analytical as well as descriptive and the character study is inimitable.

Funk & Wagnalls Co., New York City.

The Petrie Estate, by Helen Dawes Brown, is one of the most charming stories of the season. It has the exceptional characteristic of having maintained throughout the happy medium which is ever the key to success. It has just enough sentiment to season its sober thoughtfulness, just enough romance to offset its modern business-life phraseology, and just enough mystery to lend charm to its very American matter-of-factness. The characters are good from first to last; the style is excellent, and underneath the whole story is a breath of social reform that accords well with the thought-trend of the day.

Houghton, Mifflin & Company, Boston and New York.

The Guiding Hand, or, Providential Direction. Illustrated by Authentic Instances. Recorded and collected by H. L. Hastings, editor of The Christian.

The foregoing statement is almost sufficient to recommend the book in question, for Mr. Hastings gives to his reading public only that which is strong and sweet. The Guiding Hand is a handsome volume of nearly four hundred pages filled with narratives of providential direction over human actions. Of the authenticity of these incidents Mr. Hastings says: "Many of these accounts are known to be true, and all are believed to be worthy of credence."

Published by H. L. Hastings, 47 Cornhill, Boston, Mass.

The Young Man, a monthly journal and review, edited by F. A. Atkins and W. J. Dawson, and published by S. W. Partridge & Co., 9 Paternoster Row, E. C., London, England.

This English magazine maps out for itself a fine program for 1894, including contributions from Dr. Joseph Parker, Rev. Hugh Price Hughes, Archdeacon Farrar. Character sketches, Biblical articles, short stories, serials and able discussions on matters of world-wide interest will make this periodical an invaluable one. The Young Woman is a companion magazine to the foregoing, edited by F. A. Atkins, and published by the same firm. Mrs. Oliphant, Mrs. Josephine Butler, Lady Henry Somerset, Frances E. Willard, Mrs. Hugh Price Hughes, Mrs. Bramwell Booth, the Countess of Aberdeen and other brilliant writers are among its contributors. The magazines are attractive in make-up and thoroughly worthy wide patronage.

A String of Amber Beads, by Martha Everts Holden, better known to the world of literature as "Amber." Fairer than the pretty bauble they are named for and reflecting a lovelier radiance than that thrown back by the sunny shine of an amber bead, is the collection of thought gems from the pen of this ready writer. Brief, bright essays or bits of conversation, as they read more like, on every day themes, touching, mirth-awakening, eloquent, humorous, witty, sharp, or dreamy—varied as the moods that chase each other over the minds of genius, are the styles of Amber's expression. One thing alone remains absolute and that is her originality.

Charles H. Kerr & Company, Chicago.

The New Era, or, The Coming Kingdom, by Rev. Josiah Strong, D. D., General Secretary of the Evangelical Alliance for the United States of America. Though the notice of this book has been seriously delayed, the book itself is of an enduring character and notice concerning it cannot fail to be "timely." It deals particularly with the second of the two great commandments given by our Lord, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself"; or, as He himself again put it, in stronger terms, "A new commandment I give unto you, that ye love one another as I have loved you." Taking this commandment as a basis, it raises the science of Sociology to its highest plane, treating it from a Christian, instead of a mere humanitarian point of view. The author frankly admits the failure of the church to reach the masses, but his book is constructive instead of destructive, in that it suggests motives and methods which, if carried out in a Christlike spirit by the church acting in unison, must result in not merely saving individual souls, but in saving society and the world, thus advancing "The Coming Kingdom."

Published by the Baker & Taylor Co., 740 and 742 Broadway, New York City.

More than one hundred and sixty of the leading minds of the world will contribute their best thoughts to Dr. Barrows' great work on the Parliament of Religions. The Catholic papers of Cardinal Gibbons, Bishop Keane, Father Hewitt, Rev. Dr. Byrne, Prof. Wade, and other scholars and divines of the elder faith of Christendom, were admirable in spirit, powerful in teaching, and of a masterly sagacity in recognition of human brotherhood under all of the faiths of mankind. Dr. Theodore T. Munger's paper on Christianity in Literature, Prof. Terry's on the sacred books of the world as literature, Dr. Briggs' summary of advanced criticism of Hebrew scripture, Prof. Estlin Carpenter's paper on the need of a better conception of revelation, Dr. Lyman Abbott's on religion essentially characteristic of humanity, Dr. Moxom's argument for immortality, Prof. Goodspeed's study of the dead religions, Dr. Washburn's kindly survey of Mohammedanism, Rev. Mr. Slater's similarly sympathetic review of Hindu ideas, and Rev. Mr. Candlin's powerful plea for union among Christians as a moral support to mission work, not to mention other notable papers, would alone make a book almost unexampled in significance and interest.

The Parliament Pub. Co., 90–92 Dearborn St., Chicago.

Last year the Bancroft Company established themselves in the Auditorium building, Chicago, for the express purpose of producing in print and pictures, the best work on the great Columbian Exposition. They sent East and to Europe for the best artists, and set up an entire plant for drawing, photographing and engraving. Being in the field long before the Exposition opened, they prepared in every way to paint this wonderful panorama true to life. In many respects The Book of the Fair, by Hubert Howe Bancroft, has no competitor, and can have none. To enter into details regarding its plan is obviously impossible. Not only have the buildings and the exhibits of the Exposition departments their special curios and educational attractions, but the commonwealths of the United States and the foreign countries present miniature worlds in themselves. All are reproduced true to life. There are also scores of unclassified features, such as those grouped and massed along Midway Plaisance. Then again, are presented the intellectual and religious traits of all nations, such as center around the World's Congress Auxiliary. To clearly place this vast panorama before the public, is a work worthy of the highest ambition; but the Bancroft Company is accustomed to great enterprises and to carrying them to a successful issue. Six parts of this elegant work have been received and are more than worth the one dollar per part which subscribers have put into them. The twenty-five parts will make a unique library of art and literature that will hardly find its equal. Agents are hard at work canvassing and the books are receiving a wide patronage.

TO OUR SUBSCRIBERS.

DEAR FRIENDS:—As the year 1893 draws to a close, we are zealously watching the subscription lists of THE UNION SIGNAL, and with gratitude we record that the renewals for November exceed those of any month since the opening of the Columbian Exposition.

It seems needless to allude to the paralyzing of business by the financial distress of the past season, so apparent are its effects throughout the entire land, yet we desire to emphasize the fact that in these days of enforced retrenchment the lists of THE UNION SIGNAL prove that our National organ is believed to be one of the necessities of every interested worker for God and Home and Humanity.

It has been said that financial depression is invariably followed by religious zeal; why not by an awakening in the cause to which we are pledged: The closing of the saloon, the reforming of the drunkard, the prohibition of the liquor traffic?

Why not arouse the community in which you live by placing in every family THE UNION SIGNAL for 1894?

We shall be pleased to send to you sample copies for free distribution, and will you not in return send to us new subscribers, and help us swell our list to 100,000 names?

We are endeavoring constantly to improve THE UNION SIGNAL, and to do this costs money, but we desire to keep the price of subscription unchanged, hoping that at the low sum of $1 per annum, it may find its way into thousands of new homes.

Who could measure the ever-widening influence of THE UNION SIGNAL, if each subscriber would make to us the New Year's offering of only one new name, and can you think of a better, more effectual way for advancing the temperance cause?

With thanks for your support and coöperation in the past, pledging ourselves to renewed efforts on your behalf, we are

Yours very sincerely,
CAROLINE F. GROW,

EVERY ONE CONTEMPLATING THE STUDY OF SHORTHAND

Should read the following liberal offer of the National School of Shorthand, at Washington, D. C. By the terms here offered any girl or boy, young man or woman, who desires an opportunity to become proficient in this now almost universally necessary branch of education, can do so at very little expense. Almost any one can find FIVE new subscribers for THE UNION SIGNAL, and for those five new subscribers we will send them a paid-up scholarship in this school of shorthand. It makes no difference where you are located, as the instruction is by mail. The regular price for one month's instruction is $5, but with a little effort on the part of any one desiring to learn shorthand this expense may be saved for the first month. A knowledge of shorthand has now become so necessary to those who intend to be clerks, bookkeepers, teachers, secretaries, lawyers, ministers or business men and women, and affords so easy and ready a method for a young man or woman who desires to do so, to better their condition and position in life, that it needs no advertising to show its importance or its advantages.

The system taught in this school is the PITMAN, which is the one used by reporters in both Houses of Congress, the Supreme Court, in all departments of the Government, and generally throughout the United States. Any person with a fair idea of the correct spelling and pronunciation of words can learn shorthand, and, once thoroughly mastered, no one need be without employment, as the demand for good shorthand writers is increasing every day.

To all readers of THE UNION SIGNAL who desire, or who have friends who may desire the course of instruction, we would say: Set to work at once, secure five subscribers and receive this scholarship. The offer is for only one month's instruction, but to those desiring to continue after the expiration of the scholarship, special terms will be offered whereby the course may be completed without any expenditure of money.

The price of THE UNION SIGNAL is $1 per year. Send five new subscriptions to THE UNION SIGNAL, and we will send you a receipt for one month's instruction in the NATIONAL SCHOOL OF SHORTHAND, Washington, D. C. Address whichwe have been preparing for our workers and all making a collection of spoons. Could it be more complete in design? It shows the beginning of the Great Reform in the bowl, where is pictured the little Crusade Church in Hillsboro, whence it sprang.

The culmination is emblemized in the World, belted with the White Ribbon at the extreme end, while the Medallion of the President of the National and the World's W. C. T. U. is embowered in the National Floral Emblem, the trailing arbutus.

On the reverse side are the World's Floral Emblem, the water lily, as also are the initials of the great Official Publishing House, which secured the production of the spoon.

Of course, every one will want one or more of these spoons—want them for personal use and as gifts. And we have decided to reduce the profits on the same to the lowest point of safety, so as to enable more to buy them.

Around the World With Jesus.

By CHARLES A. CRITTENTON. This charming booklet describes the Holy Land and contains a sketch of Florence Crittenton Missions by Charlton Edholm, superintendent of press of World's W. C. T. U. Price 35 cents.

As is well known by white-ribboners, Mr. Crittenton, the famous evangelist, already largely supports eight Florence Crittenton Missions for the rescue of erring girls, and at the Denver convention pledged $5,000 to the W. C. T. U. for founding five more missions under their auspices. These are now being established, and every cent realized from the sale of "AROUND THE WORLD WITH JESUS" will be given to the Florence Crittenton Missions, and every one whose heart throbs for our erring girls may aid the grand work for their redemption by circulating this little souvenir. It contains beautiful pictures of Mr. Crittenton, Miss Willard, Lady Henry Somerset, and Mother Prindle, Matron of New York Mission, all white-ribboners, and it cannot fail to interest all.

Brilliants from Frances E. Willard.

is the title of a dainty volume in which are compiled the choicest thoughts of that gifted woman The book contains twenty engravings, which make it attractive as well as helpful. Board covers in white and gold and gray cloth, 60 cents.

Touching Incidents and Remarkable Answers to Prayer.

By REV. S. B. SHAW. Cloth, $1.

This book is neither doctrinal nor denominational, yet distinctly Christian. Its high religious tone, its fascinating spirit and the high rank of its contributors, make it a strong faith tonic and an inspiration to prevailing prayer.

The Well-Dressed Woman.

By HELEN GILBERT ECOB. Illustrated. Cloth, $1.

This is a work which appeals to every intelligent mother. It is valuable in its exposition, both in text and illustrations, of the artistic ideal and rules of dress, and is full of the best of advice for school-girls, young women at college and young mothers. Miss Willard and the whole corps of earnest workers in the W. C. T. U. are very hearty in their indorsement of this book, and it should be in the hands of every sensible woman.

Bright-Eyes

Or, Pleasure and Profit for Sunday Afternoon. Arranged by ALICE M. GUERNSEY. Price, 50 cents.

This pretty little quarto is ingeniously devised, so as to suggest to children, by means of outline pictures, the work of searching the Scriptures in order to find the passages which the vignettes chime in with. It will be of service to many a mother, or older sister, or brother, on a Sunday afternoon, in the endeavor to teach or interest the little ones.—Central Christian Advocate.

A Young Woman Journalist.

By FRANCES E. WILLARD. Cloth, $1.

A book designed by the author to stimulate other young women to "be something," to make the most of their opportunities.

A Woman's Evangel.

By EVA KINNEY GRIFFITH. Price cloth, $1.25

"This book will interest and benefit many readers. It has some literary merit, but its special feature is the fact that it is written to explain and advocate the various kinds of effort in behalf of total abstinence which the Woman's Christian Temperance Union is making. The many members of, or sympathizers with, that influential organization will read it with approval, and so will others."—The Congregationalist.

Columbus, and What He Found.

By MRS. MARY H. HULL. Price $1.

This is a wonder-tale filled with all the romance and truth of the great event of America's discovery, and told for young readers in a pure yet thrilling manner. There is already a large demand for this unique child's history among parents and teachers who desire to answer authentically all questions and controversies which come to the ears of children. Columbus will be always with us as much a feature in the future as Washington, being the step beyond Washington and the home-nation into the great mother, Europe, and the beginnings of the child Columbia. This book is filled with patriotic enthusiasm.

Child's Christ Tales.

By ANDREA HOFER. Price $1.

In teaching little folks the Christ example by story, no book will help so much as this. It is written from the kindergarten standpoint, and full of deep, sweet truths simply told.

Publisher's Notes.

PRESERVED IN THE RECORD.

Proceedings of the World's Parliament of Religions now Easily Obtainable.

Half the value of the "World's Parliament of Religions" would be lost if no permanent record of its proceedings had been kept. It is estimated that the total of words contained in the various speeches reaches the enormous figure of 2,000,000 words, or more than the Bible contains. Some of these words may be of dubious value, but all of them were uttered in good faith and in the heat of profound convictions. The speakers were representatives of all the historic faiths, Christian and Jewish, Mohammedan, Hindu, Confucian, Buddhist, Shinto, Jain, Brahmin, etc., all were gathered on one platform in response to an invitation to come and present in terms of frankness, but courtesy, the claims of their faith upon the respect and confidence of mankind. The most learned and pious came from the four corners of the globe. There was absolute freedom of speech, but no jarring or contention. They who heard the addresses heard the religions of the world in all their manifold forms presented by their ablest exponents. This impression would now be lost had not the addresses, papers and speeches been reduced to print, and so preserved for all time. The result is a compendium of information whose value it would not be easy to overestimate.

We have procured this record, and are able to offer it to our readers at the nominal sum of $1 for the entire set postpaid. Part I sent on receipt of 10 cents.

Oak and Ivy Leaf.

The Crusade and Christmas number of the Oak and Ivy Leaf is out and ready for special orders. On the first page is the benign face of dear "Mother Thompson," and we are confident every Y in the land will wish to look upon this "Saint in Israel," and lay at her feet the tribute of reverence, by ordering this number as a gift to friends. The strength, the character, the purity and beauty of soul which beams forth from the eyes of dear Mother Thompson, are a sacred message to the sweet girls who will thank us for reproducing this beautiful face. On page 3 is a soul-stirring letter in honor of our twentieth anniversary, signed by "your Crusade Mother," and dated Hillsboro, November 17, 1893. A greeting from the National superintendent, Mrs. Frances J. Barnes, practical suggestions for the observance of the Crusade anniversary; familiar "Silhouettes," and "The Story of the Crusade," by Frances H. Ensign, are the partial list that goes to make up this exceptional number of a most desirable little paper.

If there is a Y or a young "W" who as yet has not become familiar with the face of this journal-friend, that person is behind the times. Generous Y unions will order this issue in quantities for distribution, and enterprising Y's will discover many ways of beguiling the small subscription price from the pockets of their numerous "brothers-in-law."

SOMETHING YOU NEED
...WELLS PASSAGE INDICATOR...

EXPLANATION.—Fig. 1 shows a separate Indicator leaf, with a thin brass base pasted into the parchment leaf, the ends of which project. (See 4, 4, Fig. 1.) The leaves can be taken out and put in any part of the Bible, the projecting ends going under the elastic cord (Fig. 2, 1, 1,) which passes around the Bible going through the ends of the side pieces (2, 2) and the middle or center piece x at 3. By untying the elastic cord the device can be removed.

From the many commendations received we mention the following:

"Just the thing for Bible Readings, saves time in finding the passages."—Ex-Gov. John P. St. John.

"Having a set of the 'WELLS BIBLE PASSAGE INDICATORS' in use, I most heartily commend them as helpful in the study of the Word, and especially in giving public Bible Readings."—Mary A. Woodbridge.

Dirt defies the king:—

If the old proverb be true, SAPOLIO is greater than royalty itself: Try it in your next house-cleaning: Grocers keep it.

DO YOU LIVE IN GREASE?

As a true patriot and citizen you should naturalize yourself by using the best inventions of the day for removing such a charge. To live in Grease is utterly unnecessary when SAPOLIO is sold in all the stores, and abolishes grease and dirt.

PATENTS

FOR INVENTIONS.

Equal with the interest of those having claims against the government is that of INVENTORS, who often lose the benefit of valuable inventions because of the incompetency or inattention of the attorneys employed to obtain their patents. Too much care cannot be exercised in employing competent and reliable solicitors to procure patents, for the value of a patent depends greatly, if not entirely, upon the care and skill of the attorney.

With the view of protecting inventors from worthless or careless attorneys, and of seeing that inventions are well protected by valid patents, we have retained counsel expert in patent practice, and therefore are prepared to Obtain Patents in the United States and all Foreign Countries, Conduct Interferences, Make Special Examinations, Prosecute Rejected Cases, Register Trade-Marks and Copyrights, Render Opinions as to Scope and Validity of Patents, Prosecute and Defend Infringement Suits, Etc., Etc.

If you have an invention on hand send a sketch or photograph thereof, together with a brief description of the important features, and you will be at once advised as to the best course to pursue. Models are seldom necessary. If others are infringing on your rights, or if you are charged with infringement by others, submit the matter to us for a reliable OPINION before acting on the matter.
